"On the basis of his past performances with pledges to the people, you may expect we will be at war by April 1941, if he is elected."

Roosevelt in 1932 had been challenged to explain how he could balance the Federal budget and provide the Federal relief to the unemployed which he also promised. He had answered that he was "utterly unwilling that economy should be practiced at the expense of starving people." Nor was the managed currency system he had installed synonymous with "unsound money." The Roosevelt record was not as vulnerable to this kind of attack as the record of the majority of Republican Congressmen and Senators.

Roosevelt's most famous "oversimplification" came on October 30 in Boston when he said to "the mothers and fathers":

"I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again: Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars. * * * The purpose of our defense is defense."

It could hardly be thought he lied regarding his intentions. But the whole truth required more complex formulations than those plain words. Defense of the United States as Roosevelt conceived it required a strategy of cooperation with one group of belligerents to prevent the other from winning the war. Such cooperation made the question of attack on the United States pertinent to discussion. The President often reaffirmed his determination to aid the Allies and China, but he did not always qualify his promises to the "fathers and mothers" with the platform clause "except in case of attack." On this occasion he had been urged to include the clause once more, but he had refused, saying: "Of course we'll fight if we're attacked. If somebody attacks us, then it isn't a foreign war, is it? Or do they want me to guarantee that our troops will be sent into battle only in the event of another Civil War?"

It was a fair assumption that the "unneutral" acts of the United States would not be the determining factor in an Axis decision to attack the United States, but such acts would be likely to determine an earlier date for an attack. Neither Willkie nor Roosevelt took up such delicate calculations.

Willkie promised to outdo Roosevelt in aid to Britain and equally ignored possible effects on Axis policy. Both Willkie and Roosevelt reflected the determination of the great majority of Americans to help defeat the Axis, short of participation in the war, while thinking as little as possible of the likelihod that the Axis would not acquiesce in defeat on America's terms.

Robert Sherwood has written from firsthand experience of the hysterical letters and telegrams that flooded the White House and Democratic headquarters in response to Willkie's turn, late in October, from support of the bipartisan foreign policy to charges that Roosevelt plotted war. It seemed to the President's advisers that, after the failure of the Axis alliance to frighten Americans, Willkie was attempting to terrorize them into a stampede along the road which led to Bordeaux and so to Vichy even before the Panzers arrived on our home soil. * * * Sherwood confesses that it was he who, on the presidential train to Boston on October 30, the day Willkie in Baltimore made his prophecy of war by April if Roosevelt was elected, and to satisfy urgent pleas from the mothers and Democratic leaders, told Roosevelt to say "again and again and again" that the boys were not going to be sent into foreign wars.

This is the most that can be said for the unfortunate passage: it did not originate with Roosevelt as a vote catcher but was imposed on him by others who demanded that he allay the public panic Willkie created. Still it was ridiculed and thrown up to him by the isolationist press and speakers so often in following months that it nullified to a great extent in the public mind all the more reasoned formulations of policy that preceded and followed it, and Roosevelt felt constrained in 1941 to regard it as his most binding commitment to the American people.

A SET OF CONTRADICTIONS

Hull's worst suspicions of Japan were correct. In his communication to Nomura on October 2, he reiterated the four principles to which Japan claimed to subscribe. He specifically stated that the U.S. Government had no purpose of discussing details. Rather it was the set of contradictions between principles avowed and applications proposed by the Japanese Government that caused the difficulty. They were, he said, "a source of disappointment." He pointed them out one by one. He asked for further clarifications of the Japanese proposals:

"From what the Japanese Government has so far indicated in regard to its purposes this Government derives the impression that the Japanese Government has in mind a program which would be circumscribed by the imposition of qualifications and exceptions to the actual application of those principles.

If this impression is correct, can the Japanese Government feel that a meeting between the responsible heads of government under such circumstances would be likely to contribute to the advancement of the high purposes which we have mutually had in mind?" Hull ended with strong assurances that the President hoped a meeting with Konoye could be held.

WAKASUGI'S "MISTAKE"

Convincing evidence presently came from the Japanese themselves that it was they who made impossible Grew's "constructive conciliation," that they insisted upon appeasement as the only purpose of a Roosevelt-Konoye meeting. Japanese officials in Tokyo and Washington consumed many hours in explaining to Americans that the October 2 statement mystified them because Hull had not made known precisely what the United States would consider proper bases for a Roosevelt-Konoye meeting. But Ambassador Nomura on October 9 admitted in a conference with officials of the State Department that he himself had noted "some contradictions" of the agreed-upon principles in the Japanese proposals for implementing them. He thereupon made a frank justification of those contradictions.

Mentioning that the Japanese public had suffered the sacrifices of 4 years of war, the Ambassador said that his Government would necessarily have to present to the Japanese people some reward for that sacrifice or some attractive alternative gain.

The Americans replied that Japan stood to gain more by following a "progressive and constructive program of peace in the entire Pacific than by any other course," but the Japanese showed no comprehension of that alternative.

Nomura was no diplomat, and his inadvertencies of the sort quoted above probably explain his virtual supersedure in November by Kurusu. But he had only put into words what was apparent to Hull if not to Grew: that Japan allowed the United States no alternative to appeasement.

Attempts of other Japanese officials, quite skilled in diplomacy, to plead ignorance of American desires and mystification by the statement of October 2, also broke down. The Minister-Counselor of the Japanese Embassy, Wakasugi, had recently returned from Japan, and, on October 13, in conversation with Under Secretary Welles, he at first repeated the refrain that the Japanese Government found it impossible to learn what "in reality" were the desires of the United States. Then Wakasugi not only specified those desires with the greatest clarity, but seemed to promise that the Japanese Government would satisfy them. He said the Japanese promise in the draft proposal not to undertake further aggressive action could be made without the qualification "save for justifiable reasons," because that phrase "was entirely unnecessary and could readily be withdrawn." He said the Japanese Government would be "entirely willing" to meet the American objection to omitting China from the commitment in favor of commercial equality in the Pacific region. Wakasugi asked whether the United States could not agree to leave to Japan "discretion" in interpreting its obligations under the Axis alliance. He realized a new Cabinet might interpret its obligations differently, but the present one was the only Cabinet which could be set up that would desire to remain at peace with the United States if the United States entered the European war. He said that the Japanese Government was "willing to evacuate all of its troops from China." Welles thought he had misunderstood this last statement, but Wakasugi repeated it twice. Welles was furthermore assured that all the "controlling" Japanese generals and admirals fully supported the Japanese Government in desiring to make a "comprehensive and satisfactory" agreement with the United States.

Wakasugi emphasized to Welles that he spoke unofficially. But his statements on aggression, trade, and evacuation of China hit the precise points of the chief objections of Hull and Roosevelt to the Japanese proposals of September 6 and 22, and, since he had just returned from Japan, where he had presumably learned the views of his government, his statements to Welles on October 13 demolished the pretense that the Japanese did not understand what the United States in reality wanted.

Wakasugi said he believed his government must reach a final decision within 24 or 48 hours. Grew was informed of Wakasugi's remarkable statements to Welles. On October 15 he talked with the Japanese Vice Minister for Foreign Affairs off the record, but, as Grew reported to Washington, along lines largely parallel to the Wakasugi-Welles conversation on October 13. A day later, October 16, the Konoye cabinet fell and the Pearl Harbor government took power with Gen. Hideki Tojo as Premier and Shigenori Togo as Foreign Minister.

Wakasugi promptly changed front. He had appointments with Welles on October 16 and 17, and the Under Secretary took him to Hull for conversations on both days. According to Secretary Hull's memorandum, Wakasugi sought to keep in harmony with his talks with Under Secretary Welles, but he actually hedged on the main points of evacuating China, nondiscrimination in the whole Pacific, and interpretation of the Axis alliance. The net result was to return the situation to the impasse preceding Wakasugi's strange statements to Welles on October 13. The tone of Hull's memorandum makes obvious the Secretary's impatience with Wakasugi's zigzag. If the October 13 unofficial statements meant anything, the new government of Tojo repudiated them. Hull wrote: "The upshot * * * left us with the view that the new Japanese Government would have to speak next and before we had further serious conversations with their representatives here."

The October 13 statement of Wakasugi might have been taken more seriously but for several circumstances. Toyoda had already told Grew on October 10 that because Ambassador Nomura seemed "very fatigued" a diplomat of wide experience would be sent to Washington to "assist" him. This was as much as to say that the existing Japanese delegation in Washington was repudiated. The fall of the Konoye Cabinet was already in sight. Japan was sending large new contingents of troops into Indochina, building new airbases there, and displacing the Vichy French administrators with Japanese officials. This, as the Japaness Government was told, constituted "a complete negation of the spirit and letter of the undertakings which the Japanese Government expresses willingness to assume." Magic intercepts showed that Germany, after Roosevelt's September 11 "shoot on sight" order, applied extreme pressure on the Japanese Government. One of Foreign Minister Toyoda's last acts was to send Nomura instructions, amounting to a weak version of German demands, that the United States be warned of trouble with Japan if the United States continued to "attack" the Axis Powers.

In the light of these ominous events, Wakasugi's statements to Welles take on the appearance of a mistake arising from the confusion attendant upon the impending fall of Konoye. Far from working for agreement with the United States, the Konoye government in the main was attempting to stave off its overthrow by conceding to the demands of the militarists. The "mistake" is nevertheless an extremely valuable part of the record. First, it proves that the Japanese knew precisely what was necessary to bring about a Roosevelt-Konoye meeting and settlement with the United States. Second, the "mistake" and Japan's draft proposals prove that the Japanese consciously designed the escape clauses in the draft proposals to leave no room for Grew's policy of "constructive conciliation" short of American cooperation to help Japan win the fruits of aggression.

THE LAST CHANCE?

The coming to power of Tojo ended talk of a meeting between Roosevelt and the Japanese Premier. The administration in its efforts to maintain the secrecy of the negotiations, efforts insisted upon by the Japanese who feared the effects of publicity in rousing the militarists, had publicly denied that Prince Konoye had "invited" Roosevelt to a Pacific conference. It was true that the stage of issuing an invitation was never reached. Beard treats the administration's uncommunicativeness as part of its plot to deceive the public by maintaining false "appearances." In his exposition of the "realities" of the affair, Beard declares that Roosevelt and Hull not only pursued the "usual policy" of secrecy, but employed "dilatory" methods. Ambassador Grew's arguments in favor of "constructive conciliation" are Beard's chief evidence in support of his implication that Roosevelt and Hull wanted no reasonable settlement with Japan. But it is noteworthy that after carefully implanting in his reader's mind suspicion that Roosevelt and Hull deliberately rejected a reasonable opportunity for a settlement with Japan, Beard disclaims responsibility for arousing such suspicion by remarking that sufficient documents are not available for judgment. He admits that it is possible to find bases for argument for as well as against Roosevelt's refusal to meet Konoye. Beard excuses his own failure to use the documents that are available because the "'solution' of this insoluble 'problem'" lay outside the "purposes and limitations" of his book. After calling the Roosevelt-Konoye affair "momentous in the history of American relations with Japan," Beard's evasion of the problem, which would seem to be no more insoluble and is far more adequately documented than most of the problems he claims to solve, is disappointing.

Perhaps Beard had been discouraged by the statement in the minority report of the Pearl Harbor Joint Committee, that to go into the issue of the wisdom of the Roosevelt administration in its conduct of relations with Japan, "would involve the committee in the complexities of history extending back more than 50 years and in matters of opinion which cannot be settled by reference to anything as positive and definite as the Constitution, laws, and established administrative practices of the U.S. Government."

Besides, the question was excluded by the terms of the committee's instructions. But the committee did not fail to develop information on the subject in order to "understand the questions involved."

Morgenstern, more bold than Beard, examined evidence found by the committee and other documents, and came to very clear conclusions. "Diplomacy," he writes, "failed because diplomacy was not employed to avert war but to make certain its coming." His chief "evidence" is that administration officials were aware that imposition of economic sanctions against Japan involved a risk that Japan would use force to obtain the raw materials it needed. This is certainly true, but it is a long distance from this to the statement that the administration imposed sanctions because the policy contained a risk of war. Morgenstern set out to prove more: that the Roosevelt administration made certain that war would result.

Perhaps one example of Morgenstern's interpretations will suffice to illustrate his extreme version of the isolationist thesis regarding the Roosevelt-Konoye meeting. He writes that Hull's statement to Nomura that preliminary terms would be discussed with China, Britain, and the Netherlands "demonstrated unmistakably that this country already had an alliance, admitted or not, with China and the western imperialisms and was conducting its diplomacy much more with the view to protecting their interests than its own." Hull's actual purpose was to assure China, Britain, and the Netherlands that the United States would not betray to Japan their rights or territories. The American policy involved was antiappeasement, which had been proclaimed time and again by Roosevelt and Hull as a policy designed primarily to serve the self-interest of the United States. Incidentally Beard, although he approved Morgenstern's book, found in the documents reason to "put a stop to the vulgar saying: 'The United States was raking British chestnuts out of the fire.'"

It cannot be admitted that with Konoye's fall the last chance of avoiding war with Japan disappeared. If the Roosevelt administration had been willing to support Japan's past and future program of aggression, the Tojo government would very likely have been happy to drop the plan to attack the United States, at least temporarily. The actions of Roosevelt and Hull lead one to assume that they believed the risk of new Japanese aggressions was preferable to a profoundly immoral Far Eastern Munich. History had proved that appeasement was not only immoral but also that aggressors could not be permanently appeased. The most that could have been accomplished by a Far Eastern Munich was to postpone a little longer new Japanese aggressions. This was no temptation for Roosevelt and Hull because it would be more than balanced by the degradation of the American and all free peoples, because it would violate the American commitment in the Lend Lease Act to aid peaceful nations against aggression, and because it was in any case politically impossible: the great majority of the American people long since had given up indifference to immorality in international relations.

* * * * *

The chief item used by Morgenstern to support the isolationist thesis that Washington officials knew beforehand Pearl Harbor would be attacked is a series of intercepts beginning September 24, 1941, of messages between Tokyo and the Japanese Consul General in Honolulu. These messages conveyed the anxiety of Tokyo for data regarding the exact locations of warships in Pearl Harbor, and the reports of the Consul General containing full information. Morgenstern neglects to mention that such information was well within the requirements of a Japanese plan of sabotage by Japanese agents. The authorities at Pearl Harbor were prepared against that danger. But Morgenstern himself does not claim to find in any message prior to one dated 7:22 p.m., December 6, and another of a few hours later, 12:42 a.m., December 7, material that "gave away" the secret of a bombing raid. In these messages the Consul General for the first time spoke of air defenses at Hawaii and observed: "I imagine that in all probability there is considerable opportunity left to take advantage for a surprise attack." Morgenstern then comments that after a December 4 intercept of an "east wind rain" execute message, and the long series of Japanese messages from Honolulu to Tokyo, "there could be no question where the attack would come."

This slurs over his own admission that, not the "long series of messages," but only those sent within the last 12 hours before the Japanese planes appeared over Pearl Harbor at dawn on December 7 actually pointed to raiding planes rather than sabotage. The fact that the two messages which did expose the secret were not decoded until December 8, Morgenstern calls "Washington's excuse. * * *." But Morgenstern himself makes this excuse seem extremely plausible. He describes how the give-away messages were intercepted in San Francisco and copies mailed to Washington. Hearing of this Army Signal Intelligence Service ordered the messages to be sent to Washington on a new teletype machine which had been installed that day. When the messages arrived in Washington, translators were called to night duty. But the final and very lengthy Japanese diplomatic mesage was then being intercepted, and the translators worked on it instead. Other messages less indicative of Japanese attack were processed even more slowly.

Such is the best evidence Morgenstern can find that for Washington officials "there could be no question where the attack would come," with its implication that commanders at Pearl Harbor were not ordered to shift from preparations against sabotage to preparations against air attack because Roosevelt, Hull, Stimson, Knox, Marshall, and Stark preferred the more serious loss of life and damage to the fleet that would result from mistaken preparations. For such a terrible implication, Morgenstern at the crucial point can do no better than verify the plain reason why Washington officials did not receive the give-away messages in time, and call the reason an excuse.

THE WRONG FOOT

Another grave accusation of the isolationists is that Roosevelt and Hull so conducted negotiations with Kurusu as to coerce the Japanese into attacking the United States. The assumption is made that if the United States refused to make an agreement with Japan, this amounted to coercion of the Japanese and created a situation in which not the Japanese but Roosevelt and Hull were responsible for the Japanese attack that followed. A necessary corollary of the argument is that Kurusu and the Tojo government did in fact urgently desire not merely an agreement with the United States but one that should have been accepted by Hull and Roosevelt. Charles A. Beard proves at great length that the Japanese did urgently desire an agreement, which was doubtless true. If the Tojo government could gain the objectives of its aggressive program with the cooperation of the United States, it is difficult to believe that sheer quixoticism would have led it to reject such an arrangement and risk defeat in war instead. Even this, however, it may be noted in passing, was the choice of Mussolini when France and Britain offered him his price if he would take it without war.

Beard finds in a Japanese proposal on November 20 for a "truce" or "modus vivendi" an opportunity for Hull, knowing that it was Japan's "last effort," that the American Army and Navy needed time for preparations, and that a two-front war should "if humanly possible" be avoided, to use "supreme diplomatic ingenuity," and "supreme statesmanship" to "keep conversations going. * * *" Hull on November 26 rejected the Japanese proposal. In Beard's view, Hull "for reasons which are nowhere explicit" failed the supreme test of his career and answered the Japanese with what Beard calls "an ultimative notice."

It is now possible to state certain facts of the situation which were not available to Beard. They suggest that he was too hasty in condemning Hull's statesmanship without sufficient data regarding the possibility that it was Japanese statesmanship, or lack of it, that was responsible for the failure of diplomacy and outbreak of war. After the war, the International Military Tribunal for the Far East found in the Japanese archives the story of Japanese purposes and plans. On November 5, an Imperial Conference decided that if the United States did not accep Japan's terms by November 25 (later extended to November 29), Japan would attack the United States. On November 10, the task force which had been organized and trained to bomb Pearl Harbor was ordered to the Kurile Islands and the date of December 7 was fixed for the attack. On November 22, the task force was ordered to proceed from the Kuriles to Hawaii. These actions were taken before Hull answered Japan's "last offer" of November 20. Foreign Minister Togo described the Japanese terms of November 20 as an "ultimatum."

In short, Beard's mistake is that he puts the shoe on the wrong foot. Hull was incapable of issuing an "ultimative notice" to the Japanese after November 20 for the reason that Japan had already issued an ultimatum to the United States on that date, and proceeded to carry out its military threat within two days, before Hull answered its diplomatic threat. Beard would make the Roosevelt administration appear guilty of an aggression in diplomacy which he believes "explains," if it does not excuse, the subsequent Japanese aggression at Pearl Harbor. Actually it was Japan that was guilty of diplomatic as well as military aggression against the United States. Hull knew from Magic intercepts that the Japanese proposals of November 20 constituted an ultimatum involving demands, a deadline, and threat of attack. The only thing he did not know was that the attack was directed at Pearl Harbor or any American territory.

THE MODUS VIVENDI

The Japanese on November 20 offered a draft proposal for a temporary agreement. In the light of the rejection by the Japanese Government, on November 19, of Nomura's suggestion in favor of such an agreement, this proposal must be regarded as the sheerest of hypocrisies designed to occupy the time while the Japanese task force proceeded to Hawaii. Two of the chief issues on which the United States desired settlement, namely, Japan's obligation under the Axis alliance, and economic policy in China and the Pacific regions, were left for later consideration. On remaining issues, Japan offered to make one concession, withdrawal of Japanese troops from southern to northern Indochina, in return for U.S. cooperation with Japan in securing the fruits of aggression in China. Japan asked the United States to stop giving aid to China and to restore economic relations with Japan, including delivery to Japan of a required quantity of oil, while Japan made peace with China. Kurusu had admitted to Hull that peace with China would involve the stationing of Japanese troops there for an indefinite period. Besides providing Japan with American oil to help it impose its will on China, the United States was asked to cooperate with Japan in obtaining for it oil and other materials in the NEI. Japan would promise to make no armed movement southward, but offered no guarantee against aggression northward.

Hull considered that the proposals called for virtually a surrender by the United States. He asked Kurusu and Nomura, as he later wrote, "what they thought would be the public reaction in the United States if we were to announce tomorrow that we had decided to discontinue aid to Great Britain. There was no reply. 'In the minds of the American people,' I continued, 'the purposes underlying our aid to China are the same as the purposes underlying aid to Great Britain.'"

Hull regarded the situation as virtually hopeless. But the military leaders pleaded with him for more time, and therefore Hull and State Department officials sought desperately to work out some counterproposal to keep the conversations going. For a few days a 3-month vivendi was considered. It is noteworthy that it was while Hull worked on this scheme, that the Japanese task force was ordered on November 22 to proceed eastward through the North Pacific to reach Hawaii by December 7. No inkling of this reached American observers or officials in Washington, but ominous movements of Japanese forces into positions where they were poised for attacks against Thailand, Malaya, the Netherlands East Indies, and possibly the Philippines or Guam, were known in detail. On November 24, Army and Navy commanders in the Pacific were warned that a "Japanese surprise aggressive movement in any direction including an attack on the Philippines or Guam is a possibility." This was interpreted in Hawaii to require no change in preparations against sabotage as the chief danger.

President Roosevelt, Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, and other officials helped Hull explore the possibility of a modus vivendi, and he consulted the representatives of Great Britain, China, the Netherlands, and Australia. A Magic intercept from Tokyo to Kurusu and Nomura on November 22 extended the deadline from November 25 to 29. One phrase in it provides the first reason why Hull in the end decided not to make a counterproposal for a modus vivendi. The Japanese Ambassadors were instructed: "Stick to our fixed policy * * *." This could only mean that nothing but complete American surrender to the Japanese proposals would satisfy Tojo. It confirmed Hull's belief that no arrangement that the United States could accept would be acceptable to Japan. The intercepted message ended: "This time we mean it, that the deadline absolutely cannot be changed. After that things are automatically going to happen."

The second reason why Hull decided against the modus vivendi is that the Government of China objected to it and obtained wide support for its objection, including that of Churchill. The final American draft of the modus vivendi called for mutual pledges that the United States and Japan would not advance in the Pacific area by force or threat of force; Japan would withdraw its troops from southern Indochina, and also reduce its forces in northern Indochina to 25,000—a number thought to preclude a campaign to close the Burma Road; the United States would allow limited quantities of American oil, cotton, and other commodities to go to Japan and it would buy Japanese goods; the United States would urge Britain, Australia, and the Netherlands to resume trade similarly with Japan; and the United States affirmed its fundamental position that any settlement between Japan and China must be based upon the principles of "peace, law, order, and justice." Attached to this 3-months' modus vivendi was a 10-point proposal for a permanent agreement.

The modus vivendi drawn up by Hull meant temporary appeasement of Japan insofar as it would give temporary United States approval to Japanese conquests and relax the economic sanctions which the United States, Britain, Australia, and the Netherlands had imposed against Japan during preceding months. The plan must be regarded as a product of the desperation of the Roosevelt administration in its fight for time. Had it been offered to Japan, it would have been a violation of the administration's principle of no compromise with aggression.

Only agreement by China, the Government which would be the chief victim of this appeasement, that the time which might be gained would be worth the sacrifice, would have justified such an offer to Japan. China refused to agree. Churchill supported the Chinese view. After hectic discussions, the decision was reached on the night of November 25 to make no counterproposal of a modus vivendi but to answer the Japanese only with the 10-point proposal for a permanent settlement.

ON THE ROCK OF PRINCIPLE

In this decision the Roosevelt administration met the supreme test of its statesmanship in service of the policy of collective security against aggression. Beard's statement that the decision was made "for reasons which are nowhere explicit" is nonsense; Beard himself recites the evidence that the Chinese Government violently opposed the modus vivendi. He ignores another contributing factor, that is, the futility of offering to Japan, in the face of the intercepted instructions to the Ambassadors to "stick to our fixed policy," an American modus vivendi which would have required Japan to retreat from its "fixed policy," especially in the matter of the number of troops to be left in northern Indochina. Beard does not wish to admit that the one thing which might have justified temporary appeasement of Japan was the consent of China. The Roosevelt administration refused to make a deal with Japan affecting China's fate without its consent. It refused to ignore the rights of China as Chamberlain had ignored those of Czechoslovakia at Munich.

On the rock of this principle, the last possibility of Roosevelt and Hull attempting to postpone the deadline in Japan's ultimatum collapsed. Actually, no such possibility existed. But the administration believed that a possibility still existed that Japan would only attack non-American territory, leaving room for a choice by the United States whether it should enter the war.

No one but an absolute pacifist would argue that the danger of war is a greater evil than violation of principle. It must be concluded that the isolationist thesis involves denunciation of the Roosevelt-Hull decision against the modus vivendi because of the nature of the principle involved. The isolationist believes that appeasement of Japan without China's consent violated no principle worth a risk of war. The internationalist must believe that the principle did justify a risk of war. In short, subjective and a priori attitudes ultimately determine judgment of the Roosevelt-Hull policy. If an observer can be imagined to exist who is "neutral" as between the attitudes of isolationists and internationalists, he might conclude that it did not matter whether or not the Roosevelt administration offered the modus vivendi because the Japanese Government was certain to reject it.

A THIRD CHOICE?

By means of innuendoes rather than overt statement, Beard implies that the Roosevelt administration had a third choice besides appeasement or refusal to appease, and took it: war. He combs the record to find "warlike" statements of the leaders in Washington, and presents them in sinister array entirely out of context. The President and his Cabinet on November 25, Beard writes, "discussed war, not prospects of peace * * *." In Beard's vocabulary, discussion of war is synonymous with a desire for war. Secretary Stimson wrote in his diary regarding a meeting of the "War Council" with Roosevelt on November 25, which was attended by him and Hull, Knox, Marshall, and Stark, that Roosevelt brought up the likelihood that the Japanese, notorious for surprise attacks, would attack the United States within 2 days: "and the question was what we should do. The question was how we should maneuver them into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves. It was a difficult proposition."

Beard quotes this and Stimson's later amplification to the joint congressional committee:

"In spite of the risk involved, however, in letting the Japanese fire the first shot, we realized that in order to have the full support of the American people it was desirable to make sure that the Japanese be the ones to do this so that there should remain no doubt in anyone's mind as to who were the aggressors."

These, and many variations of the theme in discussions in Washington, Beard assembles to suggest that the administration wanted war with Japan. He entitles his final chapter, dealing with the outbreak of war: "Maneuvering the Japanese into Firing the First Shot."

The part of the Japanese Government in maneuvering itself into firing the first shot is not discussed by Beard. The situation as he describes it leads a reader to believe that it was the United States that took the initiative for war during the weeks preceding December 7, while Japan was coerced into beginning a war it had sought to avoid. Stimson's word "maneuver" is magnified out of all relation to the actual position of the two governments in which Japan, of course, exercised the initiative and the United States was forced into a war it had sought to avoid. After creating suspicion in the reader's mind that Stimson and the other leaders knew that the Japanese intended to attack Pearl Harbor, and that they wanted the attack to occur, Beard makes Stimson's use of the word "maneuver" appear to have been an affirmation of the administration's knowledge and desire. But, as has been shown, the administration thought exclusively in terms of a Japanese movement southward. The question was whether the President should ask Congress for a declaration of war prior to a Japanese attack on the Philippines or Guam, in order to avoid giving Japan the advantage of a surprise attack, or wait until Japan attacked U.S. territory, that is, "maneuver" Japan into firing the first shot. Despite much discussion, no final decision to ask Congress for a declaration of war was made. The other course, waiting while Japan might attack the United States, was a "maneuver" only in the sense that it involved avoidance of any action that would make the United States even seem to provoke or justify an attack by Japan. Whereas Beard makes the word appear to mean that the administration took positive actions to coerce the Japanese into attacking, it actually meant that the United States should do nothing that would give Japan an excuse for war.

THE SOUTHWARD EXPEDITION

Beard calls the United States reply on November 26 to the Japanese proposal of November 20 an "ultimative notice." Morgenstern calls it more simply an "ultimatum." The Minority Report of the Joint Congressional Committee declares that Japan "treated" the answer "as an ultimatum," and that Hull on November 28, if not on November 26, knew that it would so treat it. Dramatic proof came on November 25 that it was Japan that had not only issued an ultimatum on November 20 but proceeded to carry out its new program of aggression without waiting for an answer from the United States. On the afternoon of the 25th, intelligence reports to Secretary Stimson stated that five Japanese divisions were moving southwards from Shantung and Shansi toward Indochina or points beyond. If more evidence were needed by the administration that the Japanese Government had no intention of accepting any modus vivendi or any arrangement that would inhibit its program of conquest, this provided it. The President and Hull were sent copies of the report. Morgenstern avoids assessing this intelligence report at its face value by noting that on the next day, when Hull discussed with Stimson his decision to reject the modus vivendi, he "did not refer to the Japanese troop movement." Morgenstern notes that when the President on the 26th heard of the troop movement from Stimson, he said it "changed the whole situation, because it was an evidence of bad faith on the part of the Japanese." But, writes Morgenstern, the Hull answer to Japan that day had already "changed the whole situation."

The United States was actually incapable of "changing the whole situation," no matter what it did short of an attack against Japan, and even this in the circumstances would have been an offensive action only on the level of tactics: Japan had already seized the initiative of the offensive on the higher level of strategy. The Japanese aggressive movement southward was obviously launched well before the Japanese Government expected any reply to its proposal of a modus vivendi. News of it in Washington merely confirmed one of the premises upon which the decision was made to reject the modus vivendi: that Japan acted in bad faith. Beyond this, it is clear now that Japan was willing to expose its bad faith by moving an expedition southward in plain view because it served as a screen for its more stunning act of bad faith in sending the expedition to Pearl Harbor.

Considering the scope of Japanese bad faith, what was hidden from Washington as well as what was exposed, one may call suspicion of Japan, which was the fundamental source of Chinese and all other opposition of the modus vivendi, the highest statesmanship. Had the modus vivendi been accepted, the lowering of guard and injury to morale among all anti-Axis peoples and governments would have invited disaster much more severe than actually occurred. Japan in its diplomacy and its military actions had already launched new aggressions against every Pacific power before the United States had an opportunity to accept or reject the modus vivendi. To search in such a situation for ignorance among Washington officials of the full scope of Japanese aggression in order to fix war guilt on them is ludicrous, especially in view of the charge by the same critics that Washington officials should have been more suspicious than they were of Japanese intentions at Pearl Harbor.

Even if Hull's November 26 answer to Japan had been an ultimatum, it would have been a nullity because Japan had issued one earlier and was acting on it. While it is conceivable that the orders to the Pearl Harbor expedition, and even the southward expedition, could have been rescinded during the days that remained prior to December 7, it is still true that the very act of sending those expeditions in the directions of their respective targets while negotiations proceeded in Washington constituted a threat of war signifying not merely bad faith but that those negotiations took place under the sanction of a Japanese ultimatum.

* * * * *

The purpose of the Senators was to find evidence which would prove the existence of a Roosevelt commitment to Churchill to go to war in case Japan attacked non-American territory. In their minority report they make no reference to the episode. The evidence actually proved that no such commitment existed. But this did not deter Charles A. Beard. He is unable to link the documents in the case with the many commitments he charged Roosevelt with making earlier in the year. That charge in Beard's text is now forgotten. But he makes up a new brief that Roosevelt, on December 6, for reasons unstated, found it necessary to make a new commitment to the British, or at least to Australia, on that Saturday afternoon.

Churchill's proposed warning to Japan, Beard calls "in effect" an "ultimatum," in spite of the fact that it contained no time limit and made Japanese use of force the condition upon which Britain would, not declare war, but take "all appropriate measures." Then, if war resulted, the responsibility would rest with Japan.

Having asserted that the proposed British warning was an ultimatum, with accompanying implications of war guilt, Beard sets out to prove that Roosevelt made a commitment to Minister Casey regarding procedure to be followed in carrying out the British proposal. He makes no reference to the well-established fact that an American warning to Japan had been planned as early as November 28. Beard goes further: he asserts that in his conference with Casey on the afternoon of December 6, Roosevelt "agreed" to send a message to the Japanese Emperor. Then he asks the portentous question: Was the President's message to the Emperor framed to meet his "commitment" to Casey, or was it an "independent action"? The answer, Beard decides, must be "conjectural" because a letter to Hirohito had been "discussed" for many days prior to December 6 by Roosevelt, Hull, Stimson, and Knox.

Thus Beard does his best to rescue for his thesis an image of Roosevelt making a commitment to a foreign government to issue an ultimatum. The "ultimatum" was never sent because Japan violently intervened in the procedure, but this in Beard's book is insignificant compared with the revelation of Roosevelt's guilty intention. The facts in the case are, once more, imbedded in Beard's own text, and, sifted out from his distortions, they plainly show that when Roosevelt was told of the proposed British warning, he merely informed Casey that the American Government had already planned to issue a warning to Japan as part of a program that included a message to the Emperor as an antecedent step. If the plan had been carried out, it would have amounted to no more than "parallel action" of the sort which was traditional in Anglo-American dealings with Japan.

The most revealing aspect of Beard's charge is that in the crucial events of December 6 he can find no evidence of a Roosevelt commitment to Churchill. Beard does not attempt to call Australia's move to obtain parallel action by the United States in issuing a warning to Japan, even when distorted by the words "commitment" and "ultimatum," evidence that Roosevelt had promised Churchill to enter the war if Japan attacked non-American territory. Thus Beard himself abandons one of the main charges in his indictment of the President.

NO FOREKNOWLEDGE

Another main charge in the isolationist thesis collapses in the face of the Roosevelt-Casey evidence. This is Morgenstern's chief preoccupation: that Roosevelt and other officials in Washington knew beforehand that the Japanese were about to attack Pearl Harbor. Why Roosevelt, if he knew what impended at Pearl Harbor, should have been concerned to find a casus belli at Thailand an indefinite number of days after a warning which was planned for delivery to Japan 2 days after the attack on Pearl Harbor, presents a conundrum for Morgenstern which he dismisses as follows:

It is only curious that as late in the day as this Roosevelt should still have been worrying lest the Japanese fail to provide the necessary incident.

Then Morgenstern proceeds casually to ignore this curiosity of Roosevelt's behavior and reassert his thesis. But Morgenstern's failure to offer any explanation of the curiosity is actually an abandonment by him of his thesis that the Roosevelt administration provoked, expected, and maximized the Pearl Harbor attack because it wanted a casus belli. The same thing may be said of the failure of Senators Brewster and Ferguson to mention the Roosevelt-Casey episode in their minority report after they worked so vigorously to obtain the evidence regarding it. The terms of their indictment of the President are more guarded than those of Beard and Morgenstern, confined as they are to charges that the President and his subordinates did not convey proper orders and information to the Hawaiian commanders, and therefore they are not under the embarrassment of reporting that their investigation into the episode revealed the falsity of a more serious indictment.

The minority report, however, exploits its failure to mention the Roosevelt-Casey episode in order to strengthen its basic charge of Presidential failure to order proper defensive dispositions at Hawaii in time for the impending attack. After December 2, the report states, the President fully abandoned the plans to send a warning to Japan and a message to Congress. He only turned to carry out the plan to make an appeal to Hirohito, and this was done after it was too late. The President then adhered to the plan of waiting for Japanese action. This comes very close to the charge that the President consciously allowed the Pearl Harbor attack to provide him with a disastrous casus belli. The fact, which Senators Brewster and Ferguson themselves unearthed, is, of course, that the President did plan on December 6 to issue the warning to Japan, and this was linked from the beginning with the plan to address Congress.

A FINAL QUESTION

For the student of Roosevelt's policy, one question remains. In the expected event that the Japanese expedition moving westward toward Thailand would not immediately attack the Philippines, would the President have followed up unsatisfactory Japanese replies to his letter to the Emperor of Japan and his warning to the Japanese Government with a request to Congress for a declaration of war? The issue would involve a climactic test of Roosevelt's adherence to his policy of collective security, on the one hand, and his antiwar pledge, on the other. No evidence is available for an answer except Stimson's diary record that the group present at the meeting on November 28 agreed that if the British fought, the United States would have to fight. The three-step plan that was then adopted was designed both to fend off the necessity to fight and to present the American Congress and public with an opportunity to judge the issue.

It may be stated with considerable confidence that if public and Congress with something approaching unanimity had asked for war, Roosevelt would have broken his antiwar pledge. But in the more likely case, that isolationism still commended a strong minority in and out of Congress, who denied that a Japanese attack on non-American territory and British entry into the Pacific war justified American entry, it must remain purely conjectural whether the President nevertheless would have asked Congress for a declaration of war. The disappearance from the record of all discussion by him of what might follow a failure of his warning to deter Japan suggests that he left the decision for the event.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, of course, there is no way to know whether these pages are the ones that Mrs. Luce believed would "support the core" of her charges.

Cordell Hull's two volumes of memoirs run to 1,700 pages. Mrs. Luce should know better than to pretend that a reference to 1,700 pages of reading matter constitutes evidence to document her charge that Roosevelt lied.

With Mrs. Luce's own statement of her reliance upon these references, and the opinion of Professor Rauch himself, that the documentation of history shows that it is Mrs. Luce who has abused the facts of history, I believe she has convicted herself, with her own evidence, of gross and inexcusable misrepresentation.

DOCUMENTATION SHOWS EXACTLY THE OPPOSITE

On the contrary, the history of the late 1930's and 1940–41 shows very clearly that President Roosevelt was hopeful and, indeed, anxious that the aggressive dictators could be contained without war, and particularly without war involving the United States.

Mr. President, in that speech President Roosevelt warned of the danger to the entire world from hostile fascism.

Mr. President, I shall read the main excerpts from that great "quarantine" speech in 1937. I shall also quote from some of the other great speeches made by Franklin Roosevelt, because the hour has been reached, here in the Senate, when Democratic Senators need to refresh their knowledge of our country's history under the Roosevelt administration; and I think the Republicans should do so, too.

Mr. President, with that charge by Clare Boothe Luce on the record, against that great humanitarian, against that believer in human rights, against that great apostle of peace, against that man who did everything within honor to try to keep our country out of a war, I believe it important that we document his record; and I intend to do so at some little length, because—and I speak respectfully—I am shocked. I respect the rights of Senators to disagree; and of course that right includes my right to disagree with them. But I would be less than honest to this record if I did not say I am shocked at what appears to be an attitude on the part of some of my colleagues that we should let the nomination "go through."

I do not intend to let it go through without making this record. I do not intend to let it go through with my vote. I do not intend to let it go through without raising my voice, today, to call attention, once again, to the great, patriotic service which Franklin Roosevelt performed for our country in those years when it was so nip and tuck as between peace and war. Let this record speak of some of the highlights of his service, when with great statesmanship he sought to lead our country and the rest of the world down the paths of peace. Time and time again he forewarned us that the dangers were great. Time and time again he pleaded for more support for purposes of defense for the sake of defense. He said, as will be seen by referring to some of his great speeches from which I shall read, that the controlling policy of his administration was defense for defense. But he warned our potential enemies that he did not intend to surrender to the totalitarianism which, in so many parts of the world, was trying to trample freedum under its iron heel.

So, Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to listen to me while I read several excerpts from his great "quarantine" speech in Chicago, October 5, 1937, in which President Roosevelt warned of the danger to the entire world from hostile fascism.

On that occasion he said:

The political situation in the world, which of late has been growing progressively worse, is such as to cause grave concern and anxiety to all the peoples and nations who wish to live in peace and amity with their neighbors.

Some 15 years ago the hopes of mankind for a continuing era of international peace were raised to great heights when more than 60 nations solemnly pledged themselves not to resort to arms in furtherance of their national aims and policies. The high aspirations expressed in the Briand-Kellogg Peace Pact and the hopes for peace thus raised have of large given way to haunting fear of calamity. The present reign of terror and international lawlessness began a few years ago.

It began through unjustified interference in the internal affairs of other nations or the invasion of alien territory in violation of treaties; and has now reached a state where the very foundations of civilizations are seriously threatened * * *.

It is, therefore, a matter of vital interest and concern to the people of the United States that the sanctity of international treaties and the maintenance of international morality be restored.

The overwhelming majority of the peoples and nations of the world today want to live in peace. They seek the removal of barriers against trade. They want to exert themselves in industry, in agriculture and in business, that they may increase their wealth through the production of wealth-producing goods rather than striving to produce military planes and bombs and machineguns and cannons for the destruction of human lives and useful property.

President Roosevelt continued, in that great "quarantine" speech:

I am compelled and you are compelled, nevertheless, to look ahead. The peace, the freedom, and the security of 90 percent of the population of the world is being jeopardized by the remaining 10 percent who are threatening a breakdown of all international order and law. Surely the 90 percent who want to live in peace under law and in accordance with moral standards that have received almost universal acceptance through the centuries, can and must find some way to make their will prevail.

I digress a moment because I want to pin to this record the fact that statements carrying the same meaning contained in that particular portion of the speech of Roosevelt which I have just read permeate the great speeches he made from 1937 to Pearl Harbor.

Reflect on what he said, Roosevelt recognized his great obligations to this country—yes, and to the world— to try to find some basis, with honor, on which men would lay down their weapons and proceed to settle their differences without the use of arms. And so he said:

Surely the 90 percent who want to live in peace under law and in accordance with moral standards that have received almost universal acceptance through the centuries, can and must find some way to make their will prevail.

Then he went on and said:

It seems to be unfortunately true that the epidemic of world lawlessness is spreading. When an epidemic of physical disease starts to spread, the community approves and joins in a quarantine of the patients in order to protect the health of the community against the spread of the disease.

It is my determination to pursue a policy of peace. It is my determination to adopt every practicable measure to avoid involvement in war. It ought to be inconceivable that in this modern era, and in the face of experience, any nation could be so foolish and ruthless as to run the risk of plunging the whole world into war by invading and violating, in contravention of solemn treaties, the territory of other nations that have done them no real harm and are too weak to protect themselves adequately.

We are determined to keep out of war—

Let me repeat it. This is the "quarantine" speech. This is the 1937 speech. This is the beginning of a whole series of speeches and, in my judgment, should give the lie to Clare Boothe Luce's assertion. He said:

We are determined to keep out of war, yet we cannot insure ourselves against the disastrous effects of war and the dangers of involvement. We are adopting such measures as will minimize our risk of involvement, but we cannot have complete protection in a world of disorder in which confidence and security have broken down.

America hates war. America hopes for peace. Therefore, America actively engages in the search for peace.

The Chicago Tribune did not like it. Many other reactionary papers in this country, Mr. President, attacked the "quarantine" speech. But I have always felt, and say today, that I think the famous "quarantine" speech of 1937 laid out the framework, set out the broad outlines, clearly indicated the future course of action which the President of the United States intended to follow if Fascist aggression continued to trample upon freedom.

That is why it saddens me to even have to answer the charge that this great man lied America into a war.

These principal excerpts from that speech, in which Roosevelt so clearly pointed out that no nation, however peaceful it might be, could be confident that peace would continue if it blinded itself to aggressions that were swallowing up other peaceful nations, make a glorious record.

As we know, Roosevelt's "quarantine" speech was largely ignored. The nations of the world showed little interest in keeping the peace through concerted efforts to contain Nazi Germany, Italy, and Japan.

That Roosevelt's policy continued to be one of trying to maintain peace is borne out by his messages to Adolf Hitler on April 14, 1939, and to the Italian Government on August 24, 1939. In the first, Roosevelt called for mutual assurances that the territory and possessions of independent nations would not be attacked, and suggested an international conference at which the problems of disarmament and international trade should be discussed. The appeal was renewed in the August message to the King of Italy.

I ask unanimous consent to have these two messages appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the messages were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
April 14, 1939.

His Excellency ADOLF HITLER, CHANCELLOR OF THE GERMAN REICH:

You realize, I am sure, that throughout the world hundreds of millions of human beings are living today in constant fear of a new war or even a series of wars.

The existence of this fear—and the possibility of such a conflict—is of definite concern to the people of the United States for whom I speak, as it must also be to the peoples of the other nations of the entire Western Hemisphere. All of them know that any major war, even if it were to be confined to other continents, must bear heavily on them during its continuance and also for generations to come.

Because of the fact that after the acute tension in which the world has been living during the past few weeks there would seem to be at least a momentary relaxation—because no troops are at this moment on the march—this may be an opportune moment for me to send you this message.

On a previous occasion I have addressed you in behalf of the settlement of political, economic, and social problems by peaceful methods and without resort to arms.

But the tide of events seems to have reverted to the threat of arms. If such threats continue, it seems inevitable that much of the world must become involved in common ruin. All the world, victor nations, vanquished nations, and neutral nations will suffer. I refuse to believe that the world is, of necessity, such a prisoner of destiny. On the contrary, it is clear that the leaders of great nations have it in their power to liberate their peoples from the disaster that impends. It is equally clear that in their own minds and in their hearts the peoples themselves desire that their fears be ended.

It is, however, unfortunately necessary to take cognizance of recent facts.

Three nations in Europe and one in Africa have seen their independent existence terminated. A vast territory in another independent nation of the Far East has been occupied by a neighboring state. Reports, which we trust are not true, insist that further acts of aggression are contemplated against still other independent nations. Plainly the world is moving toward the moment when this situation must end in catastrophe unless a more rational way of guiding events is found.

You have repeatedly asserted that you and the German people have no desire for war. It this is true there need be no war.

Nothing can persuade the peoples of the earth that any governing power has any right or need to inflict the consequences of war on its own or any other people save in the cause of self-evident home defense.

In making this statement we as Americans speak not through selfishness or fear or weakness. If we speak now it is with the voice of strength and with friendship for mankind. It is still clear to me that international problems can be solved at the council table.

It is therefore no answer to the plea for peaceful discussion for one side to plead that unless they receive assurances beforehand that the verdict will be theirs, they will not lay aside their arms. In conference rooms, as in courts, it is necessary that both sides enter upon the discussion in good faith, assuming that substantial justice will accrue to both; and it is customary that they leave their arms outside the room where they confer.

I am convinced that the cause of world peace would be greatly advanced if the nations of the world were to obtain a frank statement relating to the present and future policy of governments.

Because the United States, as one of the nations of the Western Hemisphere, is not involved in the immediate controversies which have arisen in Europe, I trust that you may be willing to make such a statement of policy to me as the head of a nation far removed from Europe in order that I, acting only with the responsibility and obligation of a friendly intermediary, may communicate such declaration to other nations now apprehensive as to the course which the policy of your Government may take.

Are you willing to give assurance that your armed forces will not attack or invade the territory or possessions of the following independent nations: Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, Great Britain and Ireland, France, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Poland, Hungary, Rumania, Yugoslavia, Russia, Bulgaria Greece, Turkey, Iraq, the Arabias, Syria, Palestine, Egypt and Iran.

Such an assurance clearly must apply not only to the present day but also to a future sufficiently long to give every opportunity to work by peaceful methods for a more permanent peace. I therefore suggest that you construe the word "future" to apply to a minimum period of assured nonaggression—10 years at the least—25 years, if we dare look that far ahead.

If such assurance is given by your Government, I will immediately transmit it to the governments of the nations I have named and I will simultaneously inquire whether, as I am reasonably sure, each of the nations enumerated above will in turn give like assurance for transmission to you.

Reciprocal assurances such as I have outlined will bring to the world an immediate measure of relief.

I propose that if it is given, two essential problems shall promptly be discussed in the resulting peaceful surroundings, and in those discussions the Government of the United States will gladly take part.

The discussions which I have in mind relate to the most effective and immediate manner through which the peoples of the world can obtain progressive relief from the crushing burden of armament which is each day bringing them more closely to the brink of economic disaster. Simultaneously the Government of the United States would be prepared to take part in discussions looking toward the most practical manner of opening up avenues of international trade to the end that every nation of the earth may be enabled to buy and sell on equal terms in the world market as well as to possess assurance of obtaining the materials and products of peaceful economic life.

At the same time, those governments other than the United States which are directly interested could undertake such political discussions as they may consider necessary or desirable.

We recognize complex world problems which affect all humanity but we know that study and discussion of them must be held in an atmosphere of peace. Such an atmosphere of peace cannot exist if negotiations are overshadowed by the threat of force or by the fear of war.

I think you will not misunderstand the spirit of frankness in which I send you this message. Heads of great governments in this hour are literally responsible for the fate of humanity in the coming years. They cannot fail to hear the prayers of their peoples to be protected from the foreseeable chaos of war. History will hold them accountable for the lives and the happiness of all—even unto the least.

I hope that your answer will make it possible for humanity to lose fear and regain security for many years to come.

A similar message is being addressed to the Chief of the Italian Government.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

AUGUST 24, 1939.

(The following is the text of a communication, dispatched yesterday by the President and delivered today to the King of Italy by Ambassador Phillips.)

Again a crisis in world affairs makes clear the responsibility of heads of nations for the fate of their own people and indeed of humanity itself. It is because of traditional accord between Italy and the United States and the ties of consanguinity between millions of our citizens that I feel that I can address Your Majesty in behalf of the maintenance of world peace.

It is my belief and that of the American people that Your Majesty and Your Majesty's Government can greatly influence the averting of an outbreak of war. Any general war would cause to suffer all nations whether belligerent or neutral, whether victors or vanquished, and would clearly bring devastation to the peoples and perhaps to the governments of some nations most directly concerned.

The friends of the Italian people and among them the American people could only regard with grief the destruction of great achievements which European nations and the Italian nation in particular have attained during the past generation.

We in America having welded a homogeneous nation out of many nationalities, often find it difficult to visualize the animosities which so often have created crises among nations of Europe which are smaller than ours in population and in territory, but we accept the fact that these nations have an absolute right to maintain their national independence if they so desire. If that be sound doctrine then it must apply to the weaker nations as well as to the stronger.

Acceptance of this means peace, because fear of aggression ends. The alternative, which means of necessity efforts by the strong to dominate the weak, will lead not only to war, but to long future years of oppression on the part of victors and to rebellion on the part of the vanquished. So history teaches us.

On April 14 last, I suggested in essence an understanding that no armed forces should attack or invade the territory of any other independent nation, and that this being assured, discussions be undertaken to seek progressive relief from the burden of armaments and to open avenues of international trade including sources of raw materials necessary to the peaceful economic life of each nation.

I said that in these discussions the United States would gladly take part. And such peaceful conversations would make it wholly possible for governments other than the United States to enter into peaceful discussions of political or territorial problems in which they were directly concerned.

Were it possible for Your Majesty's Government to formulate proposals for a pacific solution of the present crisis along these lines you are assured of the earnest sympathy of the United States.

The Government of Italy and the United States can today advance those ideals of Christianity which of late seem so often to have been obscured.

The unheard voices of countless millions of human beings ask that they shall not be vainly sacrificed again.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, those two messages are part of the chronology, it seems to me, of the fine record this great President made in trying, with honor, not only to avoid war, but to lead those who were engaged in war and threats of war to a peaceful solution of their difficulties. Throughout that era of the Roosevelt period his own speeches and his own official papers are replete with attempt after attempt to obtain a peace; but at no time did he ever fail to make clear that there was a point beyond which the United States would not go. Time and time again he made clear, in official document and in speech, that we could be pressed too far. But the record of his restraint, his statesmanship, his great adeptness, his diplomacy in his relations with the heads of other states during those very difficult times, Mr. President, is one of his great records.

I shall refer next to the campaign speech in New York City on October 28, 1940, in which Roosevelt dwelt mainly on foreign policy, warning the American people of the dangers they faced, despite our national desire to remain at peace. He said:

In July 1937, Japan invaded China.

On January 3, 1938, I called the attention of the Nation to the danger of the whole world situation.

It was clear that rearmament was now, unfortunately, a necessary implement of peace. I asked for large additions to American defenses. Yes, I was called an alarmist—and worse names than that. I have learned by now to take it on the chin.

In March 1938 German troops marched into Vienna.

In September 1938 came the Munich crisis. German, French, and Czech armies were mobilized. The result was only an abortive armistice.

I said then: "It is becoming increasingly clear that peace by fear has no higher or more enduring quality than peace by the sword."

Three months later, at Lima, Peru, the 21 American Republics, including our own, solemnly agreed to stand together to defend the independence of each one of us.

That declaration at Lima was a great step toward peace. For unless the hemisphere is safe, we are not safe.

Matters in Europe grew steadily worse. Czechoslovakia was overrun by the Nazis. General war seemed inevitable.

Yet even then, in the summer of 1939, the Republican leaders kept chanting, "There will be no war."

A few months later—on the first of September 1939—war came.

The steps which we had carefully planned were put into effect.

American ships were kept from danger zones.

American citizens were helped to come home.

Unlike 1914, there was no financial upheaval.

Very soon, in a few weeks, the American Republics set up at Panama a system of patrolling the waters of the whole Western Hemisphere, with success.

I am asking the American people to support a continuance of this type of affirmative, realistic fight for peace. The alternative is to risk the future of the country in the hands of those with this record of timidity, weakness and shortsightedness or to risk it in the inexperienced hands of those who in these perilous days are willing recklessly to imply that our boys are already on their way to the transports.

I shall now insert the excerpts from the Boston speech discussed by Robert Sherwood, in which Roosevelt promised that American boys would never be sent to fight in a foreign war. The date was October 30, 1940:

I cannot help but feel that the most inexcusable, most unpatriotic misstatement of fact about our Army—a misstatement calculated to worry the mothers of the Nation—is the brazen charge that the men called to training will not be properly housed.

The plain fact is that construction on Army housing is far ahead of schedule to meet all needs, and that by January 5, next, there will be complete and adequate housing in this Nation for 930,000 soldiers.

And so I feel that, very simply and very honestly, I can give assurance to the mothers and fathers of America that each and every one of their boys in training will be well housed and well fed.

Throughout that year of training, there will be constant promotion of their health and their well-being.

And while I am talking to you mothers and fathers, I give you one more assurance.

I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again:

Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars.

They are going into training to form a force so strong that, by its very existence, it will keep the threat of war far away from our shores.

The purpose of our defense is defense.

It is that part of the speech, Mr. President, in which President Roosevelt said, "I have said this before, but I shall say it again and again and again: Your boys are not going to be sent into any foreign wars" which apparently was used by Mrs. Luce for her subversive, sinister charge that Franklin Roosevelt lied us into the war.

Why am I taking time this afternoon to discuss these great speeches of Franklin Roosevelt at such great length, starting with the "quarantine" speech of 1937 and going right through to Pearl Harbor? I do so because time and time again Franklin Roosevelt made clear to the American people that he was seeking, with honor, to avoid involvement of this country in war, but time and time again he warned the American people that we might become involved in war, as we finally were. Franklin Roosevelt made clear that his objective was defense for defense, but that he wanted those who were threatening the peace of the world to know we intended to maintain a defensive position so strong that we would maintain our honor and fight if fight we must.

I say the sentence is taken out of context. The entire speech was a speech in which Franklin Roosevelt tried to warn the American people of the great dangers which confronted us. The sentence is taken out of context to seek to give the impression that the one sentence demonstrated there was a sinister, Machiavellian motivation in the recesses of Franklin Roosevelt's mind, through which he was trying to deceive the American people, to mislead the American people, to lie to the American people—and I say that kind of forensic conduct on the part of Clare Boothe Luce is not only subversive, is not only untruthful, is not only sinister, but it places at issue in regard to this nomination—I care not what any Democrat says to the contrary—the issue as to whether the Democrats in the Senate of the United States are going to confirm that type of person to represent this Nation in the Embassy at Brazil.

I care not what rationalization or alibi is used. I care not what language is used to hide the issue. The issue before the Democrats—and the same issue is before the Republicans; but what a greater responsibility we have on this side of the aisle—is whether to stand today and make clear that we will not vote to confirm the nomination of a person guilty of such subversion, of such untruthfulness, and of such unpatriotic service to a diplomatic post, particularly when, I say to my Democratic colleagues, all we have been able to get from her is an apology for intemperate language, but she stands by the charge.

She will not be confirmed with my vote.

I would have the Democratic Senators do a little refreshing of their memories as to the great record of Franklin Roosevelt, starting with the quarantine speech in 1937 and going through his utterances in the 1940 campaign, including the speech in Boston of October 30, 1940.

I say to my Democratic and Republican colleagues in the Senate today that there is nothing inconsistent in that speech, nor even in that single sentence, with Roosevelt's foreign and defense policies, which he had reiterated time and time again in the speeches previously referred to in my remarks this afternoon.

But of particular significance was Roosevelt's concept of hemispheric defense and his concentration upon uniting the American Republics in a common defense policy.

UNSUPPORTED "LIAR" CHARGE MOCKS HEMISPHERIC UNITY OF WHICH ROOSEVELT WAS ARCHITECT

This is one of the factors that makes Mrs. Luce's nomination as Ambassador to Brazil so inappropriate, in my opinion.

As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] pointed out in the Senate on April 17, Brazil was probably the principle contributor to the Allied war effort of all the nations south of us.

President Roosevelt was the architect of the good neighbor policy which made that wartime cooperation and assistance possible. It runs through the excerpts from his speeches which I have placed in the RECORD. It began with his very first inaugural speech of 1933, when he said:

In the field of world policy I would dedicate this Nation to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and, because he does so, respects the rights of others—the neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors.

This policy, applied in South America, culminated in 1938 in the Lima Declaration of American Principles, a declaration designed to express pan-American solidarity in the face of the aggressive threats abroad. I ask consent to have the Lima Declaration appear at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the declaration was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LIMA DECLARATION OF AMERICAN PRINCIPLES, DECEMBER 24, 1938

(This declaration, the somewhat innocuous conclusion of the Eighth Pan American Conference, was designed as an expression of Pan American solidarity in the face of the imperialistic threats from abroad. More important, however, was the refusal of the conference to agree to the American proposal for periodic meetings to discuss common measures of defense. (See G. H. Stuart, "Latin America and the United States, 3d ed.; T. R. Ybarra, "America Faces South"; J. T. Whitaker, "Americas to the South"; E. M. Patterson, editorial, "Democracy and the Americas.")

Whereas the need for keeping alive the fundamental principles of relations among nations was never greater than today; and

Each state is interested in the preservation of world order under law, in peace with justice, and in the social and economic welfare of mankind.

The Governments of the American Republics resolve

To proclaim, support, and recommend, once again, the following principles as essential to the achievements of the aforesaid objectives:

1. The intervention of any state in the internal or external affairs of another is inadmissible;

2. All differences of international character should be settled by peaceful means;

3. The use of force as an instrument of national or international policy is proscribed;

4. Relations between states should be governed by the precepts of international law;

5. Respect for and the faithful observance of treaties constitute the indispensable rule for the development of peaceful relations between states, and treaties can only be revised by agreement of the contracting parties;

6. Peaceful collaboration between representatives of the various states and the development of intellectual interchange among their peoples is conducive to an understanding by each of the problems of the other as well as of problems common to all, and makes more readily possible the peaceful adjustment of international controversies;

7. Economic reconstruction contributes to national and international well-being as well as to peace among nations; and

8. International cooperation is a necessary condition to the maintenance of the aforesaid principles.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to read at this point excerpts from Roosevelt's Pan American Day address of April 14, 1939, in which he warned the European aggressors to keep hands off the Western Hemisphere. I call attention to his words:

The American peace which we celebrate today has no quality of weakness in it. We are prepared to maintain it, and to defend it to the fullest extent of our strength, matching force to force if any attempt is made to subvert our institutions, or to impair the independence of any one of our group.

That resolve was implemented at the Pan American Conference in Havana in July 1940, and I ask to have printed at this point the act of Havana. This agreement was aimed at forestalling Nazi control of Latin America through barter agreements and political and military pressure.

There being no objection, the act of Havana was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

534. THE ACT OF HAVANA—AGREEMENTS REACHED AT THE HAVANA PAN AMERICAN CONFERENCE JULY 29, 1940

(New York Times, July 30, 1940)

The imminent threat of German or Italian occupation or control of French, English or Dutch possessions in the New World and the even more menacing threat of Nazi control of Latin American trade through barter agreements and political and military pressure, led to a notable conference of the American States in July, 1940. Secretary Hull quickly assumed leadership of this conference, and despite the opposition of the delegation from the Argentine succeeded in achieving substantially his objectives.

The text of the convention covering the legal phase of the plan to be acted upon regarding foreign possessions in the New World follows:

"The governments represented in the second consultative meeting of American Foreign Ministers considering:

"That, as a consequence of the acts which are developing on the European Continent, there might be produced in territories or possessions which some belligerent nations hold in America situations wherein that sovereignty may be extinguished or essentially affected, or the government suffers acephalism (becomes headless), generating peril for the peace of the Continent and creating a situation wherein the dominion of law and order and respect of life, liberty and property of the inhabitants disappears;

"That the American republics would consider any transfer or attempt to transfer sovereignty, jurisdiction, possession or any interest or control in any of these regions to another non-American State as contrary to American sentiments, principles and rights of American States to maintain their security and political independence;

"That the American republics would not recognize nor accept such transfer or intent to transfer or acquire interests or rights, direct or indirect, in any of these regions, whatever might be the form employed to realize it;

"That the American Republics reserve the right to judge through their respective organs of government if some transfer or intent to transfer sovereignty, jurisdiction, cession, or incorporation of geographical regions in America owned by European countries until September 1, 1939, may impair their political independence even though there has been no formal transfer or change in the status of the regions.

"That for this reason it is necessary to establish for unforeseen cases as for any other which may produce acephalism of the Government in the said regions a regime of provisional administration, while arriving at the objective for free determination of the peoples.

"That the American Republics, as an international community which acts integrally and forcefully, supporting itself on political and juridical principles which have been applied for more than a century, have the incontestable right, in order to preserve their unity and security, to take under their administration said regions and to deliberate over their destinies in accordance with their respective degrees of political and economic development;

"That the provisional and transitory character of the measures agreed upon does not mean forgetfulness or abrogation of the principle of nonintervention, the regulator of inter-American life, a principle proclaimed by the American Institute, recognized by the celebrated committee of experts on international law which met at Rio de Janeiro and consecrated in all its amplitude in the seventh Pan American Conference held at Montevideo;

"That the community, therefore, has the international juridical capacity to act in such matters;

"That in such a case the most adequate regime is that of provisional administration.

"Desiring to protect their peace and security and to promote the interests of any of the regions to which this (document) refers and which are understood to be within the foregoing consideration;

"Have resolved to conclude the following convention:

"First. If a non-American state attempts directly or indirectly to substitute for another non-American state in the sovereignty or control which that (other state) exerted over any territory situated in America, thereby threatening the peace of the continent, said territory automatically will be considered to be within the stipulations of this convention, and will be submitted to a regime of provisional administration.

"Second. That administration shall be executed—as it is considered advisable in each case—by one or more American States by virtue of previous consent.

"Third. When administration is established over a region it shall be executed in the interest of the security of America and to the benefit of the administered region looking toward its well-being and development, until the region is found to be in condition to administer itself or to return to its former status, so long as this is compatible with the security of the American Republics.

"Fourth. Administration of the territory shall operate under conditions which guarantee freedom of conscience and faith with the restrictions demanded by the maintenance of public order and good habits.

"Fifth. The administration shall apply local laws, coordinating them with the objectives of this convention, but it may adopt in addition those decisions necessary to solve situations concerning which no such local laws exist.

"Sixth. In all that concerns commerce and industry the American Nations shall enjoy equal conditions and the same benefits, and the administrator never shall create a situation of privilege for himself or his compatriots or for any particular nations. Liberty of economic relations with all countries on a basis of reciprocity shall be maintained.

"Seventh. The natives of the region shall participate as citizens in the public administration and tribunals of justice, with no other consideration than that of competence.

"Eighth. Insofar as possible rights of any kind shall be governed by local laws and customs, acquired to be protected in conformity with such laws.

"Ninth. Forced labor shall be abolished in regions where it exists.

"Tenth. The administration will provide means to diffuse public education in all grades, with the double aim of promoting the wealth of the region and better living conditions of the people, especially in regard to public and individual hygiene, and preparation of the exercise of political autonomy in the shortest time.

"Eleventh. The natives of the region under administration shall have their own organic charter, which the administration shall establish, consulting the people in whatever way possible.

"Twelfth. The administration shall submit an annual report to the inter-American organization charged with control of the administered regions, on the manner in which it carried out its mission, attaching accounts and measures adopted during the year in said region.

"Thirteenth. The organization to which the preceding article refers shall be authorized to take cognizance of petitions which inhabitants of the region transmit through the intermediary of the administration with reference to the operation of the provisional administration. The administration shall remit, along with these petitions, such observations as it considers convenient.

"Fourteenth. First the administration shall be authorized for a period of 3 years, at the termination of which, and in case of necessity, it shall be renewed for successive periods of not longer than a decade.

"Fifteenth. Expenses incurred in the exercise of the administration shall be covered by revenues from the administered region, but in case these are insufficient the deficit shall be covered by the administering nation or nations.

"Sixteenth. There shall be established a commission which shall be called the 'Inter-American Commission of Territorial Administration' and shall be composed of one representative for each of the states which ratify this convention, and it shall be the international organization to which the convention refers.

"Any country which ratifies it (the convention) may call the first meeting, indicating the most convenient city. The Commission shall elect a president, complete its organization and fix a definite headquarters. Two-thirds of its members shall constitute a quorum and two-thirds of the members present may adopt agreements.

"Seventeenth. The Commission is authorized to establish a provisional administration over regions to which the present convention applies; it also is authorized to install the said administration so that it will be operated by the number of states which will be determined according to the case, and to legalize its execution in terms of the preceding articles.

"Eighteenth. The present convention will be opened for signatures of the American Republics in Havana and shall be ratified by the high contracting parties in accordance with their constitutional procedures. The Secretary of State of the Republic of Cuba shall transmit, as soon as possible, authentic copies certified to the various governments to obtain ratifications. Instruments of ratification shall be deposited in the archives of the Pan American Union in Washington which shall notify the signatory governments of said deposit; such notification shall be considered as exchange for ratifications.

"Nineteenth. The present convention shall be effective when two-thirds of the American States shall have deposited their respective instruments of ratification."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have made these references because time and time again Roosevelt referred to the hemispheric defense program. I have already quoted what he had to say about it in the "quarantine" speech of 1937. We find that in the fabric of all his discussions of foreign policy, from the "quarantine" speech of 1937, to Pearl Harbor, there was reference after reference to the importance of maintaining the hemispheric defense and maintaining the good-neighbor policy.

Take a look at the good-neighbor policy today, and see what has happened. What a great repair job is needed to the south of us in Latin American relations. There is anti-American feeling everywhere. There is a comment in Time magazine, and an American Embassy is stoned. There is a comment in Time magazine and American personnel of the American Embassy in LaPaz, in Bolivia, have to be removed to the outskirts of the city, where they can be near the Bolivian army barracks for protection.

We are all familiar with the demonstrations against the United States in Venezuela. A similar feeling exists in Cuba. It is almost like calling the roll of the Organization of American States. Some friends we have, but so few, as compared with the strong support which the great Franklin Roosevelt developed for the good-neighbor policy which he discussed as far back as the "quarantine" speech of 1937. In fact, he discussed it in his first inaugural address in 1933, from which I have quoted this afternoon.

No, Mr. President, I cannot vote for an ambassador who has made the statements this nominee has made about the architect of the good-neighbor policy. As I said the other day on the floor of the Senate, the memory of Franklin D. Roosevelt is revered in Brazil. If anyone mention's Roosevelt's name in Brazil, he can understand the reverence that Brazilians have for that great American. I have been informed by Americans who have come back from various Latin American countries, including Brazil, that when one enters the most lowly hovel, with a dirt floor, no household facilities whatever, as we know them, practically no furniture, and surroundings of abject poverty, there on the wall of the hut, even though it may be a mud hut, or over the mat which is used for a bed, will often be a magazine clipping of a picture of Franklin Roosevelt—even today.

What reservoir of good will the record of this great humanitarian built up for us in Latin America. I could not possibly bring myself to vote for a nominee who attempted to smear that man. I cannot bring myself to vote to send to Brazil a nominee who made the statements that she made about Franklin Roosevelt, including her statement that he lied us into a war, because Brazil was in that war too, as I shall show in a moment, and if he lied American boys into a war, he lied Brazilian boys into a war.

The fact is that he lied no one into a war, because he did not lie. We cannot pass the statement off as an intemperate campaign speech, because we cannot pass off the fact that, although she apologizes for her language, she still stands by the charge.

I take my Democratic colleagues—and Republicans too, but particularly my Democratic colleagues—to the famous Columbus Day address by Franklin Roosevelt at Dayton, Ohio, on October 12, 1940.

I shall quote a lengthy excerpt from that speech. This was 18 days before the Boston speech to which Robert Sherwood referred. Roosevelt said of hemispheric defense at Dayton:

> We of the Americas still consider that this defense of these oceans of the Western Hemisphere against acts of aggression is the first factor in the defense and protection of our own territorial integrity. We reaffirm that policy, lest there be any doubt of our intention to maintain it.
> There are some in every single one of the 21 American Republics who suggest that the course the Americas are following is slowly drawing one or all of us into war with some nation, or nations, beyond the seas.
> From the day on which that policy was announced, the American Republics have consulted with each other; they have peacefully settled their old problems and disputes; they have grown closer and closer to each other; until at last in 1938 at Lima, their unity and friendship were sealed.
> The core of our defense is the faith we have in the institutions we defend. The Americas will not be scared or threatened into the ways the dictators want us to follow.
> No combination of dictator countries of Europe and Asia will halt us in the path we see ahead for ourselves and for democracy.
> No combination of dictator countries of Europe and Asia will stop the help we are giving to almost the last free people now fighting to hold them at bay.
> Our course is clear. Our decision is made. We will continue to pile up our defense and our armaments. We will continue to help those who resist aggression, and who now hold the aggressors far from our shores. Let no American in any part of the Americas question the possibility of danger from overseas. Why should we accept assurances that we are immune? History records that not long ago those same assurances were given to the people of Holland and Belgium and Norway.
> That is why we arm. Because, I repeat, this Nation wants to keep war away from these two continents. Because we, all of us, are determined to do everything possible to maintain peace in this hemisphere. Because great strength of arms is the practical way of fulfilling our hopes for peace and for staying out of this war or any other war. Because we are determined to muster all our strength so that we may remain free.
> The clear facts have been stated over and over again. This country wants no war with any nation. This hemisphere wants no war with any nation. The American Republics are determined to work in unity for peace just as we work in unity to defend ourselves from attack.
> For many long years every ounce of energy I have had has been devoted to keeping this Nation and the other Republics at peace with the rest of the world. That is what continues uppermost in my mind today—the objective for which I hope and work and pray.
> We arm to defend ourselves. The strongest reason for that is that it is the strongest guarantee for peace.
> The United States of America is mustering its men and resources, arming not only to defend itself, but, in cooperation with the other American Republics, to help defend the whole hemisphere.
> We are building a total defense on land and sea and in the air sufficient to repeal total attack from any part of the world. Forewarned by the deliberate attacks of the dictators upon free peoples, the United States, for the first time in its history, has undertaken the mustering of its men in peacetime. Unprecedented dangers have caused the United States to undertake the building of a Navy and an Air Force sufficient to defend all the coasts of the Americas from any combination of hostile powers.
> We have asked for, and we have received, the fullest cooperation and assistance from industry and labor. All of us are speeding the preparation of adequate defense.
> And we are keeping the nations of this hemisphere fully advised of our defense preparations. We have welcomed the military missions from neighboring republics; and in turn our own military and naval experts have been welcomed by them. We intend to encourage this frank interchange of information and plans.
> We shall be all for one and one for all.
> This idea of a defense strong enough and wide enough to cover this half of the world had its beginnings when the Government of the United States announced its policy with respect to South and Central America. It was the policy of the good neighbor, the neighbor who knew how to mind his own business, but was always willing to lend a friendly hand to a friendly nation which sought it, the neighbor who was willing to discuss in all friendship the problems which will always arise between neighbors.

I would have Democratic Senators reflect on that. It is another important argument in my case that there is not a scintilla of evidence which supports Mrs. Luce's slandering of this great Democratic President. To Democratic Senators I say: "Take your time before you vote, and if you are in doubt study and read every public pronouncement of Franklin Roosevelt, starting with the inaugural speech of 1933, when he announced the good neighbor policy, and add to it the "quarantine" speech and then come back and tell me you can let this nomination slip through; come back and tell me that in good conscience you can vote for this besmircher."

That thread in the fabric of the record of Franklin Roosevelt is a gleaming thread which intertwines in the fabric of a great pattern of foreign policy. It bespeaks his determination to build a defense. It bespeaks his dedication to build up a hemispheric defense, so that no nation would dare attack. It outlines in documents, in speech after speech, that although our intentions are peaceful, we will fight if fight we must in case of attack.

In spite of that documentation, crystal clear to anyone who will read, this nominee falsely charged, while she was a Member of Congress, that Roosevelt had lied us into war. We are asked to confirm her. I say it is an insult, in my judgment, to every Member of the Senate who reveres the memory of the great Roosevelt.

Here is one Senator, only incidentally a Democratic Senator, who will not turn his back upon Franklin Delano Roosevelt, no, nor upon Harry Truman nor Dean Acheson, by voting to confirm this nomination. I have not intention to vote for a slanderer.

As the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] pointed out, when the attack came at Pearl Harbor and the entire Western Hemisphere was engulfed, Brazil was among the most active of our allies. A division of Brazilian troops was sent to Italy; bases in Brazil made possible the control by allied fleets of the south Atlantic; her air bases provided the shortest air route to North Africa.

Brazil went into that war as a result of the hemispheric solidarity preached and practiced by Franklin Roosevelt and his Secretary of State, Cordell Hull. There is no denying the statement made by our committee chairman that if the United States was "lied into war" by Roosevelt, so was Brazil.

I think I have shown that no one was lied into that war, except by the Fascists of Germany, Japan, and Italy. It was the leaders of those countries who, in their diplomatic exchanges over the years, lied, time and time again, to the heads of the free nations. That is where the prevarications are to be found. They sought by their falsehoods in diplomatic exchanges with Franklin Roosevelt and Cordell Hull to build up a false sense of security in the United States.

To use a colloquialism, I think Roosevelt's speeches show very clearly how rapidly he became "wise" to them. To take only one of the many excerpts I have used this afternoon, where he related in one of the 1940 campaign speeches, the steps of German aggression upon the peoples of nation after nation of Europe, he made very clear that he recognized the differences between the professings of Hitler and Mussolini and their ruthless, tyrannical practices.

OBJECTIONS TO MRS. LUCE: HER SELECTION WAS SOLELY POLITICAL; AS DIPLOMAT SHE IS UNQUALIFIED

Let me now sum up the reasons for my opposition to this nomination. They fall into two groups: first, that her nomination was on the basis of the close political relationship of the Luce empire, with its publications, its financial contributions to Republican campaigns, and Mrs. Luce's services to the Republican party; and second, because on her public record I do not believe Mrs. Luce is properly equipped emotionally and intellectually to represent the United States abroad. She is being sent to a country where, in my judgment, a career diplomat, not a political appointee, should be sent.

I have no illusion about the power with public opinion that lies with the Luce publications. The wide circulation of its magazines, Time and Life, the influence in the business world of Fortune, the television stations it owns in the Middle West, including KLZ in Denver, KTVT in Salt Lake City, WTCN in Minneapolis, WFBM in Indianapolis, and its Grand Rapids station in Michigan afford Time, Inc., a tremendous force for good or ill with American public opinion and the news on which it is based.

The amalgamation of Eisenhower administration policies and the editorial policies of Time and Life is well known even to the casual reader of them.

I could refer, for example, to the farm editorials in Life, which condemn subsidies to American farmers, much along the lines of the Benson farm policy. Of course, it is characteristic of Life that it does not mention the $9½ million annual postal subsidy which it enjoys itself, according to figures compiled by the Library of Congress, and which aids immeasurably in distributing these antisubsidy editorials more widely.

The heavy financial support to GOP candidates, including President Eisenhower, from the Luces has been documented.

The close working relationship of Time, Inc., and its staff with the Eisenhower administration and its policies has also been covered in this speech. That the Luce publications are taken many times to represent or indicate official administration views is clear from the oil incident in Italy and the episode in Bolivia when a quotation of an American official in Time caused a riot against American property.

Mrs. Luce has said that it is she and not her husband who is to be ambassador. But the record shows that the Luces go together and that they are taken together by the country to which Mrs. Luce is accredited.

Before our committee, Mrs. Luce was asked whether her husband would accompany here to Brazil. She replied:

> He expects to do as he did when I was Ambassador to Italy, to accompany me, of course, and to remain a half of the year.

An oil policy Mr. Luce's publications favored came to the fore in Italy a short time later as the policy of the American Ambassador, as well. In Latin America, oil and the United States are a sensitive and potentially dangerous combination. I point out that the South American edition of Time is not only circulated but is published in Brazil. In the case of the Canadian edition, there occurred an international conference, a veritable summit meeting, of President Eisenhower, Prime Minister St. Laurent, of Canada, and the President of Mexico, to take up as its chief item the tax which Canada had imposed upon American magazines and which affected only two—Time and Reader's Digest.

The close interrelation of the Luce editorial line and administration foreign policy in Asia has also been itemized in this speech.

It is no wonder that Bolivian agitators found it so easy to alarm the people of that country when Time quoted a State Department official as suggesting, even facetiously, that Bolivia should be divided up among its neighbors.

We are not voting here merely on whether or not Mrs. Luce should be Ambassador to Brazil; unfortunately, we are voting on whether to export the Luce political and economic philosophies, which are disseminated through many machines of public opinion, as official American policies.

This result is what comes of the downgrading of diplomatic missions into political plums.

In addition, I have also gone at length into the personal qualifications of Mrs. Luce herself, and I am satisfied that she does not pass the minimum test of competence which the Senate—and the administration—should impose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. No. I have announced that I will not yield until I have finished my speech; then I will yield for a question.

Mrs. Luce's record of interference in domestic political and economic activities in Italy is the worst possible precedent for a similar post in South America, where we are only gradually recovering from the disasters of our diplomacy down there of the last five years.

Most shameful of all is the endorsement by the Senate of a person who charged that an American Secretary of State has cost us not only much money, but the blood of American boys in Korea; who claimed that Communists infested "every branch" of the State Department, just before she became a part of it; and who attributed our involvement in World War II, and that of Brazil, to the lies of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Today the United States is signatory to 9 mutual defense treaties; 41 nations are also signatory to them. This means that we are bound to spring to the defense of any of them if they are attacked, and vice versa. These mutual defense treaties are the foundation of American foreign policy; the United States was very anxious, in many cases, to get these nations to join in such mutual arrangements.

Brazil lived up to a mutual defense obligation in 1941 and came to the aid of the United States at that time. Yet Mrs. Luce says, in her charge that Roosevelt lied us into war, that Brazil was taken in, in effect, and was "lied into war."

Mrs. Luce has offered nothing to document what I regard as a subversive statement. The documentation is all on the other side.

Her charge stands as nothing more than a hysterical potshot, taken at a wartime leader in the hope of gaining a few votes in the midst of a campaign. It is a monument to her qualifications in the field of political hatchetry, but it is also documentation that she is incompetent to serve as American Ambassador to Brazil. It is a clear documentation that she lacks the diplomacy and tact which one should have who represents the United States as Ambassador to Brazil.

Mr. President, during the course of my speech today, one of my colleagues sent to me a facetious note. However, I shall read it into the RECORD, in view of the fact that it does have some serious import:

> According to the current Congressional Directory, our legation in Bolivia is vacant. Possibly it would be fitting for the President to nominate Henry Luce, the editor of Life magazine, to be our Ambassador to Bolivia.

Mr. President, although that note was sent to me in humor, I wish to state that Mr. Luce's presence in our Embassy in Brazil for 6 months does not augur well for a strengthening of United States-Latin American relations.

Mr. President, before yielding to Senators who wish to ask questions, I shall close by saying that in the last 15 years I have made in the Senate many speeches which have been difficult to make; but I have never made one with a heavier heart or with a firmer conviction that it was my public duty to make it. This speech has not been a pleasant one to give. But, my sense of duty as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and as a Senator has compelled me to make it.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs, I think I would have been derelict in the performance of my duty if I had not forewarned my country that this nomination is a horrendous mistake.

It is my sincere hope that the Senate will not act hastily, but that Senators will reflect on this nomination. and will give further consideration to the record made today in this Chamber on both sides of the pending question, and at a later date will vote.

At this time I yield to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon.

I have been particularly interested to hear his remarks about the qualifications of Mrs. Luce for the position to which she has been nominated, especially in view of a letter which I have received from an eighth-grade geography class. In the letter, the members of the class indicate the increasing awareness of the problem which now confronts our country. I wish to read the letter to the Senator from Oregon, and then ask him to comment on it.

The letter reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR CANNON: In our study of foreign countries, it has come to our attention that some of our foreign representatives are inadequately trained and prepared for their jobs. Since we, as a country, are judged by our foreign representatives, it is imperative that they should be fine and dedicated examples of the American people. In order to be well prepared, we think that they should have a clearer understanding of the language and the customs of the country to which they are assigned.

Due to careful training, the Communists are gaining more and more influence in the underdeveloped countries of the world.

We know that this is not a new problem. We would deeply appreciate your advice on what we can do, as future voters and leaders of the United States, to improve the training of our foreign representatives. We feel that this is a matter of the utmost importance, and deserves your attention.

Thank you. Sincerely,

THE EIGHTH GRADE GEOGRAPHY CLASS.

The letter is signed by the secretary.

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon to state whether he believes the nominee has sufficient understanding and background in regard to the language and customs of the country to which she has been nominated to serve as our Ambassador.

Mr. MORSE. First, Mr. President, that letter certainly deserves comment. I think it is a great assurance regarding the generation that is coming up, through America's free school system. Sometimes I say that at times I think even the youngsters are ahead of the politicians, on some issues. Such a letter is inspiring, and gives us greater confidence for the future.

In answer to the direct question my colleague has asked, let me say that in the speech I have made today I have pointed out why I believe that Mrs. Luce does not have the qualifications which those youngsters have outlined in their letter, and why I believe it is so important that this post be filled by a career diplomat, one with years of service in Latin America, one who knows the language and the mores, and who is familiar with all the customs, traditions, and practices of the people—not only of the people of Brazil, but also of the people of the surrounding countries, because we must not forget that our Ambasador to Brazil must work closely with our ambassadors to other Latin American countries.

I do not think Mrs. Luce has the competency that is required for this position.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding to me.

A few minutes ago he placed in the RECORD a photostatic copy of the October 1, 1952, issue of the Washington Times Herald; that was before the time when the Washington Post and the Washington Times Herald were merged.

I should like to call my colleague's attention to the article, which is entitled "Truman Is Challenged To Act on Red Problem—Infiltration Wide, Mrs. Luce Says."

Beneath the headline is a little box in which appears the following:

Senator McCarthy promises to continue attack on "Commiecrats."

Beneath that is the following:

NEW YORK, September 30.—Former Representative Clare Boothe Luce charged tonight that the Red underground operated in at least 23 vital U.S. Government agencies during the last 20 years and stole "just about" every American secret.

Later on in the article we find this:

Mrs. Luce asserted the Government during the last 20 years has not guarded against the danger of Communist infiltration because "some of the guards appointed by the administration were themselves the thieves of our security."

Finally, I quote again from the article:

Mrs. Luce charged that while the infamous "Ware cell"— which she called the "general staff of the original Communist underground in the United States"—was operating in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, Governor Stevenson joined the legal staff of the AAA.

I am glad that my friend, the Senator from Oregon, has had the article printed in the RECORD. I believe it buttresses the splendid speech he has made.

I have asked him to yield in order to emphasize the pertinent data contained in the article.

Mr. President, later this afternoon I shall explain briefly why I find myself unable to support this nomination. But the Senator from Oregon has spoken long and very ably, and I do not wish to detain him any longer.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania very much for emphasizing the article, which I previously placed in the RECORD. As he has pointed out, the article deals with the nominee's "McCarthy tactics."

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, earlier today the senior Senator from Oregon read testimony given by the nominee during the hearings; and on page 6 of those hearings appear two passages to which I now refer.

One is in these words:

For 20 years mortal enemies of ours have been growing and thriving in the organism of the Democratic Party. There is only one way to dislodge them. We must shake them all out. Yes, the tree of government must be shaken hard. Then these rotten apples, these mortal enemies, will fall out before all from the top branches.

And again referring to President Roosevelt:

The only American President who ever lied us into a war, because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it.

Last week I read two columns relating to the nomination of Mrs. Luce, and the columnists stated, if I recall correctly, that whatever the nominee might have said in the above connection, she was not then an Ambassador, a member of the diplomatic service of our country, so those remarks are without pertinence in evaluating the present nomination. It may be that the Senator from Oregon has already commented on that question. I was not able to be in the Chamber continually to hear all of his speech. But I wonder if he would care to give his opinion on what these columnists had to say on that score.

Mr. MORSE. I have discussed that issue at length. I have read the two newspaper articles by those columnists. I am accustomed to their writing as apologists for the Eisenhower administration and for reactionary policies, so I dismissed them as not deserving of any special comment; but a very long section of my speech is devoted to the remarks the Senator from Alaska has quoted from. I presented my case in support of the contention that there is not a scintilla of evidence in what Mrs. Luce has given us that documents her slanderous charges. Let me assure the Senator I have covered her statements at great length in my speech. In my opinion, she does not have that diplomatic judgment which we should insist a person should have whose nomination to an ambassadorial post the President has sent to the Senate for confirmation.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the Senator yield further for a comment from me?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to state now, Mr. President, that I intend to vote against the nomination, and I intend to do so essentially because I would vote against any nominee who had designated one of the great political parties as a party of treason; and, by implication at least, that has occurred in this case, in my opinion.

I want to say further, if my party were in control of the administration and had sent to the Senate a nomination requiring the advice and consent of the Senate, and I were a Member of this body, and that nominee had declared the Republican Party to be a party of treason, I would vote against the confirmation of that nomination also.

Mr. MORSE. I want to thank the Senator very much for the position he has taken.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I was not privileged to be on the floor earlier this afternoon. I shall read carefully what the Senator has himself very carefully considered before speaking on this nomination.

This may have been covered but I wonder if I might direct attention again to page 6 of the hearing, where apparently the chairman is quoting Mrs. Luce:

> The only American President who ever lied us into a war, because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it.

Are we to understand, I ask the distinguished Senator from Oregon, that the language I have just read are the words of Mrs. Luce or which she is supposed to have used in speaking of the former President of the United States?

Mr. MORSE. Not language that she is supposed to have used; it is language she did use in describing President Roosevelt. There is no question about that. I have discussed the matter, I suppose, for 30 or 40 minutes as a part of my speech this afternoon, as a basis, in part, for my contention that she lacks the diplomatic ability we have the right to expect in anyone whose nomination as an Ambassador we are expected to confirm.

I wish to say to the Senator from West Virginia that I started with the inaugural speech of Roosevelt in 1933, when he laid down the "good neighbor" policy. Then I moved into the famous "quarantine" speech of 1937. Then I referred to extracts from his foreign policy pronouncements from 1937 to Pearl Harbor. I presented the point of view, which I think cannot be contradicted, that in speech after speech Roosevelt showed that his pattern of foreign policy was to build America's defenses for defense; that it was a defense policy for the entire Western Hemisphere; that he made clear time and time again in his speeches that fight we would if fight we must, but our aim was peace, our aim was to find some way, somehow, to put out the prairie fire that was threatening the free nations of the world, and which might result in a world war with the free nations against the totalitarian nations of Germany, Italy, and Japan.

He said he would not send American boys into a foreign war, and he did not, unless one interprets the attack at Pearl Harbor as a "foreign war."

I said, on the basis of that documentation, that I considered it to be subversive for anyone to have charged in the first place, and who still refused to retract the charge that Roosevelt lied us into a war. Mrs. Luce apologized for intemperate language, but she did not retract her charge against the President.

I cannot vote for such a person; I will not vote for such a person; and I am willing to let the record speak for itself.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I shall not labor the point, except that I should like to elicit again from the Senator from Oregon comment which he has already indicated to the effect that, in his opinion, Mrs. Luce apparently meant what she said in the first instance, and had no desire to alter the expression which I have read.

Mr. MORSE. She regarded the language as intemperate, but she did not retract her position that she thinks Roosevelt lied us into a war. She does not use the word "lie" again. I think the testimony makes that very clear.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I think it is wholesome that we in the Senate have a Member of this body [Mr. MORSE] who dissents, not merely for the purpose of dissenting, but for reasons which he believes are well founded. In this instance I have the feeling many Senators will desire to study this matter very carefully, even in the minutes that apparently remain to us before the vote on the nomination.

I thank the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I thank the Senator from West Virginia.

I may say to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] I have been asked to suggest the absence of a quorum before his speech begins. The leadership asked me to do it. I feel I should do it, unless the Senator knows of some reason why I should not.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator let me get recognized first?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may a quorum call without my losing my right to the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, first I wish to say that I doubt there has ever been a more severe and bitter attack upon an individual who has been nominated by a President of the United States for a high post in the service of this Government, ambassadorial or otherwise, than we have heard on the Senate floor this afternoon; and I, for one, think it is wholly unjustified and unjustifiable. I say that especially in view of the fact that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by a vote of 16 to 1 favorably recommended to the Senate of the United States the confirmation of the nomination.

Mr. President, so much is known about this nominee that I do not intend to address the Senate at length, but I wish to make a few observations concerning some things the Senator from Oregon has said.

I am particularly offended by his statement on page 3 of his prepared text, near the bottom of the page:

> Is she honest? Is she reliable? I am satisfied that Mrs. Luce does not meet either criteria.

Mr. President, I have known Mrs. Luce for a long time. She is a citizen of my State. She has a reputation for both honesty and reliability.

Mr. President, John Foster Dulles, the former Secretary of State, is now unhappily in the hospital and is a very sick man, but he was not sick at the time he recommended Mrs. Luce to the President of the United States. I do not believe Foster Dulles would recommend someone to the President for an ambassadorial assignment if he were not satisfied that the nominee was both reliable and honest. I also do not believe that the President of the United States, no matter what the pressures were, would assign anyone to any important post in his Government, particularly a high ambassadorial post such as the one in Brazil, unless he were satisfied in his mind and in his heart that the nominee was both honest and reliable.

Mr. President, on page 4 of the text of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon, which I have been following, there is reference to "the intertwining of Henry Luce policies and Dwight D. Eisenhower policies which have so influenced history in Asia, Latin America, and Europe," and so forth. Perhaps it is true that the editors of Time magazine have had the good sense to approve the Eisenhower foreign policies in connection with these areas, but I believe it is unfair to this administration and to the President to indicate, as the Senator from Oregon has indicated, I believe, that the administration has been largely influenced by Mr. Luce, or by the editors of Time, Life, and Fortune magazines.

The Senator from Oregon speaks of the "empire which has molded public opinion and frequently slanted the news for many years."

He says:

> It has great power to distort the truth, and it has shamelessly done so.

That is a frightfully severe attack, and, I believe, without justification.

I happen to be one who has known Henry Luce since 1919 or 1920. I knew him before there ever was a Time magazine. I watched him and Britton Hadden start the magazine, from nothing. They did not buy out anything. They started from nothing, and they built one of the finest publication houses this country has ever seen. This has had a profound effect on this country in many ways, not only in the political field but also in education, in the arts, in the theater, and many other ways.

It is hard to think of another man who holds the authority and power Mr. Luce holds in the publication field who, in my judgment, has exercised the power with such great discretion and with, I believe, full integrity, and responsibility, conscious of the fact that he is a molder of public opinion. I think our country has been fortunate to have had these magazines, with such a wide circulation and such influence, in such very able and capable hands.

On page 7 the Senator from Oregon says:

> But even more important is the manner in which the Luce family has dominated the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration in regard to China.

I believe that this is a severe reflection upon a great Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, who has been consistent in connection with his China policy since long before he became Secretary of State, and certainly all the time he has been Secretary of State. I do not believe any man can prove to the Senate that John Foster Dulles has been taking his color from anyone in the publication field during the years he has been Secretary of State. I think this is a reflection upon him which is most unfortunate, to put it in the very mildest terms.

On the same page of the Senator's text appears the following:

But I do call attention to and take exception to the manner in which Mr. Luce has changed the foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration, and now it is proposed that his wife be appointed officially as a member of that administration.

I have already challenged the view that Mr. Luce has "changed" the administration's policy. As to Mrs. Luce's nomination, there is nothing new about that. Mrs. Luce was appointed in 1953 to be Ambassador to Italy, and her nomination was confirmed by the Senate. Certainly Mr. Luce was not responsible for Mrs. Luce's being appointed an Ambassador of the United States. She was appointed because of her own excellent qualifications for the job, and she has been appointed to the ambassadorial post in Brazil because she has already demonstrated that she has the necessary qualifications and is able to serve with distinction and ability in one of the most important ambassadorial posts we have, namely, that in Italy.

The Senator from Oregon says on page 8:

Far more important, however, is the fact that the policies we have followed on Quemoy and the Matsus, in part influenced and certainly praised and applauded by the Luce family, have very nearly brought us into war.

I believe a better case can be made for the proposition that the policies we have followed with respect to Quemoy and the Matsus have kept us out of war; and I do not give the Luce family any particular credit for those policies, nor do I believe that they claim any.

The Senator from Oregon says on page 8:

This was a direct reversal of the Luce foreign policy and it was one of the few times that the Eisenhower administration has failed to follow that policy.

Thus he disproves what he said earlier in his statement, to the effect that the Luce family had very nearly brought us into war.

The Senator from Oregon further says:

There is nothing in her record to indicate to me that Mrs. Luce is qualified to be a diplomat.

There is so much in the record that qualifies this lady for this post that I do not wish to burden the RECORD with all the material which is available, but at this point I think it may be interesting to read into the RECORD an excerpt from the magazine Newsweek for January 24, 1955. On page 28 we find the following:

An American madonna: Mrs. Luce has now been 21 months at her post. Seldom has anyone done such a facelifting job on a hostile public opinion. Her energy and hard work have got the grudging respect of Italian officialdom. Inside the Embassy, "the Boss'" executive ability has captured the loyalty and respect of her staff. Her charm has won the affection of a large section of Italy's people. "The poor classes," as a snobbish Italian conceded, "regard her as a sort of American madonna." She has been a puissant influence for bettering Italo-American relations.

I think that is a rather significant comment from a competitive source, the magazine Newsweek.

I hold in my hand the issue of Harper's magazine for July 1955, in which there is an article by Luigi Barzini, Jr., entitled "Ambassador Luce, as Italians See Her."

Barzini is described by Harper's magazine as one of the most respected Roman journalists. Mr. Barzini was trained at Columbia University, and worked for several years on American newspapers. I ask unanimous consent to have the entire article printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the article may be printed in the RECORD as requested.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I wish to quote briefly from the article, because it bears on one of the points the senior Senator from Oregon attempted to make. One of the chapters in the article is headed "Will She Fall on Her Face?"

Everybody waited for mistakes. When in May, 1953, she spoke to the American Chamber of Commerce in Milan, saying what was obvious to all—that should the general elections of the following month go the wrong way, Italy would no longer receive the same amount of American aid—everybody happily accused her of having greatly helped the Communists. As a matter of fact, similar words had been quietly spoken before the 1948 elections by James Dunn, the former U.S. Ambassador to Rome, and by George Marshall, then Secretary of State—and had been plastered on all Italian walls, at the time, with excellent results.

I read that particularly because Mrs. Luce has been accused of meddling or interfering in Italian politics. It is interesting to find that this careful observer, Mr. Barzini, likens her to James Dunn and George Marshall, James Dunn having been one of the most distinguished career officers in the Foreign Service and Mrs. Luce's immediate predecessor at Rome.

I have one further request for an insertion in the RECORD. I find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for January 6, 1955, an Associated Press article entitled "Mrs. Luce's Policy Hurts Reds in Italian Factories." This article was inserted in the RECORD at that time by Representative Albert P. Morano, of Connecticut. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon said in his address:

It is true that Mrs. Luce had some moments of success during her last 2 years in Rome but if you examine her entire record, you will find that the mistakes of her 4 years far outweigh the popularity of her departing months.

I again assert that I doubt if anyone was in a better position to examine her entire record than John Foster Dulles. I have no doubt that he did so, and that others in the State Department did so. I have taken the trouble to speak with some of the career officers in the State Department about this nomination, and I find them entirely friendly to it.

Mr. President, I believe it is quite evident that Mrs. Luce's entire record justifies the appointment, and will justify the Senate in giving her nomination overwhelming approval.

I notice that when Mrs. Luce was first nominated to go to Italy, the Women's National Press Club held a luncheon in her honor.

It was a sellout. It was one of the biggest luncheons ever held in Washington. The people giving the luncheon had to turn away hundreds of people who wanted to attend in order to see Mrs. Luce on her way to that important post. For many years she has led in polls of public opinion as one of the women most to be admired in the whole United States. She was picked as one of the 10 most admired women in the United States, and she was frequently well up in the top 2 or 3 on that list of most distinguished American women.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will follow the example and recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported the nomination favorably by a vote of 16 to 1. It would be most unfortunate for our relations with Brazil if the Senate were not to approve the nomination with an overwhelming vote. I therefore urgently request my colleagues in the Senate to give the appointment their overwhelming vote of approval.

AMBASSADOR LUCE, AS ITALIANS SEE HER

(By Luigi Barzini, Jr.)

(She has defied the best professional advice, made plenty of enemies, but she also has disappointed a lot of people who hoped she would make a mess of her job in Rome.)

The setting is so right it is almost theatrical. The Palazzo Boncompagni, which houses the U.S. Embassy in Rome, is a handsome Renaissance-style building, built in the late 1870's for a wealthy Roman prince—and is as genuine an imitation of the real thing as a Newport villa. In the eighties, an American Ambassador who had been a Civil War general lived there; later it was the residence of the Queen Mother—a clever and handsome blonde—who reigned over fashionable, literary, political, and official Rome until her death in 1926. There is also something ironically suitable about the location at the turn of Via Veneto, one block from the American tourists' hangout, the Excelsior Hotel, and from the sidewalk cafes where refugees from Hollywood endlessly plan movies which are sometimes made.

There, one day in April 1953, Clare Boothe Luce sat for the first time at the desk of the U.S. Ambassador to Italy, in the splendidly decorated Louis XV room which had once been the Queen Mother's private drawing room. Behind her desk, on a pedestal to the right, was the American flag, and, to her left, her own ambassadorial flag with the 48 white stars on the blue background, which she is entitled to fly from the mast of any warship she sails on. On her desk she could read her favorite prayer, written in ye olde tea shoppe's script and suitably framed: "Lord, Thou knowest I shall be verie busie this day. I may forget Thee. Do not forget me" (Lord Astley before the battle of Edgehill). (On a side table she later placed a motto, "And above all, not too much zeal." (Talleyrand), perhaps not so much to remind herself of its advice as to prevent other people from offering it to her.) At the end of the room there was the conference table for staff meetings, with a large map hanging over it, a projection of the hemispheres seen from the North Pole, indispensable for global thinking.

The Embassy staff of more than a thousand employees, American and Italian, were breathlessly alert for new orders. Official Rome was curious, amused, and skeptical—waiting for the new U.S. Ambassador to make a fool of herself and go home, so that serious business could be resumed. Jokes and gossip had preceded her arrival. Nobody believed the Luce experiment would last long. It was said that she had accepted the job as one does a decoration, something to add to her official biography.

NOT TOO MUCH ZEAL

All this she knew. And she knew also that she was facing one of the most difficult countries to understand and advise. (Italy is nobody's oyster. Curzio Malaparte said that Mussolini told him in despair: "To govern Italy is not only impossible. It is useless.")

If this had been 1903, or even 1913, the job would have been a sinecure. In those days, the United States, aside from some set views about a few particular problems, had no foreign policy just as it had no cognac. It bought the best, whenever it needed it, old French brandy and matured Downing Street views. The American Ambassador in Rome had little to worry about. He was usually a distinguished but elderly businessman, who sat at his desk a couple of hours a day, and spent the rest of his time visiting churches and museums, exploring late archeological finds, or riding to hounds with his French, British, and Imperial German colleagues. He frequented the Royal Court with an eagerness and cordiality which only stanch Republicans could afford to show and was great friends with the Roman aristocracy, who owned the most stupendous palazzi and the best cooks. There were few problems to deal with, mostly related to postal rates, immigration, commerce, navigation, and sanitary precautions.

Even in April 1953, had Clare Booth Luce been another person—a career diplomat or the woman many people who did not know her thought she was—the job might still have been a fairly easy one. There is no longer a Royal Court, of course, where she could play the part of the American grande dame; there are no brilliant military parades of the King's Guards, the Piemonte Reale Dragoons, or other historic units. (What is left of the Army is now dressed in NATO khaki and rides in Italian jeeps.)

Still, Rome is one of the last great capitals. There is the oldest and closest society in Europe, with names reverberating down the corridor of centuries, with immense palazzi in town and ruined family seats in the country, where dinners are still served by bewigged and powdered flunkies in 18th-century liveries, one for each guest, and where an empty throne, covered with red damask, always waits for the Pope's visit. There is, of course, the pomp of the Vatican court and the pageantry of church functions. There are scheming dowagers, subtle Monsignori, shrewd politicians, clever writers, and some of the most handsome and best dressed men of this drab era, who still know how to court a woman of rank in an unobtrusive but dangerous way. Rome teems with gossip and intrigues, fascinating to follow or to try one's hand in. Everybody sooner or later comes through Rome. It is beautiful, decayed, skeptical, carnal, energetic, and immortal.

Sir Victor Mallet, who was the British Ambassador at the time, told Mrs. Luce, when she arrived not to worry, to go to the office only in the morning, see as few people as possible, leave everything to her staff, read no official reports or memoranda, take long siestas, and enjoy herself in the afternoon. Rosie von Waldeck, a good friend who stayed with her a while, sharply reminded her of the working habits of the German Ambassador to the Kremlin in 1917 and 1918: he slept all day, gave parties every night, and moved in the inner circles of the Revolution by entertaining Bolshevik leaders till dawn, having discovered something which has since become well known, that Communists are almost always snobs. Talleyrand's advice about zeal also was quoted, during those first months, till she and her husband winced.

THE STAGE, THE WORLD, THE CHURCH

Of course Mrs. Luce could do none of these things. Her appearance is deceptive to Europeans. She looks like an idle, soignée lady, simply but smartly dressed, bearing herself with almost queenly dignity. The hair is silky blond, the eyes are water blue and worried, the pale face has something medieval and Flemish in its stiffness, which, of course, could also be New England and Puritan. Her manner is "society": she is almost always extremely kind and often listens to the answers to her questions. For a well known satirical playwright, her repartee is remarkably subdued: she rarely allows herself the satisfaction of a good biting line.

The real woman is something quite different. Italians know little or nothing about her meager and severe childhood and the contrasting home environment of culture which bred in her a fiery polemic quality. The daughter of a violinist, William Boothe, who made a modest living, and the granddaughter of a Baptist minister, she grew up in Old Greenwich, Conn., attended Saint Mary's school in Garden City, N.Y., and later Miss Mason's in Tarrytown.

Theoretically, she might have become a pro-Roosevelt leftist, but her personal fight against vested interests took a conservative turn. During a European tour in the 1920's with her mother and stepfather, Albert E. Austin, an ex-Congressman, she was stirred by the battlefields, the hospitals, and the devastating inflation. She decided to become a journalist so that she could "really do something about it." She later went to work for Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont in the cause of equal rights for women and flew in rickety planes distributing handbills from the air "to help make women's influence felt more strongly in American politics."

Her marriage to wealthy George Tuttle Brokaw went on the rocks in 1929, and she started her career in journalism. She got a job at Vogue and then moved on to Vanity Fair, becoming managing editor in 1932. A year later she published a book, "Stuffed Shirts," a satire on tycoons and socialites, written not (as a leftwing liberal would have done it) from the sidewalk looking into the lighted windows but scornfully from the inside. "The Women," her most successful play, which was presented on Broadway in 1936, attacked the vulgar new rich, and "Kiss the Boys Goodby," struck at the illusions of the intellectuals of the appeasement era. When, in 1939, her third play, "Margin for Error," started a longish run, it was the only successful anti-Nazi play on Broadway. Her attacks against contemporary society all tended to be fundamentally in defense of traditional values.

In 1935 she was married to Henry R. Luce, head of the Time-Life empire, but, restlessly active, she continued to write new plays, articles, books. After war broke out she became a correspondent for Life. She made tours of the Philippines and of India, Burma, and China, and in 1942 was elected Representative from Connecticut. The first woman member of the House Military Affairs Committee, she had seen more of the war than any of her male colleagues. During her 4 years in Congress, she was energetically in favor of military preparedness, foreign aid, admission of refugees, equal rights for Negroes, fair employment practices, and a healthier relationship between labor and capital. Assuming the role of Cassandra, she attacked appeasement of Soviet Russia, battled against the Yalta and Teheran agreements, and warned her countrymen against Russia's aggressive aims long before this campaign became fashionable.

To the vast surprise of the public, she became a Catholic convert in February 1946, shortly after the death of her daughter in an automobile accident. She explained her spiritual vicissitudes in "The Real Reason," published the next year. At the end of her political career she resumed her writing and lecturing, this time with a new point of view, the Catholic conception of life—in which she had found a coherent framework for many of her past convictions, and to which she added a stern and uncompromising tendency to battle against all sins, errors, and misconceptions, which is more Puritan than Roman. (In Italy she discovered that most people were unconscious Catholics, thought little about the religion which is part of their lives, and sometimes made jokes about the cardinals and the Pope. "I go to mass every morning," she said. "I seem to be the only one.")

Her literary activities came to an end, for the time being, when she started campaigning for Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower's election. She did all she could to secure his nomination, getting herself sent as a Connecticut delegate to the Republican convention in Chicago in 1952. At the end of the year Eisenhower appointed her Ambassador to Italy.

THE AMBASSADOR WHO WORKS

No, when you know how she got there you cannot imagine Mrs. Luce in Rome taking afternoons off and, like a seasoned diplomat, letting things flow their fatal way. To begin with, the American Embassy is unlike any other in Rome. It is the only organization in the whole city where nobody takes a nap in the afternoon: after lunch, on hot summer days, it hums with life, when the streets are empty and the shops closed. American office routine keeps mountains of mimeographed paper circulating from room to room, most of it arriving sooner or later on the Ambassador's desk.

Complicated problems arise daily. The U.S. Ambassador in Rome is responsible, among many things, for the operation in Italy of the Foreign Operations Administration, the mutual defense assistance program, the military assistance advisory group, the U.S. escapee program, the U.S. Battle Monuments Commisison, the U.S. Information Service with branches in the principal Italian cities, the U.S. narcotics attachés office, the treaty claims office, the Navy Purchasing Office, the veterans office, the American Commission for Cultural Exchange with Italy, the U.S. foreign building operations, the Army, Navy, and Air Force attachés, the Foreign Agricultural Service, the U.S. representative in Trieste, and consular offices in the principal Italian cities. The Ambassador is the only person who can give American policy in Italy a uniform direction. From any one of these offices can come, any day, unexpectedly, the big blunder which might wreck U.S. policy in Italy and embarrass the President. They must be watched.

Her typical day is easily the most strenuous in Rome. Between 8:30 and 9:30 she handles personal matters with her private secretary at Villa Taverna, the handsome Renaissance villa owned by the Department of State for the residence of the Ambassador. Between 9:30 and 1 o'clock she is at her desk at the Embassy, each quarter of an hour filled with calls, staff meetings, briefings, perusal of decoded telegrams, and dictation. Lunch at her residence is always official; she invites Italian politicians, Ministers, other Ambassadors, and members of her staff, in turn, to discuss current events and problems; any visiting American who has a valid introduction to her; former colleagues in the House of Representatives; friends from Washington (a term which includes most Members of both Houses, the administration, the Pentagon, and National Press Club) who happen to be traveling through. Clare Boothe Luce is now considered one of the sights of Rome like the Colosseum and St. Peter's. She carefully receives everybody. The number of Italians she manages to see is enormous: industrialists, bankers, princes, Socialists, labor leaders, journalists, astronomers, actors, and musicians.

Business is resumed at her office at 3:30 and goes on till 7:30 or 8 o'clock. Almost every evening, between 7:30 and 9, she must appear at a diplomatic cocktail party or two. At 9, she presides over a large formal dinner at Villa Taverna, unless she is somebody's guest at a similarly formal dinner party elsewhere. Bedtime comes at indefinite hours, before midnight if she manages to disappear inconspicuously, much later sometimes if she is interested in the information she can get from her guests.

Very seldom she manages to run away and have an early small dinner in a trattoria with a few people she really wants to talk to, an old friend, a writer, a clever and well-informed diplomat. The only sure way to get her to accept a dinner invitation is to ask her alone with a handpicked group of men who know all the answers, the kind she would want to talk to if she were still an active journalist. Her knowledge of Italian is sufficient for her to follow the conversation and to answer with slow, faltering, but exact words. She studies the language in her spare time, on Sunday morning or before going to sleep at night, often by listening to recent Italian books or articles, recorded for her on magnetic tape. Her knowledge of French is better than average.

Most of her days vary from the typical. Last autumn, in 2 weeks picked at random, she went to Salerno to view flood devastation, spoke to every patient in every hospital, and arranged to have 14 American military trucks full of emergency supplies sent from Leghorn. The following day, in Naples, she stamped the 10,000th visa under the refugee relief program, on an Italian immigrant's passport. Back in Rome, she awarded the Legion of Merit on behalf of the President to Gen. Aldo Urbani, on his last day as Chief of Staff for the Air Force; gave a friendship dinner for top Italian, British, Yugoslav, and American officials; then, on the same evening, attended the Marine Corps birthday celebration ball, where she cut the cake and played the trap drums.

During the same period she also reviewed American troops in Leghorn, flew to Sardinia for a 2-day program of ceremonies, and attended the regular number of national holiday receptions at other embassies, exchanged half-a-dozen protocol calls with newly arrived diplomats, appeared on TV, and spoke on the radio for welfare appeals, had several meeting with Admiral Fechteler, commander in chief, southern Europe NATO, attended official dinners and luncheons, and carried on routine Embassy work during her stays in Rome.

If Mrs. Luce possessed the strength of a horse, all this extra work would be understandable. But she is frail and always looks as if she needed a long vacation in some mountain village, among cows and waterfalls, to regain her strength. She drives herself relentlessly. She smokes too much. Trained in journalism, she is constantly on a deadline, trying to define indefinable situations, to suggest plans of immediate action, to resolve impossible dilemmas. In a city where days, months, years do not matter, where decisions are postponed in the hope that the lapse of time will make them unnecessary, she seems to be the only person who hears the ticking of history's meter. At the most frivolous moment, during a cocktail party, at a ball, she will take somebody aside and fervently ask:

"Now, this is a vital question. I would like you to answer only after you have thought about it. What do you think of Don Sturzo's latest pronouncement?" or, "What do you think of the latest vote in Parliament?"

HENRY LUCE BY HENRY JAMES

The best of the bargain is Henry Luce's. In Rome he lives the life he had wanted to live for years. He had often said, "Someday I will go to Europe, to Asia, anywhere, and study one country, not just move from place to place. Learn the language, get to know the people, their philosophy of life, their hopes, past and present." The Italy he has come to is a fascinating and irritating place, rich with experience, crackling with the challenge of communism.

Luce unconsciously fell into the role of a Henry James character, the honest, straightforward American, defending and promoting the simple ideas Americans abroad believe to be theirs above all: courage, private initiative, responsibility, honesty, independence from government aid and interference. He is often asked to speak, mostly at businessmen's gatherings, and always takes great pains to explain his message, warning Italians about government encroachments, encouraging them to rely on their own strength. His speeches and his private conversations carry great weight. He was given the honorary rank of Minister, for correct placing at dinner tables. Though he follows political developments closely, he says: "I only help Mrs. Luce at social gatherings. I pour tea."

In reality he carries out a leisurely and unofficial flanking action, often doing things and making contacts which would be awkward for her. (He is very proud of her. He heartily concluded a speech with the words: "Thank God for the American Ambassador.")

He has organized his life in order to be in Italy half of the time, having discovered that his publishing business can be run efficiently from a distance. In Rome his telephone does not ring as often as in New York, his editors can communicate with him only by cable or by letter, appointments are fewer. In Rome there is more time to talk to American "personalities" than in New York or Washington; in Italy they have nothing much else to do. He can study long-range plans, examine editorial policy, and do some writing. Copies of his magazines reach his desk by airmail 1 or 2 days ahead of publication date in America.

He has hired an office in Corso d'Italia, a couple of doors from the Communist Confederation of Labor, with large windows overlooking the ancient trees of Villa Borghese. (He could not work in the Embassy, of course, and he did not want to embarrass the Rome office of Time and Life with his presence.) He has a small staff, one assistant, three secretaries, one chauffeur, and errand boy. He takes Italian lessons, reads the Bible in Italian (the fact that he knows it in English almost by heart helps) and reads Italian versions of well known nursery tales. He loves a long lunch with a well-informed Italian who tries to answer his many questions, ranging from ethics to theology, from politics to the culinary art, which come down to one: the fundamental difference between Protestant, industrial, modern America as represented by Henry Luce and Italy as represented by his guest. When he travels, he takes on one city at a time, planning with care and seeing everybody worth knowing.

Mr. Luce really has the beautiful time U.S. Ambassadors enjoyed half a century ago. He studies only the problems that really interest him, can see anybody in Italy by merely expressing a desire, or call on the Time-Life staffs all over the world to dig up background material and follow developments in a particular field.

In the privacy of their apartment, the Luces debate all details of U.S. policy in Italy. They do not always see eye to eye. Clare Boothe Luce is a self-confessed pessimist who does not allow her doubts about the final outcome to interfere with her activity. Henry Luce is an optimist, impatient with the warnings of old Italian hands and professional diplomats. He likes to say: "There is really no problem in this country which a little courage and some effort cannot solve." When a course of action is suggested, he always asks: "What good will come of it?" She wants to know: "What's the worst that can happen?"

Final decisions, of course, are Mrs. Luce's, because hers is the responsibility. The expenses, which are extremely heavy—to run an Ambassadors' residence with 19 servants, 6 gardeners, and a dining room seating 42; to dress the Ambassador appropriately; and to add to the Luce collection of Impressionists and Chinese art—are his, because his is the money.

HOW WELL DOES IT WORK?

The impact of the Luce household on recent Italian political developments is difficult to estimate. How successful is the Luce experiment—not merely of placing a woman in a responsible diplomatic post (something which the Russians really invented long ago) but of placing this particular woman, backed by her husband's power and advice?

There is, of course, something mechanical in the operation of international affairs which should not be underestimated. State Department decisions, plus the U.S. Defense budget, have their inevitable influence on Communist power. To be sure, the Luces are very popular—everywhere they go they are followed like movie stars; composers dedicate songs to her; poor people write hundreds of letters a day to her asking for help; all kinds of gifts pour into the Embassy. This prestige is partly their own, because of their obvious interest in the welfare of the country. But it is also the United States in general. To most Italians Mrs. Luce is "America," a female personification of a great friendly country, the symbol of hope in a world of dispair. Nevertheless, it is fair to admit that, perhaps not propter hoc, the situation has radically changed in Italy since the Luces arrived.

Claire Boothe Luce came to Rome intimidated by the size of the task she had set for herself. Moreover, she was naturally embarrassed by the dangerous vicinity of the Vatican. Many Americans were afraid their predominately Protestant country would become involved in popish intrigues; many Italians were afraid the Christian democratic hegemony would be reinforced with American help; and Vatican circles were afraid that American Catholic political trends might predominate in Italy, through the offices of the American Ambassador. (The Vatican is slightly to the left of Cardinal Spellman.)

ceremonies, when all the diplomatic corps is invited. Once she came within a few feet of him, during the inauguration of the North American College. Pius XII, walking through the crowd waving his hand in blessing, suddenly saw her and moved as if to come nearer. She looked nervously at the news photographers and hid behind some fat prelates. The Pope, probably understanding her gesture, walked on.

However, she does see the Pope's two nephews, Carlo and Marcantonio Pacelli, who are personal friends. She sees almost all the American bishops and archbishops, when they come to Rome for their ad limina visits and ask to be received. She cannot refuse them. A U.S. Senator, who had opposed her appointment on the ground that she was a Catholic convert, recently wrote her a letter asking her to see that a nephew of his, traveling through Italy be received by Pius XII. Mrs. Luce enjoyed answering that she could not grant the request, as she had no contacts whatsoever with the Holy See. For all other American visitors, however, audiences are arranged informally by an Embassy official, as a matter of routine.

The tasks she had set herself to do in Italy were primarily three: Communism had to be defeated, the Trieste problem settled, and the country solidly embedded in the Western military alliance. The Trieste question was the key, for it prevented a vigorous, independent, and clearly understood foreign policy of collaboration with Yugoslavia and smaller Eastern Mediterranean nations. At the same time, Italy's participation in Western defense was flabby and halfhearted because of the large Communist opposition and because of the presence on Italian soil of British and American occupation troops. In applying her energies to finding an acceptable solution to the Italian-Yugoslav dispute, Mrs. Luce prodded the Embassy, the State Department, and the Foreign Office for months. When, after more than a year of negotiations between the two countries, the Trieste albatross was cut from the Italian Government's neck, the settlement was widely conceded to be a victory for the Ambassador.

Her efforts to force the Italian Government to adopt a more vigorous anti-Communist policy have been less successful. She pleaded first with the late Prime Minister de Gasperi and with Pella later; lately she has been after Mario Scelba. Their answers have always been evasive. Yes, Madame was right. The problem was an urgent one; not a day should be lost. Still nothing was ever done. She was baffled by the apparent lack of determination she found in most everybody.

"What can be done?" she would dramatically ask her friends. "What can I, what can the Government of the United States do?"

The reasons why nothing could be done right away were many. Communists in Italy control one-third of the electorate and are not merely a foreign-dominated conspiracy but also the largest and most powerful labor party, the only one which actively defends the workers' interests. Any violent anti-Communist policy would remind people of fascism, repugnant to the new, postwar political leaders, whose authority comes from their long stand against Mussolini. What the Government fears most is the Communists' charge of being subservient to American orders.

Finally, the Christian Democrats have resented the publicity she has given to their weakness and to the Communists' gains, naturally preferring to play up their modest achievements. The American Ambassador could not bear to waste time on subtle diplomatic maneuvers, but dramatically advertised the danger of communism in every possible way—in her speeches, in off-the-record talks to Rome correspondents, in conversation, and, when in Washington, in leaks to a few favorite columnists. She has been ably helped in all this by her husband. Between them they certainly have helped to create a new atmosphere in Italy, a widespread feeling that something must be done quickly.

In a few cases the Embassy has intervened more directly. For example, the United States is paying for a considerable amount of military equipment, manufactured in Europe, for the use of the NATO forces, under the so-called offshore procurement program. Until recently all such contracts were awarded, almost automatically, to the lowest bidders. But in Italy several contracts have been withheld from firms where the workers were under the domination of Communist leadership—with the result that the Communists have lost ground in a number of recent trade union elections.

The real obstacles in her path must not be underestimated. A beautiful and ambitious woman, with the backing of a powerful government publicity organization, she soon won the crowd. But leading Italians, jealous of male prerogatives, resented her dominant position. At first she provoked hostility from every quarter. Palazzo Chigi officials treated her gingerly, as one more American oddity, a strange joke. Women, of course, hated her. Foreign diplomats derided her informal, enthusiastic, and revolutionary methods of doing business. Roman high society, Papal aristocracy, and the newly rich found her not sufficiently flattered by their invitations, which she seldom accepted. Ordinary people were irritated by the royal splendor of her life, the many servants, the jewels, and the beautiful clothes.

Communists made her the butt of all their jokes: for them she was enemy No. 1. Togliatti called her "a poor old lady" and accused her of bringing bad luck. (She complained: "The government defended me from all his false charges but nobody remembered to deny that I am an 'old lady'.") Anti-Communists resented her open and tireless nagging. Fascists called her a "decadent democrat," democrats and progressives accused her of trying to revive Fascism. The British too were alarmed. They thought that, by her efforts to bring about an Italo-Yugoslav rapprochement, she was endangering the subtly engineered equilibrium of forces in the Mediterranean. The British press kept alive the story of her imminent resignation.

WILL SHE FALL ON HER FACE?

Everybody waited for mistakes. When in May 1953 she spoke to the American Chamber of Commerce in Milan, saying what was obvious to all—that should the general elections of the following month go the wrong way, Italy would no longer receive the same amount of American aid—everybody happily accused her of having greatly helped the Communists. As a matter of fact, similar words had been quietly spoken before the 1948 elections by James Dunn, the former U.S. Ambassador to Rome, and by George Marshall, then Secretary of State—and had been plastered on all Italian walls, at the time, with excellent results.

She passed another difficult moment when L'Europeo (a pro-Government, anti-Communist weekly) printed what was purported to be an off-the-record speech she had made to American journalists at a Mayflower Hotel luncheon in Washington in the summer of 1953. Some of the things attributed to her sounded authentic, a few were obvious examples of distorted reporting, others were plainly absurd. The opposition press attacked her violently. Professional diplomats deplored her outspoken language. Her remarks to Mr. James Reston of the New York Times, on the predominance of Communist trade unions in the Italian plants working for U.S. defense projects, provoked further objections.

As the months passed, Mrs. Luce learned to hide her hand more and to abide by some of the traditional rules of the diplomatic craft. Veterans grudgingly admired her fast flying trip to Rome, in the summer of 1954, to be present at the funeral of Alcide De Gasperi, when she forced all other Ambassadors to leave beaches and golf links to follow suit. It was a good political gesture, especially since she and De Gasperi had not got on well together. At the funeral she found a clever way to express her regrets. She said: "Maybe De Gasperi's death is a gain for Italy. All countries must have a past, a present, and a future. Democratic Italy had no past. Now the memory of her late Prime Minister is her past."

In the United States, the deadline for the administration may be 1956. In Rome, as everybody knows, it is the Italian general elections of 1958. Three years are not enough to solve Italy's fundamental problems, but they might be enough to put the Communists on the defensive. There was substantial evidence early this year that the Scelba Administration was waking up. In December 1954, about 20 months after Mrs. Luce arrived in Rome, the Cabinet finally determined to fight Communists wherever they endanger the free institutions of the Republic: (1) to eliminate them from important posts in the ministries, the police, and the armed forces; (2) to curtail their monopoly of exports and imports across the Iron Curtain and their stranglehold on tax collections in municipalities under Communist Party control; and (3) to threaten diplomatic breaks with Communist satellites which continue anti-Italian broadcasts written by Italian Communists in Rome.

This sudden brave stand on the Scelba government was due to several factors. The new Soviet foreign policy based on "coexistence" shackled the Italian Communist Party for the time being, forbidding attempts to seize power legally or illegally. Then, too, the party has been weakened by internal squabbles, the illness of Palmiro Togliatti, the Communist boss, and apparently by a first small infection of disillusionment among the rank-and-file workers. Hence it is safer to oppose the Communists. At the same time, the Scelba leadership—criticized on all sides for its feebleness and confronted by a new challenge by the election in May of a leftist President of the Republic—was prodded into a little more vigorous action.

Nothing, to be sure, is constant in postwar Italy—but since 1953 the will to resist communism undoubtedly has steadied. It is equally indisputable that one reason for this change has been the persistent pressure of Clare Boothe Luce and her formidable husband. Moreover, so long as they remain in Rome, it is a safe guess that the exertions of the blonde lady of the Palazzo Boncompagni will be unflagging—and by far the most dramatic American performance Rome has ever seen.

MRS. LUCE'S POLICY HURTS REDS IN ITALIAN FACTORIES

ROME, December 26.—A U.S. policy of no aid contracts for factories dominated by Red workers is hitting Italian communism where it hurts.

More and more the men at the benches are voting for non-Communist representatives in shop elections. They want work—and Uncle Sam is handing out no offshore procurement contracts where the Communist-controlled Italian Federation of Labor is in the saddle.

U.S. Ambassador Clare Boothe Luce pioneered this get-tough policy 4 months ago. She ordered an $18-million ammunition contract canceled after Communists gained strength among workers of the Officina Vittorio Meccanica, near Milan.

Two months later, to prove that the United States meant business, a second contract was withdrawn at Palermo, Sicily. For $7,528,000, this order would have provided Italy with a new 1,500-ton destroyer escort at American expense. Cancellation came after factory workers increased the Communist majority on the factory committee even after the U.S. order.

LEADER WORRIED

Prime Minister Mario Scelba is a Sicilian, and his Christian Democratic government is worried about Communist gains on the island. Neither wanted unemployment. As a result, Italy blunted the moral impact of the American cancellation by letting a big contract to the Palermo shipyard.

Nevertheless, word got around among Italian workers fast.

Ever since World War II the Communists have controlled the Italian Federation of Labor (CGIL), which claims 3½ million members. This is nearly double the membership in anti-Communist labor groups.

The Communists have been able to wield their strength by electing Communist-controlled workers' commissions in the factories. Shop stewards and union officials chosen for office were handpicked from the Italian Communist Party, which has 2 million members and is the largest outside the Iron Curtain.

Now the workers know there will be no offshore procurement orders for factories whose workers vote these Communist commissions and union officials into office.

U.S. officials report that since Mrs. Luce's crackdown factory elections have been running strongly anti-Communist. Anti-Communists have won even in many former Communist strongholds, they say.

Only last week there was a dramatic example. Fiat's big "Avio" aviation parts plant near Turin had a Communist-controlled workers' commission in the past. Last week the workers voted again—1,920 against the Communists and only 77 for them. The Reds failed to win a single seat on the 20-member commission.

TO PROTECT CONTRACTS

Experts concede that a man might vote for a non-Communist factory council in self-interest, to protect the contracts which keep him employed, while still voting Communist in national elections.

But they say once Communist discipline is broken, the tendency is for workers to swing away from the Communists in more and more ways. Many voted for the Communists because they believed Red-led unions were the most militant defenders of their economic interests. Now that the workers see their economic self-interest lies elsewhere, according to this line of reasoning, there should be a growing trend away from communism among them.

Behind the scenes, the United States is quietly trying to assist this shift by persuading Italian employers that improved treatment of workers, as well as more workers' benefits, will bring increased production and cut Communist strength.

Italian industry is notorious in Europe for backward labor practices, although there are such bright spots as the Olivetti company. In the last 2 years, under quiet American pressure, such firms as Fiat have stepped up workers' benefits and improved labor relations.

Mrs. Luce also authored this affirmative policy. Firms with good labor relations and practices are more likely to get U.S. aid contracts than others. Knowing this, the smart industrialists are getting their labor practices into line.

The results in employee good will is beginning to show gradually—and that, too, means fewer Communist workers in Italy.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, with some regret I rise in opposition to the confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce. She is a charming and attractive woman, intelligent and well informed on almost all public affairs.

Nevertheless I believe her confirmation as Ambassador to Brazil should be rejected by the Senate. In my judgment the standard of ability and of qualifications of our Ambassadors to foreign posts in recent years has fallen too low. This is particularly true of the so-called political appointees of the Eisenhower administration. I am not one who believes that all appointees to ambassadorships should necessarily come from the Foreign Service. I believe it to be appropriate from time to time to appoint to such posts eminent citizens from outside the Foreign Service.

I regret very much that in the past it has been impossible to appoint individuals of great ability, both within and outside the Foreign Service, to posts of diplomatic importance because the cost of living in the country where those posts are located has been higher than such individuals could afford, and Congress has been too niggardly to provide adequate representational allowances.

Nevertheless, when we come to confirm the appointment as Ambassador to an important diplomatic post—and Brazil is a most important diplomatic post—of someone who is not in the regular Foreign Service, I believe we should look very carefully at the qualifications of the individual for that particular post.

I say with some regret that in my judgment Mrs. Luce at the moment knows no more about Brazil than the ordinary reasonably well informed American citizen knows about it; and I say that that is not enough. We should not send to Brazil someone who is not in the Foreign Service, who is just beginning to learn Portuguese, who makes it clear that in all likelihood she will be fortunate, able woman though she is, to carry on a very meager conversation in the language of the country, and who was the first to admit with all candor at the hearing in the Foreign Relations Committee that she had no special competence with respect to Latin-American affairs in general, and Brazil in particular.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am very happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator speaks about the hearing before the Committee on Foreign Relations on the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the hearing was held on April 15.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We were 8 days in session, almost day and night, in considering the labor-management reform bill. I inquire of the Senator when the transcript of the hearing was available to Members of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I wish I could answer my friend from West Virginia, but I cannot do so. I can only say that we were engaged actively all last week on the labor bill, right down to the time of the final vote late on Saturday afternoon. I had no opportunity to give any attention to this matter until today.

I attended a hearing today at which of necessity I had to preside. It was a hearing before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I was in the hearing from 10 this morning until about 2:30 this afternoon. I was then advised that the Senator from Oregon was making a speech in opposition to the confirmation of the Luce nomination. I came to the Senate and found on my desk a copy of the hearing. That was the first time I saw it. I have been able to read through it rather hurriedly. Of course, I did follow the matter in the public press to some extent.

I regard the nomination we are called upon to vote on as a very important one indeed. I am confident that at this time not one-tenth of the Members of the Senate have had an opportunity to read the transcript of the hearing if they see fit to do so, at a time when the long and able and well documented speech of the Senator from Oregon is not available to any Senator who was not on the floor at the time it was delivered. I came to the Chamber during the course of his remarks, and I heard only a part of them. I regret that his request that action on the nomination be held over until tomorrow so that other Senators might read his speech and read the RECORD and come to their own mature, personal judgment on the nomination, has not been granted.

I do not wish to attempt to criticize the leadership. Nothing is farther from my mind. The leaders have their problems, and I know what they are. I merely express on the record my regret that we do not have an opportunity to give this important nomination the careful attention to which I believe it is entitled.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. In line with the comment of the Senator from West Virginia, I am in a rather embarrassing position, because during the course of my remarks I did say I hoped that action on the nomination might go over until tomorrow. I would be willing to enter into an agreement to vote on the confirmation at a time certain tomorrow. What I have said should show my good faith that I want to vote on the question and not delay a vote on it. However, I believe that in view of the terrific workload we had to carry last week, and because Senators have not had an opportunity to study the issue, we should try to reach an agreement to vote on the nomination at an hour certain tomorrow, perhaps 2 or 2:30, or 3 o'clock. I care not what time is set.

Mr. CLARK. I share that view of the Senator from Oregon. I know that the majority leader is in the Chamber and has heard our comment. I am sure he will make up his own mind as to what should be done about it. Does the Senator from West Virginia desire that I yield further to him?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes. I appreciate the Senator's yielding to me. I do not wish to be picayune about the approach to the problem. In my opinion it is a problem. The Members of the Senate were engaged practically throughout every day and into the night all of last week on the labor bill, and we have received only today the printed hearing on the nomination which is now before us.

All of us have not been privileged to listen to the documented speech which I understand was made by the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon. I heard only portions of it late this afternoon. I feel that the matter is of importance not only to the Senate as a whole, but also is of vital importance to the individual Senators, because each of us has a responsibility in a matter of this kind. I hope we may have the opportunity to read the hearings and also to digest the speech made by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have no objection to anyone reading the hearings and the RECORD who wishes to do so. The hearings have been available for some time. The committee considered the matter in great detail.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I take it that the Senator from Texas wishes me to yield to him. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator from Texas mind telling us when the hearings were made available?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not know.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think they have been available for some time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If the Senator from Pennsylvania does not want to yield to me, I will wait and use my own time.

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to let the Senator make his statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Since the Senator is happy to do so, I can say that I have been informed by the distinguished Senator from Montana that the hearings have been available for some days. That is number one.

Number two: I was informed that the report by the committee was unanimous, with one exception.

The distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the committee, voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

Senators from all sections of the country, and representing all viewpoints, voted for the confirmation of the nomination.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care whether the nomination is voted on today or tomorrow or the next day. Each Senator has his own idea as to when will be the best time to vote on the nomination.

I asked the Senator from Oregon whether he preferred to have the Senate proceed with the nomination before or after the appropriation bill was taken up. He said he did not have any preference. I finally concluded, since the matter had been put off from last week until today, in order that Senators might have adequate notice, that perhaps we should move on and try to dispose of the nomination today.

I am not disposed to ask the Senate to remain in session past 6 o'clock this evening, although the majority has the responsibility to act on nominations and to take up bills which the Policy Committee cleared today, and although there is a good amount of proposed legislation waiting for action, I see nothing which would really suffer by having the nomination go over until an hour certain, such as 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to vote on the nomination of Mrs. Luce at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am happy to yield to the Senator from Texas so that he may propound the unanimous-consent agreement, with the understanding that I do not lose the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Illinois desire to have me yield to him?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thought my recollection was correct, and I find, upon checking, that a copy of the hearings was delivered to the office of every Senator on April 18, which was 10 days ago. So the hearings have been available for any Senator to peruse and examine, had he desired to do so.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to challenge the statement of the Senator from Illinois. I know that he tells only the truth, both on and off the floor. All I can say is that I saw the hearings only a short time ago, and I think that is the case with many of our colleagues.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I simply made the suggestion so that it would be a part of the discussion. If the matter needs any checking, Dr. Marcy, the very efficient chief of staff of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is on the floor. He knows when the hearings were concluded. So it is not a question of the veracity of the minority leader; it is a question of fact.

Mr. CLARK. The minority leader knows that I was not challenging his veracity at all Perhaps I could have gotten a copy of the hearings earlier, if I had wanted them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, so that the Chair may put my proposal before the Senate?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senate will remain in session for some time, until 6 o'clock or 7 o'clock this evening, or for as long as Senators may desire to discuss the nomination. The Senate will convene tomorrow at 12 o'clock. I ask the attachés on both sides of the aisle to notify Senators of the agreement which has been entered to vote on the nomination of Mrs. Luce at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. President, so that we will be certain to have a yea-and-nay vote on the nomination, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 12 O'CLOCK NOON TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in recess until noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator from Texas desire that I yield further to him?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. May I have the attention of the majority leader and of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the whip? I think the record should be made perfectly clear as to how the nomination was handled in committee. I should like to have the attention also of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], who is another member of the committee.

I do not want the Senate to believe that in the committee proceedings the nomination was considered at any great length. It was not, because of extraordinary circumstances which developed the day the vote was taken in the committee. A very important admiral was before the committee for a long time that morning. I think the record will show that it was well after 11 o'clock when we turned, in the Committee on Foreign Relations, to the Luce nomination. Dr. Marcy, the director of the staff, is in the Chamber, and he can verify my statement as to the time.

A motion was made to report the nomination favorably. I made it clear that I thought a record ought to be made in the committee. A considerable number of my colleagues on the committee had other engagements, but they thought we should dispose of the nomination.

I have always tried to be very accommodating in the Senate, but I said, "Mr. Chairman, I think this record ought to be made. I should like to make it today, if you feel that the committee must vote on this matter today."

This is, I believe, a fair interpretation of the feeling of the committee. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] are in the Chamber, and they can correct me if they think I am wrong in my statement about it.

I said, "I think a record ought to be made and consideration given to the nomination, but I do not want to hold you men here if you have other engagements, if you want to dispose of the nomination today."

The point was made that they felt a commitment had been made that the nomination would be voted on on Thursday.

I said, "I am willing to stay here and talk to the record, if necessary, but I have a record to make on the nomination and I am going to make it. If you who cannot stay want to come back at 2 o'clock, and vote at 2 o'clock, that will be agreeable to me."

The agreement was made. The Senators whom I have mentioned as being in the Chamber will, I think, agree with me. The rest of the committee came back and voted at 2 o'clock. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] honored me by his presence every minute of the time. Perhaps at one time or another two or three other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations may also have been present. They wanted to know how long I thought it would take me to make my record. I said I thought I could do it in 30 minutes.

After 40 minutes, my attention was called to the fact that I had already spoken 40 minutes. The suggestion was made that perhaps I would be willing to insert the rest of my remarks in the record. It was a documented record.

I do not have to be hit on the head with a baseball bat to know that, under the circumstances, good, common sense dictated that I had better insert the remainder of my remarks in the record. I inserted it in the record.

It was then well after 12 o'clock. The Committee on Foreign Relations returned at 2 o'clock, not for the purpose of discussion, but for the purpose of voting. The roll was called, and the committee voted.

That is the record of the deliberations of the Committee on Foreign Relations on this nomination.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. I have promised to yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. JAVITS. I simply wanted to know whether the Senator from Pennsylvania intended to speak to the Luce nomination.

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator from Oregon in his very complete and effective presentation of the case against the confirmation of the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce. His speech, as are all of the Senator's speeches, was thoroughly well documented, full of facts, and a presentation which I regret most of the other 97 Senators did not have a chance to hear.

I greatly appreciate the action of the majority leader in deferring until tomorrow our action on the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, so that Members of the Senate will have an opportunity to read the speech of the Senator from Oregon, to study the facts he has presented, and also to read the hearings, which in my case and in the case of my able colleague, the Senator from West Virginia, appeared today on our desks for the first time.

Mr. President, our relationships with Latin America are extremely important. I am somewhat familiar with the problems involved, because I was the adviser—and there was only one—to the U.S. delegation to the Seventh Inter-American Conference at Montevideo in the fall of 1933, when the good-neighbor policy for Latin America was initiated and implemented. It is notable that scarcely 6 months after the Roosevelt administration had taken office, that delegation—designed to improve our relationships with the Latin American countries—was sent on its mission, under the late and great Secretary of State Cordell Hull. At that conference was laid the foundation for the good-neighbor policy—the multilateralizing of the Monroe Doctrine, by which it was declared to be the policy and sentiment of the United States that that would no longer be a unilateral policy, enforced by the fiat of the United States, but, in President Roosevelt's own words, that it would be "a joint concern" of all the American Republics.

It was at the same conference that the new policy of nonintervention in the affairs of our neighboring states to the south of us was initiated; and thus we departed from the hitherto existing gunboat policy, which had existed for perhaps a quarter of a century or more, by which we, in effect, had ruled as to what would happen in connection with the recognition of the governments of our neighboring countries. In those days our State Department could practically impose a death sentence on an administration which had come into power in one of our smaller neighbors, by refusing it recognition.

Mr. President, it seems to me that at this critical juncture nothing could be more serious or more undesirable than to send as our Ambassador to one of our neighboring American Republics one who had interfered in the internal affairs of the country to which she had been sent as Ambassador, as the record shows Mrs. Luce did in Italy. Such action would be disastrous in Brazil.

All of us know that President Roosevelt was known throughout Latin America as its friend and as the author and originator of the good neighbor policy. So I believe it would be the height of unwisdom to send to the great state of Brazil a person who has uttered so flagrant a calumny as that President Roosevelt "lied us into war," and who at this late date will merely admit that her statement was intemperate, but will not retract or apologize for the distortion of facts which her statement represents. In other words, Mrs. Luce still believes that President Roosevelt "lied us into war." Under those circumstances, I cannot in good conscience vote for confirmation of her nomination.

Mr. President, that is only one of the many reasons the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] has cited in the speech he has made today in the Senate Chamber. He also referred to many others—for instance, the fact that she said 20-odd agencies of our administration were "riddled with Communists." When she made that statement and when she said that "This rotten fruit should be shaken from the top branches of the tree," she was engaging in smear tactics which I though the public conscience had long since repudiated.

Mrs. Luce is an educated and a cultured person. She has rendered real service in the field of drama. She has great personal charm. But those qualities have little bearing on the question which is before us here.

I think it no exaggeration when I say that of the many unfortunate situations which have developed in our foreign affairs in the last few years, none is more tragic than the deterioration of our relationships with our Latin America neighbors. Following the unfortunate and disgraceful attacks on Vice President NIXON when he was visiting our southern neighbors, we have only to refer to what happened to our Embassy staff in Bolivia, because of the publication of an article by Time magazine, in order to show how our relationships have deteriorated, and to demonstrate clearly that we cannot afford to send as our Ambassador to Brazil one who is not fully trained and qualified in the field of Latin American affairs.

Mr. President, I think the time has come to send as our Ambassador to Brazil, that great neighbor of ours, one who speaks the Portuguese language, who is familiar with Latin American psychology, and has been trained as a diplomat in that field. We should not continue to resort to the policy of the Eisenhower administration of paying off political debts with diplomatic appointments.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish to agree with the Senator from Alaska. I think I know something about Latin America.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico is correct; in my judgment, he knows more about Latin America than does any other Member of the Senate.

Mr. CHAVEZ. And I think I know something about human reactions.

Regardless of whether the nominee is a qualified person, the fact that a member of her family, in commenting on the situation in Bolivia, stated that the country should be divided, has an important bearing on this case, for we should bear in mind that Brazil is on the border of Bolivia. What will be the reaction among both the Bolivians and the Brazilians? Instead of developing good will, the appointment of such a person will only agitate the past.

I know that if the suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Alaska [Mr. GRUENING] were followed, much good would be done to our relationships with Latin America.

In the first place, Mr. President, language barriers are, as a general rule, most unfortunate. Imagine sending to Norway, as our Ambassador to that country, a person who could not speak the Norwegian language, and who thus could not converse with the average citizen of that country. Just consider the folly of sending as our Ambassador to some other important country, a person who could not speak the language of that country.

Mr. President, in our country there are sincere persons, of both political parties, who are talented and who could actually contribute greatly to the good will between our country and the other countries of the world.

However, I wish to point out that I have known a case in which an American girl who could not speak a word of Swedish was sent to serve in our Embassy in Sweden. I have known of other cases of that sort. However, we do not find the British or the Germans or the Italians making such mistakes. When our country makes a mistake of that sort, it is obvious that we are not using our own resources. Our population is a conglomeration of the descendants of Europeans and of peoples in the other countries of the world; and among the people in the United States are fine, sincere, qualified persons whom we could well use in our diplomatic service in the various countries of the world.

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for yielding to me.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I now return to the subject of the confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil.

Before the extended colloquy which has just been concluded, I had pointed out my view that it was important that Ambassadors sent by the United States of America from outside the Foreign Service to posts of diplomatic importance should have some knowledge and background and experience in the country to which they were accredited. I think it is clear from the record of the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee that Mrs. Luce does not have that experience as to Brazil. She was candid enough to admit it herself. This I think in and of itself is a reason for opposing her nomination.

In this regard, I would call to the attention of my colleagues the question of what should be the standards governing the advice and consent of the Senate which the Constitution requires be given to the appointment of Ambassadors. The appointment of Ambassadors, until recently, was a very important matter in connection with our foreign policy. I regret to state that during the last 6 years the position of ambassadorship has been denigrated, has been depressed, until in many cases an Ambassador has become a mere messenger boy for the Secretary of State and the Department of State.

I hope that trend will be reversed. I am confident it will be reversed so long as Christian Herter is our Secretary of State, and that is one of the reasons why I voted with enthusiasm, with all of my other colleagues present and voting, to confirm his nomination, because I think he will bring our Ambassadors around the world back to the position of responsibility and authority which they should have. I, for one, am happy to see that is his policy, and I am sure it will also be his procedure.

Mr. President, if we are going to rely upon our Ambassadors, they ought to know something about the country to which they are accredited. I suggest that the post in Brazil is one of the most difficult posts in the world to which to be sent, because of the huge physical extent of the country, because of the sensitivity of its proud people, because of the fact that it is the only nation in South America where Portuguese, instead of Spanish, is the official language, because of the fact that it is a nation which is only now coming out of a status of poverty and lack of economic development. An ambitious and proud people are coming into the modern age with all the zeal and desire to acquire the status of a great country which that subcontinent entitles them to hope for.

Because the post of Ambassador to Brazil is such a sensitive one, we should have an expert on Latin America, a person from our Foreign Service or from the outside world, someone who knows Brazil, in that post of importance.

So, with some regret, I reiterate that Mrs. Luce is a charming and an attractive woman, an intelligent and informed woman on most matters of public affairs, but not on Brazil, not on Latin America. So the first count in opposing the confirmation is that she does not have the experience for the job.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to my friend from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have been listening attentively this afternoon to much of the discussion about the proposed appointment of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador. I have listened with particular attention to the able remarks of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, whom I respect so much, and I think he knows it.

Mr. CLARK. I reciprocate the affection and respect of the Senator.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I would agree completely with the Senator from Pennsylvania that an Ambassador appointed to one of our neighbors in the world, be it a great neighbor or a small neighbor, ought to have an understanding and appreciation of that country. I think it would be very helpful if he or she spoke the language of that country. In fact, I would be perfectly willing to introduce a resolution in the Senate, and I have thought of so doing, to provide that all our Ambassadors Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary should speak the language of the country to which they are accredited.

I remember reading an article some months ago which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, written by Katherine Pringle, and her late illustrious husband, Henry F. Pringle, pointing out how few of our Ambassadors spoke the language of the country to which they were sent. I have also read the book "The Ugly American" with a good deal of dismay, because if the conditions described in that popular book are true about the lack of familiarity with foreign nations on the part of our oversea representatives, then our foreign policy is in a distressing condition indeed.

But what disturbs me about some of the speeches on the nomination, including the one of the very able Senator from Pennsylvania, is this: Are we going to start with the nomination of Mrs. Luce to impose these requirements? Would that be fair? We have been sitting in the Senate week after week, month after month, some of us year after year, some others much longer, confirming nominations of persons to be Ambassadors who were just as unfamiliar with the countries to which they were accredited as is Mrs. Luce, and who were equally lacking in language familiarity as is Mrs. Luce. I think it is part of a Senator's duty to be fair, that even the predecessors of Mr. Eisenhower made appointments of some of their political associates to be Ambassadors, and many of those associates did not speak the language of the country to which they were accredited.

This is the question to which I was coming: Might it not be better and fairer if we in the Senate proceeded to adopt a general policy that no person shall be appointed to represent this country overseas unless he or she speaks the language of the country to which he or she shall be accredited? It seems to me it would necessarily follow that a nominee with such qualifications should certainly understand the country in which he or she would be representing the United States of America. But is it fair or just to start with Mrs. Luce to impose such requirements, when the Senate and the Members of the Senate have been confirming nominees who did not have such qualifications for weeks, months, years, decades, generations, and, for all I know, nearly 2 centuries?

Mr. CLARK. In direct response to the question of the Senator from Oregon, I think it would be a mistake for the Senate to pass a resolution requiring every Ambassador to speak the language of the country to which he is accredited. That is perhaps a sad commentary on the state of education, not only of those in the Foreign Service, but among the American people generally. I am sure we would have the greatest difficulty in finding competent Ambassadors who understand our Foreign Service, our policies and our problems, who spoke the languages of many of the countries of the world, which

I will not name, but with which the Senator from Oregon is familiar. One of the languages might be Portuguese, and another might be Finnish. There might be many nations in the Near East and in the Far East whose languages our Ambassadors might not know. There are very few persons, in and out of the Foreign Service, who speak fluently the language of some countries in the world. The learning of many more languages by the people of this country is one of the objectives we should aim for. That is why I was so enthusiastically in favor of the Defense Education Act last year, which called for far greater study of foreign languages in our public schools. However, that should be one of our objectives for the future.

When a person outside the Foreign Service is nominated to be sent to a country with which he is not familiar, and when, in addition to that disability, that person does not speak the language of the country, it is an additional reason for suggesting that the nomination is not wise.

With respect to the Senator's question, "Where do we start?" he has been in the Senate longer than I have——

Mr. NEUBERGER. But a relatively short period of tenure.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Oregon, nevertheless, is my senior. Minor virtue though consistency may be, I have stood on the floor and have done what I could to prevent other nominations from being confirmed when I thought they should not be. I do not regret that action. I intend to do it again, because I think our standards are far too low in performing the duties laid down for the Senate by the Constitution of the United States.

We have to start somewhere. I am not starting now. I started a year ago or 2 years ago. I am simply trying to carry out what I tried to do earlier. Then, as no doubt will be true now, the majority of my colleagues felt my position was not well taken. In all probability my friend from Oregon feels that way.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I simply want to ask one more question, and then I shall desist from imposing upon the Senator's time.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is not imposing in any way.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Is it not true that all of us, including the able Senator from Pennsylvania, during the past several years and perhaps longer, have voted almost perfunctorily to confirm nominations of persons to be Ambassadors and ministers, when those persons certainly were not familiar in any way with the country to which they were going in order to represent the United States?

Mr. CLARK. That has been the experience in the Senate, and I regret it. One does not like to constantly be a carping critic. It may be that I have been derelict in my duty by not opposing a number of other nominations of persons to be Ambassadors.

I do not remember at this moment exactly how I voted with regard to the nomination of Mr. Gluck to be Ambassador to Ceylon. I thought that was an unfortunate nomination, and I spoke against it on the floor. I still think it was unwise. It may be that other nominations have slipped through.

I do not think one should take advantage of one's immunity on the floor of the Senate to make uncomplimentary remarks about American citizens, who no doubt are very patriotic and possibly more able than the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I will say that if people of the same caliber have had their nominations confirmed it is not because I did not try to fight them.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his characteristic courtesy and candor in answering my questions.

Mr. CLARK. I thank my friend for his interjection in the colloquy.

Mr. President, I now return to stating the reasons, in addition to Mrs. Luce's lack of specific experience, why I believe her nomination should not be confirmed.

My first reason was lack of experience. My second reason is Mrs. Luce's lack of objectivity.

Mr. President, this may seem a curious kind of criticism for a politician to make, and I would be the first to admit that on the hustings I have engaged from time to time in exaggeration, I have said some things which in cooler moments I regret, and I have been a partisan—and I shall be again. But this is not the same, it seems to me, as the situation with respect to a nomination of a person to be an Ambassador to an important, friendly country, considered in the light of the fact that statements—to be charitable—of high inaccuracy were called to the attention of the individual who made them and, many years after that event, her testimony still is that she stands by her statement that Franklin Roosevelt lied us into war.

Mr. President, I think almost all good Americans would now, after the heat of events, agree that was an unfortunate statement. It would seem to me to be the kind of statement which an individual possessing real objectivity would apologize for and would retract, and as to which the individual would say, "The statement was made in the heat of a campaign. It was made in hotblood. It was the kind of thing which you gentlemen, as Members of the Senate, perhaps have done at times."

But to stand on that statement and to say she still believes it, I think, Mr. President, is a sad commentary on the objectivity of the lady in question, as indeed I fear have been a number of her other activities in public life, both as a Member of the other body, as a leading Republican politician, and as a playwright. I use the word "politician" in a good sense, and not in an evil sense.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Pennsylvania has invited our attention to the apparent unwillingness of Mrs. Luce to retract the statement which she previously made in reference to a former great President of the United States. I point to page 7 of the hearings, in which the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the U.S. Senate made the comment:

> You think he lied us into a war?
> Mrs. LUCE. I stand by my statement.

I think at this point the RECORD should be made clear as to the colloquy between the chairman and the person nominated.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator for his helpful interjection.

Mr. President, my third reason for reluctantly opposing the confirmation of this nomination is that I believe the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations disclose a lack of mature judgment on the part of the nominee, which disqualifies her for this important diplomatic post. I hope that before the vote is taken tomorrow, every Member of the Senate will read carefully this not-too-long document of 38 pages I hold in my hand, including the appendix, which represents the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I hope each Member will judge for himself whether, as he can reconstruct it from the printed word, the demeanor and behavior of the witness before the committee evidenced that caliber of dignity and that sense of judgment which one would expect from an Ambassador of the United States of America.

I have said before, and I say again, that Mrs. Luce is a charming and attractive woman, but I suggest that in her previous career as a playwright, as a political speaker, and, indeed, according to many—the record carries the evidence—as an Ambassador to Italy, she has not displayed those qualities of sound and mature judgment which are the essential part of the armament of an Ambassador of the United States of America.

Finally, Mr. President, my fourth reason for opposing the confirmation of this nomination are the affiliations of Mrs. Luce. We must be careful when we speak of things like affiliations. A sad, black chapter in the history of our country was built in this decade on the basis of guilt by association. I wish to distinguish these comments very clearly indeed from the type of smear which has occurred in the saying: "A once met B; and B knew C; and C is a fellow traveler or a Communist."

We must distinguish between that kind of guilt by association and the necessary and admitted and much-to-be-commended affiliations which arise from the institution of matrimony.

Mrs. Luce is Mr. Luce's wife. Mr. Luce, Mrs. Luce testifies, will spend 6 months out of every year with her in Brazil if her nomination is confirmed. I do not intend to attack the personal integrity or the ability of Henry Luce. They are both great.

I agree with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH], who said Mr. Luce came up the hard way. He was the son of a missionary. He went into the magazine business shortly after World War I, and he has built up an empire and a powerful financial structure. He has amassed great wealth. That is the American way of life. This is what we hold out as a goal before many Americans. I think he is to be commended for it.

But I say that experience has shown that Mr. Henry Luce, the husband of the nominee, has evidenced consistently, and almost from month to month, the same lack of objectivity and the same lack of judgment which I fear are characteristic of the nominee.

I will not gild the lily. We know that Time magazine started as a weekly news magazine. Many years ago it was converted into a journal of plutocratic opinion, and as such it distorts the facts of American life week by week and month by month, in support of policies—no doubt honestly held by its publisher—which, in my judgment are detrimental to the best interests of the United States, policies which came very close, no more than a month ago, to getting us into what might well have turned into a revolution in Bolivia, or perhaps a war. Our diplomacy was held up to scorn over a large area of Latin America. Why? Because of the desire to make a "slick chick" wisecrack in a widely read magazine published in Spanish throughout Latin America, and repeated in the English edition.

We know what happened to the China policy which Mr. Luce advocated. At the time there were those who thought that was an indication of lack of objectivity and lack of judgment. I hope we are not to have a repetition in Brazil of the situation which occurred in Bolivia, under a Latin American policy which would carry with it equally disastrous results.

On the 19th of March of this year I had occasion, as shown on page 4588 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to insert in the RECORD an article by a very able reporter on the Providence Journal-Bulletin. This article was an effort to analyze Time magazine in an article which was subsequently printed in the New Republic. I invite the attention of my colleagues to the excerpts from that article which appear upon that page in the RECORD. I read the concluding paragraph, which is a quotation from the late William Allen White:

> I think on the whole, sooner or later, the American people do get the truth. But they often get it when it is cold potatoes and does them no good.

I say it with deep regret, but I do not believe that the affiliations of Mrs. Luce and the attitude of mind of her husband—again, no doubt honestly held, because he thinks that is the way to do things—are very helpful to the foreign policy of the United States. Therefore I am reluctantly compelled to vote against confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be our Ambassador to Brazil, on the ground that the record shows that she does not have the necessary experience, objectivity, or judgment, and that her relationship with the Luce newspaper empire is, in my judgment, likely, if not certain, to hurt the status of the United States in the country to which she seeks accreditation.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, so long as there will be no more speeches on the nomination of Mrs. Luce today, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

MODIFICATION OF REORGANIZATION PLANS NO. II OF 1939, AND NO. 2 OF 1953—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 25)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 144, "An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953."

The bill provides that, in the approval and disapproval of loans, the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) shall not be subject to the supervision, direction or other control of the Secretary of Agriculture. In all other respects the functions and activities of the REA would be exercised within the Department of Agriculture under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary.

Were S. 144 to become law it would mark a major retreat from sound administrative policy and practice. Twenty years ago the REA, then an independent agency, was by reorganization plan placed within the Department of Agriculture and under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary. The President, in his message transmitting Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939, said that the proposed reorganization was for the "sole purpose of improving the administrative management of the executive branch."

That action of 20 years ago accords entirely with the later finding of the first Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch that:

> There must be a clear line of authority reaching down through every step of the organization and no subordinate should have authority independent of that of his superior.

Because S. 144 violates this sound injunction I am compelled to disapprove it.

Moreover, there is nothing in the recent history of the REA which affords any basis for concluding that the best interest of the agency or the public would be served by removing the Administrator's loan-making authority from the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The REA since its inception has moved steadily in the accomplishment of its mission. When the agency was established, only a small percentage of the Nation's farms had central station electric service. Today 96 percent of our farmers have such service and about one-half the increase has been provided by REA financed facilities.

In the past 6 years the REA-financed systems have made their greatest progress. Loans of more than a billion dollars have been made in this period, nearly half as much as was loaned by the agency in the previous 17½ years of its existence. Power sales have more than doubled since 1952, loan delinquencies have been reduced to the vanishing point and the net worth of electric borrowers has more than tripled. Plant investment for these systems has more than doubled in the past decade. The REA telephone loan program, authorized in 1949, has resulted in loan approvals which now total approximately $500 million and modern dial telephone service is rapidly being extended to the Nation's rural areas.

The REA has been working well and progressing efficiently under the existing administrative arrangements. The change in those arrangements proposed by S. 144 would be contrary to the public interest.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1959.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, a copy of the message of the President was made available earlier today to Members of the Senate. Now we have heard read to the Senate the veto message relating to Senate bill 144.

I say most respectfully that the message does not get to the heart of the proposed legislation. The proposed legislation did not deal with the number of loans that had been made or the amount of the loans, or the purposes for which the loans had been made. The bill was directed toward one thing, and only one thing, namely, the possibility of political interference in the granting of loans by the Rural Electrification Administration through the Secretary of Agriculture. The legislation was directed toward the commitment, which had been given by the Secretary of Agriculture to the Senate Committee on Government Operations, at the time the Reorganization Plan of 1953 went into effect, that if any changes were to be made in the administrative structure of REA and its relationship to the Department of Agriculture, the appropriate committees of Congress would be notified prior to those changes being made.

Those changes were made. The committees were not notified. The promise and the assurance of the Secretary of Agriculture were not fulfilled, and the fears of many Members of the Senate, expressed at the time of the adoption of the reorganization plan, relating to the Department of Agriculture, actually became a fact. The Secretary of Agriculture appointed an officer in the Department of Agriculture with jurisdiction over the Rural Electrification Administrator, who is a presidential appointee.

Mr. President, I recommend that Senators study the message very carefully, and I hope that, after having studied it, my colleagues will come to the same conclusion to which I have come this afternoon, namely, that the message does not come to the point at all of what we are attempting to do, and that the President, in vetoing S. 144, insists on continuing a situation which is frowned upon and looked up with concern and worry by the REA's of the Nation. I hope, therefore, that the policy committee of the majority will take the stand to override the veto. It is about time that Congress made up its mind that government by veto shall come to an end.

From time to time, as we pass effective legislation in the Senate, which expresses the will of those of us who have gone out and talked to our people as to what a Democratic Congress would do, we are confronted with a veto. I am of the opinion that the time is at hand to challenge the veto. I for one am prepared to enter that battle. Win or lose—and it is important to win—it is essential that we stand up now and see whether or not we shall constantly have the efforts of the Congress stopped dead by the use of the veto by the President of the United States.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. It is about time that we face our responsibility in connection with this legislation. I recall, for example, on two previous occasions when the Senator from Minnesota engineered a good farm bill through the Senate, and when eventually both bills passed Congress, only to be vetoed by the President of the United States. No effort was made on the part of Congress to override the presidential veto of the only two good farm bills passed in the 6 years of this administration.

So, speaking as an individual Senator, I wish to assure the Senator from Minnesota that I am 100 percent with him. I hope that the veto by the President of the United States will be met by Congress and that, win or lose, we face our responsibility on this issue.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to say that I wholeheartedly concur in the remarks made by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Montana. It is the duty of Congress to pass legislation which in its opinion is best for the Nation. Both the Senate and the House, by very large majorities, showed that they did not believe that the present Secretary of Agriculture should have veto power in connection with REA projects.

I was very happy to vote for the Humphrey-Price bill. The RECORD shows that the Secretary of Agriculture is not friendly to REA, that he is particularly opposed to the generating and transmission activities of REA co-ops; that he wants to raise the interest rate to unconscionable heights and, if possible, drive REA co-ops into the private money market, where they would probably have to pay 4½ percent, or 5½ percent interest; and that at the very least he would like to see a 4 percent interest rate if the loans were continued to be made by the Federal Government.

Of course it is true that interest rates have risen in the last few years both on shorttime and on longtime borrowings by the Federal Government. I do not believe, however, that the interest rate exceeds the average interest rate on shorttime and longtime loans. The last time I looked at it, it was slightly less than 3 percent.

I also believe that there should be some scaling down even of that average, because Congress, in the Pace Act of 1944, required the REA co-ops to provide full area coverage and to take in virtually every farmer who applies, no matter how isolated he may be or how far away he may be from the distribution line. In my State of Illinois, which is one of the most prosperous farm States in the country, we have about three REA customers to the mile of distribution line. This is a very small figure. In other words, Congress compels REA co-ops to serve large groups of people whom the private utilities never would have served. Under those conditions it is proper that there should be a subsidy granted to the REA co-ops. I furthermore believe that in the case of some co-ops, where the farm population has been diminishing, which is true in the southern portion of my State, there should be a second scaling down of the interest rate.

So, I believe that the present policy of the Secretary of Agriculture is unwise and not in the national interest, and therefore the veto power should be taken away from him. I hope very much that the Democratic majority will decide to try to override the veto of the President. I wish to say that, as one humble Member of the Senate, I shall vote, if this question comes before us, to override the veto.

Mr. GRUENING. I share the hope that not only the Democratic majority but also Republican Senators will participate in that action. I say that because I see on the floor my very good friend, GEORGE AIKEN, of Vermont, who has played a very active part in making available low cost electricity to sections of the country which would never have had it but for the enlightened policy of the Roosevelt administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to pay tribute to the distinguished Senator from Vermont, and I have been paying tribute to him in this regard for the past 11 years.

He has been one of the stalwarts in the fight to see that farmers of the country receive low-cost electricity. While I do not wish to embarrass him in any way, I hope that he also will vote to override the President's veto.

Mr. GRUENING. I am happy that the Senator from Vermont is on the floor, so that I pay tribute to his long-time record in this field, as well as to his independence in breaking with the administration when it was following an unwise and untenable farm policy. I am sure we can count on him again on this particular issue.

Mr. AIKEN. The question is, What is an unwise and untenable farm policy? I wish I knew. With regard to the REA matter, I agree wholeheartedly with what the Senator from Illinois was expounding, I believe, when I came on the floor, with reference to the interest rate charged REA co-ops. We know that if the interest rate were raised to 4½ percent or 5 percent or 6 percent, at least a third of the REA co-ops in the country would have to go to the wall. Possibly a few could stand it, but certainly about a third could not.

However, I shall have to part company with my good friend from Illinois and my good friend from Alaska, and points between, when they advocate overriding the veto. In my opinion the bill which takes the so-called veto power from the Secretary of Agriculture and places full responsibility for loans in the hands of the REA Administrator is pretty nearly meaningless as far as the REA program is concerned.

The REA Administrator will have to get through the Secretary of Agriculture the money he needs to make loans. There is one thing I regret, and I hope it may not turn out as I think possibly it will. I am afraid we are not unanimous in our feeling that the REA's interest rate should be kept low. I am simply afraid that in considering a bill like the one just vetoed, which actually does not do anything for the REA, we shall simply be affording an excuse to vote to raise interest rates and to do other things which would really be bad, and to enable Senators to point to this bill and say: "I supported the REA. My vote on this issue proves it."

I may be wrong. Perhaps every Senator who votes to override the veto of this bill will also vote against raising interest rates and doing other things to the REA which would not be so good.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Simply because people take one step in virtue should not cause the Senator from Vermont to believe that they will not take other steps in virtue. I should think the Senator from Vermont would welcome the overriding of the veto, because it would register in a very clear way that Congress did not want the Secretary of Agriculture to stifle the REA. I do not believe the Senator from Vermont wants that to happen either.

Mr. AIKEN. If I thought that every Senator who is likely to vote to override the veto would vote against raising the interest rates of REA and to vote against hamstringing REA in every way, I might be tempted to vote to override the veto myself. But I still have some doubt in my mind that such may be the case.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand the Senator from Vermont has pending a resolution to override the opinion of the Comptroller General. I will support the Aiken resolution when it comes from the committee and is brought before the Senate for action. I hope this will be an evidence of good faith from our side of the aisle, and that the friends of REA on the other side of the aisle will forget partisan advantage and join with us to override the veto.

Mr. AIKEN. The one thing which bothers me is what the Senator from Illinois just said: "When the resolution comes from the committee." I wish we could have it reported by the committee, because it has been there since January 14.

I see the Senator from Minnesota in the Chamber. I know he will help me. I am not certain that the committee must have a quorum to vote on the question, but I think the committee should consider the veto of the bill now before us. I think that would be an excellent time also to vote to report the resolution which has been lingering in the committee since January 14. It should be reported by the committee and agreed to by the Senate in order to remove any shadow of doubt about the legality of all REA loans which have been made up to now and which may be made in the future.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I would be much more reconciled to overriding the veto if I were assured that the resolution to which I have referred will be reported.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I will join with the Senator from Vermont to have that done. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. If the distinguished Senator from Illinois is, as he has said he is, and I know he is, a humble Member of this body, then, indeed, I, as the junior Senator from Ohio, a new Member of the Senate, am an extremely humble Member indeed.

I hold in the highest admiration the statement made a few moments ago by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. I hope the leadership of the Senate will bring before this body, and soon, the question of overriding the veto by the President of a meritorious bill. I say this as one who years ago, as a Representative at Large from Ohio in the other body, helped to draft the Rural Electrification Administration law. I am proud to say that as a Member of the other body, and on every yea and nay vote, I supported the REA legislation.

In this instance, both Houses of Congress passed a meritorious bill. Whether we have the votes or do not have the votes to override the veto of the President is not material. What is material is that we should not fold in this moment. We should have a vote on the question of overriding the veto. I hope that will be soon.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I am happy to yield to my colleague from Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to give to the Senator from Vermont one ninety-eighth of the assurance required.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Alaska. I am sure that when and if the resolution to which I have referred is reported to the Senate, it will be approved overwhelmingly, because it means so much, not only to the future of the REA program, but to the past, as well, which has been put under shadows by the decision of the Comptroller General.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The best way to have the Aiken resolution reported is to override the President's veto by a big vote. That will be a clear mandate that just as we do not want the Secretary of Agriculture to hamstring the REA progress, neither do we want the Comptroller General to hamstring the program.

If we override the veto by a big vote, it will then be possible to have the Aiken resolution reported, and I shall be very glad to vote for it.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, before passing to another topic, I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and other Senators who have protested against the President's veto of the Humphrey-Price bill.

REA is one of those constructive, inventive actions taken by the Roosevelt administration more than 20 years ago. It has revolutionized the agricultural sections of the country by bringing low-priced electricity to the farms. It is a striking fact that the Eisenhower administration, while accepting, because of their overwhelming and popular support, the drastic, far-reaching, and beneficial reforms of the Roosevelt administration, and being unable to repeal them, has nevertheless, somehow, managed consistently, and perhaps not too consistently, to weaken them by administrative procedure.

The Humphrey-Price bill is not a very drastic measure; it is simply an attempt to diminish and forestall the administration's efforts gradually to wreck REA. It is obvious that that is what the administration is trying to do by curtailing the power of the Administrator to make needed loans, and by preparing to raise interest rates, as it has done throughout its tenure, for the benefit of vested-interest groups. Therefore, I sincerely hope Congress will seriously consider the President's veto message and will vote to override the veto.

MILITARY DEFENSE OF ALASKA

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, the New York Times yesterday printed a letter signed by the two Senators from Alaska and the Alaska Representative in the House taking issue with statements in an article published by the New York Times' military expert, Hanson W. Baldwin. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, Mr. Baldwin had stated that only the important military areas in Alaska around Fairbanks and Anchorage would be defended in the event of a shooting war. Apparently the rest of Alaska and its people would be left undefended. The Alaska delegation felt that it could not allow so mischievous and unwarranted a statement to go unchallenged, and therefore communicated its views to the Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy, asking him for confirmation or correction of this statement for the record.

Secretary McElroy's reply was gratifyingly categorical, to the effect that "there is no military plan in existence, and none has been considered, which contemplates or accepts the concept that the United States would fail to defend any and all of our sovereign territory—and that includes, of course, Alaska as an integral part." This correspondence was printed in the magazine section of the New York Times on yesterday, April 26, 1959, together with a reply by Mr. Baldwin, to whom the New York Times quite properly accorded the privilege of replying to Secretary McElroy.

Unfortunately, Mr. Baldwin compounded his error by a concluding statement in which he alluded to the "potential danger" that—

> A small-scale enemy attack somewhere on the periphery of Alaska might well create such a political and psychological uproar that it would create a costly and wasteful military diversion as did the Japanese on the Aleutians during World War II.

Mr. President, the fact is that what Mr. Baldwin calls a "costly and wasteful military diversion"—namely, the expulsion of the Japanese, after their occupation of Attu and Kiska Islands—would never have occurred if the Federal Government, including successive Congresses, had sensed the military and strategic importance of Alaska, and had provided the necessary defenses.

At the outbreak of World War II, not a single military establishment—Army, Air Force, or Navy, was ready for its defensive role. Alaska's voteless Delegate, then the able and devoted Anthony J. Dimond, had pleaded repeatedly, but vainly, for the establishment of suitable defenses in Alaska. As early as 1904, the Navy Department had set aside Kiska Island, near the western end of the Aleutian chain, as a naval reservation. The Navy planned to make it an important coaling station and to give it the necessary defenses that its adjacency to Asia connoted. It might have become a Gibraltar of the North Pacific. The Navy repeatedly requested funds for this potentially important base; but Congress after Congress declined to appropriate them, year after year, with the result that the first Navy to occupy Kiska, nearly 40 years later, was the Navy of the Mikado—not the Navy of Uncle Sam. I do not wish at this moment to take the time of the Senate to go into the long and pathetic story of the Federal Government's failure to make adequate defense preparations for Alaska. I am concerned only with present and future needs.

Throughout the 1930's our voteless Delegate in the House of Representatives, Anthony J. Dimond, who served there for 12 years, and was the predecessor of Delegate E. L. BARTLETT, now my able and distinguished colleague in the Senate, both in committee and on the floor of the other body pleaded fervently for defenses for Alaska. He repeatedly urged the construction of at least one Army Air Force base and one Naval base. I have in my possession a copy of a letter written to Delegate Dimond as late as November 12, 1937, by the late General Malin Craig, Chief of Staff of the United States Army. General Craig, speaking for the Army, rejected Delegate Dimond's written plea for an endorsement of an Army air base in Alaska. General Craig gave as his reason that "the mainland of Alaska is so remote from the strategic areas of the Pacific that it is difficult to conceive of circumstances in which air operations therefrom would contribute materially to the national defense."

How little vision and forethought concerning impending events.

As late as the late winter of 1940, the War Department had finally come around to the view that some defenses should be established in Alaska, and budgeted the modest sum of $12 million for an Army Air Force base near Anchorage. This item was excised by the House Subcommittee on the War Department, of the House Appropriations Committee. The subcommitte rejected the pleas of General Marshall, of General "Hap" Arnold, of Delegate Dimond, and of myself to restore this modest item. The bill was reported without it on April 4, 1940. Five days later, however, Adolf Hitler invaded Norway and Denmark, and a sense of urgency was transmitted to our shores. When, 2 months later, the military appropriation bill reached the Senate, Hitler's hordes had swept through the Netherlands and Belgium, and were pouring into France. The Senate restored the Alaska base, and the House concurred.

Likewise, the War Department, as it was then called, rejected, as having no military value, the building of a highway to Alaska, and maintained its opposition until after the attack on Pearl Harbor. However, I was able to persuade President Roosevelt of the necessity of constructing this highway immediately. Work was begun in the late winter of 1941–42, after we were well into the war. The highway was not built over the route which either the United States or Canadian Commissions which had studied the problem had recommended. Instead, it was built over a route previously unsurveyed, which added greatly to the costs which our Nation was obliged to pay. The U.S. Commission was headed by our able and distinguished colleague, WARREN G. MAGNUSON, at that time a Member of the House of Representatives, and I was one of its five members.

The story of the military neglect of Alaska is long; and, although I am familiar with it, it need not be told here. However, I think it necessary to take issue with Mr. Baldwin when he stigmatizes as a costly and wasteful military diversion the very proper action on the part of the U.S. Navy and Air Force and Army in driving the Japanese enemy out of the Aleutians, and to point out that that campaign would not have been needed and would not have taken place if Alaskan defenses had had the proper appreciation and attention from the Federal authorities, executive and legislative, that Alaska deserved.

My point in bringing up this matter today in connection with the correspondence which was published in yesterday's New York Times is that I continue to feel very strongly that the defenses of Alaska are as yet by no means what they should be. In the course of the last few years, the United States has built a tremendous number of bases all over the world. They have been built at great cost. Many of them are of extremely dubious value. No doubt they were calculated risks when they were planned, and represented the best thinking of our military authorities at the time when they were established. But there is no question that today our tenure of a great many of these foreign-based establishments is highly uncertain. There is uncertainty about whether we shall be able to maintain them, even during the cold war, in the face of opposition from the governments of the countries where the U.S. bases are located; and this uncertainty applies even in the case of countries which are manifestly friendly, and whose people we count as belonging to the free world. In other cases, in the case of countries less free, there is little question that Uncle Sam is being blackmailed, if that may not be too harsh a word, for the right to keep those bases there. If that is too harsh a word, let me say that Uncle Sam is obliged to pay through the nose. There is the further question of whether, with the changing technology of war, these bases have the value that was ascribed to them when they were established.

With the rapid change in the methods of warfare, the validity of these bases, I think, deserves careful reexamination by the Congresses and by the military authorities.

But I wish to point out that whatever defenses we build in Alaska, we build on the firm rock of U.S. terrain and within the security of a 100 percent loyal American people. What is built in Alaska is not liable to sabotage, subversion, or other adverse factors which exist in the case of many oversea bases. Alaska's defense should be fully reconsidered, so as to make the 49th State what is an important part of its destiny—namely, to be a bulwark of defense for the North American Continent, and thereby for the whole free world.

I repudiate the notion that defending a square foot of American soil is costly and wasteful. But it is much better to have the defenses—and potential offenses—in such shape that no enemy will be tempted, as were the Japanese, to invade any part of our Nation.

[From the New York Times magazine section, Apr. 26, 1959]

DEFENSE OF ALASKA

To the EDITOR:

In the article "Communiqué From Our Alaskan Outpost" (March 15), Hanson W. Baldwin wrote that Alaska has "only two important target complexes or basic military objectives"—the Fairbanks and Anchorage areas. "These areas, and these only, will be defended," he stated.

This statement implies that whether American soil will be defended is a question susceptible of doubt, rather than a matter of national principle. It suggests that the Department of Defense will undertake to repel an invader threatening the security of American homes where the area involved is militarily significant and will abandon the axiom that American soil is and must remain inviolate.

Such a statement can only tempt a potential aggressor into a miscalculation tragic for the world if, in undisclosed fact, the statement is false.

Accordingly, we, as Alaska's congressional delegation, have asked Secretary of Defense Neil McElroy to correct the record. His reply, dated April 3, 1959, says in full:

"In reply to your letter of March 20 concerning the article, 'Communiqué From Our Alaskan Outpost,' by Mr. Hanson Baldwin, you may be assured that there is no military plan in existence, and none has been considered, which contemplates or accepts the concept that the United States would fail to defend any and all of our sovereign territory—and that includes, of course, Alaska as an integral part."

We are relieved to have reaffirmed the determination of the United States to defend every American community, great and small, in every State.

E. L. BARTLETT,
U.S. Senator.
ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senator.
RALPH J. RIVERS,
Member of Congress.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

(Mr. Baldwin replies: "The statistics cited in my article speak for themselves. They make it plain—as indeed Senators BARTLETT and GRUENING and Representative RIVERS know—that the strategic concept of Alaskan defense is based upon the insular theory. The 'islands' of Anchorage and Fairbanks are the most important military targets in Alaska and virtually all of our available defense forces are concentrated around them. Mr. McElroy has rightly reaffirmed the political principle of the defense of American soil anywhere. But the fact remains that much of Alaska—given the present strength, composition and location of our Armed Forces there—is virtually indefensible militarily, and that the Anchorage-Fairbanks areas are the only areas which have strong defenses. There is a potential danger in this situation which my article attempted to clarify. A small-scale enemy attack somewhere on the periphery of Alaska might well create such a political and psychological uproar that it would create as costly and wasteful a military diversion as did the Japanese attack on the Aleutians during World War II.")

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, will my good friend, the able and distinguished junior Senator from Alaska, yield to me?

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, it gives me great pleasure to yield to my colleague, who many years ago, as secretary to his predecessor, Delegate Dimond, later as Secretary of the Territory of Alaska, and for 14 years the able Delegate in the other Body, saw and lived through our tremendous efforts to obtain an adequate appreciation of the defense value of our 49th State, when it was only a Territory.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank my colleague.

I should like to ask him whether he will agree with me in my contention that something vital will have been lost to our country if a time ever comes when the American public does not demand that an invader be driven from American soil.

Mr. GRUENING. It would be a betrayal of our entire past; it would be a renunciation of one of the most basic things for which America has stood, namely, the right to defend our freedoms and to extend that defense to every man, woman and child under our Flag.

Mr. BARTLETT. In his article in the New York Times of yesterday, Mr. Baldwin stated that the danger in connection with defending certain parts of Alaska, which he terms as being indefensible, is that a small-scale enemy attack there might create such a political and psychological uproar that it would create as costly and wasteful a military diversion as did the Japanese attack on the Aleutians during World War II.

I should like to ask my friend a question, inasmuch as he is in a position to know, because he was then the Governor of Alaska, and had intimate knowledge of that campaign; and, indeed, he was in the forefront of those who previously had urged that Alaska be properly defended.

Was it not a military decision, rather than a decision brought into being by public emotion, which led to the dislodgement of the Japanese from the Aleutian Islands?

Mr. GRUENING. It was wholly a military decision. I was Governor of Alaska at the time, I was close to the administration, and I can assure the Senator there was not a vestige of psychological or political uproar. The Armed Forces merely did their duty as they saw it, and I highly commend them, in retrospect, for what they did.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not true also that the mere fact that the Alaska defense forces are concentrated at Anchorage and at Fairbanks is not evidence of any kind at all that the Department of Defense does not have an intention to defend all of Alaska? I am sure my colleague will recall the very pointed testimony on this very facet of the defense of Alaska made by Lt. Gen. William Kepner when he was commander in chief of the Alaskan Command and when he said that the defense of Alaska would be more easily achieved by concentrating his forces, rather than spreading them out all over the then vast Territory of Alaska.

Mr. GRUENING. My colleague is quite correct. The disposition of the forces is, after all, a tactical matter, which must be left to the military.

Mr. BARTLETT. I recall having had a conversation one day with the then Chief of Staff of the Army, who made, in an eloquent statement and in decisive terms, the point later stated by General Kepner, and the Chief of Staff at that time was none other than General Eisenhower.

I commend my colleague for calling this situation to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the country.

Mr. GRUENING. Will my colleague not agree with me that the defenses, which, after all, are a national problem, and should have had nothing to do with our inferior Territorial status, were nevertheless grossly neglected, and that the pressure to strengthen those defenses originated with and was carried through by Alaskan representatives in their legislature, through their memorials, by our Delegates in Congress, by people who were on the ground and had a far better appreciation of the needs of Alaska than did people in the distant Capital of the United States

Mr. BARTLETT. The junior Senator from Alaska has made a statement of exact fact.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRUENING. I yield with pleasure to my distinguished colleague from Oregon, who has done so much to help Alaska, both in the construction of the highway, and in all other ways, which have made it possible for Alaska now to achieve a position of equality with the other 48 States.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have been listening with great interest to the discussion of our defenses generally, and those of Alaska particularly, by the two able Senators from Alaska. Of course, I was especially interested because during much of World War II I was stationed in the Alaska theater of war, as the eminent junior Senator from Alaska knows, because at that time he was the Governor of Alaska. I believe he served as Governor of the Territory of Alaska longer than anyone in Alaska's territorial history.

But the point which I wish to make and which I think is important is this. Reference was made to the New York Times. This morning there commenced, on the front pages of the New York Times, a most informative series of articles of what the writer has seen in his travels through Siberia. He describes therein vast developments occurring in Siberia in terms of hydroelectric power, railroad construction, highway construction, industrial plants, and an entire, impressive, vast program, which he discusses.

Siberia is opposite Alaska at Bering Strait. If any conflict ever occurs at the roof of the globe, and we pray it will not, it will occur, so far as geography is concerned, between the State of Alaska and Siberia, because at Bering Strait they nearly touch. On a clear day one can see the low headlands of Siberia looming out of the bay, as the Senators from Alaska so well know.

It seems to me the articles which are starting in the New York Times emphasize that what has been done in Siberia by the Soviet Union, through vast expenditures of money and resources, should stimulate us in the Senate and the other body of Congress and the President of the United States to bring about a similar program of development in Alaska. Alaska needs roads, highways, a railway connection with the United States, and great hydroelectric power projects to tap such rivers as the Yukon and other great streams which could provide industrial development.

I think the series of articles on Siberia should encourage the Government of the United States to follow Russia's lead, and proceed to develop Alaska, which has not yet been done.

Mr. GRUENING. The able Senator from Oregon has outlined succinctly exactly what needs to be done in Alaska. I, too, read the first of the series of articles on Siberia which appeared in the New York Times of this morning. I hope, when we are hearing so much from this administration about what needs to be done to compete successfully with Russia and about not being outdone by Russia in the economic, military, and every other field, the administration will come to the view which the Senator has expressed about the necessity of helping to bring about Alaska's development. Alaska has the greatest hydroelectric development potential in the Western World. Less than one-fourth of 1 percent of its hydroelectric power potential is developed. The great Yukon and Kuskokwim flow wastefully to the sea. I am hopeful the administration will wake up to the need of trying to catch up in the fields of development which were so well started by the Roosevelt and Truman administrations.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I think it is excellent and very auspicious that the new 49th State of the Union has two Senators who are so thoroughly acquainted with Alaska's needs in the field of industrial and resource development.

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

SEA TRANSPORT AND WORLD TRADE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the far-reaching significance of drastic changes in maritime policies of our Nation so vitally affect the interest of all segments of our citizenry that the widest discussion of such proposals should be encouraged. Especially is such a practice timely because discussions by our State Department representatives and those of foreign nations are imminent. These conferences are scheduled for early June, and already publication of the plans of foreign representatives has been observed, which indicate that there is a determined effort to advance the views and recommendations of other countries in opposition to the prevailing U.S. position.

Ralph E. Casey, president of the American Merchant Marine Institute, has just made a well-considered presentation of the American viewpoint on vital issues before the 17th Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce here in Washington. The topic of his splendid address was "Sea Transport and World Trade." Because of his mastery of the subject matter and his forthright discussion of the issues I think that Members of the Congress and the American public should have opportunity to read his statements in this connection. Thoroughly experienced in all facets of maritime matters, Mr. Casey's views are of more than ordinary interest, both because of his firsthand contacts with American shipping leaders and his sound judgment in weighing the respective views of opposing interests, gained from his recent conferences in London.

In order to afford the fullest opportunity to the readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I ask unanimous consent to insert a copy of Mr. Casey's address in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEA TRANSPORT AND WORLD TRADE

(Statement of Ralph E. Casey, president, American Merchant Marine Institute, Inc., before the 17th Congress of the International Chamber of Commerce in Washington, D.C., April 21, 1959)

Sea transport and world trade are synonymous. Like love and marriage or the horse and carriage, as the song goes, you can't have one without the other. World trade is the cornerstone of global peace and prosperity. And sea transport is, and always has been, the vehicle which makes world trade possible. As the spokesman for the American maritime industry, I wish to make it abundantly clear that we favor freedom of sea transport. Our country has gone to war for this principle, and throughout the 20th century we have been in the front ranks of those advocating freedom of the seas.

Our friends abroad have taken issue with us claiming that certain phases of United States maritime policy are discriminatory. They point to the subsidy provisions of the 1936 act and to the cargo preference requirements of our law.

It is not my purpose here today to engage in any extended or detailed analysis of these two facets of our martime policy. However in a forum such as this, I would be out of character if I did not submit at least a brief summary of our position.

Without subsidies we would have neither a merchant marine nor a shipbuilding industry. To think that any American operator could compete successfully in world trade with our labor costs three to four times that of foreign competitors is, of course, completely untenable. So, if we were to adhere completely to the principles of free shipping, this country would, of necessity, have to rely entirely upon the merchant marines of our foreign friends both for commerce and defense. This, we will not do.

But even with subsidies our ships must have cargoes. Nothing in our subsidy law provides the business for our ships or guarantees profits. Consequently, our Government has found it not only expedient but eminently fair to provide that at least 50 percent of, not commercial, but purely governmental cargoes be transported in American-flag vessels. This has become part of the permanent statutory law of this country and as such, mandatory upon the executive branch of our Government. The only function left for administrative agencies is to carry out the law according to its intent and purpose. In that connection, I question the propriety of the talks which have been set for June here in Washington between our State Department and certain foreign governments.

However, let us not exaggerate the significance of this phase of our maritime policy. Recent figures disclose that of all the foreign commerce of the United States, only 6 percent is subject to the cargo preference law. And since foreign ships carry approximately 3 percent of even this cargo, all we are talking about is 3 percent of our foreign commerce.

Another interesting statistic of recent compilation shows that of all the cargoes which are promoted by Government aid only 52 percent are purchased in the United States. The other 48 percent is carried in foreign ships almost exclusively and, of course, approximately 26 percent of these cargoes purchased here likewise are carried in foreign ships.

Some of our friends abroad are inclined to think that this great country of ours can afford almost anything. They seem to believe that if money can solve the problem, we have the answer. But we of the American shipping industry realize there is a limit with respect to the extent to which this country will go to maintain a strong American Merchant Marine. I say this reluctantly because I wish it were otherwise, but it has been difficult enough for us to acquire even the inadequate fleet we presently have under the American flag. Certainly, this country will never build merchant ships that cannot be operated commercially in time of peace. And yet sometimes I think our foreign critics would like to have us build merchant ships for defense and lay them up in time of peace.

Thus, we freely admit that with respect to 3 percent of our foreign trade, complete freedom of competition does not exist. However, that is not the kind of flag discrimination that was practiced by many Western European countries for centuries back even to the first navigation acts enacted in 1381; nor is it the kind of flag discrimination that is in vogue with some countries today. The cargoes which are subject to our 50/50 law are sponsored by American taxpayer funds and certainly they are entitled to the benefits to American shipping inherent in the requirement that one-half go in our ships. Remember, 97 percent of our trade is free and open to all foreign competition, so for our foreign friends to say our law sets a precedent for flag discrimination elsewhere is nothing short of ridiculous.

But the U.S. Government has impeded freedom of shipping in yet another area. Our merchant marine is constrained from carrying goods to Red China. Now I do not propose to take issue with our policy in that regard. It may be entirely sound, but whether it is or not, at least it is thought to be by those in our Government who are qualified to speak and act in that field. I merely point out the decided contrast between the clamor that has been raised over cargo preference and the thunderous silence that attends our shipping policy toward Red China.

To conclude, the United States of America has contributed more of its financial resources to the development of world trade than any country in the history of the world. We strongly support free and expanded trade among nations. But, at the same time, please permit us the existence of a merchant marine of at least a size and strength necessary for some fair share of that commerce and one which will serve a nucleus for national defense.

DECLINE OF EMPLOYMENT IN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have recently received from the Textile Workers Union of America a fact sheet dealing with the decline of employment in the textile industry, a major element in the economy of Pennsylvania, as it is in most other Eastern Seaboard States. The figures provided in this fact sheet revealed a situation far worse than I or others who have followed the decline of employment in this industry had expected. The press has carried detailed reports of unemployment conditions in the steel and auto industries, but for some reason little publicity has been given to the at least comparable hardships being suffered by textile workers and the communities in which they make their homes.

I ask unanimous consent that these figures documenting the plight of textile workers in the United States, particularly the Eastern United States, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXTILE WORKERS UNION OF AMERICA FACT SHEET ON TEXTILE UNEMPLOYMENT, APRIL 1959

Unemployment in the textile industry is about the highest for all manufacturing industries except apparel. In January 1959, the U.S. Census Bureau reported 10.3 percent of the textile labor force as unemployed as compared with 7.3 percent for the entire non-farm wage and salary worker population.

While the unemployment rate for all manufacturing industries declined from January, 1958 to January, 1959 by 1 percentage point, from 8.9 percent to 7.9 percent, the unemployment rate for the textile industry dropped only one-half of one percentage point, from 10.8 to 10.3 percent. Most of this drop was caused by people leaving the industry as the number of production workers employed in the industry actually declined from 861,000 to 855,000 during this period.

There has been a net decline of 403,000 production jobs from February, 1951 to February, 1959 as employment fell from 1,263,000 to 860,000.

Increases in production are not translated into higher employment as productivity is increasing at a phenomenally high rate. Yards produced per man-hour in 1947 were 7.8; in 1951, 9.0; in 1956, 10.6; in 1957, 11.6, and in the first 9 months of 1958, 12.2. As output has not kept pace with the annual rate of increase in productivity of 4 to 5 percent, employment has continued to shrink.

The decline in jobs has been felt in all sections of the country in which substantial numbers of textile workers are employed. While New England and the Middle Atlantic States have suffered the greatest declines, the South has also had a considerable drop in employment (table I).

Large groups of unemployed textile workers have been stranded in communities all along the eastern seaboard. These communities have made abortive efforts to improve their lot by attracting new industry. But in no case has the new employment significantly improved conditions within these areas. Textile workers have been scrapped by the thousands. Men and women with years of service have remained unemployed, with many of them involuntarily being retired or supported by families.

The chronic state of unemployment has meant economic distress for many areas (table II).

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in the March 30, 1959, issue of Missiles and Rockets magazine, the distinguished junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] had published a short and a most pertinent article on the subject of our status in the missile race against Russia.

I ask unanimous consent that the article may appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There are many experts on past wars, but none on future wars. As Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, Chief of Staff of the U.S. Army, testified: "In my judgment, any dogmatic prediction of what will take place after an initial nuclear exchange is beyond the human capability."

Let us hope there will never be any real experts on nuclear wars, not on the grounds that no one would survive to become an expert, but on the premise that we may have the courage and the wisdom to prevent such destruction from ever getting started.

It is not enough, however, for us to be comforted by such hope. We must also be prepared for the dreadful alternative. In fact, such preparedness may well be the only sound basis upon which the hope for peace may grow.

Many sincere and informed people have varying judgments as to what constitutes adequate preparedness or adequate defense. Such differences are understandable. But there are certain propositions upon which, in my judgment, there should be substantial agreement. They are:

If a nuclear war does happen, it will come with such suddenness and destruction that there will be no time to defend or retaliate with any strength except that already in existence. Neither weapons on the drawing boards nor those whose production was postponed will have any effect upon the outcome of the conflict.

Since the time factor for response to an attack may be but a matter of minutes, the state of readiness of our weapons is of crucial importance. Those forces not so alert may be no asset; in fact, they may turn out to have been an actual handicap as a pre-attack source of unwarranted complacency.

It is wrong to measure our retaliatory strength in terms of what we have available before an attack has occurred. Our strength should be judged on what we believe we would have left, and could use, after attack.

With the premise that we would not be the aggressor, this Nation must have substantially more retaliatory strength, or substantially better dispersed and protected retaliatory strength, than the pre-attack strength of the attacker.

The Communists are building up their strategic strike capability at a faster rate than we are. Therefore, obviously our relative position is deteriorating. Under such circumstances, some day in the near future we may well find ourselves without a post-attack capability sufficient to meet the requirements either of deterrence or of adequate retalation.

The capability for swift retaliatory delivery of nuclear weapons has great significance in international negotiations and also in the imposition of control over others without the use of the weapons as such. This power is often referred to in terms of "nuclear blackmail."

It is a matter of U.S. policy, not lack of U.S. economic strength, which has allowed the Russians to develop and produce strategic striking power at a greater rate than this country. Economically, the United States is much stronger today than the U.S.S.R. With millions less people, we produce more than twice as much as the Soviet does. It is true that their rate of progress, as well as that of the Chinese, is greater than ours, but it is also true that we can far outproduce the Soviets in weaponry with less drain and less strain.

Knowledge of our production potential, however, is not enough. We must use it. There is no time left for complacency. Rather, we should look with clear vision at realities.

Already, the Soviets are ahead of us in important aspects of space exploration. They are also ahead of us in ballistic missiles.

The Sino-Soviet empire already is employing these leads in their dealings with other nations. If we are not to default in our position of leadership in the free world, therefore, we must step up our economic, moral, and defense pace.

This does not necessarily mean large increases in our defense spending. We can, and should, cut down the current waste of tax money by discontinuing the production of obsolete and useless weapons systems and also by eliminating existing duplication between the services.

This is no time to lose confidence in our democratic free enterprise system. Now, more than ever before, is the time to reassert that confidence.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Missouri points out what I think we need to have reiterated over and over again, namely, that as he states:

If a nuclear war does happen, it will come with such suddenness and destruction that there will be no time to defend or retaliate with any strength except that already in existence. * * *

Since the time factor for response to an attack may be but a matter of minutes, the state of readiness of our weapons is of crucial importance. * * *

It is wrong to measure our retaliatory strength in terms of what we have available before an attack has occurred. Our strength should be judged on what we believe we would have left, and could use, after attack.

The Senator further says:

This does not necessarily mean large increases in our defense spending. We can, and should, cut down the current waste of tax money by discontinuing the production of obsolete and useless weapons systems and also by eliminating existing duplication between the services.

Mr. President, I hope this article will receive from my colleagues the careful attention it deserves. The article is closely related to a letter which was published on the editorial page of the New York Times yesterday morning, entitled "Making Federal Policy," for which the subhead is, "Executive Branch Believed Hampered by Multitudes of Committees."

The letter was written by the distinguished commentator on national defense matters, Mr. Hans J. Morgenthau. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAKING FEDERAL POLICY—EXECUTIVE BRANCH BELIEVED HAMPERED BY MULTITUDES OF COMMITTEES

(The writer of the following letter, a former consultant to the State Department, is the author of "In Defense of the National Interest" and other books.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The initiative of Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, as reported in The New York Times of April 17, in planning to investigate the policy-making processes of the National Security Council, deserves wide popular support. Upon its success or failure may well depend the fate of this country.

For the defects which Senator JACKSON has found in the procedures of the National Security Council can be duplicated in all agencies of the executive branch concerned with the military and foreign policies of the United States. The executive branch of the American Government has become a cumbersome, slow-moving instrument of government which, short of being faced with disaster actual or impending, is incapable of swift, decisive action and radical innovation. It has become government by committee.

VETO ON DECISION

As I pointed out in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on April 15, the State Department is a member of about 700 interdepartmental committees, and to this figure must be added the multitude of committees into which the policy-making process is dissolved within the Department itself. These committees tend to become miniature replicas of the United Nations Security Council in that determined minority of one has a virtual veto over any positive decision.

This system of government puts a premium on inaction and on the mechanical continuation of safe routines. This being so, to refrain from new initiative must appear to many members of the executive branch by far the safer and more convenient course; hence, the propensity of our Government to continue policies long after they have outlived their usefulness or even when they have become self-defeating.

This government by committee destroys not only individual initiative but also individual responsibility. Since whatever formula a committee is able to agree upon is a labored product of a faceless collectivity rather than the result of the decision of one man, nobody in particular can be held to account for its effects. Applying the misunderstood principles of democracy to the process of policy formation, this system confounds consultation and information, which are essential for sound decision, with the participation on an equal footing of the purveyors of information and advice in the decisionmaking process itself.

MEASURES SUGGESTED

The restoration of personal initiative and responsibility to the decisionmaking process of the executive branch requires essentially three measures: the separation of the making of decisions from information and advice, the location of the making of decisions in individuals rather than agencies or subagencies, and the elimination of the duplication of functions and their overlap in a multitude of agencies, all of which have an equal part in the decisionmaking process but none of which is ultimately responsible for any particular decision.

If the 86th Congress, following Senator JACKSON'S initiative, frees the executive branch of this handicap of committee government, which in turn hamstrings any new departure in foreign and military policy, it will have at least enabled the American Government to embark upon those novel and bold foreign and military policies which the times demand.

HANS J. MORGENTHAU.

PRINCETON, N.J., April 17, 1959.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the burden of the letter is that under the Eisenhower administration committee discussions, committee investigations, and committee procedures have replaced the rule of authoritative decision by an individual executive who is appointed by the President and who has his confidence.

The junior Senator from Washington is about to undertake a most important investigation of the organization of the National Security Council in connection with this matter, which is the subject of Mr. Morgenthau's letter.

I commend the letter to all my colleagues.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor.

USE AND MANAGEMENT OF FOREST LANDS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I have recently received a communication from the Honorable Maurice K. Goddard, secretary of the Department of Forests and Waters for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in which informative remarks are made with regard to proposed Federal legislation which would affect the extensive forest areas of Pennsylvania. Since many of our States have similar forest treasures they wish to protect, I ask unanimous consent that Secretary Goddard's observations be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SENATOR CLARK: As you know, legislation frequently comes before Congress affecting the use and management of forest lands. Because Pennsylvania is one of the leading urban and manufacturing states, I think there is a tendency to neglect the importance of so elemental a resource as our forests. Yet there are dozens of communities in the Commonwealth with lumbering and wood manufacturing as their leading and sometimes only industry.

These plants are not by any means restricted to our small communities. In the Philadelphia metropolitan area alone there are 388 such industries and in Pittsburgh there are 114. In addition, of course, the State's woodland provides Pennsylvania with some of the finest recreation in America. At the present time Pennsylvania has more forest recreation areas than any other state except Oregon.

Since our State park system is the second most heavily used in the nation, however, we must continually be searching for new park sites in and around our large population centers. In my opinion recreation is a necessity in modern life and any measures which will help us provide recreational facilities for our own and future generations of Pennsylvanians benefits the economy of the entire Commonwealth. As you know, the problems of employee leisure are of great interest to modern business.

Because of this, I have taken the liberty of enclosing with this letter a list of Federal legislation in which we, in the Department of Forests and Waters, are vitally interested, together with some background material that may serve as useful reference for you.

Sincerely yours,

MAURICE K. GODDARD.

GOOD FOREST MANAGEMENT IS IMPORTANT TO PENNSYLVANIA

Over 52 percent of the Commonwealth is forest—a renewable resource.

At last count there were 1,179 factories engaged in wood manufacture in Pennsylvania. This makes the industry sixth in the State in the number of plants. These industries are not restricted to our small communities—there are 388 such industries in the Greater Philadelphia area and 114 in Pittsburgh. Last year's income from these industries was more than $1 billion.

Six million acres of Pennsylvania forest are under ownerships of 100 acres or less. This is an important source of income for many of these landowners.

Forests serve as Pennsylvania's playgrounds. The State has the second most heavily used State park system in the nation—second only to New York. Pennsylvania has 148 State Forest Recreation areas—a number second only to Oregon.

Pennsylvania's park expansion program has attracted nation-wide attention. There are 66 State parks now in operation. Five more are under construction and several more are on the drawing boards. Of particular note is our attempt to construct new parks near the State's population centers.

FEDERAL LEGISLATION HELPS

Public Law 566: A long-term project for the development of the water resources in the Brandywine Creek Basin, Chester County, will provide reservoirs for recreation as well as water supply and flood control. These man made lakes will be the hearts of three new State parks. Inasmuch as the U.S. Soil Conservation Service will participate in this project, authorizing legislation will be requested from Congress.

Cooperative Forest Management Act of 1950 (Public Law 729, 81st Congress): Under this act the Department of Forests and Waters employs 18 service foresters on a cost-sharing basis who render technical forestry assistance to private landowners in establishing, managing, and harvesting timber crops from small woodlands. You will be interested to know that in 1958, 1,900 landowners were given this service and realized $178,000 in gross income as a result. I am convinced that this program must be stepped up. Under the existing program, it would take 120 years for us to visit each landowner.

Clarke-McNary Act: Assistance to our programs through this act has been extremely helpful. In forest fire prevention and control, for instance, it helps us support an organization of 3,800 wardens and 150 fire towers protecting over 15 million acres of forest. As you know, reforestation in Pennsylvania has been extremely important. Seedlings to reforest the thousands of idle, unused, and nonproductive acres in Pennsylvania are grown in four large tree nurseries for which the department receives a small cost-sharing benefit from the Federal Government. In two areas, however, the Clarke-McNary Act is inadequate—in facilitating the reforestation of strip-mined areas and in provisions for the disposal of surplus Federal equipment for use by the States in developing State recreational areas. This department, therefore, believes the following bills would help correct these deficiencies.

S. 1087 and similar House bill introduced by Representative SAYLOR: This legislation authorizes a study of the need for Federal aid in the reforesting of strip-mined areas. Any measure, in my opinion, which furthers the improvement of such areas is helpful.

H.R. 702 (introduced in this session by Mr. BALDWIN, of California): This bill would amend the General Services Administration Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus Federal equipment to public supported recreational activities. While we have been able to procure such equipment for fire-fighting activities, we have not had the authority to procure it for construction and maintenance of vitally needed public recreation areas.

INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE PERSONNEL

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there will shortly come before us, in connection with the Treasury Department appropriation bill, a question as to whether we should authorize the Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service of the Treasury Department to retain his personnel and to hire a large number of additional revenue agents to bring the strength of the force up to the strength it had at the end of the Truman administration.

I have received a telegram from Paul W. Smith, honorary president and founder of the Tax Executives Institute, on this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, N.Y.

Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

It is very important in the interest of almost complete breakdown of manpower problems in the Internal Revenue Service that the $2½ million trimmed from the Revenue Service appropriation be restored. As a matter of fact it should be double that amount. Industry is severely suffering from the lack of performance by the Internal Revenue Service due to the lack of manpower. Industry must have decisions in keeping with its pace of operaion and bureau does not have manpower to perform. This is very expensive economy.

PAUL W. SMITH,
Honorary President and Founder,
Tax Executives Institute.

THE NATIONAL ECONOMY

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a most interesting letter was published on the editorial page of the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning, entitled "How Much Can We Spend?" The letter was signed by a large number of economists of the faculty of the University of California.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW MUCH CAN WE SPEND?

We wish to express our deep concern over the unmistakable and continuing deterioration of the world position of the United States.

When we look for the causes of this decline, one stands out in special relief. It is the widely held opinion that the resources of our economy are insufficient to support the economic and defense effort required to sustain a position of world leadership. The idea, vague but powerful, has taken hold that raising defense or other public expenditures significantly above the present level would somehow cause a complete breakdown of the economy.

It is our considered opinion, as professional economists, that this economic defeatism is wholly unwarranted. While our specific counterarguments are restricted to the economics of the defense effort, they really apply equally to the economics of all those other activities, such as foreign economic aid and Federal aid to education, which affect our country's position in a highly competitive world.

It is true that an increase in defense spending would probably necessitate either a budget deficit or higher taxes, and that higher taxes would probably be required to combat inflation. We realize that no one likes higher taxes. They are, however, society's way of cutting back the purchase and production of consumer goods so as to release labor and plant capacity for providing more public goods. This cut in consumption is the true measure of the cost of expanding defense programs. So long as the citizen elects to pay this cost, because he feels that he needs more security, the economy remains perfectly sound.

It must be obvious to everyone that a country like the United States, with the highest standard of living in the world, could reduce its consumption standards substantially if considerations of national security demanded it. What is perhaps less obvious is that a very great increase in defense production would be made possible by quiet minor sacrifices of consumption.

For example, in 1959 planned spending on defense is to be $46 billion. By taking up the slack of unemployed labor and unutilized plant capacity, we could raise defense spending from $46 to between $50 and $55 billion—an increase of between 10 and 20 percent—without any reduction at all of total consumer purchases below the 1958 level. A tax increase would still be necessary, but only to prevent consumers from expanding their spending as their total earnings rise with rising employment.

The $46 billion of defense spending planned for 1959 is 10 percent of the anticipated gross national product. In 1953, not a year of economic hardship, the figure was 14 percent. A willingness to allocate to defense 14 percent of gross national product in the coming year would result in defense spending of over $60 billion. This would still leave our per capita consumption above the 1953 level because productivity has been increasing, and yet we would have expanded our defense effort by nearly one-third.

We feel that the issue has not been made clear to the American public, and that it has been assumed too readily that the public is unwilling to make even minor sacrifices.

In the past, democracies have demonstrated a capacity to turn their economies upside down to win wars and a chronic incapacity to make the much smaller adjustments required to prevent them. Surely this habit courts disaster in the era of the intercontinental missile.

Roph, Henry Rosovsky, Tibor Scitovsky, Lloyd Ulman.

(The signators are all economists on the faculty of the University of California.)

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the burden of the letter is stated clearly, as follows:

It must be obvious to everyone that a country like the United States, with the highest standard of living in the world, could reduce its consumption standards substantially if considerations of national security demanded it. What is perhaps less obvious is that a very great increase in defense production would be made possible by quite minor sacrifices of consumption.

The letter calls to my mind again the desirability of closing the tax loopholes which exist to such a wide extent in our present Internal Revenue Code. I hope that when these matters come before the Senate, as they will, my colleagues will give careful thought to the fact that we must obtain more revenue if we are to have an adequate national defense and also take care of the legitimate needs of our domestic economy. The best way to accomplish this end is to close the tax loopholes. We shall shortly have an opportunity to do so in connection with the Treasury Department appropriation bill.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, April 27, 1959, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled joint resolution (S.J. Res. 19) authorizing the Architect of the Capitol to present to the Senators and Representative in the Congress from the State of Alaska the official flag of the United States bearing 49 stars which is first flown over the west front of the U.S. Capitol.

RECESS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, if there is no further business to come before the Senate, under the order previously entered I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 28, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend James Pickett Wesberry, D.D., LL.D., pastor, the Morningside Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., offered the following prayer:

"Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."—Psalm 33: 12.

Gracious God, Thou hast richly and abundantly favored the United States of America for which we are most humbly and sincerely grateful. Hear us now, as once again we invoke Thy blessings upon our great President and ask divine wisdom for him, his cabinet, and for each of these faithful and honored Representatives of the people in our National Congress.

Give special grace, we humbly pray, to Speaker RAYBURN as he wisely and graciously wields a gavel the influence of which affects the nations of the world. Comfort Thou the highly esteemed and grately beloved Chaplain of the House, and if it be within the circle of Thy divine will, may he be speedily and completely restored to good health and strength.

Be Thou the God and Father of each of us this day—a day which we have never seen before and will never see again. Help us to use it for Thy glory, to walk humbly before Thee, to do justly, to love righteousness, and to follow Thy counsel, remembering always that the Nation is truly great whose God is the Lord. In the all-prevailing name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 23, 1959, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

On April 17, 1959:

H.J. Res. 336. Joint resolution making a supplemental appropriation for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year 1959, and for other purposes.

On April 22, 1959:

H.R. 2493. An act declaring certain property in the State of New Mexico to be held in trust for the Pueblo of Santo Domingo; and

H.R. 5508. An act to provide for the free importation of articles for exhibition at fairs, exhibitions, or expositions, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1555. An act to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES v. BERNARD GOLDFINE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

APRIL 23, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: Mr. Oliver Eastland, an employee of the House, while serving at my direction as an attorney of the Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, received a subpena directing him to appear as a witness before the U.S. Court for the District of Columbia in the case of U.S. v. Bernard Goldfine (No. 1158–58). The return date of the subpena has been extended by the court to April 28, 1959.

The subpena in question is transmitted herewith, and the matter is presented for such action as the House, in its wisdom, may see fit to take.

Respectifully yours,

OREN HARRIS,
Member of Congress, Chairman.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read as follows:

U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. BERNARD GOLFINE, DEFENDANT, NO. 1158–58

To Mr. OLIVER EASTLAND, House Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, George Washington Inn:

You are hereby commanded to appear in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia at Third and Constitution Avenue NW., fourth floor, courtroom 8, in the city of Washington on the 20th day of March 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m., to testify in the above-entitled case.

This subpena is issued on application of the defendant.

HARRY M. HULL,
Clerk.
HUGH E. KLINE,
Deputy Clerk.

EDWARD BENNETT WILLIAMS,
Attorney for Defendant.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 252) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Oliver Eastland, an employee of the Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, has been served with a subpena to appear as a witness before the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, to testify at Washington, D.C., on the 28th day of April 1959, in the case of the United States of America against Bernard Goldfine, criminal case numbered 1158–58.

Resolved, That Oliver Eastland, an employee of the House, is hereby authorized to appear pursuant to said subpena as a witness before the said court; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on April 16, 1959, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] presented to the House a subpena which had been served on him. Under the precedents of the House he could not respond without the permission of the House, the privileges of the House being involved. Therefore, at this time I submit privileged resolution (H. Res. 253) for the consideration of the House.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas Representative OREN HARRIS, a Member of this House, has been served with a subpena to appear as a witness before the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, to testify at Washington, D.C., on the 15th day of April 1959, in the case of the United States of America against Bernard Goldfine, criminal case numbered 1158–58; and

Whereas by the privilege of the House no Member is authorized to appear and testify, but by order of the House: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Representative OREN HARRIS is authorized to appear in response to the subpena of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in the case of the United States of America against Bernard Goldfine at such time as when the House is not sitting in session; and be it further

Resolved, That as a respectful answer to the subpena a copy of this resolution be submitted to the said court.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LABOR, AND HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1960

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, during one of the sessions of last week the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] obtained permission to file a report in connection with the Departments of Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation bill for 1960 by midnight Tuesday, tomorrow night. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for that bill to be brought up on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 120)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Works and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 10 of Public Law 358, 83d Congress, I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, covering its activities for the year ended December 31, 1958.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1959.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (S. DOC. NO. 6)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Science and Astronautics, and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, as amended, which established the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the 44th and final annual report of the Committee for the fiscal year 1958. This report covers the activities of the Committee through the close of business September 30, 1958, when it was superseded by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

The National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics is to be commended for its many contributions to the progress of aeronautical science in the United States and for the spirit of teamwork in aeronautics it has inspired among leaders in science, the military, and industry. I wish also to acknowledge at this time the excellent work and dedication of the Committee's research staff who, over the years, have given unstintingly of their talents in a manner which reflects credit upon them and all other civil service personnel of the United States.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1959.

HON. CHRISTIAN A. HERTER

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimouse consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the chief of American foreign policy is now Christian A. Herter.

When the Nation heard that able and conscientious John Foster Dulles was incapacitated by an illness that prevented him from continuing the excellent services he had given to our country and the free world during the past 6 years, there was sincere sympathy for Dulles, and concern about the future direction of our foreign policy.

It would be difficult to find a replacement who would measure up to the ability and the character of Dulles.

Fortunately, there was a man in the State Department who was prepared for such an eventuality. As the right-hand man of Dulles, he had earned the confidence of his superior, and had shared in his vast knowledge of international affairs.

That man was Christian A. Herter, who began his career as a junior Foreign Service officer. He was born with a talent for diplomacy, that was broadened and strengthened by a thorough education and by extensive experience in Government at various levels.

I first met Chris Herter when we were colleagues in the Massachusetts House of Representatives during the 1930's. I was impressed by his patient determination to explore every issue before making a decision. In the heat of debate, he never lost his temper. When he rose to speak, we knew that he was ready. His integrity and his courtesy won for him the increasing regard of his fellow Republicans, and the respect of his Democratic opponents. He was promoted to Congress, where, for 10 years he developed the stature that singled him out for further honors.

Returning to Massachusetts, he was elected and reelected as Governor of the Commonwealth.

The recognition of genuine ability may be delayed but never denied. Washington had noted his faculty for gathering the facts and resolving the conflicting opinions that would result in a true consensus, and his polite but firm leadership once the die was cast. As a Member of Congress, his grasp of international relations had shown growth and seasoned judgment. Here was a man destined for greater responsibilities. In 1957, he was summoned to Washington to become Under Secretary of State.

Although I have criticized some elements of our foreign policy, I believe that the President should be commended for his wisdom in choosing John Foster Dulles as his first Secretary of State. History will be grateful to Dulles for his unyielding opposition to Communism, and for the time he won that will enable the free world to prevail.

As illness forces him to relinquish the burdens of his office, we in the United States are thankful to Dulles for recommending Herter as the man best able to fill his shoes. The fact that the President followed his advice, is a tribute to the accomplishments of Dulles, and to the potentialities of Herter.

We in Massachusetts who know Chris Herter predict that he will be a pleasant surprise to the Nation and to the Western World.

Quietly but effectively he will integrate all the resources of our State Department, and in concert with our allies, present a united front against those who threaten the peace of the world.

In our new Secretary of State, Christian A. Herter, the Communists will meet a leader in diplomacy who will prove to be an unpleasant surprise for them.

FOOD FOR PEACE

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BASS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago the President of the United States recommended that this country adopt a food for peace plan. The Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, has had hearings on this subject. Several bills have been introduced in the interest of a food for peace plan. However, I do not believe we have adequate information to pass legislation inaugurating such a program. I, therefore, today have introduced a bill which will establish a commission to make a study of the food for peace plan that has been recommended by the President. I hope this body will give early and favorable consideration to the bill creating such a commission, so that during the next session of the Congress we will have the necessary information to initiate this vital program.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION OF THE COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. ROGERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs may be permitted to sit this afternoon during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

UNDER PRESENT PLAN HIGHWAYS CAN BE BUILT WITHOUT PAYING DOUBLE—CONSIDERATION SHOULD BE GIVEN TO GASOLINE TAX INCREASE OR PROVIDING THE MONEY IN SOME WAY TO CARRY OUT PRESENT PROGRAM

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Federal Highway Act of 1956 reaffirmed our interest in primary and secondary roads and highways. The act called for constructing a National System of Interstate and Defense Highways to include a 41,000-mile network of four- to eight-lane expressways designed to link together all of our principal cities. From an estimated cost of $27 billion, the amount has been revised and raised to $40 billion.

Since it is possible to have a pay-as-you-go or pay-as-you-build program for this purpose, Congress used rare and wise foresight in adopting such a program for this huge highway construction job. The Government cannot easily have such big programs for internal development on a pay-as-you-go basis, but in this case such a program is not only feasible, it is desirable.

Now, this pay-as-you-go program is in jeopardy. We have discovered that the Highway Trust Fund, instead of having a real substantial surplus, will soon be exhausted. If we are to have contracts beyond June 30 of this year, more money must be provided between now and then.

In his budget message to this Congress President Eisenhower called for an increase of 1½ cents per gallon on the Federal tax on gasoline, which would yield three-quarters of a billion dollars in the next fiscal year and put the program back in good condition. Possibly a better way can be found for providing the money.

If we continue the pay-as-we-build highway program, the cost will be at least 50 percent less than if we were to issue and sell long-term bonds for that purpose. If bonds are sold, the people will have to pay $2 for every $1 spent on highways, since by the time long-term bonds are paid there will be $1 of interest paid on every $1 of principal. Under the present plan this 41,000 miles of highways can be built for $40 billion instead of paying double that amount or $80 billion if bonds are substituted.

Under our fractional reserve system in commercial banking, the people who are promoting their own interest in banking, as they are expected to do under our private enterprise system, are taking advantage of every opportunity to encourage the issuance of more and more debt paper. They not only want more and more debt paper, but they want debt paper that will entail little or no risk like U.S. Government-guaranteed securities or securities issued by the States counties, cities, and political subdivisions. These latter securities are tax exempt and the commercial banks are the principal purchasers. If the banks had to pay actual money for these securities, their profits would not be as attractive as under the present system of creating the money on the books of the bank with which to buy them.

GOLDSMITH COMMENCED OUR PRESENT BANKING SYSTEM

Three hundred years ago, the local goldsmith occupied a prominent and useful part in the local economy in Europe. The goldsmith accepted a deposit of gold and gave the depositor a receipt or receipts for it. These receipts were used as money because the holder could carry the receipt to the goldsmith and get the actual gold. The goldsmiths discovered that the depositors of gold seldom returned for the actual gold as the receipts were more convenient in trade and served the same purpose that the gold would serve. It was then the fractional reserve system was commenced by the goldsmiths, which is now in use right here in the United States. The goldsmiths commenced the policy of lending gold receipts, for an interest charge, which amounted to several dollars in gold receipts as they had gold. The reputable goldsmith discovered that he could safely issue several dollars in gold receipts for every $1 of gold he had in his vault. This enabled him to collect interest on several dollars for every $1 in gold he held on deposit.

The commercial banks in the United States today are using the fractional reserve system patterned after the old goldsmith. Today, the commercial banks have outstanding loans and investments amounting to almost exactly 10 times the amount of their dollar reserves. On $18 billion in reserves with the Federal Reserve banks, the commercial banks are collecting interest on $180 billion on loans and investments which they have made on these reserves—or 10 to 1.

During the past two or three decades when the commercial banks were clamoring for more and more debt paper we have witnessed a change in the type and character of debt paper held by commercial banks. Now, much of this debt paper is guaranteed by the Federal Government; this is true whether it was created for the purpose of building houses or for foreign loans.

PAYING DOUBLE FOR CERTAIN POSTOFFICE BUILDINGS

Congress accepted the lease-purchase plan for building post office buildings sponsored by the present administration before realizing that such plan would give the manufacturers of money a dollar in interest for every dollar of principal used for this purpose. In other words, every $100,000 building constructed under this plan will cost the taxpayers $200,000.

We have a chance to avoid that mistake in our highway program.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR APPOINTMENT TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I have this day introduced a bill to establish professional as well as geographic qualifications for future appointments to the United States Supreme Court.

I urge my colleagues to study the measure, and if they agree with me that it is meritorious, I earnestly solicit their support and invite them to join with me in any way they see fit, including becoming a coauthor if they so desire. I am not seeking so much the pride of authorship as I am the restoration of confidence in our Supreme Court.

If this bill becomes law, I sincerely believe it will lead to a restoration of public confidence in our Nation's court of last resort.

This bill will require that future appointees to the Supreme Court must have had not less than 8 years' judicial service as a justice, a judge of a court of appeals, or a district court of the United States, or as a judge of a State court of last resort having jurisdiction to interpret the State's constitution.

In addition, the bill would prohibit the appointment of more than one Associate Justice of the Supreme Court from any of the 10 judicial circuits of the U.S. Court of Appeals which geographically divide up the Nation.

I sincerely believe that one important effect of this bill will be to lift the appointments to the U.S. Supreme Court from the realm of politics.

Since the President can serve only 8 years, this bill would prevent him from naming and advancing a political appointee through the Federal courts to the U.S. Supreme Court within the President's tenure of office.

Three of the present members of the Supreme Court were named to judgeships of lower Federal courts by President Eisenhower—then advanced to the Supreme Court by the President from 1 to 4 years later.

Mr. Speaker, I want to emphatically point out that this bill is not an attempt to hamstring or curtail the power of the Supreme Court.

I will bitterly oppose any attempt to tamper with or destroy the delicate balance of power written into our Constitution by our Founding Fathers.

On the other hand, there are absolutely no qualifications for appointment to the Supreme Court set out under the law.

It is not even specified under present law that a member of the Supreme Court must have a legal background—much less judicial experience.

To me, it is inconceivable that a person without substantial prior judicial experience and proven judicial temperament can be expected to ably dispense justice in interpreting the laws of our land in our Court of Last Resort.

Justice is not merely the application of textbook interpretation of the body of the law by legal theorists. It is that reaching of a tempered decision of Solomon-like beauty that comes from equally weighing the law and the evidence and knowing the full import of such decision on the parties involved.

Mr. Speaker, this ability is acquired only through years of experience.

I think the American people have the right to demand that the finest legal minds in the Nation be chosen to sit on our highest court—minds of men who have proven judicial backgrounds, and who geographically represent the broad flowing stream of customs and culture that coarses through out Nation.

Mr. Speaker, our Founding Fathers—of whom slightly more than half signing the Constitution were students of the law—could not have envisioned the tremendous growth of our Nation into 50 States spreading into the far reaches of the Pacific. Nor could they have foreseen the massive growth of our laws and judicial system which now requires many years of study and actual practice to understand. If they had, I am sure that in their God-given brilliance they would have made such provisions requiring both judicial experience and geographic representation.

Many legal authorities and associations, as well as laymen, have openly criticized and quarreled with decisions reached by the Supreme Court.

I firmly believe that such questionable decisions are handed down by the Court primarily because of a lack of judicial experience on the part of the present members of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Speaker, of the nine members of the Court, five had no prior judicial experience before appointment to the Supreme Court.

I, like many Americans, believe that the Supreme Court of our Nation is decidedly not the place for "on the job training" for men who have never served as a judge or justice.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation is divided into 10 judicial circuits. Of the 8 associate justices now serving on the Supreme Court, 4 were appointed from the 1st, 2d, and 3d circuits composed of 10 New England and Middle Atlantic States; 2 from the 5th circuit, and 1 each from the 6th and 8th circuits. There is no associate justice on the court appointed from the 23 States comprising the 4th, 7th, 9th, and 10th circuits.

REQUEST FOR AUTHORIZATION OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR MUTUAL SECURITY FUND

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, in connection with its request for authorization of additional funds for the mutual security program, the Executive has made available to the Committee on Foreign Affairs six volumes of background information which have been classified "secret." A set of these volumes is on deposit in the Foreign Affairs Committee room on the gallery floor of the Capitol and is available for examination by any Member of the House who desires to see them and is willing to be bound by this security classification.

The Foreign Affairs Committee has nothing to do with the classification of this material. The Departments of State and Defense decide which items of information should be classified, and we have to respect their judgment. There is no desire on the part of the State Department or of the Defense Department, and certainly not on the part of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to keep any information from Members of the House.

I hope that as many Members as possible will come to the committee room and study these books. I firmly believe that the better informed Members are concerning the mutual security program, the greater will be their support for it.

Let me say just a word about the reason why a certain amount of information is classified and is not made available for publication. Although I differ with the Pentagon and the State Department as to the desirability of classifying certain specific items of information, I understand their overall purpose and I am in general agreement with the necessity for such classification.

The volumes to which I have referred include detailed descriptions of the forces of nations which receive military aid from us as well as comments from our military authorities as to the effectiveness of such forces. It is important that this information be kept from our enemies, and it is clear that publication of some of the appraisals of the forces of allied countries might make serious trouble for us with our friends.

It is the general policy of the Executive not to make public the amounts of military and economic aid which have been programed for individual countries in the authorization currently under consideration. Figures for technical assistance for individual countries are available for publication this year as they have been in previous years.

An important reason for not making dollar amounts of aid planned for individual countries public while legislation is under consideration by the Congress is that all such figures are tentative until appropriations have actually been voted. In all previous years the funds provided by the Congress for the mutual security program have been less than the amount requested by the Executive. As a result, after the appropriations have been voted, it is necessary for the Executive to make a redistribution of funds, in general reducing the amounts programed for the various countries. Ordinarily this cannot be done on a straight percentage basis; that is, if the appropriation is 10 percent below the total originally requested, it is not possible to just go through and cut every country by 10 percent. In the first place, we do not, except in very unusual circumstances, give money to foreign governments which receive assistance from us. We pay for things which are supplied to them. In our military program we provide arms and equipment for a division or an air squadron or provide a country with a minesweeper. Ordinarily it is not desirable to provide equipment for part of a division or half an air squadron or a fraction of a minesweeping vessel. After a cut has been made by the Congress, it is necessary to adjust the program in terms of the various items which go to make it up. It makes matters more difficult if each country is keeping careful watch to see that its own program is reduced no more in dollar value than any other. If there has been publication of dollar amounts for individual countries, it complicates the job of curtailing and adjusting the program for the individual countries.

A major purpose of the foreign aid program is to influence foreign nations to behave in a manner favorable to our interests. It is important that the money we provide be used as effectively as possible. Our expenditures will be less effective if controversy and national rivalry concerning overall dollar figures for specific countries diverts the attention of the recipients of our aid from the underlying objectives of the program.

Let me emphasize again that it is the desire of the Foreign Affairs Committee that every Member of the House be fully informed as to the mutual security program now under consideration. The books are available in the committee room, and I hope that you will make use of them.

DR. JAMES P. WESBERRY

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Dr. James P. Wesberry who is serving as Chaplain this week is no stranger to the House of Representatives. He is well remembered here as one who acted as our Chaplain for some 6 weeks in the summer of 1949. Many Members of Congress have long had the privilege of counting this man of God among their treasured friends. It is good to have Dr. Wesberry with all of us here in Washington again.

Dr. Wesberry is the distinguished and beloved pastor of the Morningside Baptist Church in Atlanta. He is known not only in his church but throughout the Southern Baptist Convention as a great influence for Christianity and one of the strong, outstanding inspirations for good to this generation.

Born in Bishopville, S.C., James Pickett Wesberry was destined to walk in the paths of service as a devoted minister of the Gospel, preacher, pastor, teacher, counselor, writer, statesman, and friend. Dr. Wesberry received his bachelor of arts degree at Mercer University, the bachelor of divinity and master of sacred theology degrees from Andover Newton Theological School, and took some special studies at Harvard University.

At the age of 20, Dr. Wesberry was ordained to the ministry by his home church, Park Street Baptist Church, in Columbia, S.C., and while still a student served as pastor of several churches, among which was the Soperton Baptist Church in Soperton, Ga. At the Morningside Baptist Church in Atlanta, where he has been pastor for the last 15 years, he has realized what I know to have been his dream of building one of the most beautiful churches in America.

In 1957 he served as president of the Southern Baptist Pastor's Conference, and as president of the Georgia Baptist Convention for 1956 and 1957. He was chairman of the Committee on Committees for the Southern Baptist Convention in 1958. Currently, he is a member of the Public Relations Committee of the Georgia Baptist Convention; a member of the Atlanta Baptist School Committee; and chairman of the Missions Committee of the Atlanta Association. He has served for many years as president of the Board of Directors of the White Operating Board of Battle Hill Haven, Inc., a home for the aged and chronic ill for Fulton and DeKalb counties. He is also at present a member of the Atlanta Fund Review Board; a member of the board of trustees for the Doorway of Hope, a Christian home for alcoholic women. He served as first State director of the National Youth Courtesy Foundation, and he has also served as national president of Alpha Chi Omega Divinity Fraternity.

Currently, as chairman of the Georgia Commission on Literature, his voice is no uncertain sound regarding the evils of obscene literature, arousing and stimulating similar action throughout the Nation.

Dr. Wesberry is the author of several books and numerous articles and editorials. An inspiring book of prayers of Dr. Wesberry was published some years ago. In addition to his book of prayers, he is the author of the "Life and Work of William Screven," and the books: "Every Citizen Has A Right to Know," a report of the Georgia Literature Commission for 1954, and "The Georgia Literature Commission," 1957 report. He served for a number of years as staff correspondent of "The Christian Century," and as program writer for the "Young People's Training Union Quarterly" of the Southern Baptist Convention.

SPECIAL ORDER VACATED

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted me for tomorrow for 60 minutes be vacated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE TOKYO RAIDERS: A SYMBOL FOR AMERICA

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we pause for a moment to take note of a memorable occasion of the past weekend, and to pay tribute to the men who were there.

This was the 17th annual reunion of the Tokyo raiders.

In the month of April 1942, the United States was locked in a mortal struggle with the Axis Powers. The surprise attack on Pearl Harbor was then nearly 5 months into history, and an angered America was still arming. The greatest of haste still seemed not to give us action—and the Nation, wounded and enraged—wanted to come to grips with the enemy.

Then came the news.

American airmen had bombed the Japanese homeland.

Tokyo, Yokohama, Osaka, Kobe, and Nagoya had been hit by American bombs. Our aircraft, said President Roosevelt, had taken off from Shangri-La.

It was a year later that the War Department released the facts. The full story of the brilliant and daring operation, jointly planned and jointly executed by the Navy and the Army Air Force, took its place in the annals of our history.

In 1942, however, America hailed this raid with a burst of enthusiasm. To them, it was our promise of victory; to them, it foretold the surrender ceremony 3 years later in Tokyo Bay.

We who live in Alameda, Calif., have two sources of pride in the raid.

First, General Doolittle was raised in our city. Secondly, NAS Alameda was the then home port of the U.S.S. Hornet, and it was from there that the raid was staged.

It was my friend and fellow Californian, James H. Doolittle, who organized and commanded this operation. It stands as one of the achievements of a man whose life has been filled with achievements. By nature, and by professional training, James H. Doolittle filled to perfection the role he chose for his life.

It was a broad role, and it remains so today. The daring aviator, the doctor of science, the Air Force lieutenant general, and now forging ahead into space technology, James H. Doolittle is among our most distinguished Americans.

The men he commanded, and who flew the raid against Japan with him, are now men in the prime of life. Their original numbers have thinned somewhat, from an original 80 to 57—attrition began on the raid itself. To all of them, for what they did and for what they are today, the Nation owes a debt of gratitude. Their contributions will be long remembered.

Thinking back upon the B–25 bombers these young men flew from the decks of the U.S.S. Hornet, it occurs to me to wonder what the course of history might have been if by some magic, the number designation of their aircraft could have been reversed.

Suppose, instead of B–25's, they had had B–52's.

Our counterattack could have been launched while the Pearl Harbor strike was still underway. The Imperial fleet, by nightfall, would have had no homeland worth returning to. And the fleet itself steaming, in the compact formation of that day, could have been found and picked off by a B–52 enroute to its assigned target. The Rising Sun would have set that very day.

More to the point is the apparent truth that, if we had had B–52's as we have today, there would have been no war in the first place. This is the lesson we have learned at last. Peace can be waged only if our Nation has the weapons of war in readiness to use if need be.

If we should ever fail to heed this truth, we will have broken faith with ourselves, with our dead of all wars, with our living veterans, and with the Tokyo raiders in particular.

Let us salute the gallant raiders on this 17th anniversary of their raid, and wish them many more yet to come.

To preserve the identity of these brave men I include a list of the names of plane crews in order of takeoff. There are 57 members out of the original 80 alive today. Those who have died are indicated by asterisks:

Takeoff No. 1: Lt. Col. James H. Doolittle, Lt. Richard E. Cole, Lt. Henry A. Potter, Sgt. Fred A. Breamer, Sgt. Paul J. Leonard*.

CONGRESSIONAL FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce to the House the names of the 11 young journalists and political scientists who have been selected for the 1959–60 congressional fellowship program sponsored by the American Political Science Association.

Six more were selected as alternates who may be added to the winning group before they come to Washington next November to spend 9 months in offices on Capitol Hill.

Each winner will receive a $4,500 stipend, plus traveling expenses to and from Washington. Approximately 150 journalists and political scientists throughout the country applied for the program this year. Applicants had to be between the ages of 23 and 35 with advanced training combined with experience.

An advisory committee composed of Members of both parties in both congressional Houses and Washington journalists and political scientists make the final selection which is based on reports made by screening committees and regional interviewing boards.

The American Political Science Association has sponsored the Congressional Fellowship program since 1953, giving promising young journalists and political scientists the opportunity to learn about the legislative process first-hand by enabling them to work on the staffs of Senators, Representatives and congressional committees. Services of the fellows are made available free of charge to the congressional office in which they work.

Winners are:

POLITICAL SCIENTISTS

Robert G. Gilpin, 28, graduate student and research assistant, department of political science, University of California, Berkeley.

James R. Klonoski, 34, assistant professor of political science, St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minn.

Richard H. Kosaki, 34, assistant professor of government, University of Hawaii.

Gerald Rigby, 30, Charles Fletcher Scott fellow in political science, University of California, Los Angeles.

Alan Rosenthal, 27, research assistant, department of politics, Princeton University.

Raymond E. Wolfinger, 28, graduate student and half-time instructor, department of political science, Yale University.

JOURNALISTS

Forest W. Amsden, 33, executive editor and associate publisher, the Coos Bay (Oreg.) World.

Ron M. Linton, 30, labor editor of the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal.

Daniel D. McCrary, 28, staff reporter, the Wall Street Journal, Philadelphia Bureau.

Wesley Dale Nelson, 32, newsman, Associated Press, Boise, Idaho.

Joseph Roy Parker, Jr., 29, legislative-government-political reporter, Raleigh (N.C.) News and Observer.

The following were named as alternates:

Daniel M. Berman, 30, assistant professor of political science, Washington College, Chestertown, Md.

Charles Ulick de Burgh Daly, 32, student, graduate school of journalism, Columbia University, and reporter for the White Plains (N.Y.) Dispatch.

Harry W. Ernst, 27, education editor and general assignment reporter, the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette.

Gordon L. Shull, 34, assistant professor of political science, College of Wooster, Wooster, Ohio.

Charles Dale Story, 31, assistant professor of government, Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Tex.

David M. Welborn, 24, graduate student and research assistant, department of government, University of Texas—presently doing research in Washington, D.C.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure I speak the sentiment of the House in commending the American Political Science Association in sponsoring and supporting this most rewarding program. It was an honor and a privilege to serve on the advisory committee for the 1959–60 Congressional Fellowship program. The membership of that committee follows:

David Brinkley, National Broadcasting Co. television news analyst.

JOSEPH S. CLARK, Democrat, Pennsylvania, U.S. Senate.

Hugh L. Elsbree, Director, Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress.

Claude E. Hawley, chairman, Deputy Director, Information Center Service, U.S. Information Agency.

THOMAS H. KUCHEL, Republican, California, U.S. Senate.

BARRATT O'HARA, Democrat, Illinois, U.S. House of Representatives.

FRANK C. OSMERS, JR., Republican, New Jersey, U.S. House of Representatives.

Joseph R. Slevin, national economics editor, Washington bureau, New York Herald Tribune.

William S. White, newspaper columnist, United Features Syndicate, and contributor to Harper's magazine.

COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Mr. SHIPLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHIPLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to the hours of operation of certain broadcasting stations. At the present time our daytime stations are operated from sunrise to sundown, which under the present act would be from approximately 7:15 a.m. central standard time to 4:43 p.m. central standard time on December 22, the shortest day each year.

This is a problem which all of us who live in rural districts are very much aware. For example, at my home in the 23d District of Illinois, there are no full-time stations. We only have the privilege of using our local stations from sunrise to sundown. There are many reasons why this act should be changed to read from "6 a.m. to 6 p.m." instead of from sunrise to sunset.

For the rural communities to receive this service would be definitely a life and property-saving. For example, in the case of local disasters which occur after our stations have signed off the air, the local residents do not get any coverage of local tornadoes or other similar disasters.

In the winter, sunrise is around 7 a.m. and our schools have no opportunity to advise the children whether buses will run or not because of weather conditions, and so forth. The stations cannot give the weather report, which is very important to people who leave for work before 7 a.m., in regard to local road conditions. If they were made aware of such, they could prepare for these conditions or maybe not even go to work at all, and, therefore, possibly save many lives and many dollars.

Following are eight facts about radio broadcasting stations licensed by the FCC to operate daytime only:

First. There are now 3,400 standard A radio broadcast stations in the United States. Half of these—1,700—are permitted to operate only during daytime. Over 1,000 of these daytime only stations are in cities and communities which are not served by a local full-time station.

Second. Several millions of our citizens live in these 1,000 communities which have a blackout of local radio broadcast service after sundown. Through Federal Government regulation, we are making them second-class radio citizens, actually discriminating against them by not letting them have a local radio broadcast outlet except from sunrise to sunset. These good people vote, pay taxes, and live a full life, except they cannot have a local radio broadcast service like their metropolitan fellow citizens.

Third. Entrenched interests—those who got in early in the larger metropolitan centers—applied and got good frequencies on which they could broadcast full time. As the economics of our Nation developed after World War II, many smaller communities wanted their own local radio station. Perhaps, because of lack of foresight, the FCC set up only 6 local full-time channels out of the 107 channels in the AM broadcast spectrum so these stations had to take, in most instances, frequencies and channels on which the FCC permitted operation only from sunrise to sunset. Radio waves skip and bounce to greater distance late at night.

Fourth. From 540 kilocycles to 1600 kilocycles there are 107 AM broadcast channels. How are these 107 channels used?

Clear channel stations (U.S.)	45
Regional channels	41
Local channels	6
Foreign clear channels	15
(Canada, Mexico, and Bahamas)
Total	107

Daytime stations are assigned as secondary stations on all channels except the six local channels.

Fifth. The small local community radio broadcast station is more vital today than ever before. The basic fundamental policy of the regulation of broadcasting by the FCC is the same today as it was 25 years ago. Revisions are long overdue to keep in step with the listening habits of our people. We now have some 600 TV stations and over 500 FM stations with standard AM radio filling a different role in service to the people—that role is basically local today.

Sixth. Let us not be guilty of furthering monopolies through Federal regulation at the expense of public necessity—12-year clear channel freeze.

Seventh. Today, man lives by the clock not by the sun. Engineers may try to confuse the issue with technical details, but this goes much deeper; it is a moral and social issue that will grow in magnitude unless something constructive is done immediately by the U.S. Congress.

Eighth. Hours of operation from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. as a minimum for our U.S. daytime radio stations will greatly improve the situation and cause the least harm or inconvenience to the remaining half of the radio broadcast industry.

DENTAL CARE FOR DEPENDENTS OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, for consideration and action by this body, I have introduced a bill to provide dental care for the dependents of the members of our Armed Forces.

This bill H.R. 6321 is an amendment to chapter 55, title 10, of the United States Code, which at present authorizes medical care for these dependents, under certain conditions. In essence, the amendment simply liberalizes the present provisions for dental care, which are too limited to be of value to the persons concerned.

This amendment is by no means designed to pamper the serviceman or his family. It is, rather, one step intended to complete the health program by applying the same philosophy of family care to dental health as we apply to their physical beings otherwise. To the extent that dental health is now neglected in this law, our moral obligation is also neglected. I mean that moral obligation we as a nation have to the families of men whose very lives we may demand in our national defense.

In recent years we have given much attention to the conditions of life in our armed services, in order to attract and retain the increasingly high order of knowledge and skills our security demands. The amendment I propose is just another small item contributing to this purpose. I say it is small, and from the standpoint of national investment it is small indeed. But it is an investment, and one which will yield a direct return to the Nation, in an enhanced posture of defense.

RULES OF PROCEDURE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been giving considerable study to the advisability of making changes in some of the rules governing procedures in the House of Representatives which I feel would bring about not only greater economies and effect savings running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars annually, but which at the same time would eliminate some confusion and relieve Members of embarrassment in declining requests which at times border on the ridiculous.

With a full recognition and appreciation of the fact that the conduct of the business of the House of Representatives is based upon precedents and customs, I nevertheless have observed that while precedents change, it has also been my observation that all of the changes have not been in a direction that is conducive to efficiency and economy.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I am not so naive as to believe that I can bring about all of the changes that would result in the most sensible application of the rules under which this House operates, and for that reason I am not at this time introducing or even proposing resolutions which I believe would accomplish this end.

Rather, I am only calling attention to the membership of this House, and most respectfully requesting the indulgence of the leadership, to two suggestions which I believe would be in order at this time.

First, I would suggest that the House consider the advisability of permitting joint or multiple sponsorship and introduction of bills, in order to eliminate as far as possible the needless expenditure in the printing and processing of identical bills, which are introduced simultaneously by many Members. While the rules of the House do not specifically bar this procedure, precedents which are presently followed do have this effect.

Secondly, due to the current disregard of the rules governing the practices of extensions, both in the body of the RECORD and the Appendix, I am suggesting that some consideration be given to a revision of the rules, which would have the practical effect of exercising more control over the nature of material which finds itself included in the RECORD by unanimous consent. And, inasmuch as we do have limitations and controls over the allowances to Members for postage, telephone, telegraph, stationery, and office equipment, might we not even consider a limitation on the space which any Member might use in the printed RECORD for extensions of remarks which include articles, speeches, and extraneous material which has no relation whatsoever to the legislative processes of this Congress?

Mr. Speaker, I think it is time that this Congress do something of a positive constructive nature, indicating that we as Members of this body who are charged with the responsibility of exercising some discretion in the appropriating of billions of dollars, are interested in practicing the economy which we should demand of every other department of Government. Something needs to be done to restore the confidence of the American people, which we have permitted to deteriorate because we have failed to exercise fiscal responsibility and accountability in the conduct of our own offices.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, these are only two suggestions. I have many others which I expect to make from time to time. I hope that I may have the support of a sufficient number of my colleagues to the extent that we will be able to see the adoption of at least some measures which will promote greater efficiency and more economy in the operation of our own House.

CHEATING DAYLIGHT AND DARKNESS

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that something be said today as Washington embarks upon its annual fling of trying to cheat daylight and darkness.

In this wonderful state of confusion and make-believe, nothing could be more appropriate than to push the hands of the clock ahead for an hour.

It is entirely in keeping with the idea of some that we live on borrowed time as well as borrowed money.

I hope you like the golfer's special. I do not.

PROGRAM FOR THE NATIONAL FORESTS

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment Secretary of Agriculture Benson and the Forest Service of his Department for the excellent report on the national forests sent to the Congress on March 24, 1959.

This "Program for the National Forests" is in accordance with President Eisenhower's statement to the Congress in 1953 that the national forests should be managed wisely. The President made it clear that the Federal Government has a responsibility to see that such management is achieved.

It is evident that much study has gone into the resource management and development measures included in both the long-range phases of the program and the short-term objectives.

Many in the Congress are familiar with the report on "Timber Resources for America's Future," the exhaustive study of the Nation's timber situation which the Forest Service completed in 1958. The 5-year national forest recreation program called "Operation Outdoors" is well known on Capitol Hill. The Agriculture Department's Committee on Research Evaluation provides valuable information on research needs in forestry. And long-established national forest project work inventories are excellent sources of jobs to be done.

I cite this background material upon which this recent report on a "Program for the National Forests" is based for two reasons: First, it is sound material already accepted by the Congress and the public; and secondly, it provides a solid basis and good reasons for the activities needed to provide greater resource yields and services from the national forests.

The American people are fortunate in having such a tremendous store of renewable natural resources in their national forests. The national forests in the Central States, and in my State of Indiana, are rather insignificant when compared to the vast acres in such forests in the West. My colleagues in Oregon, Washington, California, and elsewhere can point with pride to national forests comprising many millions of acres.

The Hoosier National Forest in Indiana, while only about 120 thousand acres in size, is growing in importance each year for its recreation, wildlife, water and timber values. In 1958, over 90 thousand people camped, picnicked, hunted, and fished on the area. Again the number is small, but to our people in Indiana this use is important.

We have an allowable annual cut of 5 million board feet of timber on this small Hoosier National Forest. Only about 1.5 million board feet are harvested, which means that the development and use of the timber resource base should be stepped up in accordance with recommendations set forth in this report to the Congress for the improvement of timber sales and research activities on all the national forests.

The report shows that the sawtimber needs of the Nation by the year 2000 will require an annual harvest of 21.1 billion board feet of sawtimber on a sustained-yield basis. An estimated annual growth of some 105.4 billion board feet will be needed to meet this national demand for sawtimber.

Under the interim or short-term action proposals for the next 10 to 15 years the annual harvest of sawtimber should be increased from 7 to 11 billion board feet on all the national forests. It is recommended that this increase be achieved by intensified management of present forests, growing more and better quality trees, better fire and insect protection, and improved utilization. Some 3.3 million acres will need to be planted to seedlings or reseeded during this period to make the areas produce merchantable yields of timber.

The report gives a much better picture of the goals of this "Program for the National Forests" than can be summarized in a brief statement from the floor. More wood, more recreation, better hunting and fishing, better range and grazing, intensified protection, expanded road systems for timber access and recreation, and accelerated forest research are some of the major program proposals. All are aimed at a more intensive development and management of our national forests.

The benefits of this comprehensive plan for full use of the multiple resources of the forests are well stated in the report. They show significant results both as to short-term and the long-range returns. A dollar value cannot be placed on the soil, water and recreational benefits. But such intangible benefits are often priceless in the well-being of a nation and its people.

The attention of the Congress to this splendid report by Secretary Benson and his staff is of importance at a time when high demands are being made on the renewable national resources of all nations.

DEFICIT FINANCING

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, Government spending and its effect on the entire national economy is of tremendous concern to each and every American today. In my files are many, many letters voicing this individual anxiety. Occasionally a constituent has a particularly clever and indelible way of expressing his feelings. Following is such a letter, a copy of which I received recently and which I feel admirably portrays the dangers of extravagant Government spending:

MIDDLETOWN, OHIO, April 13, 1959.

The Honorable CLARENCE CANNON,
Chairman, Appropriations Committee, House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CANNON: From a close perusal of the newspapers, I believe I have finally grasped a true picture of deficit financing. All it means is that it is good for the country to spend more than you make. This is such a good idea that I think I shall do it with my own financing.

As I want this to be entirely legal, I plan to follow the exact method used by the United States Government. My wife and oldest daughter will be designated as my Senate and my two youngest children will be my House of Representatives. The House and Senate have met and have given me a program of essentials and desirable expenditures. However, the total amount of the program is in excess of my income. This would not be the case if I could defer some of my outgo and deficit financing is the only possible outcome.

I therefore propose that I should pay no income tax for the year 1959, and I will then have enough money to carry out both the necessary and desirable programs. I know it is against the law to not pay taxes, but here is where my deficit financing occurs. With a personal debt limit about four times my income, I propose to issue 3-percent promissory notes, due 1995, in lieu of cash for my personal liability to the U.S. Government. I will faithfully pay the interest semiannually (or issue a 2-year bill in its place) and plan to carry out the following programs:

Farm aid: I have a house on a large lot that needs landscaping, gardening, and caretaking. Not essential, you know, but very desirable to me and my family. We voted for this.

Foreign aid: My family have unanimously voted for this program in the form of a foreign tour.

Highway program: I need a new driveway and paving on my property, and this is a mandate from my constituents.

Housing program: My house needs a new roof and air conditioning.

Labor and welfare: My wife needs a maid to help keep up our house so she will have more time to spend the additional money that will be available now.

Veterans' services: These are hospitalization expenses, medical insurance, annuities and life insurance premiums, all of which can be increased under the new program.

These are the desirable programs (not the essentials, like my defense program, essential services, etc.), and I estimate I can complete them all in a period of several years and then expand. And it cannot be wrong, since the Government has been doing this most of the last 27 years.

One of the best benefits of my program is that my heirs won't have to repay, either, since they can reissue my obligation along with their own. If the dollar loses value through the possible inflationary aspect of this plan, we might get out for less than one cent on the dollar, and those 100 to 1 odds are just the kind I like.

Another good feature is that I will really be helping the economy by spending (just like the U.S. Government) and keeping the money in circulation. And the more people who follow my lead will really be able to make industry hum.

I feel this is such a good idea that I am submitting it to my company in the suggestion plan. They would have millions to pour into the spending pot. Since it is only following governmental policies, it must, therefore, be an acceptable plan. It was such a good plan that I was unanimously reelected and nominated for Father of the Year.

Yours very truly,

J. G. TERRY,
Three Alameda Circle, Middletown, Ohio.

P.S.—When my company accepts this in the suggestion plan, think how much larger my note for taxes will be and that should make you happy too.

(Copies to: The Honorable WILBUR D. MILLS, chairman, Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.; the Honorable PAUL F. SCHENCK, House of Representatives, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.)

PROTECTION AGAINST VIOLENCE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, all good Americans deplore the incident that happened down South where the colored man was taken out of jail and disappeared, and presumably killed.

I am wondering about that situation in connection with this civil rights legislation. It is only a week or two since, in a Southern State where there was a strike, a coal mine operator and a truck-driver were killed. Nothing much was said or printed about it. It just seems to be a matter of course, a normal procedure, in connection with some labor dispute.

The McClellan committee placed on the record a long list of crimes of violence but very little came of its exposures. The Senators must be somewhat discouraged.

I cannot figure why so many become so excited over one incident and apparently give no thought to others of like nature. I cannot explain it.

Listening to the debate in the other body, knowing of the failure to pass legislation to protect the average worker and citizen, why so much trouble and condemnation because a man of color is lynched, and so little is said when whites meet a violent death at the hands of a mob? Is it a crime to kill a man when he is colored but just a customary union procedure to beat him to death during a strike? When will folks be given a little protection during strikes?

PERMISSION TO SIT DURING GENERAL DEBATE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during general debate for the balance of the week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, on May 8 of this year we celebrate the 75th birthday anniversary of a man who will go down in history as one of our greatest Presidents, former President Harry S. Truman. I ask unanimous consent that on that day at the beginning of business I may be recognized for 1 hour to make appropriate remarks in relation to former President Truman and that I may be permitted to yield to others to do likewise on that occasion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

UNITED NATIONS FOOD ACT FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] is recognized for 90 minutes.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that other Members who may desire to do so may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD following my statement on the subject I am about to discuss.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, America's agricultural abundance is the greatest single asset we have with which to fight the cold war but it is quite evidently the last resource considered, if at all.

The first law of nature states "The first need of all mankind is food." It is not clothing, not shelter, not money, not guns, it is food. Yet this fact is constantly overlooked in planning for true world peace.

I would like to suggest that the millions of dollars tied up today in wheat and corn is the most valuable weapon we have and we are wasting it shamefully.

Mr. Speaker, last month, on March 26, I took the floor to discuss the problem of the use of food for economic, educational, and industrial development in underdeveloped nations. At that time I suggested that I would introduce a United Nations food bill that would increase, first, industrialization; second, educational programs; and third, national food and fiber reserves in underdeveloped areas. Today 24 of my colleagues have joined me in cosponsoring the United Nations Food Act which we are introducing today.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it shocks our sense of justice and morality to know that we have literally billions of dollars worth of food and fiber resources rotting in our storage bins when over two-thirds of the world, half naked and starving, is striving for a new kind of life based on dignity and economic well-being. We can ill afford to misjudge the awakening of the peoples of Africa and Asia to the feeling that they do not have to live on the edge of starvation. The latter fact is a result of proof that has been shown to these people by Western countries and particularly the United States. We have shown these people that there is no reason to accept the tragic fate of their forebears. We have shown them that life can be more than a perpetual search for the absolute necessities. But now that we have pointed the way toward the possibility of national well-being, we cannot let the peoples of Asia and Africa down. We must be willing to aid these nations in long-term programs of economic development.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that this bill goes a long way in working out a rational program for economic and agricultural development through the United Nations. Almost all other bills and acts on this subject are limited in their purpose. They do not tie agricultural aid to economic development. For example, section 402 of the Mutual Security Act gives recipient countries a choice of accepting a certain share of our aid in the form of farm products. I do not believe that our food resources should be used to supplant the cash amounts that are presently received by the underdeveloped countries. Or take Public Law 480. The avowed purpose of Public Law 480 is to increase the export of farm commodities. The use of the proceeds from sales under this law for the goal of economic development is incidental and subordinate to our purpose of increasing our exportation of farm resources.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman's new legislation contemplate doing away with the present Surplus Disposal Act, the public law the gentleman just quoted?

Mr. WOLF. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Or is it in addition to that?

Mr. WOLF. It is in addition to that.

Mr. BAILEY. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that under the present Surplus Disposal Act the President has the free use of $300 million worth of surplus products? And I understand they have given away the full amount the last year. Does the gentleman propose to make that $500 million worth?

Mr. WOLF. No. The proposal here is to work through the United Nations.

Mr. BAILEY. Nevertheless, they would get that much of the surplus foods because the President has authority and does distribute $300 million worth. Is the gentleman going to ask for another $200 million worth to put in the hands of the United Nations?

Mr. WOLF. In the hands of the United Nations, yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Maybe we should hold on to our surplus considering the unemployment rolls in this country. Are you aware of the fact that the Department of Agriculture has already served notice that they are taking butter off the list? They are marketing it for about half price abroad, and they are taking it off the surplus food list here in this country.

Mr. WOLF. I am happy to have the gentleman bring this to my attention.

Mr. BAILEY. You better make some other investigation before you go ahead with this type of legislation.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from West Virginia—and I was going to discuss this later—that I have a bill that will make some of our food abundance available to the hungry people of this country.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is far more important than providing for a few hungry ones abroad.

Mr. WOLF. I agree with the gentleman. We should take care of our own people at home first, but we cannot neglect our friends overseas.

Mr. BAILEY. Maybe you better proceed along that line instead of with your giveaway program abroad.

Mr. WOLF. I welcome the gentleman's comments, and I am grateful he has made them even though I do not fully agree.

The United Nations food bill puts the emphasis on economic development. In this way the program does not become primarily a method of increasing our own exportation of food resources. We know that it is now possible for food to be used directly in economic development. Various studies have shown that food and clothing could be used on community development projects in lieu of money payment to previously unemployed workers. By using our food and fiber resources in this way the importing nation would be able to take care of the increased demand on food without causing inflation. Furthermore, by using food in this manner the industrializing government would be able to utilize capital for increased industrialization rather than diverting this capital for the procurement of food. Other purposes that food would be used for under this program are education programs such as school lunches and school clothing programs. Agreements would also include the use of our food and fiber for the purpose of building national food and fiber reserves in nations that are susceptible to droughts, floods, or famines. Nations that are susceptible to such conditions are more likely to be in danger of political, economic, and social instability. Furthermore, nations are forced to cut back on industrialization. Clearly these problems can be averted with adequate national food reserves.

Under the terms of the bill agreements may be made for food and fiber resources between the Secretary-General and the President during a 10-year period beginning at the date of enactment of the act. The food and fiber resources made available for this program are those commodities held by the Commodity Credit Corporation. Under this program, the President is authorized to use up to $250 million a year of food and fiber stocks held by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

It should be understood that as contemplated presently, there will be no costs to the United States beyond that amount already authorized to the Commodity Credit Corporation.

I would like to close my statement with reasons for putting this plan through the United Nations rather than on a strict bilateral basis.

Today the underdeveloped nations of the world look to the United Nations as their protector, as their hope for peace and security. They look to the United Nations because they owe a large degree of their sovereignty and independence to the United Nations.

These people feel that the kind of aid that is given to them by sovereign nations has too many political strings attached. And we know that this is so. We in Congress know that we have lost sight of the fact that people should be aided because they are people, that there is dignity in life, that people should not be aided because we think that this is the best way to bribe them into supporting our military and political position as against the Soviet Union. We do not seem to realize that our goals of peace and our national security will be better secured and our political systems will be better secured if we do not constantly tie aid to nations in a way which forces their hand ideologically. By proposing the possibility of an expanded economic industrial development program for the United Nations which will have as one of its basic features part of our agricultural resources we will have done much to prove our hope that people all over this world, in Asia, in Africa, in Europe, may live in dignity and freedom from want. Furthermore, we will be showing the world that we hold the United Nations as our greatest instrument for peace and security in this world.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the names of the Members who have cosponsored this bill with me: The gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. CARTER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HARGIS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LIBONATI], the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. JOHNSON], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BROCK], the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. KING], the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCGINLEY], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOWALSKI], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTENMEIER], the gentleman from Montana [Mr. ANDERSON], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMPSON], the gentleman from California [Mr. KASEM], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NIX], the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. RIVERS], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BREEDING], the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER], and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY].

There may be some questions regarding various sections of the bill, and I thought I might briefly analyze the bill, section by section, and include a copy of the bill.

The purpose of the bill is to utilize food and fiber resources for industrial and educational development in underdeveloped areas through the United Nations.

Section 1: (a) Food and fiber may be used effectively in promoting strong economic conditions, thus tending to foster hope, confidence and human dignity in areas that are changing from industrially underdeveloped economies to industrially oriented ones.

First. Inadequate supplies of food and clothing undermine the health, welfare, and morale of people. When adequate supplies of food do not exist, it is impossible for the people to divert any of their productive efforts for any purpose other than the obtaining of sufficient food and fiber. Hence, certain basic capital improvements such as harbors, roads, canals, and the like cannot take place.

Second. Many nations lack food and fiber reserves. Consequently, when there is a local crop failure, famine, or drought, there is a great fluctuation in price of food and fiber commodities. This necessarily causes instability and cutback in programs of industrialization and education.

(b) The United States has provided leadership and support in projects and proposals to enable better distribution and use of food and fiber. Furthermore, this is the world food year. The President has suggested that ways should be found to use our food and fiber resources in a more rational and meaningful manner in all areas of the world. The purpose of the United Nations food bill is to point the way for better uses industrially and economically of our food and fiber resources through the United Nations or any of its appropriate agencies.

AGREEMENTS

Section 2: Agreements may be made for food and fiber resources between the Secretary-General and the President during a 10-year period beginning at the date of enactment of this act. The food and fiber resources made available for this program are those commodities held by the Commodity Credit Corporation. These food and fiber resources will be furnished without charge. Any agreements entered into by the President with the Secretary-General shall have the following stipulations:

First. The commodities will be used in underdeveloped areas to further industrialization and basic capital improvements. Food and clothing would be used on community development projects in lieu of money payment to previously unemployed workers. This would have two effects: First, there would not be increased demand on the regular market thus circumventing inflation; second, the industrializing government would be able to utilize capital for increased industrialization rather than diverting said capital for the procurement of food.

(b) Food and fiber would also be used for education programs such as school lunch and school clothing programs.

(c) Agreements would also include the use of our food and fiber for the purpose of building national food and fiber reserves. Nations that are susceptible to droughts, floods, or famines are more likely to be in danger of political, economic, and social instability. Furthermore, nations are forced to cut back on industrialization. These problems can be averted with adequate national food reserves.

Second. The United States will pay the costs of ocean transportation and transportation within the United States. Presently we pay these costs under Public Law 480 and under our military aid program. It is difficult to ascertain the shipping costs of $250 million worth of food and fiber because such commodities will be shipped to places that vary in distance from the United States. However, accepting the unlikely premise that the entire allotment would be sent to a point at the greatest distance from the United States, the transportation costs would be $40 million. Storage costs on $250 million worth of foodstuffs are $28 milllion a year. Economically, therefore, it is more rational to aid needy people than to let the food and fiber rot in storage tanks. It should be noted that the $40 million transportation cost represents final cost whereas the $28 million a year cost of storing $250 million worth of food and fiber, like Old Man River, keeps rolling along from year to year.

Third. Food and fiber reserves would not be used to affect the domestic production of the importing country, nor to affect the usual imports of the same or similar commodities.

Fourth. The commodities under this program are to be used solely for domestic consumption. They are not to be reexported. More specifically, these commodities should not replace commercial exports from the United States.

Fifth. The President will be kept informed of the uses of the food and fiber resources given by the United States by the Secretary General.

LIMITATIONS

Section 3: No agreements shall be entered into for any one year which amount to more than $250 million a year.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER NATIONS

Section 4: This is the "honest broker" section. The Secretary General of the United Nations will act as a broker in bringing together those nations that want to participate in bilateral and multilateral operations which will better distribute and utilize food and fiber resources. The President is authorized to participate in any of these operations.

PROGRAM NOT EXCLUSIVE

Section 5: The contributions or expenditures under this act will not count as contributions under section 306(a) of the Mutual Security Act. Hence, the food and fiber given in this act will not be included as part of our money contribution to the United Nations technical assistance program.

A bill to promote the foreign policy of the United States and help to build essential world conditions of peace by the more effective use of U.S. agricultural commodities for the relief of human hunger, and for promoting economic and social development in less developed countries through the United Nations or its appropriate agencies

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled,

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SECTION 1. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the assurance of an adequate supply of food and clothing for the people of the world is an important step toward strengthening democracy throughout the world and aiding the cause of lasting peace through providing more stable economic conditions, thereby generating an atmosphere of hope, confidence, and human dignity;

(2) inadequate supplies of food and clothing undermine health, efficiency, and morale; and in some areas of the world, the inability of the people to divert any of their productive efforts to any purposes other than obtaining sufficient food and clothing has resulted in a lack of general and technical education of individuals, and a lack of basic capital improvements such as harbors, roads, canals, bridges, schools, factories, dams, and the like; and

(3) the lack of an adequate national food and fiber reserve leads, in cases of local crop failures, drought, or floods, to famine, violent fluctuations in price of food and fiber commodities, hoarding, and a destruction of public confidence; and places nations without such a reserve forever in peril of national catastrophe and often causes cutbacks in programs of industrialization and education.

(b) in continuation of the leadership and support which the United States has provided to meet the problems referred to in subsection (a), including support for the proposed World Food year, it is therefore the purpose of this act to demonstrate the willingness of the United States to aid the cause of peace with a positive program aimed at abolishing the causes of war, including (but not limited to) efforts to ease and ultimately eliminate starvation, human exploitation, discrimination, and other injustices and threats to permanent peace. It is also the purpose of this Act to carry out the responsibilities imposed upon the United States by its position as the world's most fortunate independent democracy, by providing for the use of our food and fiber resources to aid other nations in the improvement of their living standards, through assisting such other nations by means of the United Nations and its appropriate agencies by provisions of adequate food and fiber reserves for such other nations.

AGREEMENTS

SEC. 2. The President is authorized during the ten-year period which begins on the date of enactment of this Act upon the request by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to furnish, without charge, over a period not to exceed ten years in any case to the United Nations or to such agency, from stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation, wheat, dairy products, corn, barley, oats, rye, feed grains, sorghum, soybeans, cottonseed, flaxseed, dry edible beans, cotton, rice, and tobacco. In making such stocks of food available to the United Nations or any of its appropriate agencies, the United States shall enter into agreements with the United Nations or any of its appropriate agencies providing that:

(1) such commodities shall be used in underdeveloped areas to further (a) industrialization and basic capital improvements including (but not limited to) community development projects, harbors, roads, canals, bridges, schools, factories, dams, and the like; (b) education and educational programs including (but not limited to) school lunch and school clothing programs; (c) national food and fiber reserves;

(2) the United States will pay the costs of transportation of such commodities within the United States to ports of embarkation, and will pay ocean freight charges;

(3) such commodities shall not replace in the countries of use the usual domestic production or imports of the same or similar commodities;

(4) such commodities shall be used solely for domestic consumption in the country to which exported, and shall not be reexported nor shall such commodities be used to replace commercial exports from the United States;

(5) the President will be kept continually informed with respect to the activities made possible by, and uses made of, commodities furnished by the United States under such agreements, and with respect to whether or not the objectives of the United Nations are being carried out through the programs undertaken pursuant to this Act.

LIMITATIONS

SEC. 3. Agreement shall not be entered into under this Act which will call for the furnishing in any calendar year of agricultural commodities representing an investment by the Commodity Credit Corporation in excess of $250,000,000.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER NATIONS

SEC. 4. The President is authorized to cooperate with the Secretary General of the United Nations in bilateral and multilateral operations with other member nations of the United Nations that wish to further their own economic well-being and the objectives of the United Nations through the contribution or use of surplus foods and fibers.

PROGRAM NOT EXCLUSIVE

SEC. 5. Any contributions or other expenditures made under this Act shall not be considered as contributions to which the limitations contained in the proviso in section 306 (a) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954 apply.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the distinguished gentleman from Iowa for the introduction of this legislation today. I want to join him in the introduction of this same bill. I certainly think he is on the right track, and I congratulate him, indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I have today joined several of my colleagues in introducing food for peace legislation. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] has told you, this legislation would authorize the United States to make surplus agricultural commodities available to the United Nations for distribution to nations throughout the world.

To me, this legislation makes good sense. I want to put our surplus agricultural commodities to work. And I can think of no better way to do this than by putting them to work in behalf of a lasting world peace.

It is difficult for us in the United States, where overproduction by farmers is a constant problem, to realize that in many areas of the world people are constantly faced with a shortage of food. Many nations are hard pressed to meet the day-to-day food requirements of their people. They do not have large reserve stocks to pick up the slack in the event of droughts, floods, or other natural disasters which curtail production.

There should be an internationally created food reserve upon which nations which suffer temporary shortages could call for help.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that other nations of the world would join the United States in making food and fiber available to this food reserve.

Communism thrives on the difficulties of other people. Communists are quick to exploit temporary food shortages and other natural disasters. Russia could be expected to oppose, in the United Nations, the creation of any international food reserve, for they know if food is available for nations to use, if and when disaster strikes, that one area for exploitation will be closed to them.

Passage of legislation such as we have proposed today will demonstrate once more to the world the dedication of the United States to the ideal of peace. Once more, we will say to the world, "When you are in trouble, share in our abundance."

Millions of people throughout the world look to the United States for leadership today. Whether we like it or not, we cannot escape our role as leaders in the free world. Enlightened self-interest demands that we do all we can to help other nations become economically strong. People who are convinced that their economic self-interest will best be served under a democratic form of government will have little, if any, sympathy for Communist propaganda.

Just recently, it was revealed that in Haiti hundreds of people are literally starving to death. For about 3 years, drought reduced production to a point where there is not enough food to go around.

Many Members of Congress have urged the President to send some of our surplus food to Haiti immediately. When people are starving, there can be no delay while national policy is examined to see if we can properly extend the needed help.

The great nation of India is always precariously balanced on the edge of a food shortage. Any disaster which reduces the food supply, even slightly, creates serious trouble for the government. The Indians are proud people. At times, they seem to us to be exasperatingly indifferent to the obvious dangers in communism. But India is a democratic government which is struggling to provide a decent standard of living for its millions of people.

Economic and political unrest, caused by a widespread and persistent shortage of food, greatly complicates the difficulties of the government and could conceivably tip the scales against freedom there.

Whether we like it or not, there is a struggle now under way between India and Communist China. India is trying through democratic procedures to create jobs and give her people greater economic independence—the same thing China is trying to achieve through the harsh, repressive procedures of communism.

If India fails, and China succeeds, there will be nothing to stem the spread of Communism in Asia. Our surplus foods can be a significant weapon in this life or death struggle.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will give careful and sympathetic consideration to this legislation. By agreeing to make surplus commodities valued at $250 million available annually to the United Nations over a 10-year period, we will not only be taking a step that will greatly strengthen our foreign policy, but will also be acting to solve the surplus commodity problem for this country.

There can be no doubt that until the present large surpluses are worked off, we cannot really get down to the task of writing a farm program that will be fair to the farmers and will operate at a minimum cost to the taxpayers.

But bear in mind that this is not primarily surplus disposal legislation. First of all, it would be a deliberate attempt on our part to use our surpluses to the greatest advantage, to bring help and relief to people anywhere who are in trouble. It would reinforce our present efforts to help peoples and nations help themselves.

This is sound legislation, Mr. Speaker, and I am proud to be among those sponsoring it on the floor today.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman; I am grateful for his comments.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I rise to compliment my distinguished colleague from Iowa for the legislation which he has today introduced. I am happy to offer a companion bill to this legislation.

I think we have for many years missed a wonderful opportunity to make available our great abundance to the hungry people of the world. I am sure this would have a tremendous impact in bettering our international relations.

I suppose our country is the first country in the history of the world that has complained about an overabundance. This is certainly a remarkable paradox in these times when we know that two-thirds of the world goes to bed hungry every night. Those of us who have traveled in China and in the Far East know that hunger is a real problem. As I have stated previously I am not referring here to mere nutritional deficiency, but hunger of the belly kind that makes kids cry. In this bill I think we are taking a step in the right direction, using this food for peace, knowing that food does have a universal language. The smallest child knows the meaning of food, whereas he may have no understanding of some of the other things we are attempting to do to retain and to win new friends in this time of peril. In my opinion it would be more effective than our military assistance program.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Ohio and say that I am happy to have his leadership on this and other projects.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with the gentleman from Iowa in the remarks just made and add my commendation of him for the leadership and initiative he has taken in this matter.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman from Oregon for his splendid contribution. I might say that he has been one of the great leaders in the recognition of the need for a more active United Nations. I am happy to have him with me in this matter.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to join with the gentleman from Iowa, representing the Second District, in the purpose of this bill, endeavoring to use the device of the United Nations in a food-for-peace program.

There is one question I should like to put to the gentleman from Iowa. That is, what is the difference, if there is one—and I am sure there is, having thoroughly studied both sides of it—between this bill the gentleman is introducing at this time and the bill that was referred to as the Humphrey food-for-peace bill?

Mr. WOLF. I am happy this question has been asked because I know there have been questions by other Members who have called our office in regard to this matter.

The Humphrey bill is a broad bill. In a sense, it intends to expand the Public Law 480 program. I think the gentleman will find that if there is an area of similar consideration it is under title V of the Humphrey bill, which I have here, which does not specifically state or completely authorized or suggest in what manner we work in a multilateral way. My bill attempts to suggest and define the method whereby we can work through the United Nations. I think we are in pretty good agreement on this. As a matter of fact, we have discussed this with their office and have no area of conflict. We have attempted to define in considerable more detail in our bill than it is in the Humphrey bill, the role of agricultural resources in economic development of underdeveloped areas. For example, my bill aims at the use of food and fiber for actual economic development of the underdeveloped area on projects such as community development projects. Mr. HUMPHREY'S bill, on the other hand, does not change in emphasis from that of Public Law 480, which places economic development of an underdeveloped area as one of many considerations. In this bill, however, it is the primary consideration.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to join the gentleman from Iowa in introducing this legislation. I think it is a very important measure because it is going to help the United States carry on the great struggle for the minds of men.

I have many people in my district who have asked me repeatedly why we do not give some of our surplus foods to the hungry people of the world, particularly in these underdeveloped areas. I think this is a way of demonstrating to those people that the United States is a humanitarian nation, rather than acting as the Soviet Union has been doing, engaging in a number of false promises which the free world is now coming to understand are nothing but false promises. This bill, I think, affords us an opportunity to use food that would otherwise be rotting away to help the starving people of these nations, to help the economies of these nations. I think it is a very important bill.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his contribution.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COAD. I congratulate the gentleman on leading this discussion today and promoting further the idea of food for peace. As the gentleman probably knows, back in the 85th Congress I proposed legislation along similar lines.

Mr. WOLF. May I interrupt the gentleman to say I am well aware of his contribution in this field. I am happy to have Iowa so well represented on the Committee on Agriculture by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD].

Mr. COAD. I thank the gentleman very kindly. I am very glad to see that this issue has come forth. I think that all of us who have been acquainted with this general subject were particularly elated to see the President in January favoring this kind of a proposal, because essentially the people of the world in the countries that are threatened with the domination of communism are obviously, so many of them, so weak that they do not have the internal resources by which they are able to go into the mines to extract the minerals from the soil, and to build industrial plants so that they can get themselves on their own feet. This is the kind of plan and the type of program that gives these countries the opportunity to build internal strength so that they can make industrial progress, so that they can make their own factories, their own trucks, their own automobiles, so that they can have a finer, higher type of living, coming closer to our standards. This is the kind of program that, instead of America's cutting down on world prices, will help to lift the standard of living of the rest of the world so that they can come up to our standard of living.

Not only this, but an incidental byproduct, and I do call this an incidental byproduct, is that it does lend assistance to us economically at the same time. But by and large it is a program to help the welfare, the standard of living of all people all over the world. I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman from Iowa for his splendid contribution to the discussion. I should like at this time to suggest in furthering his thought that I think he will find that in India the daily per capita consumption calorie-wise is 800 calories. It is well known by nutritionists that it takes 2,700 to 3,000 calories per day to promote actions increasing their own welfare. The thing I think that is inherent in these programs is that these countries do not get any provisions under this bill unless they are willing to help themselves. People who cannot get beyond a diet of 800 calories have too little energy left to build schools, to build railroads, and to construct communications facilities. If we can show them how to feed their families and remove from them the worry of finding food enough for each day alone, we will be helping considerably. This food is only to be available to individuals, under these provisions, who help with these projects.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What the gentleman suggests is all very well, but before we go overboard on a program of that kind, does not the gentleman think there should be more study of the conditions in our own country, an effort made to determine just how far we can go in alleviating the conditions I have found in some of our localities where people, especially older people, do not have enough to get along on and maintain their health?

Mr. WOLF. I am well aware of what the gentleman says. I believe he might like to know that I have visited several depressed areas in this country. I am very much concerned with the problems in this country and the unhappy conditions that exist for many of our senior citizens and that exist in many depressed areas where there is serious unemployment. However, I do not feel that $250 million per year is going overboard in this field when we are spending better than $40 billions a year on national defense. I think the gentleman will agree with me that we cannot neglect the people at home, but we can introduce a bill suggesting some of the uses we can make of food at home to help our own people under unhappy circumstances.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If you travel to Michigan, in my own district, of course, where people are generally prosperous and well-to-do and comfortably situated, you will find plenty who are dependent on either State or Federal funds because of their age or their helplessness and they are getting along on less than is sufficient to maintain healthful conditions. Should we not take care of them first?

Mr. WOLF. I agree with the gentleman. I think he has an excellent suggestion. I hope he will join with me when I introduce subsequent legislation dealing with agricultural aid to our depressed areas, and I hope he will be in favor of it.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. COAD. I would like to refer the gentleman from Michigan to his own Secretary of Agriculture who has at the present time in what is called Section 32 funds $300 million to be used for this very purpose, which he has not used this year and which he did not use last year and refuses to use. He can buy food and food products to help people who are indigent in his district and in every district in the United States for any kind of food for people in any kind of destitute circumstances and, yet, he does not do it. This is an administration problem. You have the money. The Congress has provided for it. So here is the gentleman's answer, and if you could get something done we will all appreciate it.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further. I have no complaint—of course, I am delighted to have you criticize the Secretary of Agriculture for purely political purposes, but how much of a better job have we done in the past? My point is this. We are sending all of this stuff abroad, and all the money or whatever it may be while in our own country, our honest, decent, hard working people who have reached an age where they cannot take care of themselves, and you folks seem to be thinking of these people thousands of miles away while you do not look at your people right here under your own noses at home.

Mr. COAD. That is exactly it—we are looking down the hill, right down here. We are looking down at the administration and on the point that the gentleman brought up, it is not political at all—you brought it up and I am trying to give the gentleman an answer to his question and say that the fault lies with his own administration.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Of course, there is no doubt but that Mr. Benson is to blame for these people being without food in other parts of the world. Possibly, he is to blame for them being born and to blame because they have not died before. But, I would like to take care of my own folks before I go wandering all over the world. Some of you folks seem more concerned with people who are out of sight than you are concerned about your people right at home here. You can go out here any time you want to in Washington and find hungry people and ill-clothed people, but it seems you would rather send money some thousands of miles away.

Mr. COAD. Will the gentleman cosponsor legislation of this type along with the rest of us?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. To take care of our own folks here?

Mr. COAD. Yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Certainly, but I want them to go to work. I cannot go along at all with putting a lot of people in the Michigan unemployment compensation, and putting additional people on unemployment compensation when 58,000 people are on strike in one industry. I think they ought to go to work. I would like to ask the gentleman if he saw that notice the other day where the union right here in Washington is going on strike for higher wages, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he read the schedule of wages. How can anyone afford to pay those wages when costs are going up all the time? They want $3 and $4 an hour.

Mr. COAD. I would dare to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps the entire public might go on strike against the high interest rates in this country.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. COAD. I was referring to the high interest rates.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. To go on strike against that?

Mr. COAD. Why, certainly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is all right with me.

Mr. COAD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My remedy when prices are too high is not to buy. When I go down to the supermarket here, as I have time and again, and I see liver at $3.50 per pound—I meant to say $1.50 a pound, I was just enthusiastic there, you see—I do not buy it, do you not see. But I see the woman ahead of me buying it. Down here at the Fifth Street Market, it was $1.68 and they are buying it down there. Next week when they are out of a job, they want to go on public relief.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Is the gentleman from Michigan suggesting a buyers' strike in this country?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. So I thought. When my old automobile went bad and it would not work and I had to buy a new one, I did and I paid an exorbitant price. Now, it will not work—it is a rattle wagon.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. LEVERING. I want to second what has been said by our colleagues about this type of legislation showing the true humanitarian side of our great Nation.

There is another point also, the survival of our way of life over international communism. I am thinking of our own security program. We know certainly that communism does travel on empty stomachs. This is an important legislation in the right direction to help us all with the problems we are facing in the free world.

I would like to ask the gentleman if he agrees that this type of legislation, in helping other countries, ultimately improving their economics, we will be improving a long-range program of extended markets for our own farm products?

Mr. WOLF. That is an excellent point. I thank the gentleman for bringing that into the discussion. There is no question in my mind that the man who spends every waking hour trying to get enough food for his family has little time to develop the resources of the nation in which he lives. If he can have food for his family, he will have time to aid in his nation's economic development. First, there must be communication and then transportation, and ultimately they tap the resources.

When you tap the resources, then comes the ability to buy the resources which we produce.

Obviously through the use of our foods on programs outlined in the United Nations Food Act we are cultivating the tastes of others in two ways. People of other lands will become accustomed to the kinds of food produced in the United States, and second, people will begin to eat more than they presently do in such nations as India and Haiti.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. A few days ago one of my former constituents made the observation that it seemed sinful not to produce food on his own farm when he knows there are people who are hungry around the world who could use that food. As I see the problem, America is capable of producing more food than we need. There are people in the world who need the food which they do not have. Our choice is either to make that food available through whatever means we can, and this resolution that you are introducing is one of those means; or else to insist that our farmers not grow food because we are producing too much. That would be contributing to starvation. That is an absurd situation.

The gentleman is to be commended for his proposal. I am hopeful that the Administration will recognize that we ought to raise the standard of living throughout the world. It may be that they can produce enough food for themselves, or that they can produce enough other things with which they can buy the food they need. But that is not the situation facing us today. Therefore, the food-for-peace plan, which the gentleman is recommending, certainly seems to be very definitely in order for the years ahead.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Talking about this wheat production, you are all familiar with the Yankus case. Who originated that program? Was it not 1938 that your party put it in? I know it to be the fact that a former Member of this body received $97,000 for cotton subsidy in one year, and in another year $130,000. A foreign corporation had gone up $200,000 for growing crops. Most of the money has gone for cotton, rice, tobacco and peanuts, has it not? You are the boys who did it? You are yelling about taxing now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If the gentleman will read the wheat bill which I introduced, he will find in that bill there is a $20,000 limit on payments. The Department of Agriculture apparently takes a dim view of this feature of the bill, but it seems to me that the problem is on both sides of the aisle. There was, as I recall, a very loud outcry from that side of the aisle when the Secretary of Agriculture back in 1949 suggested that there be a limit upon these payments. I do not think either side is without fault in their concern about the amount that should go to any individual.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will the gentleman let me in there? We protected you on peanuts, cotton, rice, and you gave us subsidies on corn and wheat. It was a dirty deal in my opinion.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that the amount of food and fiber resources we have on hand today is approaching $10 billion. While I do not want to get into a detailed discussion with the gentleman on how this distribution should be made, I do want to point out that we have the surplus and I am one of those who thinks we have done a very unfortunate and unhappy job of dealing with something God has given us to use to help the hungry and less favored people of the world. This was the point I took the floor to discuss, not the question of the rightness or wrongness of the program.

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Utah.

Mr. KING of Utah. I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa. I had the privilege of being one of those who dropped in a bill comparable to the one sponsored by the gentleman from Iowa.

It seems to me that this bill is one of those rare bills in which both the conservative element and the liberal element in our country may very fully unite. It has been the traditional role of the liberals to show a sensitivity to the needs of others, to starving people; that has been their time-honored role. It has been a traditional role of the conservatives to be alarmed over expenses. In this particular bill you have a joining of those two consideration. Here at one master stroke we can take care of the needs of countless individuals who are in desperate need of help and at the same time we can effectuate some very substantial economies in the process by saving the cost of the storage of these wheat surpluses. For that reason I join very willingly and enthusiastically in sponsoring this particular legislation. I am going to back up the gentleman from Iowa in this effort.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to say at this point that I am honored to have the distinguished gentleman from Utah with me in this legislation and appreciate his support.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Unfortunately, I did not hear all of the gentleman's remarks but I understand this is a bill which has been introduced to dispose of these surpluses.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to interrupt the gentleman if I may and correct him. I would like to use a different expression than "dispose," I would like to say, "utilize for the help of mankind something that we have in abundance."

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I appreciate the gentleman's attitude. My question is whether the gentleman has estimated the cost of transportation distribution of this wheat when sent abroad and who will bear it?

Mr. WOLF. I am very happy to have this question brought up. I would like to say it would be very difficult to ascertain the total cost. In our proposal we suggest $250 million. I say it would be very difficult to equate these costs. The Department can give us the cost of similar programs in the past and we can ascertain the cost of military assistance. The ocean freight cost of sending military supplies to various parts of the world each year comes to about $168 million whereas the shipping costs on food would run no more than $40 million a year.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I would be happy to have these figures. The point of the matter is the gentleman has no cost estimate for, let us say, what it would cost to transport and distribute say 100 million bushels of wheat like we did to India or some specific project. The gentleman has not got the details of those estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. WOLF. I would like to say that we have some agencies of the United Nations working on these cost figures and when these figures are available I would like to put them in the RECORD and I will see that the gentleman gets them.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I would be glad to have them.

Secondly, whatever the estimates may be, would the cost be borne by the Government?

Mr. WOLF. That is right.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. To these countries where the food will be distributed. How can we know that the surplus food would actually be distributed to the hungry people over there in those countries where we are going to send it? As you may recall, we had a program several years ago about sending surplus wheat to India. There is a question in the minds of many people after the fact as to whether the grain or what proportion of the grain finally got to the hungry people of India and how much of it got maldistributed into other areas where the hungry people of the world the gentleman is interested in, and I am, too, did not actually get it. Distribution will become a very key question.

Mr. WOLF. The gentleman's position is well taken. It is sound; it is true. Under this program we have the ability to review from year to year, the President of the United States has the authority to enter into agreements with the United Nations or the appropriate agency thereof. It does not say he has to. Further, at any time we feel the covenants are not carried out, he can take appropriate action.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I gather from the gentleman's remarks that the idea is to utilize the United Nations rather than to do as we did with India, have a bilateral agreement with the countries involved. The proposal is that the United Nations be utilized for distribution.

Mr. WOLF. We are suggesting in addition that the United Nations be used as one of the methods by which we dispose of our food resources. I am not suggesting that we do this instead. We have to continue the program the gentleman has suggested, but I am suggesting further that we use the United Nations, too.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The gentleman has been very fair in yielding and I appreciate it. Presently one of our big problems in distributing this surplus food to our own people comes from the question of the complexities involved in distribution, and the cost involved. At the present time we utilize the 48 States. We have tried to work out a Federal-State program in that instance, yet I think the gentleman will agree that experience has shown in spite of what we all desire, myself and others who are interested in the humanitarian aspect of this thing, we have run into some real tough distributing problems, so much so that some States prefer not even to avail themselves of the surplus to set up the machinery which is necessary to be used so that these foods can get into the hands of the people who need it.

Mr. WOLF. That was a very well-taken point.

I would like at this time to go back and state that our storage costs on about $250 million of surplus commodities would run about $28 million per year to keep it on hand. Using some estimates and some markets around the world, we figure that the cost of transporting is about $40 million. It is very difficult to tie it down to actual pennies because we do not know which countries will avail themselves.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Is that on the assumption that we would be completely out of the storage business?

Mr. WOLF. This portion when it leaves our storage bins would no longer be stored and the cost of storage would not be needed.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. The $40 million transportation cost is the equivalent of the $100 million I think the gentleman said of storage for the same quantity.

Mr. WOLF. I want to correct the gentleman. It was $28 million to store it a year, and $40 million to transport it.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Storing the same quantity. The gentleman is talking about a certain quantity in storage. Saving the storage costs and the cost of transportation relate to the same quantity.

Mr. WOLF. A relatively small amount more. Economically, therefore, it is more rational to aid needy people than to let the food and fiber rot in storage tanks. The $40-million transportation cost represents final cost whereas the $28 million a year cost of storage continues from year to year.

Referring to the other point the gentleman raises, that is the question of keeping food and fiber resources out of the normal channels of trade, may I say that this is another reason for working through the United Nations. By doing this we have other countries who may be affected by the trade question arbitrate this thing and keep this program workable, if you please, so that it will not interfere with regular channels of trade. We should remember that the people who will be aided by this program affect only so slightly the regular channels of trade. We hope eventually that through this program people will assume their places in the regular channels of trade after sufficient industrial and economic development.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. I am very happy to join with my colleague in introducing this legislation, and I want to commend him highly for his thinking in this matter. In that connection, I would like to raise one question and mention one item. The gentleman has considered the increasing population of the world and that our surplus of food cannot prolong the significance of meeting this problem. The gentleman proposes this food-for-peace bill will be a temporary type of thing to help those countries until they can more or less get on top of the situation and get their own population and production problems under control themselves.

Mr. WOLF. Yes. And, this again is a very significant contribution. The program I suggest is a 10-year program beginning on the date of the enactment of this bill. Naturally we would have to review it at the conclusion of this 10-year period on what the situation was here. I would like to say further that this is one of the reasons why the $27 million was made available to the United Nations special fund, to study the methods by which we can utilize some of the things we have; methods by which these countries can utilize their own manpower, recognizing that not only we in America have an exploding population but many countries around the world are experiencing a greater population explosion. We must help these people in their problems which, I believe, are only temporary if we help them. Hence, I believe, this is a temporary measure, yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would like to go along with the gentleman. I have no support for this policy of being able to raise a certain crop and then the Government getting the surplus, holding it awhile, and then selling it to someone and then buying it back at a profit. At least two committees, the Fountain committee and the Hardy committee, laid bare the facts of what is happening. We should get away from that, but I do not know how to do it. It does seem to me that after we get rid of the present surplus—and we should get rid of it—that then, instead of granting a subsidy for the growing of crops, we should let the people go along on their own, and then, if there is a surplus, distribute it abroad. I recall when the drive for India was on and the complaint came from India that the people were not getting the wheat. It was the crooked politicians who were getting it. And, one of the higher-ups over there told me further that they had just as large a group of crooked politicians as we have.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOLF. I yield.

Mr. LEVERING. Several weeks ago I appeared before the House Committee on Agriculture and suggested, as perhaps some means of alleviating our farm problem, that we extend Public Law 480; to implement it further. I found, from our discussions in the committee, that apparently there was some objection to Public Law 480 because it involved competition, we will say, with our friendly neighbors and other countries throughout the world that produce the same type of thing we do in the way of food and fiber, such as Canada and other nations, perhaps Australia, possibly New Zealand and possibly others. Does the gentleman have any comment to make upon those objections which have been used against Public Law 480 that might be applicable and used against the legislation the gentleman proposes today?

Mr. WOLF. I think I partially answered this question in the previous discussion today. Let me say that we have under the provisions of this act, the ability to review, through the President, the method and purposes to which our food and fiber resource is being used. We also have the United Nations group, the men who will sit and the various committees of the United Nations who recognize, in a very real and personal way, what interference with normal trade activities does to the economies of their own nations. And, these men will be constantly watching to see that this program will be kept honest. We also have to recognize definitely, again, that the people who get the provisions under this program must ask for it through the United Nations. This is the suggestion of the group that I visited at the United Nations, that the United Nations will not go into a country and suggest to them "We are going to do this in your country whether you like it or not." The government must ask for it in order to get these provisions, and that will keep it from becoming a problem.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman has expressed almost exactly the point I wanted to make in connection with the answer to the question asked, that the legislation that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] is introducing cannot be subject to the criticisms that the gentleman just suggested were made to Public Law 480, because the areas served under this bill are not in the market at the present time. There is no competition in this market, because they have neither the money nor the ability to compete in the market. This whole program is planned on the basis, as the gentleman has expressed quite thoroughly, that this will not be a new market in the sense that they have the ability to buy or to go into the market and purchase. But these are people who need help, who do not have the ability to buy. That is why it becomes so important and so valuable as a device for a service to humanity.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman from Iowa. I would like to suggest that one of the conversations I had with the Chairman of the UNICEF program concerned the dramtic use of the dried milk program, which had such a wonderful impact on the young people in many countries of the world. We were actually creating a market. That is, we were creating a market if we could put into the hands of the U.N. people the wherewithal to purchase the dried milk. Then they would buy much more of it. They had seen dramatically how the children in the schools had a new color in their eyes, a new brightness, that their bodies had filled out, that they had taken on the ability to think and to create, which had not been existent before. Their parents were seeing this. But again, they had no money with which to buy to further the condition that had already been manifested.

We are hoping to get behind this problem and to try to help them cultivate their own resources.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I was on a program the other night with Clarence Pickett, who was for many years the secretary of the American Friends Service Committee. He told how a year or so ago he met with a group of Russian scientists. One of these scientists gave him a present for the American Friends Service Committee and explained his reason very simply. He said that as a young boy, living in Siberia after World War I, he had been kept alive by food which had been provided in part by the American Friends Service Committee, with the Nansen Mission. This had planted a seed of concern, a seed of humanity, in his heart.

Certainly we who are so fond on Sunday morning of paying tribute to such propositions as "if thine enemy hunger, feed him," ought not to shy away from converting that fine proposition into reality when we have the visible demonstration that upon those occasions where we have had the decency and common humanity to express our concern it has borne rich fruit.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOLF. I thank the gentleman, and I should like to say that last Saturday night I appeared before the Council of World Questions in Cedar Rapids. This is a group made up of business, industrial, professional people, and educators, who gather together frequently to discuss world questions. I was happy to discuss the United Nations food bill with them. I received unanimous consent and support to go ahead with the proposal this morning. One of the gentlemen talked in the same vein as has my distinguished colleague from Colorado.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank all the gentlemen who have joined me in this discussion here today on this bill. I can only urge in closing that the appropriate committee will take speedy action and that we will soon have hearings on this bill.

INFLATION AND SOME OF ITS RESULTS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, from hundreds of citizens in the Fourth Congressional District of Michigan come copies of a statement carried in a recent issue of the Chicago Tribune which read as follows:

DEAR CLARE HOFFMAN: People in many countries have been ruined or impoverished by inflation caused by excessive government spending. I am worried about inflation in the United States and depreciation in the value of the dollar. If our Government keeps spending more than it takes in, we certainly will have more inflation and prices will keep going higher.

If this happens—

My savings will be worth less.
My insurance will be worth less.
My pension will be worth less.
My bonds will be worth less.
My income will buy less.
My social security will buy less.

I hope that you will vote only for essential expenditures, and against waste and appropriation bills favoring special interests. If we are to survive as a strong Nation, we must avoid further inflation.

Let's keep the dollar sound.

Sincerely,

On the front page of a recent issue of the Tribune was a cartoon in color which gives the answer to the question as to why we have excessive appropriations—the reason for inflation and the high cost of living. It depicts Uncle Sam besieged by taxpayers, each and every one demanding a reduction in taxes except for the purpose in which he is interested.

Unfortunately, the clipping from the Chicago Tribune reminding me that, due to waste and excessive appropriation, the savings, the insurance, the pension, the bonds, the income and social security of every individual will buy less, is true—as every thinking individual has for some time known.

That situation is due to the fact that Congressmen have lacked either the desire or the courage to resist the heat put on by pressure groups demanding additional aid or handouts for the members of first one group and then another.

The clipping then expresses the hope that I will vote for only the essential expenditures.

That course I have tried to follow ever since I came here with just one exception—defense. I have voted for appropriations for national defense even though on occasion I thought at least a portion of the money was unneeded, because I had, and I have no way of knowing just what sums were or are essential for an adequate defense, and, like many others, have been forced to accept the judgment of our military men.

I have voted so often for economy, against what I considered excessive or unneeded appropriations, that in every primary and general election my opponent has branded me a tightwad, as an "agin" candidate.

In truth and in fact, many a "no" vote has been a vote against waste and extravagance, but for those "no" votes I have been bitterly criticized. Due in part to the inflation caused by waste and excessive appropriations, the value of my own savings—accumulated as they were by hard work and thrift—has been grievously diminished, and am just as worried about my future, the future of my children, my grandchildren, and my great-grandchildren as is any one of those who sent in the Tribune statement.

Many people thoughtlessly condemn Congressmen who vote for what they consider economy as being reactionary, horse-and-buggy Congressmen. Comgressmen who vote against Federal aid to education, housing programs, subsidies of one kind or another, all perhaps desirable activities but calling for tax dollars which we do not have, are bitterly condemned as reactionaries. Congressmen who vote against programs which, however desirable, we just cannot afford, are described as thinking in the past, even though those uttering the condemnation know very well that we cannot, without disaster, continue to borrow and spend.

More and more we are becoming a dependent people—dependent upon other nations for our own protection, dependent upon State and Federal Government for the things which we might, had we the will and energy, do for ourselves.

The cost of living has gone ever higher and the demand for higher wages and higher prices which must follow higher wages continues incessantly. Just last week in the local papers we find 42,000 construction workers here in Washington threatening a strike for higher wages which they say are necessary to meet the ever-rising cost of living, but which, if granted, will shove that cost still higher.

Carpenters here now get $3.50 per hour; they are asking for an additional 35 cents per hour. Operating engineers get $2.60-$3.70 per hour; they want an additional 25 cents per hour. Teamsters receive from $2-$2.40 an hour; they ask for a 50-cents per hour raise. Cement masons get $3.42½ cents per hour; they want an additional 50 cents per hour. Laborers who get $2.30 per hour are asking for an additional 35 cents per hour. And all seek fringe benefits. We all want more—forget Uncle Sam has nothing except as he gets it out of us.

Undoubtedly some increases will be granted and the cost of homes will go higher for the purchaser, the consumer, must always pay, for the very sound reason that no one willingly will work for nothing or without some profit.

Unemployment benefits are being sought. There is a substantial demand for 39 weeks of unemployment compensation. If I figure right, that would leave, if granted, but 13 weeks where the worker was on his own.

A question which comes to my mind is just how few gainfully employed people can support those who are out of a job or who choose not to work.

Just how much can we spend for desirable, enjoyable items which we cannot afford? That is, for which we do not have the money to pay?

Likewise, just how long can the Federal Government, which is dependent upon tax dollars, continue to create new agencies, extend additional assistance to first one group and then another? It has to borrow the money, pay interest on its borrowing to finance its plans.

At present, drives are on for higher wages, for a shortening of the workweek, for Federal housing, Federal aid to education, for an increase in farm subsidies, for new agencies to promote new Federal activities—in fact seldom a mail reaches my desk that does not contain the citizens' demand for additional Federal funds, many of the writers at the same time demanding a lessening of taxation.

A Congressman who votes for Federal aid to the various groups is praised and lauded as a liberal. A man who votes for economy, for efficiency, is characterized as a tightwad and sometimes as a cruel, thoughtless individual who has no regard for those described as being unable to live in the manner the writer would desire.

One thing is absolutely certain. Spending the dollar you do not have leads to bankruptcy, and borrowing to spend without limit not only leads, first, to inflation, but later to bankruptcy and disaster.

Consistently since I came here I have voted for economy and efficiency and more than one colleague has described me as not only being against progress but heartless in considering the needs of others.

For once at least I subscribe to a statement of Franklin Delano Roosevelt who, on October 19, 1932, said:

> If in some crisis, it [the Nation] lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow temporarily on reasonable terms.
> But if, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy. For over 2 years our Federal Government has experienced unprecedented deficits, in spite of increased taxes. [Since that date our national debt has increased from $19,487,002,444 to $276,343 million in 1958, with an annual interest charge of $8½ billion.]

Congressmen vote for measures which in the long run are harmful because they lack either the inclination or the courage to vote against measures which they know or might well have known would ultimately bring disaster but which their bosses, the voters, demand.

Many insist that, this being the people's government, Congressmen should vote as the people wish even though the result is disastrous. Unfortunately, as depicted in the Chicago Tribune, those who want something for themselves for which the other fellow must pay, are extremely vocal and insistent.

It is my purpose to vote as in the past and suggestions from a colleague or a constituent as to anything I can say or do to bring about greater efficiency and economy in the Federal Government will be welcome.

Do you wish me to vote for lesser appropriations or for none at all, for (a) the armed services, (b) foreign aid, (c) Federal housing, (d) Federal aid to education, (e) old-age benefits, (f) social security payments, (g) veterans' benefits, (h) payments to those in the armed services, to Federal employees, to Congressmen, and their assistants. To cut it short, on just what should I economize where the adviser is personally interested?

FARM PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and I further ask that all Members who desire to do so be permitted to extend their remarks on this subject following my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, today, along with several of my colleagues, I am introducing a farm bill which I have discussed on this floor previously. It is not entirely a new bill but perhaps by the combination of the provisions and propositions that are placed within the confines of this bill at least it will present a new approach.

It is obvious today that America must have a farm bill which adheres to the fairness of the economic situation for both our farmers and our consumers. We have worked long and tediously to attempt to get this kind of fairness written into and cinched down in this farm bill. It is my hope that this is the kind of approach that all farm legislation will take. I am sure it is the approach that all of us who represent districts scattered across the length and breadth of America desire and the kind which we will promote.

In rural America today we find that there is a demoralized situation. It is demoralized because there is an obvious lack of leadership. Any time there are units by the millions in this country or any country, whether it be an economic situation or whether it be in the farming industry, or whatever the situation may be, if there are so many who are involved and if there is no leader in a problem it then becomes a demoralized situation. This is the kind of fear we are confronted with in America, especially regarding our farm situation.

In America we have efficient farming because America by and large through the decades and even though the centuries has been made up in our rural economy of family farmers. A family farmer by nature is an efficient farmer. I believe that it comes with ill grace that anyone can say that our farmers must become more efficient, for when you really get out into the family-farm operation you find there a family pride, you find a family desire for existence. It is out of this kind of setting that the farmers scrupulously attempt to be the most efficient. So I commend the American farmers for having done a good job. I commend the American farmers for doing an efficient job today.

I am confident that through peace and through war our American farmers will continue the heritage of doing a most proficient job. They have done the kind of job that is commended and cited. Our farmers have not only been feeding America, but here for the last hour in debate on this floor we have been talking about feeding the entire world in those countries where they do not have sufficient food supplies. Our farmers have proven and are proving themselves. They do not need to be berated about their inefficiency. They are to be commended for doing a terrific job. If they come into ill repute by anyone, it is because they have done too good a job of what they set out to do.

In America every day we have 7,000 new mouths to feed. Every day our population is increasing by leaps and bounds. At the same time, and I was particularly glad that the gentleman from Michigan a few moments ago pointed out, we have right here in this country people who do not have a sufficient diet. We know that there are thousands that are living on less than a $1,000 annual income. Yet today we are not debating the point of whether we should be in the relief program or out of the relief program, what we are talking about is setting up a sensibile farm program that will set up production on an equalized, stabilized basis at a fair price.

Our farmers are able to produce beyond consumption. I know that we need new markets, but we are not debating today new markets. I know we need new areas for exports, but we are not debating an export program today. I know we have need for new industrial uses for our farm commodities, but today we are not debating the need for new industrial uses. We admit all of this. What we are doing today is looking realistically at the farm problem and what should be done in order to correct it. The farm problem stems from two main facts. No. 1 is that we have too much production and No. 2 is that we have too little price. These are the scoundrels of the farm problem. Now it is fallacious to continue in the same kind of situation which creates our problem and which is our problem. It is fallacious to continue producing too much and to continue having too little price.

If low prices and high production are the way by which we find prosperity, then our farmers should have been exceedingly wealthy in 1932. But, the farmers want only a sensible, organized production program. The farmers want only a fair price. They want to produce for consumption, and yet they also want to make a decent living. The Department of Agriculture has predicted in the last few days that this Nation is going to see an 8-percent drop this year in farm income. According to press reports we see also that the Secretary of Agriculture is goading Congress to pass a farm bill. I believe by and large the Congress wants to pass a farm bill, however, we do not want more production and lower prices, for these are our problems. So I have attempted to gear this farm bill that is being introduced today to have an organized, regulated, free production, but to establish and maintain a fair price. This is a bill, I am sure, upon which all interests can agree. It is a farm bill that is geared to the family farm operation. It is a farm bill that is not set up to destroy the consumer pricewise.

Last Monday the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT] asked if I might further elaborate on two points in this regard which I would like to do at this time. I am very happy that the gentleman from California asked these questions, for I am sure that there are others from urban areas who are very concerned and interested in these two points.

Now, the first question requests an analysis of the effect of my farm bill on food prices to the consumer. I would say this to the gentleman from California on this very important point: My bill is not designed or intended to raise the retail price of farm products, and the point I wish to make crystal clear is that as a result of my studies of this problem, I must conclude that the modern merchandising complex and processing technology of the food industry has become the largest single determining factor in consumer food prices since 1951.

Let us compare the following figures to get an indication of the effect prices received by farmers have upon food prices: The index of prices received by farmers for all farm products were:

1951	302
1959 (February)	243

Now these indexes clearly show a decline in prices received by farmers since 1951. Has this decline had any effect on the retail prices paid by consumers for food? According to the consumers' index of retail prices paid by consumers for food, we see that in 1951 the consumer food index was 111.6, 1952 the consumer food index was 114.6, February 1959 the consumer food index was 118.2. Showing a steady increase in food costs.

During this same period farmers' parity ratio has dropped from 107 percent in 1951 to 82 percent in February, 1959. There is no question, according to these figures from the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce but that the American farmer is being short changed. My bill would raise the feed grain prices from 65 percent of parity to 90 percent of parity. Let us consider, for example what effect this would have on retail consumer prices of pork, since this bill would increase the price of corn which is the principal feed of hogs. At 90 percent of parity corn would sell for $1.52 a bushel. The latest corn-hog ratio is 13. By multiplying $1.52 by this ratio, we can determine that the price of hogs would be $19.76 per hundredweight, which is a fair price and represents 90 percent of parity for pork. Now in 1958, hogs were selling at 93 percent of parity, so by this example indications are that my bill would not increase consumer retail food prices. The same application can be made to corn-fed beef cattle, which were selling at 109 percent of parity in 1958. The provisions of my bill would tend to stabilize the meat prices. In answer to the gentleman from California's second question concerning the advisability of this Congress to initiate a searching inquiry into the spread between prices received by farmers and the prices paid by consumers, I would say that I most assuredly believe that further investigation should be made in this field and that the results of the investigation be widely published because I do not believe that the general public realizes that there is a very long road between the farmers gate and the dining room table. For example, in 1958 the American farmer received an overall average of 40 percent of the consumers' food dollar, and in January of this year 39 percent of each consumer food dollar returned to the farmers. To spell this out in terms of hourly wages received by a typical hog-beef raising farm operator in the corn belt, it has been determined that his return per hour in current dollars is a paltry 66 cents. A typical farm operator receives 66 cents and hour for raising life-sustaining food for the American people. Yes, I say to the gentleman from California that we should take a good, hard look at the distribution of the consumers' food dollar.

Certain items of savings afforded by this bill should be taken into consideration because of the reduced storage program and because of the feature of paying out of the surplus commodities for acres that are placed in the conservation base of that farm, it is anticipated that enactment of this bill would reduce tax dollar expenditures. So, permit me, if you will, to go into the details of this bill and I will not labor these points. No. 1 in the provisions of this bill provides that farmers will place 10 percent of their tillable acreage in the conservation base of the farm without receiving any compensation whatsoever from the Government for doing so. After this 10 percent of the tillable acres has been placed into this conservation base, an additional 25 percent of the remaining tillable acres will be placed also in the conservation base. These are called Government responsibility acres because the Government will pay in kind—that is in surplus commodities—at the rate of two-thirds of the average annual yield of that farm for that commodity. The third proposition under this bill is that the remaining tillable acres, which actually represent 67½ percent of the total tillable acreage of the farm, can be planted as the farmer chooses to plant them so long as he does not plant one single crop on more than one-half of the remaining acres.

In addition to this there is a price support of 90 percent of parity in support loans, with a limit of $20,000. This is geared to the family farms on the commodities under which this bill is written. The crops are corn, barley, rye, flax, sorghum grain, soybeans, and dry edible beans. Wheat and rice are dealt with separately in the specific provisions. The acreage for wheat and rice is set aside in a little different language, making sure that there is no overproduction of wheat and rice. Tobacco, peanuts, wool and sugar are not included in this bill, and the acreage that is planted to tobacco, peanuts, and sugar is not included in the tillable acreage of this plan.

This program will go into effect if it passes a national producers referendum with a simple majority. That means that if the producers of all these commodities which I have enumerated, by a simple majority vote, are for this program, then this will become the law and the program. But if it would fail on a national referendum, then the programs that were in effect at the time of the referendum will continue.

Mr. Speaker, America definitely and desperately needs for her world population a sane, sensible and workable farm program. The farmer wants no more than a fair share, but the farmer is entitled to at least a fair share. The farmer has a rightful position in our country. America has been made great by the strength of her farm population and by the products that have come from our farms. Our farmers are certainly first-class citizens. They are entitled to eat at the first table along with all segments of our economy.

If and when our farmers are able to organize their production and their prices so that they will have a reasonable amount of production for consumption, and a fair price, then I will be one of the first to agree that the Government ought to get out of the farming operation entirely. But the American farmers are in the despair of confusion, and they are scattered the length and breadth of this land. They are disorganized, and they are put upon by conflicting group thoughts.

So, Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of approach that we need, the kind of an approach that we must have. I believe it is one which certainly must meet the merits of a workable and sound program.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield.

Mr. NELSEN. This is a very interesting discussion. Being a farmer I am interested in any kind of a bill that will improve our agricultural economy.

The gentleman mentioned two points—too much production and too little price. I want to add a third problem facing the farmers, and that is the cost of things we must buy to operate a farm. I recently bought three plow colters for a John Deere 3-beam plow. They cost $20, and we used to get them for a dollar or two. A plow share, a farm tractor and equipment, they all cost proportionately more. And taxes are another big item. These are all things that are adding to the problems of the farmer and cutting down his profits. I was wondering what the gentleman's answer would be to this problem of the cost of the equipment we buy? How do you propose to get that in balance with our economy?

Mr. COAD. I appreciate the gentleman's contribution and his question. It is obvious that we must have an economy that is not out of balance. You know the problem as well as I know it. The gentleman is conversant with the farm problem, because he is a farmer. We have a very great difference, but I doubt that we can establish any kind of position that our farm economy should be less than the rest of them. The gentleman from Minnesota does not wish that, nor do I.

The fact is the index of living cost stands now at 123 percent. The farmer is receiving, roughly, 80 percent of parity. So there is great disparity there between two segments of the economy with the farmer bringing up the rear. The purpose of my bill is to bring up the farm economy to the rest of the economy of the Nation. I am sure no one would want to bring down the rest of the economy to the level of the farmer. If we did that we would utterly destroy America, because America today must pay its way, which in interest alone on the indebtedness demands a strong economy. We must have a gross national product in terms of dollars such that taxes can be collected to keep this country as sound as possible.

Mr. NELSEN. I will agree with the gentleman's point of view.

I would like also to call attention in the RECORD to the fact that Congress was asked—I believe in 1953—to put a limit on the Federal payments to any one producer. At that time I was with the REA, and I well remember the discussion. I think they started with a limit of $25,000; then it was increased to $100,000; and then it got up to $250,000. But all of these amendments were defeated. They were defeated, not on this side of the aisle, but on the other side, by the Congress.

I say that I do not agree with some of the payments that have been made, the staggering amounts to individual producers. It is ridiculous that a million dollars should be paid to any single producer.

Let us take the case of the 80-acre farmer. Take out your 10 percent and you have taken out 8 acres. Take out your 25 percent and you have taken out 20 acres from his 80-acre farm, leaving him with about 60 acres on which to produce such an income. This farmer would have to have 1,000 percent of parity to support the operation of a $4,000 tractor, and still have an income which would put him on a par with the rest of the economy. Things are getting out of balance so far that you are not going to cach up without very definite steps being taken to correct the situation.

While I am very concerned about farm legislation I think that we must, as the gentleman proposes to do, get our production somewhere nearly geared to demand in order that we may produce at a fair price and be assured of a return that is in keeping with our cost of operation.

I wish to compliment the gentleman from Iowa for his efforts, and I hope we will finally find a bill that will solve the problem.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COAD. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota very much.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a companion bill to the bill just introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. COAD. It will lead to a fair income for farmers and effect some material reduction in surplus commodities. Our proposal provides for a voluntary and involuntary conservation base, repayment in kind for certain acreage in the conservation base, and price support of 90 percent of parity for approximately two-thirds of the total tillable farm acreage.

Recent surveys of planting intentions do not bear out the Department of Agriculture theory that lower supports and no production controls will solve the farm problem and clean out the surplus storage bins.

This legislative proposal is designed to cut crop production without oppressive and unrealistic acreage controls. It is based on a farm unit, rather than a specific crop acreage basis.

It seems to me that our biggest problem lies in restoring farm income to a point where it will come into balance with the rest of our economy, while at the same time taking acreage out of production.

Too many unworkable agriculture programs have been advanced by the present administration over the past 7 years. As a result, the farmers' income and economic status has consistently dropped in relation to the other segments of our economy. This bill may not be the answer to all our farm ills but it certainly does represent a new approach.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LEVERING. I want to thank the gentleman from Iowa for discussing this very vital subject, particularly as it pertains to the preservation of the family farm in America. There is a very dangerous trend in this Nation, which is a constant and real threat to our free enterprise system. It is important in America that we maintain Wall Street, but it is important, too, that we maintain Main Street, and I include the family farms alongside the small businessmen on the main streets of this country. The gentleman has indicated the importance of having prosperity for the farmers of this Nation because it is basic to the economy of our Nation. Will the gentleman admit that every depression in this country has started on the farm?

Mr. COAD. Not only has it begun on the farm but the whole history and cycle of the economy has been that it starts on the farm, it grows on the farm, it develops on the farm and then it pulls everyone in. I appreciate the valuable contribution of the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I want to thank the gentleman from Iowa for bringing this matter out on the floor at this time for discussion. Certainly in this area of farm economics we need a great deal more discussion. A few years ago I served on the Joint Economic Committee which went into the question of agricultural economics. I still think that the study and report of that subcommittee are a landmark and a guide to what might be done in the farm area. Many of the gentleman's and the suggestions of others certainly jibe with what I understand the economics to be.

The question gets down to a very practical one and I think it is important, particularly in line with what the gentleman from Nebraska has said when the gentleman yielded to him, that too many programs in the past 7 years have been in effect and as a result the farmers' income has declined. The trouble has been, in my judgment, that the Congress has never seen fit to give the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, the programs he has requested. That is my judgment. The Secretary of Agriculture's program has never been in effect. The Congress has not given him what he has requested. May I ask the gentleman, inasmuch as this is the sixth Congress in a row that his party has been in control of, whether or not there is any chance that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House will grant hearings on this bill so that we may do something about not only your bill but make other beneficial suggestions?

Mr. COAD. I cannot speak for my chairman. As the gentleman knows, I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. COAD. I assure the gentleman that I am requesting not only of the chairman but also of the Livestock and Feed Grain Subcommittee that this bill be expedited, not only because I have a personal interest in it but more for the sake of the American farmer. One of the things we witnessed the other day in committee was the fact that hearings were announced for all Members to come in and make their views known before the Committee on Agriculture. The meeting was called for that purpose, but no one showed up, and that was for the purpose of hearing Members of the House.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. How were those notices directed? May I ask the gentleman, did I as an individual Member get one?

Mr. COAD. I cannot speak for the gentleman.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I know, but was it sent to all Members in mimeographed form? How was the notice issued?

Mr. COAD. I am sorry, I am not aware of that. I do know there was a notice in the paper to that effect. I believe it was in the Daily Digest of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. I just want to say one thing, I want to emphasize it—and if the gentleman wants to answer I would like to hear him—and that is, it comes with very ill grace when now going into the fifth or sixth year the gentleman himself and other members of his party have directed great criticism against the Secretary of Agriculture when you have not given to him the programs he has requested and when you have not put into effect any program that you all think might be the way to go about it.

Mr. COAD. Let me remind the gentleman that the 84th Congress, of which I was not a member, but it is a matter of established fact, did pass a bill and it was vetoed by the President. It was not the first one; it was not the only one. And, I am wondering if the gentleman would care to indicate if he can speak on behalf of the President or even give an indication that he will sign this one.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. No, I cannot. I might state this, though, that the bill that the President vetoed in the 84th Congress, in my judgment, should have been vetoed. It did not follow through with what were the basic economic problems in this situation. I suspect that the gentleman himself, in light of his speech here today on this program, would not advocate that program, either. So, of course, it is a matter of balance between the executive and the legislative branches of the Government. But, the point I am making still stands, that whatever program has been in effect has not been that of Secretary Benson. Perhaps it can rightfully be stated that it was not the program of the Democratic leadership, and I think that is a fair statement, too, but the criticism has all been directed against the Secretary of Agriculture as if the Congress had no part to play in this thing. And, here we are again, as I pointed out, in the third Congress in a row controlled by the Democratic Party, composed of critics of Secretary Benson—here we are now in the middle of April, and apparently no farm program coming forward. Now, the Joint Economic Committee to which I referred—and this subcommittee was chaired by Senator SPARKMAN, one of the leaders in your party—I still believe that the findings of that Committee on Agricultural Economics could well form the basis of a good agricultural program. And, I can tell the gentleman this, that the Secretary of Agriculture is in conformity with the economic analyses of these programs. But, the House Agriculture Committee and the Senate Agriculture Committee apparently will not take up and deal with this program from the standpoint of the economics involved.

Mr. COAD. I am in agreement with the gentleman that there is need for activity and passage of legislation of this kind, and I am glad we agree on that point.

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Again I want to say I compliment the gentleman for bringing this matter up. Although I am a member of the party on this side of the aisle, as is the gentleman a member of his party, neither one of us controls our own parties and all we can do is hope for us to get these ideas across.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. I want to commend the gentleman from Iowa, from Iowa's great sixth district, for the tremendous amount of effort and study that has gone into the preparation of this bill that has been introduced today. I am privileged to join with you in the introduction of the pending bill. The gentleman from Missouri has brought up a number of questions here, but first of all I should like to make this inquiry. The gentleman mentioned the Secretary of Agriculture and his programs several times. He said that never has the Secretary gotten what he wanted. Now, the question that has always occurred to me is just what is it that the Secretary wants? Now, he has 200 lawyers over there working for him, and I have positive knowledge of the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi, chairman of one of the subcommittees, has asked the Secretary to submit the kind of legislation he wants, the kind of a program he would propose for the farmers of our Nation, and as yet this is not forthcoming. I have noticed in the testimony given by the Secretary that there is a shift in his position after each Congress. After the second session of the 85th Congress there was considerable indication that he had received most of the things he wanted; that he was reasonably satisfied with the legislation. It was not vetoed. However, now we find the Secretary of Agriculture denying that this program had anything to do with his suggestions; that it was not satisfactory to the administration, and so on. Now, the Democratic program in the 84th Congress has vetoed. What is it that the Secretary proposes to do for the farmers of America to solve these agricultural problems that confront this phase of our economy, the production of food and fiber?

Mr. COAD. Let me make this one remark before I yield further, and that is this: I appreciate the gentleman cosponsoring this bill with me. I would like to state that, of course, the Secretary has come before the Committee on Agriculture and has made some nominal requests. But, it has not been of such nature that it is a vital and a new program. There have been only slight modifications of increasing production and lowering price supports that seem to be the main gist of the Secretary's request. I do not wish to get into any kind of a partisan struggle on this question. As far as I am concerned, we are forced by the necessity of history to let bygones be bygones, if that is what they are. What we must do is to look for an approach to correct the situation that exists.

Our corn farmers have wide open production, and their price supports have been set almost at the minimum allowable by law, at least within a fraction of a percent. I have not talked to one corn farmer in my district who is satisfied that this is the solution to the farm problem. And it is not, because we are going to have corn running out of our ears this year and the farmers can see that this is the way by which they are going to produce themselves into bankruptcy in the end.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. Mr. Speaker, I believe with the gentleman that there is no purpose in getting into a partisan argument here. I should like to attempt to answer the question propounded by the gentleman a moment ago when he asked, "Well, what is it that Secretary Benson proposes?" In a word, as I believe the case to be, the Secretary is convinced that we have too much Government interference with the farmer. He proposes a gradual lowering of price supports, and a relaxation of controls over the farmer. He is convinced that the segment of American agriculture which has not been operating under the price support control theory or program during the past 20 or 25 years is much better off, and has been much better off, than that portion of our agricultural economy which has been hampered and hamstrung by controls, and encouraged by high price supports. That, in a word, I understand Secretary Benson's philosophy to be and I personally agree with it.

Mr. COAD. Of course, what his philosophy is and how it works out is certainly a matter for debate. What we have attempted to do in this bill is to give a great amount of freedom to plant and yet on an orderly basis, so that there is not overproduction, but still to stabilize at a higher price level than is presently found. We have attempted in every way here to meet all the objections on both sides of the aisle and yet to get the job done of stabilizing price and production.

Mr. TEAGUE of California. I did not mean anything that I have said to indicate that I find myself in disagreement with the gentleman's bill, because I have not had time to study it. The purpose of my remarks was to answer the question, "What is Secretary Benson proposing?"

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FLYNN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I certainly want to add my word of thanks and congratulations to the gentleman who has the floor on the introduction of his bill which is a new approach, I believe, to the farm problem. I have not had the opportunity to read it carefully, but I have gone over it and in substance know most of the essential parts of it.

Naturally, in approaching the farm problem, it is going to take the best that both sides of the aisle have to offer to solve it. Otherwise we will ever have it with us to the detriment not only of the American farmer but of the entire American economy.

However, in discussing it, we cannot help but review events of the past and remember that in 1952, in the presidential campaign, the promise was made that we would have one type of farm program. After the election, a Secretary was put into office who gave the people something directly opposite to what had been promised them.

Naturally, this Congress that was elected on the same platform, would not go along with that Secretary, would not give him the right to carry out a program contrary to the planks in the platforms of both parties.

That policy of the Secretary has led American agriculture down the road to disaster at the present time. So it is up to this Congress and the Members on both sides of the aisle to pick up the pieces and to do something about it. American agriculture cannot afford to wait and have this become a campaign issue in the campaign of 1960.

The President of the United States in his opening message to this Congress said that an entirely new approach must be arrived at. In so saying he has in effect repudiated the program of his present Secretary as well as the program of those who preceded him. He is calling for just the type of thing the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD] has suggested in introducing this bill.

I note the gentleman said that when an invitation was given no Member of Congress appeared to speak before the gentleman's committee. I do not think that is entirely accurate, because I am looking at a number of Members here who did appear and testify, and I also testified.

Mr. COAD. I am speaking of a specific day. I recall very well the most complete presentation the gentleman made when he was there, but I remember other days when the invitation was made available and no Member showed up.

Mr. FLYNN. I spoke for an hour and 15 minutes, and I saw many Congressmen there speaking the same way, attempting to draft, if we could, an approach to the farm problem that would meet with the approval of Members on both sides of the aisle. I note that many of the plans the gentleman has in his bill are in complete accord with the testimony I gave. I think the gentleman's plan is essentially the type of approach we would like to have. There are a number of things I should like to discuss that I think could be changed, but with the basic structure of the plan and the bill I am in agreement. I think it is essential that that be done.

What does the bill do? It gets away from subsidies, it gets away from programs, it gets away from 70 percent of parity or 60 percent or no parity at all. It recognizes that fundamentally the problem of agriculture today is overproduction, that is, we have too many acres being planted to agricultural crops. This excess planting makes more than the American public can consume domestically. The law of supply and demand brings down the price of farm commodities that the farmer has to sell, whereas the things he is buying are going up with our steady inflationary rise, and he is caught in a cost-price squeeze.

The farmer does not want control, he does not want acreage allotments, he does not want a representative of the Commodity Credit Corporation coming to his farm and measuring 15 acres of wheat, and then if he happens to have 16, requiring that he cut down to 15 and destroy it. He does not want individual bureaucratic controls that are in existence today. He wants to be a free entrepreneur, to operate his farm as his father and his grandfather did, with him, himself, deciding how many acres to plant and what to plant.

It is our job to get this economy to the point where we can take off the farm controls and let the farmer be a free operator. To do that you are going to have to bring supply into balance with consumption domestically. The only way to do it is what the gentleman has suggested, to take land out of production. We can do it with the rental-purchase program or a combination of that. I do not favor a large Government purchasing program, but if it is necssary, I say, go into it. If we can rent enough acres to drop production, as the gentleman's bill provides, we will be better off.

However, I do not believe we can pay $25 an acre because there is much land not worth $25 an acre. I think it should be based more on the value of the land. I think an amendment to that effect would be accepted if offered.

I compliment the gentleman on his answer to what the President asked for, a new approach, an approach which I think must be accepted and which I think will be accepted by both sides of the aisle, and which will be of tremendous effect and good to the farmer.

Mr. COAD. May I ask the gentleman a question? Does not the gentleman agree that this bill, paying two-thirds in kind of the commodity, the annual average yield on the particular history based on that farm, would give a very careful approximation to the real value of the acreage?

Mr. FLYNN. I like that feature very much. The rental provision needs adjusting, but that part I like very much.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I appreciate the gentleman's efforts and I appreciate the efforts of anyone who seeks to get this farm price squeeze solved. The gentleman who just preceded me said that we want a new approach. I came to this Congress 21 years ago and for a great part of that time we have had this farm problem with us. About 3 years ago, I finally came to the conclusion that we could patch and we could amend and we could just work on this present system of farm legislation that we have until doom's day and when we got all through, we would be just about where we started because all of these bills and all of these amendments to the original farm bill have not done the job. I certainly hope the gentleman has a bill that will do the job. I have read the bill, but the truth of the matter is the gentleman's bill does not differ to a great degree from the law that is now in effect or that has been in effect, the soil bank bill and the acreage reserve legislation. Now, you are attempting to put in another acreage reserve bill, which I just do not believe will work. I hope I am wrong. Let us look at the new approach and, as the gentleman knows, I explained the Jensen-Mundt bill to him earlier this year. It is a bill which would provide for the consumption of the surplus grain that we have which is depressing the market, and it would consume that grain in a very short time. Our horses and mules, before the advent of the iron horse, used the production of 43 million acres of our land. Then, we went into the tractors and the trucks and the automobiles, but we did not feed that grain back to the iron horse in liquid form. It is no wonder that we have a great surplus of grains. The Jensen-Mundt bill provides that all motor fuels shall contain 5 percent grain alcohol made from surplus grain. It provides that it should provide for a 5 percent mix of grain alcohol in all our motor fuel, which would consume over 700 million bushels of grain annually. You can readily see that this great price depressing surplus would soon be used up. I testified before the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture of which the gentleman is now a member, I think two different times last year and the year before. When I got through, a member from a southern oil-producing State, and a very powerful member of your committee, said, "Jensen, I cannot be for your bill." I said, "Why?" "Well," he said, "We produce oil in our State." I am wondering how long the oil producers of America are going to keep their heads in the sand. With the new approach, that will solve your farm problem, and it will solve it for a very small amount of money as compared to the expenditures called for today in handling this farm problem.

Mr. COAD. As the gentleman knows, he and I discussed that and we agree on certain essential aspects of this problem, but after going into this in every detail, there is admittedly on the part of everybody a great residue of feed. There is a residue from this kind of operation. I think the No. 1 question that has to be resolved before alcohol from grains can be implemented into an actual functioning program is what to do with the feed residue. There is a great residue that has a high amount of feed value.

Mr. JENSEN. Oh, yes; the value of the residue is 40 percent of the original grain.

Mr. COAD. Forty percent of 700 million bushels will be an exceedingly high amount to dump on an overly inflated feed-grain market.

Mr. JENSEN. But we are using 770 million bushels of that grain and 40 percent would go back into feed. So you would have 300 million going back into feed, but you would have 470 million bushels taken out of the reserve. I hope the gentleman understands that.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield.

Mr. FLYNN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN], has said that he did not see the value of continuing the soil bank reserve. It has been tried——

Mr. JENSEN. Just a moment. I did not say just that. Please do not put words in my mouth. I said that his bill followed pretty closely the acreage reserve section of the soil bank bill which we have eliminated for this year and next year.

Mr. COAD. Of course, I might inject this, it does not follow to the extent of the soil bank being in that bill was not mandatory. But when you enter this program this is mandatory. You present 10 percent of your acres as a contribution, and then 25 percent of the remaining acres on which two-thirds payment in kind is made.

Mr. JENSEN. We have been on 90 percent of parity.

Mr. COAD. And that aspect is in this bill. I appreciate the gentleman's support along that line.

Mr. JENSEN. I have not thoroughly studied the gentleman's bill. I am just a little fearful that you are taking so many acres out of production that the farmer, even though he gets 90 percent, will not have enough cash to carry on his expensive operation.

Mr. COAD. Having taken into consideration specific farm operations, we know it will pay out more than what the farmer will receive this year and next year. There is no question about that.

Mr. JENSEN. Let me say this: I never played politics with the farm program or any other program. After I have studied the gentleman's bill thoroughly, if I am convinced it is the best bill we can devise, then I shall be for it 100 percent.

Mr. COAD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield.

Mr. FLYNN. I campaigned last year on the basis of testimony I gave before your committee. All during that campaign I said, without having all the resources of the Department of Agriculture before me, it would be essential that we withdraw from American agriculture 6 million acres of productive land in order to bring production into balance with consumption. Some of the papers in my area agreed with me and some disagreed. One paper made a thorough study of it and went into it much deeper than I did, and they came up with the answer that the plan would work if it went all the way and took a hundred million acres out of production. One of the first things I did when I came to Washington was to call the office of the Secretary of Agriculture for an appointment. I discussed that exact matter with one of the economists of the Department to whom I was referred. I asked the gentleman how many acres it would take out of production to bring it into balance. They had the figures available. They said in the first 50 million acres taken out of production there will be little effect, but every acre over that amount will make a decided difference. He said it would take 80 million acres out of production to bring production into balance with consumption. I then said, "Why do you give the American people a conservation program of 22½ million acres when you know it will take at least 80 million acres to do the job?" The money we are spending on the 22 million is wasted because it would not go far enough. I notice here that you are asking for 40 million acres.

Mr. COAD. No, no, no; I have no figure.

Mr. FLYNN. It amounts to 40 million acres at $25 an acre. That will equal the amount carried in your bill.

Mr. COAD. I am sure the gentleman has confused two bills that have been recently introduced, one providing for 40 million acres at $25 an acre. That bill is not only on the other side of the aisle but it is on the other side of the Capitol.

Mr. FLYNN. I feel that the number of acres will have to exceed 40 million, and as the Department itself told me in the conference, it will have to be 50 million or 80 million acres. The amount provided for in either of the bills would come far below the Department of Agriculture estimate and far below the present $7 billion to get us back to the same place we were in 1952.

Mr. COAD. I agree that the percentages in this bill would have to be reviewed in a couple of years. You have the 10 percent and then the additional 25 percent. After about 2 years the entire subject would have to be reviewed by the Congress.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to say that during the past weekend when I was in Iowa I took occasion to discuss the gentleman's bill with some of the farm leaders who have been very helpful to me in formulating my action regarding agriculture. They told me to return to Washington and urge the adoption of the gentleman's bill, to get behind the gentleman's bill and tell him to press it. I congratulate the gentleman for bringing the matter to the floor today.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RANDALL. I have been here less than 2 months, but I want to commend the gentleman from Iowa on the presentation he has made. I campaigned on the proposition that I knew nothing about farm problems, but that I would attempt to learn something about them. I have read these bills very thoroughly and I want to note what is in this bill. I am sorry the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] is not here. I wish to answer some of the criticisms he made on the floor. Certainly this is a step in the right direction and I am sure that any defects in the bill would be corrected by amendment when it is called up for consideration and debate in the regular way. It cannot help but have good results.

There is one feature of the bill I note with great satisfaction and that is that the last section provides for a referendum. No one wants to force a program on any group to its injury, and I observe that the bill provides for a referendum. If it does not work out then it calls for a referendum. This does not become effective until the people have exercised the right to vote on it.

I am very appreciative of the gentleman's effort. I believe it will be a step in the right direction.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CARTER. This is more than a step in the right direction. I made a very careful study of what it would do to my farm and some 22 farms in the southern Iowa area.

It is a sound, workable program. In the first place, in the application to these farms in this area it increased the income to the farm in each case. In the case of my own farm, 60 acres, based on the past 5 years' experience, it would increase our income by $1,000. I like that, but the other feature that I am sure will be satisfactory to those people in the city who are not interested paricularly in seeing the income of the farmers increased greatly is the fact that this program increases the number of acres under conservation on a sound workable basis. It will take out in excess of 50 million acres the first year; and as the gentleman from Iowa has indicated in his review of the program it provides a sound, workable conservation program for withdrawing tillable acres in the farming area, and this is mighty important to the cities and the people of this country.

The other features which I think are very sound and worthwhile are these: The cost to the taxpayers is at an absolute minimum because this is on a payment in kind basis from surplus and will take out of the surplus problem the cost of storing these surpluses.

FEDERAL HIGHWAY PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THORNBERRY). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARR] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BARR. Mr. Speaker, in 1956, this Congress passed legislation starting the United States of America on the greatest project in the history of this country and probably in the history of mankind. In 1956, the Federal Aid Highway Act was passed and this Nation started work on a $26 billion program of interstate highways. The sheer size and magnitude of this program is difficult for the average citizen to grasp. But by comparison when this program is really rolling, the effort involved in the total project could build the great pyramids of Egypt in an hour or so. It would suffice to dig the Panama Canal in 2 weeks. The St. Lawrence Seaway might perhaps be a job of only 1 week. It is very doubtful if this Nation has ever embarked on a project more significant to its future growth and development. When this great system is completed in approximately 1973, the whole face of the United States will be changed. Population patterns will have been radically altered. Industrial growth will have tended to move out along and close to those great systems of interstate communication.

In my opinion, this Interstate Highway System marks a real attempt by the United States to face up squarely to its problems. I often think that perhaps a visitor from Mars examining the legislation and debate in this Congress might think that we were legislating for an agricultural nation, a mining nation, an oil extraction nation, or a nation that lived by force of arms. In actual fact, the United States today is none of these. Every set of statistics, every reasonable view, will highlight the fact that the United States today is the greatest industrial nation the world has ever known. Agriculture, mining, oil extraction, all have their place in this Nation but they are minor and relatively unimportant compared with the industrial might of this country. So in this legislation, the Congress of the United States faced up to the fact that we do have an industrial, nation, and that industry is weak, ineffective, and cannot grow unless it is buttressed by efficient, cheap, and rapid transportation. The Congress looked this fact squarely in the face in 1956 and devised a program that would enable the United States to develop its industrial muscles and its real potentials for growth.

The 1956 act, wisely it seems to me, provided for a sound and reasonable plan of financing this great program. It created a Highway Trust Fund under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and dedicated to that trust fund the revenues from the gasoline and diesel fuel tax, 50 percent of the tax on trucks, buses, and trailers, the excise tax on tires and tubes, tread rubber, and motor vehicle use. In fiscal year 1958 these revenues dedicated to the trust fund amounted to approximately $2,026,116,000. The act also provided, and I think that this is a wise provision, that these roads should be built on a pay-as-you-go system. It stipulated that no apportionments to the States could be made unless estimated revenues to be placed in the fund would equal the estimated expenditures.

In 1958, the expenditures under the program were stepped up, and yet no additional revenues were diverted into the trust fund to cover this increased expenditure. The provisions of the Byrd amendment, or the pay-as-you-go principle, were merely suspended for that year. Secondly, the whole program was never in phase, to use the technical management term. The program was in balance over the approximate 13-year period of its completion program, but revenues are designed to come in more rapidly during the latter half of the program than in the beginning. Expenditures, on the other hand, maintain a fairly constant level during the 13-year period. And lastly, the original cost of the program has jumped enormously. As a result of all these three factors, the Highway Trust Fund today is, to all intents and purposes, broke. It has sufficient funds at hand to maintain its program temporarily, but if the situation stays as it is, there can be no apportionment of funds to States for this program during fiscal year 1961, and only $500 million for the fiscal year 1962. The $500 million for fiscal 1962 represents about one-fifth of the amount authorized in the 1956 and 1958 acts. It is plain to everyone that this great program—the greatest program the United States has ever undertaken—is in grave jeopardy.

There are three possible solutions to this financial dilemma. The President has recommended that we increase the gas tax from 3 cents to 4½ cents and also estimates that this will bring into the fund about an additional $1 billion a year. The main trouble with this program is that I doubt if this Congress is in any mood to levy additional taxes. Secondly, by moving again into the excise tax on gasoline, the administration is encroaching heavily on the rights of the States. The States have financed their portions of their share of the interstate program, their State roads and, in my State at least, their city and county roads are built largely by the revenues from the State gas tax. It seems to me that this is their field, and the United States of America has moved far enough in that direction. The States, the cities, the counties, have fantastic road building problems of their own, and I firmly believe that the United States has left them little enough room to maneuver in the solution of their financial problems. I frankly cannot see how any man or any administration could advocate States' rights and yet make it increasingly difficult for the States to solve their own financial problems.

The second alternative is to suspend again the provisions of the pay-as-you-go plan. This would involve more bookkeeping sleight of hand but would certainly not solve the ultimate financial problem of the highway program. In my opinion it would simply mean that this Nation has refused to face up to the facts that we have an expensive, but vitally important program on our hands, and we might as well get down to the task of financing it properly.

There is a third alternative, and I have attempted to set it forth in the bill I introduced on Thursday, H.R. 6553. I mentioned above that the excise taxes on gasoline, tires and tubes, tread rubber, motor vehicle use, and 50 percent of the excise tax on trucks, buses, and trailers, is dedicated to the trust fund. In 1956 this amounted to roughly $2 billion. But there are other excise taxes directly connected with highway use which were not dedicated to the trust fund, but are used in the general fund to defray the ordinary expenses of government. These include the excise tax on passenger automobiles which in 1958 amounted to $1,170 million; the other 50 percent tax on trucks, buses, and trailers, which in 1958 amounted to $110 million, and the excise tax on parts and accessories, which amounted to $166 million. The total revenues from these three taxes, amounting to $1,447,229,000 in fiscal year 1958, went into the general fund, not into this highway program. My bill, H.R. 6553, dedicates these funds to the Highway Trust Fund. These excise taxes on automobiles, trucks, buses, and trailers, parts and accessories, are a wartime holdover. They are not very popular at all in my congressional district, which comprises metropolitan Indianapolis, Indiana. In that district, the manufacture of various components for automobiles is by far the largest employer and the largest income producer. These excise taxes have been a source of irritation for many years, and they are certainly not gaining in popularity. It is my honest opinion that these taxes should be dropped or should be dedicated to a program that will at least increase their selling market.

In 1961 the Bureau of Public Roads is due to come back before this Congress with a report on costs and benefits of this whole program. At that time the Congress of the United States can make an accurate appraisal of what the program will cost, how it should be financed, and what the benefits will be. In the interim, I strongly recommend that the proposal I have outlined in H.R. 6553 be used to keep the trust fund solvent. There is no reason to make it harder on the States by increasing the gas tax; there is no reason to abandon the pay-as-you-go principle; and if this bill constitutes budget busting, I would suggest that the Congress take a close look at the programs on which we are currently embarked, which, in my opinion, are of far less importance to the growth and the development of this Nation. In closing I might add that if we do neglect the transportation facilities of this Nation, a lot of the arguments I hear in this Congress about defense expenditures, the farm program, and mutual security will be purely academic. If we hamstring our industrial might by neglecting our transportation sinews, the money simply will not be there for some of these auxiliary programs.

REPORT ON BERLIN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I had occasion to stand in this well and to address the Members of this House for a few moments on the subject of the Berlin crisis and our need to back up the policy of firmness enunciated by the President of the United States and already subscribed to by the leaders of this House and of the other body. Since that time, as a member of the House Armed Services Committee, I have had a chance to travel to Berlin and also to our positions in Western Germany and in Western Europe. And I may say that as a result of that visit, I have come back not only still firmly behind the policy enunciated by the President, but even more solidly convinced that we must adhere to that policy in spite of any wavering or hesitation on the part of any of our allies as we now move into the foreign ministers' conference and the summit conference that lie ahead.

Mr. Speaker, the group that went to Berlin representing the House Armed Services Committee during the Easter recess was comprised of Members on both sides of the aisle, and I certainly would hesitate to speak for anyone except myself in drawing conclusions from that visit. But I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps my own conclusions as an individual member of the committee may be of some interest to the other Members of this body, and for that reason I am taking the liberty of passing them on at this time.

Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, our committee visited not only West Berlin and spent some time in East Berlin, but also had the opportunity to visit SHAPE Headquarters in Paris and to confer at some length with General Norstad, certainly one of our outstanding officers in Europe. We also visited U.S. Army Headquarters in West Germany as well as visiting positions in the field and watching American, as well as German, troops run through infantry and armored maneuvers.

On the basis of this experience, I came back with these conclusions.

First. First of all, our ground troops are doing an effective and important job in Europe. Some question was raised in the minds of some people some weeks ago when the President at a news conference responded to a casual question by saying that he saw no point in sending more troops to Europe since we did not intend to fight a ground war in Europe. I felt at the time that that remark was unfortunate, because, while I was sure that it did not reflect the true feelings of the President of the United States, it did raise a question as to whether the whole NATO structure was serving any legitimate and useful military purpose. I came back from Europe convinced that our ground forces are indeed performing a highly useful function there. As the so-called shield of the NATO structure it is their job to prevent Soviet ground forces from overrunning our friends in Western Europe long enough to make it posible for us to bring our superior atomic power, the so-called sword of the NATO structure, into play.

Second. I also came away convinced too that our troops are highly trained, well led, and combat ready for anything that the Soviets might throw against them in Europe. I think all of us were impressed with the quality of the training program and with the high degree of morale and efficiency that we saw demonstrated. Certainly these troops are not likely to be taken by surprise.

Third. At the same time, I was disturbed, as I think other members of the committee were disturbed, to learn that as a result of some of the cuts in the defense budget already under way and contemplated that it has been necessary for our ground forces in Western Germany to reduce to some extent both the training maneuvers which these troops go through and also their essential practice alerts. There is certainly no justification for having any ground troops in Europe unless these troops are combat ready, are trained with every type of maneuver which our military leaders believe is necessary, and unless they are fully practiced in the alerts that may be needed to move into action at any moment. It is false economy of the worst sort for us to sacrifice and skimp in terms of training maneuvers and alerts, because in so doing we run the risk of throwing away our whole investment in troops on the European Continent. I would seriously recommend to this House that action be taken at once that will insure that the full schedule of maneuvers and alerts be carried out in fiscal 1960 by the five American divisions now stationed in Western Germany.

Fourth. Our five divisions are all committed along the line on the Iron Curtain in the southern portion of Western Germany, which is the portion protected by the United States. While these divisions, as I say, are well trained and are ready to hold their positions in the event of an attempted Communist breakthrough, I feel strongly that we need at least one more American division in reserve, and possibly two, in order to make it possible for these five divisions to execute their mission in the event that they are called upon to do so. No sensible ground commander would ever go into operation with every one of his troops committed on the line. It is important, in my judgment, if our military power in Europe is to continue to serve as a deterrent to Soviet aggression, as I believe it should be used, that we make it clear to the Soviets that we are in fact fully ready and prepared to carry out our mission. We can't expect to do this, if the Russians know clearly that we lack some of the reserve forces which we ought to have. Even at this the American troops in Western Germany would be far outnumbered by the 20 to 25 Soviet divisions already located just on the other side of the Iron Curtain, and even the 21 divisions now available to NATO would continue to be greatly outnumbered by the more than 150 Soviet divisions located on the European continent. Nevertheless, I feel that the addition of this one reserve division is necessary, and I recommend it to this House and to the Department of Defense.

Fifth. While our troops are well trained and I believe combat ready, I also came back convinced, and I am sure that other members of the committee came away convinced, that our troops could use more equipment and to some extent better equipment, particularly with respect to tanks and the equipment required for an armored division. Once again, it is false economy to skimp in the one area in the world where Army troops are most likely to be employed in the event of any all-out conflict with the Soviet Union.

Sixth. The two battle groups located within West Berlin represent some of the finest and best trained troops that I have seen in the U.S. Army. They, too, are well led and their spirit is the highest. In fact, in terms of morale and in terms of training they represent some of the finest ambassadors that this country has abroad.

Seventh. I was extremely impressed with the American commander in Berlin, who functions both as a military and diplomatic representative, Maj. Gen. Barksdale Hamlett. I have already recommended to the Department of Defense that General Hamlett, who has been a most able and outspoken exponent of the American position of firmness, be retained in Berlin until the present crisis has been resolved. General Hamlett, we discovered in Berlin, was originally slated for normal rotation from this command in June or July of this year, a period that may well represent the height of the Berlin crisis. I am happy indeed to be able to report to this House that, as a result of my recommendation, I have now been advised by the Department of the Army that General Hamlett, with the approval of the State Department, will be retained in Berlin in his present position until the crisis has passed. I am happy indeed that the Department of State and the Department of the Army agree with me that his removal, even on a routine rotational basis, at that particular time could be misinterpreted by our allies as well as by the Soviets as a fundamental change in our policy of firmness.

Eighth. Many of us went to Berlin particularly concerned about the position of the American dependent personnel in Berlin and also in West Germany. We wondered whether in the interest of safety these women and children ought not to be evacuated from Berlin at this time so as not to jeopardize their safety in the event that a serious crisis developed on May 27 or sometime thereafter. Frankly, I came back convinced that these people should not be evacuated from Berlin except as a last-ditch emergency measure. The fact is that the women and children of our military personnel in Berlin are enthusiastic about their position on this frontier outpost of democracy and have no desire to be returned to positions of greater safety. Indeed, the fact that American dependent personnel are remaining calmly in Berlin is one of the great sources of morale for the German people. Any indication that we were removing our dependent personnel, on the other hand, would be the tipoff to the Germans that we had decided that Berlin could not be defended. Such action could, of course, have a very destructive effect on the people of Berlin and might completely jeopardize our own position. There is a good deal of the frontier spirit not only in the troops, but in the dependent personnel themselves in Berlin, and I believe that, unless and until there is the indication of some serious immediate emergency, we ought to continue to maintain the status quo over there, including our dependent personnel, confident that our policy of firmness will weather any crisis that lies ahead.

Ninth. Finally, with respect to the crisis of Berlin itself and the policy that we are following there. There is much less anxiety in Berlin about the Berlin crisis than there is here in Washington. This is largely due to the fact that the German people have been living directly under the Russian gun for so long they have gotten used to the tension. They are carrying on in the present crisis not only because of that experience, but also because they are convinced that the Americans are behind them and that we mean business in facing up to the Soviet ultimatum. I learned that there was some earlier agitation in Berlin immediately after the announcement of the Soviet deadline, especially when for a time there was some general discussion in this country of recognizing the East German Government as the agents of the Soviet Union. But once the President announced in his television address of March 15 that we intended to stand firm the Berlin people took him at his word; and it would be hard for anyone today in Berlin to realize that the city was really living under any time deadline or indeed was located as it is 110 miles inside the Iron Curtain.

This fact alone is clear indication of the validity and indeed the effectiveness of the American policy of firmness in Berlin, a policy that has already begun to get results. The May 27 deadline has already been postponed indefinitely. Frankly, I don't believe the Russians expected that there would be any such outpouring of sentiment as came from this country in response to their deadline, and I think they have been frankly surprised at the recognition on the part of this country of the importance of Berlin to our overall position in Europe. The same policy of firmness already seems to have accomplished results in connection with flights into the Berlin air fields through the air corridors. The first Soviet reaction to the first flight over 10,000 feet was typical. They said that they could not be held accountable for any consequences that might take place as a result of these flights. When we protested this action, when we failed to be alarmed, and when we continued to fly in at greater heights the Soviet action changed and became more moderate and temperate.

I came back convinced that our position in Berlin is the key to our whole allied position in Western Europe. If we were ever to let Berlin go, we would lose, in my judgment, Western Germany, and in losing Western Germany would lose our whole position on the Continent of Europe. This is not because Berlin is vital from a strategic or military standpoint. Quite the opposite. But our position in Berlin and our insistence on our rights there hold the key to the respect in which we are held by the people of Europe. And if we can be talked out of that position, or can be frightened out of it, then I am afraid we would soon find that there was little support for any U.S. position on the Continent after that event took place.

There have been in recent weeks growing demands for some sort of negotiation in the Berlin situation. We are told, for example, that it is necessary that we make some concessions to the Soviets in order to insure our access to Berlin, that it is not proper, for example, for us to continue to rely on our position as one of the conquerors of the Germans for our continued position in that capital city. In my judgment, it would be a mistake for us to make any concessions to the Soviet Union merely to be allowed to retain the same access to Berlin that we already have. What possible assurance could we have from the Soviets, even if we made concessions, that they would pay and more attention to that agreement when the time suited them than they appear to be paying to the agreement and the understandings under which we are in Berlin at the present time? In my judgment it would be a mistake to enter into any negotiations specifically over Berlin at the forthcoming meeting of the foreign ministers or the summit conference, as some of our allies and local columnists have suggested. The Berlin situation can be solved only as a part of some broader settlement of the future of Germany itself. If we can ever reach some final solution on unifying the country—and I am none too optimistic about it—then there might suitably be some reason to review the status of the capital of that country. But any negotiation with regard to Berlin itself would be not only a mistake but a disaster.

Some people seem to be disturbed by the fact that the present situation in Berlin is a rather anomalous one, not neat and simple and all wrapped up. The area of West Berlin is tied in economically and emotionally with the area of West Germany some 110 miles to the west. And yet as Mayor Willy Brandt pointed out to our group during a productive and fruitful 1 hour session, there have been anomalous political situations before. Pakistan, for example, has long been divided into two sections, and yet the country continues to live. While the Berlin situation is not perfect, it is something that could well be lived with on an indefinite and a continuing basis. In fact, Mayor Brandt himself typifies the confidence of the Berlin people in their ability to live with it. He told us something of the amazing economic growth of the city. He pointed out that even the threat of the Soviet blockade has not to any great extent impeded this growth. He told us that the Berlin people were prepared to withstand a Soviet blockade for something up to 6 months, and he also recognized that if the Soviets ever attempted to starve out the people of West Berlin this would prove to be a major propaganda defeat for them in many countries of both Europe and Asia.

What we are undergoing in Berlin now is, in my judgment, just another phase of the long-range pressure which the Soviet Union intends to keep placing on us in various parts of the world in an attempt to break down our own position. What we are facing is another aspect of the long-term struggle between the free world and the Soviet world. It is our job to learn to live with these pressures and tensions without cracking and without seeking some sort of easy, simple, and apparently satisfactory solution. As one high American officer told me, "We Americans are too inclined these days to believe in fairy tales. We are too inclined to look for the easy, simple solution which will resolve all our difficulties and allow us to live happily ever after. But in the real world, especially in the face of Communist threats, people just don't live happily ever after. The pressures and the tensions continue, and it is a mistake for us even to try to find some easy, simple solution that will presumably allow us to live happily ever after in Berlin. We're following a will of the wisp. We must learn to live under Soviet pressures and Soviet tensions without cracking. Only in that way can we continue to stand up against the long-range pressures directed against us. Berlin is an important testing ground."

Mr. Speaker, I came back from Berlin proud that our American policy of firmness has won us such support and confidence from the people of Berlin. Indeed, one is almost overwhelmed by the confidence that has been placed in us by the people of Berlin. I hope we are as good as they expect us to be. I was proud, too, to be a Member of a Congress whose leadership has gone along with the President of the United States in backing up this policy of firmness and in recognizing that in carrying out our responsibilities overseas there can be no narrow partisan considerations. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that in the forthcoming foreign ministers' talks, for which our new Secretary of State is leaving Washington just this afternoon, and in the forthcoming summit meeting too, that our diplomatic representatives will continue to hold strongly to this policy of firmness and will continue to live up to the position of strength which has won us such recognition abroad.

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned this afternoon my view that our position in Europe ought to be reinforced by at least one, perhaps two infantry divisions in strategic reserve in order to be fully prepared for anything that might develop. I made a similar statement shortly after returning from Berlin earlier this month. I was surprised and also a little proud, Mr. Speaker, to discover the other day that as a result of this statement of mine that I have been singled out for personal attack by the Soviet propaganda machinery. I consider such an attack a badge of honor. On April 12, the Soviet propaganda radio had this to say, and I quote:

> Not a single day passes without one of the political or military leaders of the United States coming out with a warmongering and bellicose speech. A striking example can be found in the speech of Democratic Congressman SAMUEL D. STRATTON—

They even got my middle initial mixed up, Mr. Speaker.

> He demanded that the Berlin issue be settled by force of arms and suggested that several infantry divisions should be sent to Berlin.

That is the end of the Soviet propaganda broadcast attacking me. This, of course, is a complete distortion, like all Soviet propaganda. I did indeed call for one or two divisions, but I made it clear that these divisions were intended to hold our position on the line in Western Germany so that the Soviets wouldn't be tempted to attack us. But the fact that the Soviets are making such attacks on those who stand by the policy of firmness is, in my judgment, the clearest indication that this policy is getting under their skin and has indeed already disrupted the plans that they had for making political capital out of Berlin.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one more suggestion. We must not only stand firm. We must make a few moves of our own. Berlin is an important symbol, in my judgment, of the free way of life. The contrast between West Berlin and East Berlin is so enormous as to be, in my judgment, one of the real reasons behind the Russian action. Our position in Berlin is not only a military position but a psychological position. I have already indicated that the existence of our dependent personnel in this outpost has also important psychological implications. I think that we need at this important time to do something even more dramatic to demonstrate our interest in Berlin and the importance which we place on this great city as a favored bastion of freedom on the continent of Europe.

On May 15 we celebrate Armed Forces Day, in Berlin as in this country, and we pay tribute to the job which our Armed Forces are doing in maintaining the peace around the world against the Communist menace. Not long ago the Soviet dictator, Mr. Khrushchev, made a speech in East Berlin, and during our stay in Berlin our group visited the spot where he made that speech. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest here and now, to underline the importance which we in America place on the role of Berlin, that we urge the President of the United States to fly to Berlin on Armed Forces Day, May 15, and by his presence in Berlin make it clear not only to the people of Berlin but to the world that we intend to stand by our commitments in Europe no matter what may come. I think such action by the President would electrify the free world.

Mr. Speaker, I am grateful that as a member of this great body that I had the opportunity to see something of the progress of our Armed Forces and our national position in one critical part of the globe. I hope that these few observations may be of some service to the members of this Congress in carrying out their responsibility for the security and the future of this Nation of ours.

THE J. P. MORGAN-GUARANTY TRUST MERGER COMBINES TWO FINANCIAL EMPIRES WITH VAST INFLUENCE IN AMERICAN BUSINESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the news that the Federal Reserve Board has approved the proposed merger of two of the biggest Wall Street banks comes as an unbelievable shock. What could the Federal Reserve Board be thinking of? Has it lost all sense of proportion and all sense of duty to try to preserve independent banking?

The Department of Justice can still bring the antitrust laws under its jurisdiction into action against this merger, so let us hope that the Attorney General of the United States will not have his judgment warped by this incomprehensible action of the Federal Reserve Board.

The combination of these two giant banks will not, we are told, make the biggest bank in the country. Three banks will still have more resources than the astronomical $4 billion which the merged banks will have. So what? Are all bank mergers to be approved which fall short of creating a new record for mass in assets?

The fact is that the smaller of these two banks—the J. P. Morgan Co.—already bigger than any of 13,464 other commercial banks in this country. It is bigger than any of 99.8 percent of all the commercial banks in the country. The combined deposits of these two banks will equal the combined deposits of at least 3,000 smaller insured commercial banks.

So what is the reason for this merger? Are these two banks too small to stand on their own feet? Are they too small to be efficient? Is there now going to be more competition in the banking business, and will the smaller business firms of the country needing bank financing have greater access to bank credit?

The point is that in centering our attention merely on the amount of money which is to be combined by this merger, we overlook the real significance of the merger What is happening here is not merely that a great percentage of the banking resources of the country are going to be combined and brought under a single control, but that two financial empires are going to be combined. The influence of both of these banks—the Guaranty Trust Co. and the J. P. Morgan Co.—over the business affairs of this country has its hold not in the amount of deposits on financial resources which these banks have, but in their vast interlocking connections and their intimate influence in the affairs of other financial institutions and in the affairs of the giant industrial, commercial, transportation and public utilities empires.

BOARDS OF DIRECTORS INTERLOCKED IN VAST NETWORK WITH TOP INDUSTRIAL AND FINANCIAL COMPANIES

During the 84th Congress the House Small Business Committee, of which I am chairman, made an extensive investigation into the inability of small-business firms in this country to obtain necessary financing. The committee had occasion to make a report which sets out the very extensive interlocking connections between the directors and officials of the top financial insitutions of this country and all of the lesser financial institutions, as well as the interlocking relationships between these top financial centers and the larger manufacturing, distribution, transportation and utility companies. The committee report is titled "Interlocking Directors and Officials of 135 Large Financial Companies of the United States."

In order that the members may have a better idea of what is involved in the merging of these two financial giants, I would like to call attention to some of the information set out in the committee's report. This information was developed as of late 1956. There may have been a few changes in individual directors and officers since that time, but I think we will find that there have been no substantial changes in the ties between these banks and the other financial and nonfinancial corporations. In the following table the directors and officers of each of these banks are listed, along with their official positions in other large financial and nonfinancial corporations. The information is grouped according to the types of businesses with which these banks are interlocked. For example, there comes, first, interlocks with other major commercial banks and bank holding companies. Such Guaranty Trust interlocks with such companies are listed, and immediately thereafter similar interlocks for J. P. Morgan & Co. are listed.

SMALLER FIRMS EXPECTED TO HAVE LESS CHANCE OF OBTAINING FINANCING

Let me illustrate. Under interlocks with major insurance companies, we find that various directors and officials of Guaranty Trust Co. are also directors of Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., Prudential Insurance Company of America, Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, Northern Insurance Company of New York, not to mention several other large insurance companies.

On the other hand, directors and officials of the J. P. Morgan & Co. are also directors of the New York Life Insurance Co., the Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co., Indemnity Insurance Company of North America, not to mention quite a few other large insurance companies.

Thus far we find directors of commercial banks in positions of making the loan policies of insurance companies and vice versa. Can we assume that when applicants for commercial bank credit come to Guaranty Trust Co., the insurance officials will recommend approval of credit to a competitor of a corporation in which the insurance company has a large investment? Obviously not.

Can we reasonably imagine that when an applicant for a long-term loan comes to one of these insurance companies, the bank directors on these insurance boards will vote to approve a loan to finance some company that will compete with any important customer of the bank? I think not.

So what will happen now, when a combined bank will be pursuing a combined policy and its directors will help to make loan policies of not just the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., but the New York Life Insurance Co. as well? The answer is that the smaller industrial and utility companies will stand even less chance of obtaining either insurance loans or bank credit than they now have.

To illustrate another aspect of this problem which will arise, we might consider the interlocking connections under the heading "Major Mining, Prime Metal and Metal Fabricating Companies." Here we may find that the president of Guaranty Trust Co. was a director of American Smelting & Refining Co. Another director of Guaranty Trust, in fact the chairman of its board, was the director of the Anaconda Co. Still another director of Guaranty Trust was a director of American Brass Co.

Then look at J. P. Morgan Co.'s connections in the copper and brass field. One of its directors was already a director of American Smelting & Refining Co., as was a director of Guaranty Trust. But now there comes into the picture two other top copper companies, Kennecott Copper Co., and Phelps Dodge Corp.

The interlocking connection between these banks and all of the major financial industrial and utility companies are shown in the following table.

JAPANESE TEXTILE IMPORTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, America has just been the recipient of another announcement from the Japanese Government, as to the Japanese quota of textile exports into the United States for 1959 and 1960. Like a God upon a mountain they have thundered down at a sickly State Department, which controls an even weaker Commerce Department, that their quota for the next 2 years will only slightly exceed the voluntary quota of last year, which they have imposed upon themselves as a result of negotiations by our impotent State Department. There will be the usual beating of the chest of those in the State Department, or other high places, who will claim to have engineered a very favorable agreement. They will give lip service to the terrible hypocrisy which proclaims that the State Department of these United States is trying to protect the textile industry, while surrendering the might and power and ability of these United States to a foreign government, which, of itself, declares what shall come into the United States.

Remember my friends who are being sold down the river, and I am speaking of the American people, and particularly the taxpayers of the textile industry, that this is not a quota set by your Government of the United States. This is a quota set by a government of a foreign country, a country dictating to our country as to the quota it will put into the channels of trade, or export to the United States, in order to soften the market of these United States, threaten the textile industry, and cut down on the value of our textile goods, made with good, honest American labor.

When are we going to wake up? When are we going to wake up to the fact that anytime we encourage the manufacture of goods outside of these United States for import into these United States, we are selling the American labor, as well as American capital, short? When are we going to wake up to the fact that we cannot expect any respect from any foreign government to whom we yield in any manner or means whatsoever? I do not mean negotiate. I mean yield and surrender. For that is what has happened insofar as our textile situation is concerned.

True it is that the amount of the quota for the next 2 years does not substantially increase over the adjusted quota for 1958, but true it is also, that we are being dictated to by a foreign government.

Let us look at the textile situation realistically. Japan is able to set its own quota. Our Government, because of the policies set by the State Department which gives more allegiance to foreign governments than it does to the people of these United States—we are paying the salaries of those overpaid bureaucrats—has failed to do anything for the textile people. They say we have to have trade; do they consider the textiles expendable? The administration is impotent, and its treatment and handling of the textile situation not only reveals its helplessness, but shows a lack of loyalty to the American people who have been paying the taxes. The administration forgets that American lives are at stake, that American livelihoods are the responsibility of the administration in power.

What have they done to protect this segment of American industry? The quota from Japan is not, of itself, going to upset the market, although it will make those who invest in the textiles worry about whether or not their production will find ready consumption. The textile manufacturing plants today probably have as many orders as they have ever had, perhaps more: they may have orders they cannot fill. What is going to happen if they have orders which are delayed, are filled by textiles from Red China, from India, from Indonesia, or other parts of the world? What is going to happen if those people take our American market?

What will our people work at, these fine Americans who have given their best in honest toil in the textile industry? This is the only skill they know. They have labored, and, yes, they have paid taxes, taxes and more taxes, expecting and deserving some guidance, some leadership, some protection, and some security from their Government.

The rayon and silk people might well awaken to the facts of life. Japanese exports to the United States of certain rayon acetate and silk fabrics, increased substantially in 1957 and 1958, according to reports published by the Japanese Institute of Textile Trade Research and Statistics. The total rayon, acetate and silk fabrics exported from Japan to the United States rose from 30.2 million square yards in 1956 to 47.2 million in 1957, and 64.9 million in 1958. An overall gain 1956 to 1958 of 115 percent.

Twenty-seven million six hundred thousand square yards of silk fabrics were exported to the United States from Japan in 1956, 41.7 million in 1957 and 47.9 million in 1958, an increase over the 3-year span of 74 percent.

We were speaking of ginghams a moment ago. Ginghams export from Japan to the United States jumped 15-fold between 1956 and 1959. Less than 1 million yards were exported in 1956, but in 1958 over 13 million yards were exported to the United States.

Now remember, I am talking about the Japanese. I am not talking about the exports from other countries, not only those which we have experienced, but those which we may expect in the future.

Now, somebody is going to tell you that the textile manufacturers are happy about this situation. That is not true. They are in a terrible situation. They are trusting an administration which has sold them short. But, unfortunately, they are in the position of having to play along for fear of getting something worse. Is that not a terrible way to think about your Government? Is that not a horrifying picture of the American scene today, that a great industry, whose people have not only contributed their lives and their dollars to make America great, their skill and their work, but whose sons and daughters have gone forth on the battlefields to preserve freedom? A great industry, wondering and shaking their heads at what may happen next month or next year, and scared that a Government which has indicated, so far as they are concerned, the characteristics of Judas Iscariot, and, including the kiss on the cheek, may sell them down the river worse next year.

My purpose is not to talk about the Japanese situation alone. My purpose is to seek to awaken the administration into looking at this textile industry and shouldering its responsibility to the people employed in that industry, for, ultimately, they are going to be the sufferers. We must consider China now. Let me quote to you from the March issue of the International Cotton Advisory Committee at Washington:

> As indicated in table 6, exports of cotton fabrics from Communist China increased from 2,000 metric tons in 1954 to 40,000 metric tons in 1957, but there was no further increase in 1958. Most of the exports were to Hong Kong, Indonesia, Malaya, and Singapore and to other Southeast Asian countries.

We have pointed out before in this House that anything going through the port of Hong Kong can come to this country without quota.

Let me quote further from the International Cotton and Advisory Committee:

A regional analysis of the balance of trade in cotton fabrics indicates that the center of the cotton textile industry has been shifting away from Western Europe and the United States toward Asia. Figure I shows that exports and imports are nearly in balance for the continents of North and South America, whereas net exports from Western Europe are rapidly declining. In contrast, Asia and the Communist bloc (China) are becoming increasingly important as net exporters of cotton fabrics whereas Africa continues to be the largest importer. Also, if we examine the situation with respect to individual countries, we find that many of the less developed countries are moving rapidly in the direction of self-sufficiency in cotton fabrics.

What is your Government doing about it? We hasten to the aid of everybody else. We waste billions on foreign governments. We support dictators. We know that there is plenty of fat in the military. What about our textiles? If the center of cotton textile industry is shifting toward Asia, what are we going to do about it? What is our Government going to do about it? What are the textile people going to demand? I am not fooled a bit by the propaganda of the bureaucracy here. I know that in the cold war the American people have not been told the truth about the economic possibility. Textile people know that the goods that are produced in Red China have good quality. They are made with good machines. They are made with slave labor, and, as a result, can be sold in what were our former foreign markets at 2 to 5 cents per unit cheaper than we can sell. Red Chinese are successful in marketing their goods. Let us examine the techniques used by China in achieving this success:

(a) Offering textiles of a comparable quality at a cut price.

(b) Flexible and favorable terms of supply including a falling clause in their contracts.

(c) Offer of both short-term and long-term credits to finance exports.

(d) Use of the influential business community of Chinese origin residing in Southeast Asia.

The Governments of Thailand and Malaya impost restrictions. Can some of our people not go to those people and ask them what the impact is and what the effect is. In the United Kingdom they have restrictions. Our only restriction, so far as I can determine, is a voluntary Japanese quota.

It does not make sense. It is not sensible. It is not American.

There is not going to be any use to run and close the barn door after the horses escaped. That is the State Department's plan now, if they have any plan.

I call upon the American people to demand some action now.

Where are these people who work in the textile mills going to find employment if our textile situation softens?

We already have more unemployment than we should have. We already have an economic policy, if it is a policy, by this administration, which is a stagnant, nonprogressive, economic policy. We have too much unemployment, and I feel we are going to have more.

I am talking today for the people I represent. Thousands of them work in the textile plants, and giving honorable labor every day. Thousands of them have the taxes taken out of their wages each week. Thousands of them expect something from their Government, and they have a right to. What are we going to do about it, Mr. President? They are not rich enough to play golf and clip coupons; they are dependent upon their jobs for a living. What are we going to do about them? I am asking the questions now.

What markets do American textiles have now?

Through the sinister manipulations of our State Department, and our Commerce Department, we have gradually lost our markets on the European continent—we have no appreciable markets in Central and South America. We have no market of any consequence in the British Isles. The Japanese and the Red Chinese have taken our markets in Southeast Asia. Where are our markets? If we face up to the truth of this situation, Canada is our only remaining substantial market outside of these United States. And, if you examine the record, find out just how much Japan is exporting to Canada. Talk with some of the gingham people if you want to know the facts of life. Ask them what happened to the ginghams in New England. I know what happened to one of the ginghams in my district. It was sold down the river and when the officers of the corporation came up to the Capitol of the United States, and we tried to tell the bureaucratic authorities whose allegiance is greater to foreign governments than to these people, that we had 250 people who would be put out of work, and investments of thousands of dollars that would lay idle, that an entire community would be effected, what could they do for us? They could not do one solitary thing. They did not do one solitary thing, they were not even sympathetic.

We found our authorities hopelessly helpless. That mill is closed now—yes, closed. It could not pay American labor its deserved salary and compete with low-wage Japanese goods.

What are our goals? What does this Government plan for textiles, a year from now, 2 years? What long range ideas or programs may we expect? Are textiles really expendable?

Let me quote from a recent editorial entitled "Why Import Unemployment?—Mythical High Tariffs Fail To Stem Flood of Foreign Imports":

Over the years, free trade propagandists have skillfully built up and maintained the myth of high U.S. tariff walls.

In actual fact, U.S. tariffs are among the lowest in the world.

Since 1934, American tariffs have been reduced some 75 percent.

More than half of our imports are admitted duty free.

In 1958, our average tariff on all imports was about 5 percent. By way of contrast, it was about 30 percent in the United Kingdom; in France, about 25 percent; Switzerland, 10 percent; Canada, 9 percent; and West Germany, about 7 percent.

Among the 36 leading trading nations of the free world, 28 have higher average tariff rates than the United States.

Certainly, our mythical high tariff walls have not prevented a flood of foreign-made chemicals from entering the United States. More than 250 different intermediates and 100 types of naphthols, fast color bases, and salts are being imported into the country.

More and more frequently, items on the chambers' works-production forecasts are appearing in ship cargoes at U.S. ports of entry and include such well-known intermediates as H acid, Chicago acid, J acid, gamma acid, anthranilic acid, benzidine, the chlor anilines, 1–2–4 acid, BON, metanilic acid, para-nitro-toluene, MPD, ortho and para toluidines.

In addition, about 1,200 types of dyes are being imported into our market with a domestic market value of 12 to 14 million.

The high U.S. tariff walls, if ever they existed have long since crumbled and, under our misguided tariff policy, are fast on their way to complete extinction.

I am not just worried, Mr. Speaker, I am alarmed. Tomorrow will be too late. We need productive policies, productive programs, and plans now. To have such are the duty—the obligation—of the Government.

We cannot afford to sleep. I am reminded of the saying of a banker, that banks usually go broke in good times, because banks become enthused at the possibilities of making great moneys. I think our textile situation is similar. We become enthused in these times when we have good orders, but yet there is going to come a time, if we are not careful, when we not only will not have orders for our goods, but we will not have work for our laborers, and we will not have any consumption for the product of our capital. We need to start a program now to preserve our textile industry, help it with markets, and insure its productivity in the future.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I am glad to yield to my colleague from South Carolina.

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I should like to compliment my distinguished colleague on bringing to the attention of our colleagues here this pressing problem. It is going to affect every industry in this country unless this Congress wakes up and gives some measure of protection to the basic, fundamental, essential industries of this country.

Again I thank the gentleman for his timely and forthright statement.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

REHABILITATION SERVICES OF THE DAV

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, as a DAV member, an unusual record of unselfish service for handicapped war veterans, and their dependents, has recently come to my attention. It concerns the personalized rehabilitation service activities of the Disabled American Veterans.

Formed in 1920, the DAV was granted a congressional charter in 1932, which, as amended in 1942, extends membership eligibility to any American citizen, who has been either wounded, gassed, injured, or disabled by reason of active service in the Armed Forces of the United States, or of some country allied with it, during time of war. Composed exclusively of America's disabled defenders, the DAV specializes in service to, for, and by disabled war veterans.

Although all of the some 2 million war veterans who are receiving disability compensation from the U.S. Veterans' Administration have substantially benefited by reason of DAV legislative and rehabilitation activities, less than 10 percent of them are dues-paying DAV members—all of whom receive the Disabled American Veterans Monthly, which keeps them informed as to all developments which may affect their future. Detailed annual reports, by the DAV to the U.S. Congress, are printed as House documents by the U.S. Government Printing Office.

At its national convention in Louisville, Ky., in June 1941, the DAV formally decided that its contribution to the Nation's national emergency defense effort would be to see to it that all ex-service men and women should have the benefit of expert advice and assistance of trained national service officers in the proper preparation, presentation, and prosecution of their respective claims, with the Veterans' Administration, and other governmental agencies, for service connection of their disabilities, disability compensation, hospitalization, medical treatment, prosthetic appliances, vocational training, and finally selective placement into self-sustaining suitable jobs, utilizing their remaining abilities.

Far too many World War I disabled veterans, who failed in time to get the benefit of such expert advice, had suffered the disillusionment of being unable, technically, to prove their legal entitlement to the benefits to which they considered themselves equitably entitled—because of their inability to procure detailed, specific, fact-giving affidavit evidence positively to prove their claims.

SERVICE ACCOMPLISHMENTS

That the DAV has been faithful to its self-assumed policy of extending such much needed services to disabled veterans following World War II and the Korean conflict is indicated by a résumé of some of the many individualized rehabilitation services extended by its nationwide staff of full-time national service officers during a recent 10-year period, as follows:

Claim folders reviewed	3,453,604
Rating Board appearances	1,382,863
Favorable awards obtained	537,367
Service connections obtained	99,054
Increased compensation obtained	$225,493

Monetary benefits thereby obtained totaled $179,083,769.66. Infinitely more could have been accomplished by the DAV if it had been enabled financially to maintain a larger staff of trained national service officers—gradually reduced in number from more than 300 in 1947 to about 140 at the present time. Nevertheless, during the same 10-year period, the DAV expended $12,197,600 in the maintenance of such special advocates. This sum does not include administrative expenses at its national headquarters, nor the cost of its national publication.

DAV COSTS IN EXTENDING SERVICE

Measured by such overall costs, the DAV has expended about $3.50 for each claim folder reviewed on behalf of a claimant, or, measured another way, about $8.80 for each appearance before a rating agency, or, again, about $22.70 for each favorable award obtained, or about $123 for each service connection obtained, or about $54 for each compensation increase obtained. For each rehabilitation service dollar expended by the DAV, about $14.10 of direct moneclaimants, not counting the fact that such benefits will generally continue for many years.

To estimate the DAV's cost of extending needed service to distressed disabled veterans involves differing circumstances—proving entitlement to service connection, an increased disability rating, medical treatment, prosthetic appliances, vocational training, and other benefits. Advising and assisting individual claimants requires time, ranging from a few minutes up to many hours. Most claimants have no conception of the time that their attorneys-in-fact must expend in carefully studying the evidence in official claims folders, in preparing briefs, in making presentation to claims and rating boards, and so forth.

Thousands of claimants have been given pertinent, helpful advice, not measurable or recorded in the monthly reports required to be submitted by each national service officer to the National Director of Claims, Cicero F. Hogan, and his able Assistant Director, Chester A. Cash, located at the DAV National Service Headquarters, 1701 18th Street NW., Washington 9, D.C.

These statistics fail to reveal the humanitarian dividends thereby obtained for the scores of thousands of distressed disabled veterans, and their dependents, who have been thereby directly benefited—for the rest of their lives.

Most of these service-disabled veterans have probably assumed that the DAV has been getting some kind of financial help from the Federal Government, although no Federal money has ever been appropriated to the DAV.

It is true, however, that, because the Veterans' Administration has long realized the value of such personalized services, it has, throughout the years, been furnishing office space for all DAV national service officers, in its 63 regional and district offices, and its central office in Washington, D.C. As the Deputy Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, Bradford Morse, recently stated, "We of the VA—and you of the DAV—speak, in essence, the same language."

The experience as to World War I veterans, for whom service connections were procured as much as 35 years after active service, indicates that such expert service officers will be needed for many decades into the future.

FINANCING METHODS

DAV income has been procured first from membership dues, but, more importantly, since 1942, from its Idento Tag project, by which most automobile owners throughout the country receive miniature automobile license tags. Incidentally, attachment of such Idento Tags to key rings has enabled the DAV to return more than 1,400,000 sets of lost keys to their owners—without regard to whether they had previously mailed in any donation. Fortunately, Idento Tag recipients who do respond with donations have long enabled the DAV to maintain a larger staff of fulltime national service officers than maintained by any veteran organization.

If, however, twice as many Idento Tag recipients were each to donate only $1, after receiving their miniature automobile license tags each year, then the DAV would be enabled to expand its rehabilitation service setup into all of the some 176 VA hospitals. They could then extend much needed rehabilitation service to many additional scores of thousands of disheartened disabled veterans.

The Idento Tag project is owned and operated by the DAV itself, at its national headquarters at 5555 Ridge Avenue, Cincinnati 13, Ohio. Most employees consist of disabled veterans, their wives, their widows, and other handicapped persons—a rehabilitation project in itself—under the direction of the DAV National Adjutant, John E. Feighner, and the National Commander, Judge David B. Williams—a personal friend of mine. I hold Judge Williams in high esteem.

DAV SERVICE FOUNDATION

Because the income from the Idento Tag project has not been sufficient adequately to provide for its staff of full-time national service officers, resignations have reduced their number from about 300 in 1947 to about 140, notwithstanding appropriations aggregating $3,300,000, during the last 10 years, from its incorporated trustee, the DAV Service Foundation, 631 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW., Washington 4, D.C.

The Foundation's reserve funds therefore again need to be built up, by greatly increased volume of donations by disabled veterans—all of whom have so much benefited by reason of the DAV service program—and by other social-minded Americans. Much needed are many more bequests in wills, designations as beneficiary in insurance policies, assignments of stocks and bonds, and benefactors of Perpetual Rehabilitation Funds.

PERPETUAL REHABILITATION FUNDS

Spontaneously started by concerned disabled veterans in Montana, this special memorial trust idea has gradually spread into 29 States, with special donations ranging from $100 to $1,300. Many more are hoped for—and much needed—during succeeding months. Installment payments are acceptable and are being received from an increasing number.

After the end of each fiscal year on June 30, an updated Memorial Honor Roll of the benefactors, who have established such perpetual rehabilitation funds with the DAV Service Foundation, will appear in each DAV annual report to the U.S. Congress.

Only the interest earnings—4 percent—will be available for appropriation to the DAV for its use in maintaining service officers in the respective States, from which each Perpetual Rehabilitation Fund originated. If supported by a sufficient number of social-minded Americans—as well as individual disabled veterans and their DAV departments and chapters—this unique idea holds hope for eventually building up sufficient reserve funds, so that the earnings therefrom can enable the DAV to maintain much needed rehabilitation service for disabled veterans in each State throughout future years.

Security for America's war disabled, and their dependents, is, in the final analysis, linked up with America's future security. Americans who help the DAV Service Foundation will therefore be helping the DAV to help many more distressed disabled war veterans, their dependents, and their communities. America's future security will thus be fortified by the DAV's personalized rehabilitation service activities.

Incidentally, I am personally proud of being a life member of the DAV—as should be every eligible.

THE LAST OUTCAST OF DEMOCRACY

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post today published an excellent editorial entitled "The Last Outcast of Democracy" concerning home rule for the District of Columbia.

Here in the Capital City of the greatest nation on earth we witness more than three-quarters of a million people who are absolutely disfranchised. As the editorial points out, no other major capital in the free world is in a similar state.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has already voted statehood to Alaska and Hawaii, and I certainly hope that this body will have an opportunity to vote on a home-rule bill for the District of Columbia in this session.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I ask that the Washington Post's very powerful editorial be printed with my remarks in the RECORD. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this editorial makes correct common sense.

THE LAST OUTCAST OF DEMOCRACY

New hope for home rule in the District of Columbia is rising out of the tide that swept Alaska and Hawaii into the Union. For many years the District has been knocking on the doors of Congress with petitions for self-government much short of statehood. The three areas have been regarded as the underprivileged children in the U.S. family. Now two of those children have been welcomed into the fold as full-fledged States. With the third child still crying on the steps of the Capitol, the argument for taking it into the family as a self-governing unit ought to be irresistible.

In some respects Washington is presenting the most cogent appeal for political reform ever laid before Congress. Both Alaska and Hawaii had elected Territorial Governments of their own and voteless Delegates in Congress even while the full privileges of statehood were denied them. The people of the District have no suffrage whatever, no local government worthy of the name, no voice in Congress, no sense of participation in the political life of the Nation.

One reason for the long delay in bringing Alaska and Hawaii into the family was their separation from the other States. No such objection can be raised against the District, which is the Capital of the Nation and the center of its political life. Another point used against Alaska was its relatively small population. But the District, with its 850,000 people, has almost four times the population of Alaska and more inhabitants than any one of 12 States.

The District is thus a far more conspicuous political freak and a greater embarrassment to the United States throughout the free world than Alaska or Hawaii ever was. Congress came to have twinges of conscience in the case of the neglected Territories. How can it possibly avoid more acute twinges of conscience so long as home rule is denied within the Capital itself? No other major capital in the free world is kept in a state of absolute disfranchisement comparable to that of Washington.

The issue before Congress is not, therefore, simply one of granting the reasonable demands of a local community. Rather, it is a question—to borrow the words of Sturgis Warner of the District Home Rule Committee—"of eliminating the last legal and constitutional anomaly in the United States." Congress has done remarkably well in the first two steps it has taken. Now it should complete its task by welcoming the last outcast into the family not as a State but as a self-governing city with a special function.

There is nothing drastic, revolutionary, frightening or even strange about what the District is asking. Its request is simply for a restoration of self-governing rights that were swept away in a time of indignation over Governor Shepherd's excessive zeal in trying to keep Washington abreast of our national growth in the post-Civil War period. Home rule existed here when the District was established in 1800. Congress fostered and extended it until 1874. Since then there has been an appalling departure from American political principles in the continuation of what was essentially a receivership for the Shepherd regime.

It is important to remember also that, in extending the appointed local regime in 1878, Congress did not intend to continue the abolition of suffrage. The House voted for a District council to be elected by the people. The Senate approved a District Delegate to Congress. These provisions for elected officials were stricken from both bills only because the conference committee could not agree on a compromise.

When the Senate Judiciary Committee looked into this problem some years ago, it concluded that the right of suffrage still exists in the District. It cannot be exercised, because Congress has abolished the offices which the people used to fill at the polls. In other words, a basic right that was clearly recognized by Madison and others among the Founding Fathers has been suspended, because Congress has failed in its duty to provide the framework of a local government.

The Senate is now keenly alert to its obligation to restore this right of local self-government. It is expected soon to pass a home-rule bill for the fifth time in recent years. All the pressure that can be applied to reverse the blunder of 1878 will then be focused on the House.

The home-rule bill on which the community's hopes are now built is a product of long evolution. It is not a perfect bill. Some of its provisions are the subject of sharp controversy. Yet on the whole it is a good bill, and apparently the only home-rule measure that has a chance of enactment at present. It has wide support among the members of both parties in Congress as well as the endorsement of the administration and local home-rule groups.

The positive virtues of the bill are numerous. First, it would delegate authority to govern the District for all practical purposes to a local body. At present Congress is the real city council for Washington, a chore that it does not like and has no time to perform properly. Under the new system, local policies and programs, local appropriations and taxes would be voted by a legislative assembly responsible to the people. Like every other American city, Washington would then have control over its local affairs.

Second, the ballot box would be restored to the disfranchised District. Local residents would elect the 15 members of the general assembly at large voting for 3 candidates from each of 5 wards. By this means District residents could exercise control over their schools, their public improvements, and their social welfare institutions as well as their taxes.

A third important provision would give the District a speaking but nonvoting Delegate in the House of Representatives. This would be admittedly only a stopgap arrangement. By all the rules of fairness and logic the people of this city should have full-fledged representatives in Congress and should participate in the election of the President. But only a constitutional amendment could extend these rights to the District, and home rule should not wait for such an amendment. Meanwhile an elected Delegate could be a most useful emissary of the newly enfranchised community on Capitol Hill.

A fourth basic fact about the bill is that it would leave in Congress the ultimate legislative authority over the District. Any act of the legislative assembly could be repealed or modified by Congress and, of course, the home-rule system itself could be changed whenever Congress might see fit. This bill would not in any sense be a first step toward statehood for the District of Columbia. Instead, it would restore Congress to its proper role of general supervision over the seat of government while freeing it from detailed involvement in municipal operations. This is a point of enormous significance to those Members of Congress who find service as District Councilmen to be especially burdensome.

Criticism of the bill arises largely from its provision for a District Governor to be appointed by the President and the so-called double veto. Most local residents and many legislators would prefer an elected Governor. But there is historical precedent for this arrangement. The first mayors of Washington were appointed, and after a few years Congress permitted the people to elect their own mayors. Those who favor an appointed Governor see a special need for pulling together the national and local interests in the city in the initial stages of home rule. With the new system firmly established, it would be a simple matter to permit election of the Governor, if experience should demonstrate that to be desirable.

The double veto can also be defended as a steadying hand on a new government. If the Governor should veto an act of the general assembly on the ground that it would adversely affect a Federal interest and the assembly should override that veto, the President could step in with a second irreversible veto. This might be very irritating to the local community on some occasions, but it would certainly afford every safeguard that might conceivably be necessary to curb possibly unwise local measures.

The only other argument against the bill that seems to influence some Members of Congress is the large percentage of Negroes in the District's population. Actual experience has shown that there is little disposition on the part of Negroes to vote as a bloc unless that is necessary for protection of their rights. But in any event a general denial of suffrage in order to prevent Negroes from voting is the very negation of democracy—the counsel of despair.

In some measure the flight of high-income families to the Maryland and Virginia suburbs is a result of their disfranchisement in the District. The imbalance produced by this migration cannot be corrected by continuing to encourage it. Those who are worried by the District's changing population should be the first to work for the creation of a responsible local government which could address itself to the community's basic problems.

As a neglected orphan that depends on action of Congress for authorization to spend its own revenue, the District has a very dismal future. As a self-governing and self-respecting community, it could emerge into a new era of social, cultural and economic progress. Beyond this, a decent respect for the principles we profess as a nation and for the solemn pledges made by both political parties demands that the rights of home rule be restored.

The question is whether a little group of willful men in the House of Representatives shall be allowed to mock the principles of democracy in the Capital of the world's foremost democracy. The people of the District have demonstrated many times that they want home rule. The Senate wants it. The President wants it. There are many indications that the country also wants it and that a majority of the House would readily vote for it if given a chance. The use of minority obstruction to thwart self-government is doubly offensive.

Years of effort have failed to dislodge the House District Committee from its indifference to this scab on the face of democracy. So it is to Speaker RAYBURN and other top men of the House that the District and the country must look. In the past these leaders have been inclined to turn the other way while home-rule bills have been asphyxiated and buried. Now they must be asked to bring home rule to a vote on the floor or face full responsibility for flouting their party's pledge and for continuing to make the U.S. Capital a byword for cynics everywhere.

If these leaders are inclined to take command of the situation, they will have support from many sources. As Shakespeare has said:

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
"Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

And that tide appears to be running today in favor of the neglected children of democracy. Now, the only conspicuous political unit in this category under American control is the District of Columbia. For its sake, for the Nation's sake and for the sake of the free world, the country ought to rise up and insist that this breach of faith with the Founding Fathers and 850,000 loyal citizens be wiped out.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of California, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States relative to civil defense; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Colorado, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States relative to urging amendment of Federal law governing old age assistance, to the end that recipients of awards may accept employment and retain the remuneration received therefrom up to $600 annually without penalty or reduction of old-age-assistance awards; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to grant permission to the city of Nashville to fly the American flag over the grave of Capt. William Driver, in the city cemetery, 24 hours each day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Texas, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States, that the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States be requested to take such action as necessary and authorized by law to prohibit the further importation of sheep into the United States from any other country in which the disease of scrapie is known to exist; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to appropriate the sum of $400,000 and make it available to the U.S. Corps of Engineers for the purpose of completing the engineering studies aimed at determining the best and most economical locations of harbors of refuge and small boat harbors in the island chain; to the Committtee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WALTER (by request):

H.R. 6735. A bill for the relief of Josef Jan Loukotka; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WIDNALL:

H.R. 6736. A bill authorizing the presentation of the Order of the Purple Heart to Andrew T. Derrom; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

161. By Mr. DOOLEY: Resolution of the Civic and Business Federation, White Plains (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring reduction and eventual termination of agricultural controls and the granting of subsidies in the form of price supports, in order to bring about adjustment between production and consumption; to the Committee on Agriculture.

162. Also, resolution of the Civic and Business Federation, White Plains (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, opposing the enactment of education bills S. 2 and H.R. 22, as an unnecessary and improper intervention in local and State affairs; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

163. Also, resolution of Emil Hubsch Post No. 596 (Mount Vernon, N.Y.), Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, opposing any budgetary move to curtail the existing appropriations for the betterment of the veteran, and urging passage of H.R. 1181 which would provide a pension to World War I veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

164. Also, resolution of the Civic and Business Federation, White Plains (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the balancing of the Federal budget for the next fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1959, at the $77 billion level as proposed by President Eisenhower to the Congress, as an essential requirement in the effort to control inflation and stop deficit Government financing; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

165. Also, resolution of the Civic and Business Federation, White Plains (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, opposing enactment of the unemployment compensation bills S. 791 and H.R. 3547 for the reason that should new standards be imposed at the Federal level the experienced rating systems now used by the States might be lost and costs to employers rise to 2.7 percent or more; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

166. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Irving Brant, Washington, D.C., requesting consideration of legislation that would restore local self-government to the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

167. Also, petition of the editor, Szabad Magyarsag, New York, N.Y., requesting Congress to establish, by joint resolution, the agendic item of truly free elections for the captive people of Hungary, East Germany, and other slave states of the Soviet Empire, as a condition prerequisite to any ratification by the United States of any "summit" meeting, or "agreements" resulting therefrom, and also requesting a joint public hearing thereon; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

168. Also, petition of Mrs. Henry A. Burke, Beverly Hills, Calif., with reference to redress of grievance for alleged injury emanating from a decision by the Minnesota State Supreme Court in the case involving the Henry A. Burke estate; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

169. Also, petition of the commander, T. C. Carter Post No. 21, American Legion, Meridian, Miss., petitioning consideration of their resolution with reference to proposed legislation that would extend education and training benefits to all veterans who enter military service from February 1, 1955, and as long as the draft shall continue; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Hon. Christian A. Herter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HASTINGS KEITH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Speaker, may I join with my colleagues in the Congress in commenting on the appointment of Christian A. Herter as Secretary of State of the United States.

I served in the Massachusetts Senate for 4 years while our new Secretary of State was Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. And whereas many of my colleagues have commented favorably and enthusiastically on his competence in the field of foreign affairs, which I endorse, it is of his many accomplishments as chief executive of Massachusetts that I wish to speak at this time.

Mr. Herter reorganized several of our State's departments of government. He expanded its educational system and built hospitals and highways. He balanced the State budget and gave Massachusetts its first and only substantial reduction in taxes.

We have every reason to be confident that under Mr. Herter's leadership, the Department of State will have a positive approach to the problems of foreign policy.

Furthermore, we have every reason to believe—on the basis of past performance—that his program will be effective.

I consider it a distinct honor to have been associated with Mr. Herter at the State level, and to have this privilege of speaking in his honor today in the Congress of the United States.

Victor Herbert Centennial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, it is ironic, is it not, for me, a legislator, to rise in praise of a maker of songs? For, has it not been said, "Let me make the songs of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws?" Moreover, if I had any spirit I should be up before you singing the songs of Victor Herbert rather than using the flatness of prose to talk about him. But I do remember how many hours I spent playing his songs on the piano and the violin. The gay and sentimental songs, the marching songs, the heart lifting to the melodies and the rhythms. For, surely, he was, and is, a beloved composer. When I think of all the Victor Herbert melodies we played and sang at home, I grow nostalgic. I tell my grandchildren that they are missing a good bet in not knowing the songs of Mr. Herbert, cellist, conductor, composer. For, it seems to me, and I hope I am sadly mistaken, that the younger generations, not knowing him, are a bit prone to condescend toward his music; are more apt to dismiss the songs we loved as sentimental effusions. But I maintain that they are the losers.

The younger generation has been so busy educating us that it is time we turned the tables and educated them. I propose that the theater, television, and radio combine in one huge conspiracy to bring them the music of Victor Herbert. Once again, we would hear a lot of "Toys," from "Babes in Toyland"; "Kiss Me Again," from "Mademoiselle Modiste"; "Ah, Sweet Mystery of Life," "I'm Falling in Love With Someone," from "Naughty Marietta"; "Gypsy Love Song," from "The Fortune Teller"; "Moonbeams," from "The Red Mill"; "Sweethearts," from "Sweethearts." And that is at least one small contribution we could make to bring a spot of joy to this world of atom bombs and everyday crises. There are few enough as is.

Herbert's music is universal. It needs no interpreter. Herbert illustrates what Confucius said so many years ago:

Music produces a kind of pleasure which human nature cannot do without.

It is music like Herbert's that washes away the dust of everyday life. He recalls a compelling statement of Disraeli:

Music is miraculous. A blast from a trumpet and millions of soldiers rush forward to die. A peal of the organ and uncounted nations sink down to pray.

Let us remind these know-it-all youngsters that Mr. Herbert was an accomplished musician, a cellist of the highest rank, who played with the Metropolitan Opera; that he was the most famed conductor of his day of the Pittsburgh Symphony. That, born in Dublin, he had the joyous flair of the Irish; educated in Germany, he had the meticulous workmanship of the Germans; and living in America, he had the largeness of heart, the generosity, and the friendliness of the Americans. With these traits he made good music, fresh music, music to be loved, and music to be sung. That we here tonight pay tribute to Victor Herbert is no small wonder. There is no mind too sophisticated nor heart too simple that cannot embrace him. Perhaps this evening can initiate a national revival of Victor Herbert's music. For my grandchildren's sake, I hope so.

Sixth District of Missouri Results of Opinion Poll

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. W. R. HULL, JR.

OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to make available for the information of other Members of Congress the results of a legislative poll I recently conducted among residents of the Sixth District of Missouri.

The opinions expressed in the poll assume national significance, I believe, in view of the fact that the district, comprising 17 counties in northwest Missouri, strikes a near-balance between farms and industrial and business communities, with responses coming from persons in a wide range of occupations.

Of special interest is the fact that a majority of the large number responding to the poll did not confine themselves to voting on the questions contained in the 28,000 questionnaires I mailed out, but demonstrated their great interest in the conduct of our national affairs by adding affirmative comments of their own on the pressing issues of today.

Residents of the district are most concerned about the high level of government spending, the continued failure of the Federal Government to live within its means, and the threat of inflation.

Also, a large majority voiced their approval of legislation designed to protect the rights of union members and the public against the machinations of the few unscrupulous labor union officials whose misdeeds have been exposed in recent congressional hearings. A typical remark was that of one man who stated:

I am a union member and I favor a tough labor bill.

The results, stated in percentages, follow:

	Percent yes	Percent no	Percent undecided
1. Would you favor increased taxes if necessary to maintain national security, as opposed to continued deficit spending?	70	23	7
2. Do you favor a cut in foreign aid spending?	70	22	8
3. Do you favor Federal aid for school construction?	43	51	6
4. Would you support legislation to regulate labor organizations?
(a) By requiring secret ballots for union elections?	85	5	10
(b) By publication of financial records?	87	4	9
(c) By restricting secondary boycotts?	70	11	19
(d) By restricting jurisdictional strikes?	69	13	18
5. The President has requested an increase in postal rates and the Federal gasoline tax. Do you favor these proposals?	[1] 30	61	4
6. Do you believe the earning limitation for social security should be increased?	58	36	6
7. Are you in favor of the administration's farm program?	22	64	14
8. Do you favor an increase in the Federal minimum wage from $1 to $1.25 an hour?	38	58	4
9. Would you favor price and wage controls if necessary to halt inflation?	71	23	6

[1] An additional 2.5 percent favored increasing postal rates only, if necessary, and 2.5 percent favored increasing the Federal gasoline tax only.

The Montgomery County Sentinel, of Rockville, Md., an Honored Weekly Newspaper

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN R. FOLEY

OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago a small town weekly newspaper publisher gave me my first job as a printer's devil. Since then, as I have traveled from place to place in our country, it has been my custom to read the local weekly hometown newspapers. The vigor of their editorials, their dedication to the basic principles to which all Americans adhere, have been a constant source of inspiration.

For these reasons, I am proud to note that close by the Capitol in my own county we have one of the truly outstanding weekly hometown newspapers, the Montgomery County Sentinel, of Rockville, Md. Last week the Maryland Press Association awarded five certificates of honor to Mr. Cy Campbell, publisher, and Mr. Rogers B. Farquhar, editor, of this weekly newspaper that has a paid circulation of over 11,000. First place for best news picture in 1958 went to Hugh Gillespie, staff photographer. Other certificates for 1958 were second places for best editorial, for excellence in typography, and for community service, and third place for general excellence.

The Sentinel and its contemporaries are a hardy lot. They breathe genuine meaning and purpose into the words, "freedom of the press."

Development Loan Fund

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I was one of the Members of this House who pleaded in the Deficiency Appropriations Subcommittee, the full Appropriations Committee, and on the floor of the House before Easter for at least $100 million appropriation for Development Loan Fund commitments during fiscal 1959. President Eisenhower had requested a $225 million deficiency appropriation and I am pleased to note that the Senate Appropriations Committee has increased the Development Loan Fund item to $200 million for the remainder of this fiscal year.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE SHOULD BE DEEMPHASIZED

However, I am more than pleased to know that the distinguished chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, has offered an amendment that would establish a capital fund for the Development Loan Fund totaling $7.5 billion, or $1.5 billion annually for 5 years. The President has asked for only $700 million for the Development Loan Fund for fiscal 1960. Senator FULBRIGHT pointed out that the emphasis should be on economic foreign aid, rather than military assistance and I agree with him wholeheartedly. The U.S. Government cannot eliminate military assistance and it should not, but it should be deemphasized.

BOLAND COMMENDS SENATOR FULBRIGHT AND CONGRESSMAN BOWLES

My colleague from Connecticut, Congressman CHESTER BOWLES, the former Ambassador to India who served with distinction, made similar observations with respect to our foreign aid program on the floor of this House last week.

Both Senator FULBRIGHT and Congressman BOWLES are to be commended for their profound thinking in this very vital field.

The distinguished newspaper columnist, Walter Lippmann, devoted his article of today to the foreign aid program which he so truthfully calls the annual headache of Congress. He then tells why it has become such a headache. Mr. Speaker, I had submitted the Lippmann column with my above remarks yesterday for the RECORD, but the entire text was returned to my office this morning because Senator WAYNE MORSE of Oregon has asked that the Lippmann article be printed with his remarks in the Senate. It was printed on page 6903 of yesterday's RECORD. I now ask that my commentary be included, without Mr. Lippmann's column, of course.

National Parks Facilities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEE METCALF
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, a recent news release by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] follows:

NEWS RELEASE BY CONGRESSMAN DON MAGNUSON, SEVENTH DISTRICT, WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, April 8.—Recent hearings held by the House Interior Appropriations Subcommittee brought out the alarming fact that we are falling behind on our Mission 66 plan for developing our national parks while use of these facilities continues to increase by leaps and bounds.

The Mission 66 program, initiated in 1956, was designed to develop adequate facilities for an estimated 65 million people who are expected to visit our national parks in 1966.

As a member of the subcommittee which approved the initial money to get this program under way, I am concerned over the way the administration has permitted Mission 66 to fall so far behind schedule.

Part of this slowdown must be blamed on inflation. When Mission 66 first was approved in 1955 it was estimated that the 10-year program would cost $459 million. Since then, rises in construction costs have increased this by $61 million. Additional projects have upped the anticipated cost another $125 million.

The National Park Service, adhering faithfully to the administration's balanced-budget-at-all-costs policy, has asked for only $47 million for fiscal 1960 while we originally planned to spend nearly twice that amount.

Conrad L. Wirth, Director of the National Park Service, shed little light on how the Service expects to get back on schedule. He admitted that the program was lagging badly and suggested that $80 million a year should be spent during the next 2 or 3 years to get back on schedule. But he did not ask for that amount or say where he expected it to come from.

These neglected resources mean a great deal to a large segment of our population. Last year 59 million people visited national parks and an adidtional 68 million went to national forests for their recreation.

With park development falling behind our burgeoning population, we face the grim prospect of having to reserve cabins that we used to be able to drive to on the spur of the moment; pulling into crowded, smoky camp sites that used to be quiet and out of the way; fishing in streams with more fishermen than fish and even being turned away from full campsites.

In this morning's mail was the following press release on the same subject from the National Park Service:

FIRST-QUARTER TRAVEL TO NATIONAL PARK: BREAKS ALL RECORDS

The number of visitors to national parks and other areas in the National Park System for the first 3 months of 1959 has set a new record for first-quarter travel, Director Conrad L. Wirth of the National Park Service, Department of the Interior, announced today.

Total for the first 3 months of 1959 was 7,119,000, Wirth announced. This represents an increase of 24.5 percent over the total of 5,717,300 for the same period in 1958. The previous high for the period was 6,345,000, set in 1957.

Travel in March of 1959 totaled 3,152,200, a gain of 36.9 percent over the 2,302,000 visits recorded in March 1958.

Among nearby areas, the Blue Ridge Parkway recorded a 39 percent increase in visitors in the 3-month period. Other increases in individual park areas ranged as high as 204 percent. The National Historical Areas of the System were highest among category increases with a gain of 48 percent, followed by the 29 national parks with an increase of 42 percent.

"These heavy increases in visitation," Wirth said, "clearly justify the Mission 66 program to provide adequate facilities and services for the many millions of Americans who visit and use the approximately 180 areas administered by the National Park Service.

"Our original Mission 66 planning took into consideration a probable total of 80 million visitors a year by 1966, the year the Mission 66 program is scheduled for completion. These travel figures for the first quarter of 1959 cause no dampening of our previous estimates that the total by 1966 may be well above 80 million."

Mr. Speaker, I note that Mr. Wirth says Mission 66 "is scheduled" for completion in 1966. But, as the gentleman from Washington points out, Mr. Wirth admitted that the program is way off schedule and does not know how it is going to get back on.

Editor Mel Ruder of the weekly Hungry Horse News, published at Columbia Falls, Mont., near Glacier National Park, has suggested that the program be renamed Mission 76. That apparently is the only way this program is going to get back on schedule.

The Brigantine "Yankee"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HASTINGS KEITH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill on behalf of the brigantine Yankee which will, I believe, do much to keep alive for American boys and girls the seafaring tradition of New England—and especially of the salt-of-the-earth section I am proud to represent—an area that includes Cape Cod, the islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard, and the famous onetime whaling town of New Bedford.

In recent years, training youthful mariners in sailing and seamanship has been carried on aboard the famous brigantine Yankee. Voyages in coastal waters as well as around the world have helped to develop in these youths self-reliance, and the ability to assume leadership.

The Yankee has changed hands, but her new owners wish to carry forward the same program of training our youth.

The bill I wish to introduce will, I am advised, permit this training to be resumed, as it grants the Yankee registration as a yacht under specific restrictions.

A Program for the National Forests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CATHERINE MAY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mrs. MAY. Mr. Speaker, from time to time the Congress receives a message which in following years comes to be looked upon as a milestone in the progress of our country. Such a message was received during the Easter recess. It is from the Secretary of Agriculture. It submits for our consideration a program for the national forests.

The national forests are one of our great public heritages. They belong to all Americans. Their resources and services are available for use by everyone. Demands on the forests are now such that a program for the development of their resources and services for sustained production at practicable capacity is of the greatest urgency.

The program which Secretary Benson has recommended to us is designed to accomplish this development. It recommends both long-range objectives and a short-range program necessary to get the job done.

The short-range program is of great immediate importance. It is important for two reasons. First, the need is here, right now, to catch up with current use of these public properties. Hardly a day passes that I do not receive an appeal from mill owners large and small to do what I can to help put more timber on the market. We could do so if roads and other necessary facilities could be provided. Recreation use of these areas by people from my State—and from your States, too—has long since passed the capacity of existing facilities to handle these people—to handle this use in a way that will safeguard the purity of water supplies and provide safe places for campfires. I could cite other examples of increased use of these public forests.

This increased use is fine. The national forests belong to all the people, and we want them used. There is plenty of opportunity for even more use than present use. But the immediate problem is to catch up with the use we already have.

Moreover, what is done in the next 10 or 15 years will determine whether this great public estate contributes its fair share of the needs and necessities of our people by the end of the century and that is not many years distant.

This fair share is more important than many people realize. Large segments of agriculture and industry, many cities and urban areas, are dependent on water flowing from national-forest watersheds. Hundreds of thousands of people earn their livelihood processing timber grown in national forests. The national forests are grazed by millions of livestock. Millions of people depend on the national forests for all kinds of outdoor recreation.

I think it is especially important to note that this program is not all outgo and no income. Last year the national forests of my State had cash receipts of nearly $16 million. It will be larger this year. Returns to the Treasury could be very much larger if we build the necessary timber access roads and do the other things outlined in Secretary Benson's proposed program.

Mr. Speaker, this program is a practical approach to a practical problem. It should have our vigorous nonpartisan support.

Armenian Martyrs' Day, April 24

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, on April 24, 1915, all the leaders of Armenian communities in Turkey were arrested by Turkish authorities, kept incommunicado and then, in small groups, taken to various parts of Asia Minor and put to death there. This sudden and shocking move by the Turks was the unfolding of the hideous plan of exterminating 2 million Armenians in the Ottoman Empire.

The coldblooded execution of the plan sounded the death knell of the Armenian race in the Empire, for within a year, while Europe was in the death throes of the First World War, the Turks had successfully and with impunity carried out their mission through wholesale massacres. At the end of that war, when the sky had cleared, and the dust had settled over the areas formerly populated and cultivated by Armenians, there was hardly any trace of life. In this unprecedented human holocaust in modern times more than 1 million Armenians lost their lives; most of the survivors were scattered as refugees in neighboring lands, and only a small number of Armenians were spared.

From that day on, every year Armenian communities everywhere observe April 24 as the day of their martyrs, paying homage not only to the memory of a few thousands of their leaders, but also in commemoration of 1 million innocent and helpless Armenians who lost their lives in that human carnage.

I gladly join Americans of Armenian descent in the commemoration of that event, the Armenian Martyr's Day.

Happy Anniversary for General de Gaulle and France

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, our felicitations go forth to France and her great president and leader, Gen. Charles de Gaulle.

A year ago, France was in a desperate plight. Chaos impended and all looked to De Gaulle. He responded bravely. France, having been rescued from bloody uncertainty, breathed freely. The world was relieved, especially the Western World. France became her historic self again, proud and glorious.

The general, with heroic effort, rebuilt the government, strengthened the central authority, and freed the nation of the splintering political factions that had plagued France for decades. Communists were given cold comfort; they were no longer able to foment strife and trouble.

In his 1 year of tenure, the general has revalued and made firm the franc, increased taxes, and inaugurated a system of austerity for his fellow Frenchmen, and they did not rebel. He has cut many unwarranted and unfair subsidies, even reduced veteran pensions. He has strengthened the presidency, the office he holds.

Recently, as a result of all these measures, French exports topped imports. The franc is presently so stable that tourists are no longer looking for bargains on the black market, but are getting their francs from the banks. The threat of further inflation has so lessened that the Bank of France, in a confident mood, has lowered the discount rate from 4½ percent to 4 percent. This lowered rate should encourage borrowings for plant expansion and extended activities.

The unresolved problem is Algeria. This unruly area has caused the French much concern and casts a shadow over the good works of De Gaulle. The relentless war is like an open wound that is draining France of much blood and treasure. Four hundred thousand of her men are pinned down in this long drawn-out struggle. If there is a way out, it is hoped General de Gaulle will find it. We wish him success. The solution of the Algerian problem would add even greater luster to his name. Let us hope, for the sake of Algeria and France that this tragedy will end soon and peace shall descend upon a land torn asunder with flame and bullet.

Then De Gaulle can tackle other difficulties besetting France and especially, give further impetus to her economy. If anyone can make France bloom and boom, it is General de Gaulle.

In an article in the current issue of Fortune, entitled, "De Gaulle's Audacious Economics," there aptly appears the following:

> "The road is hard, but it is beautiful," De Gaulle told the French a year ago. "The end is difficult, but it is great. Allons." And France has indeed gone forward, into the Fifth Republic, now into a grand design of economic reforms almost as radical as the political. * * * The astonishing news out of France is that the grand design is taking hold.

Mr. Speaker, we all hail France and her great leader on this eventful anniversary.

Loyalty Day, May 1, 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, May 1 has been set aside for the national observance of Loyalty Day in our Nation. Inspired by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, enacted into law by the Congress, given Presidential approval, it is an appropriate time to ask ourselves: What constitutes loyalty to America? Who is the truly loyal American citizen?

I believe loyalty is found in the American citizen who loves and reveres the Constitution and, because he loves it, obeys it—not just in precept but in practice.

Loyalty is found in the citizen who despises the demagog and any base attempts to place one class of people against another class. He is unwilling that any shall profit at the expense, or suffer at the hands, of any other class.

Loyalty is found in the citizen who prizes individual liberty. He remembers that there was such a man as Patrick Henry. He knows that all the powers of government have been conferred and exist to protect the liberties of all citizens. He refuses to exalt the powers of government at the expense of any citizen's freedom.

Loyalty is found in the citizen who recognies that ours is a government of laws—that the law must be independent and fearless. But in the words of our 26th President, Theodore Roosevelt, the loyal citizen knows that "No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it."

Loyalty is found in the citizen who loves his fellow man—who wrongs no man—who believes in the nobility of hard work—who is frugal, honest, industrious and sincere. He believes that human dignity and worth are of supreme importance to the American way of life.

Loyalty is found in the citizen who desires to take an active part in the workings of our democracy. He recognizes that citizenship and responsibility are as one.

Loyalty is found in the citizen who knows that the future can be bright and secure only if we continue to apply the knowledge of the past to the opportunities of the future.

The observance of Loyalty Day is a serious obligation. It is a time to evaluate our citizenship. It is a time to remind ourselves that "Loyalty is the holiest good in the human heart."

Now or Never

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, the Nation may not be in serious danger, but it is in greater danger than ever before.

Russia has more submarines, more planes, and more divisions than we have—and is adding to them faster.

Every year we have more enemies and fewer friends. The last to go is oil-rich Iraq.

Every year Khrushchev is more aggressive and more insulting.

Every year we have a larger national debt. Interest alone is $7½ billion dollars. Next fiscal year it will be over $8.1 billion.

Every year Congress spends more than our income, the larger part for nondefense spending, things we have been doing without and can continue to get along without.

Every year we vote to increase the number of civil employees. They now number more than 2,300,000 at an annual payroll in excess of $13 billion.

Every year it is harder for the U.S. Treasury to sell Government bonds; harder to borrow the money Congress spends above the budget—and interest rates go up.

Mr. Speaker, when Congress votes to spend more than the budget the Government must gobble up more money to finance the big spending:

First. When Congress votes to spend more than we take in the dollar depreciates. Your money buys less.

Second. When Congress votes more money than the budget, the cost of living goes up for every family in America. Prices increase in every store.

Third. When Congress votes more money it is harder to get a loan. And interest is higher. For the first time in years Washington pawnbrokers are petitioning for increased rates.

Fourth. When Congress votes to spend above the budget your savings are worth less. Your old age will be harder than you expected.

Fifth. When Congress votes to spend for things we have been doing without and can continue to do without, your life insurance will do less for your family and your fire insurance will not build your house back.

Sixth. When Congress keeps on voting to spend past the budget your pension will not support you as well, and your social security will not provide as much security.

Seventh. When Congress votes to issue more bonds and borrow more money, gambling on Wall Street grows more frenzied and the crash is that much nearer.

Eighth. When Congress keeps on spending after we have used up all our income, inflation burns higher and you have less confidence in Congress and the Government.

Ninth. When Congress keeps on spending, taxes must go up instead of down.

Tenth. When Congress spends and spends our allies lose faith and want to compromise with the enemy. Our enemies gain confidence and refuse to disarm.

Eleventh. When Congress spends for nondefense pressure groups, war is nearer. Khrushchev is just waiting until Congress spends us into bankruptcy.

Every time Congress votes to spend a dollar we do not have for things we can get along without, they are voting you and your family and your Nation into greater danger and shorter rations.

Here is what the Reader's Digest says about it:

THE OMINOUS DISTRUST OF THE DOLLAR

The flight from Government bonds is more ominous than most Washington officials care to admit publicly. Several recent Treasury financing operations have failed badly. As a result, the Treasury is being forced to run faster and faster merely to keep up with its maturities. The fact is that the richest nation in the world is now operating on a hand-to-mouth basis.

The effect of all this seems utterly lost on advocates of dynamic new spending programs to speed business expansion, eliminate unemployment.

The Treasury cannot spend more money than it gets through taxes and Government security issues. Yet professional and naive investors both now distrust the latter. This means recourse to financing through the banks, which increases the money supply and is directly inflationary.

The classic sources of savings upon which the Treasury must draw if it is to manage the public debt in orderly fashion are being diverted. Institutions and individuals alike are investing their funds elsewhere. This clearly reflects basic distrust of the Government's fiscal responsibility. As Federal Reserve Chairman William McC. Martin puts it, "Investors cannot be induced to purchase fixed-income securities if they fear a steady erosion in the purchasing power of the dollar." Yet this is precisely what they do fear.

Official Treasury figures tell the story. During the past 6 years the assets of insurance companies, mutual savings banks, savings and loan associations and pension funds rose by about $100 billion—but not a penny of this additional money went into Government issues.

During this same period, private citizens had new savings on the order of $137 billion available for investment either through savings institutions or directly in securities and mortgages. None of this flow of capital went into Government obligations, on balance.

Refusal of the investing public to put new funds into Federal issues forces the Treasury to finance by devious means. For example, it sells tax anticipation notes to corporations at whatever price the market offers. This is, in effect, a method of collecting taxes before they are due. And it sells other short-term issues to banks, which treat them as cash, since they can be turned into dollars by rediscounting—thus creating more money.

Unless hopes for balancing the budget can be revived, the Treasury will have no alternative but to continue this course. That creates still further problems: (1) It will push up its interest cost even higher; (2) it will necessitate new offerings at more frequent intervals.

Restoration of faith in the dollar requires facing up to the Treasury's dilemma. But that is something Congress still seems unprepared to do. The testimony of Treasury officials has brought out clearly the need for fiscal sanity. But such pleas for a balanced budget mean comparatively little to a Congress which is being pressured from all sides to approve vital new Federal spending programs.

These pressures are direct, and every Member of Congress is subject to them. The sad truth is that they do not come solely, or even primarily, from labor-liberal groups. Conservatives are just as active in sponsoring spending programs when their own interests are involved.

Congress lacks any real machinery, moreover, with which to keep the budget under control. Its dual system of appropriating directly for some programs and authorizing agencies to borrow from the Treasury, with no time limit on either type of spending, skirts the whole problem. There is no close tie between the voting of expenditures and the voting of revenues to provide the necessary funds. This makes a hold-the-line policy difficult under any conditions.

Spot checks of congressional mail fail to reveal any strong national demand for a balanced budget. Many people are writing, but most also want local needs considered.

Federal debt-management problems not only arouse concern on the part of Treasury officials but also affect the taxpayer's pocketbook. Interest cost on the money the Government has hired now runs to $8.1 billion yearly. This is second only to defense in the fiscal 1960 budget of $77 billion, and represents almost a 30-percent increase within the past 5 years alone.

The continuing shift in Treasury debt to shorter and shorter issues is creating other worries. With buyers backing away from issues having a longer term than a year, refunding operations become larger and more frequent. Financing exclusively in the 1-year area means that within 4 years 75 percent of the total debt would have to be refunded each year.

The upward trend of interest rates has, moreover, still some way to go. Not only does the Treasury face further maturities this half-year which must be refunded; it will also have to raise some $6 billion to $7 billion of new money in the second half. If business recovery continues as expected, the Treasury will be competing with heavy business loan requirements.

Eisenhower's impossible position on spending versus economy is illustrated in his effort to boost rural electrical cooperative interest rates. He wants co-ops to pay the same rate (about 4 percent) that the Treasury must bear when it borrows in the open market—just enough to cover basic costs. Yet the President is stymied by the congressional farm bloc. Democratic leaders assured the cooperatives that the 2-percent rate will go untouched.

At the heart of the Treasury's problem is a simple fact, easily grasped by anyone. This is that governments, like individuals, cannot spend more than they take in without being hurt. In the case of governments, continuing deficit spending debases the currency. This is the essence of today's distrust of the dollar.

It may be added, Mr. Speaker, that the next world war will be different in many respects from any previous world war in history. We will not be fighting for victory; we will be fighting for survival.

The decisive phase of the war will be fought in America. And if America loses it will be a war of extermination. The Russian firing squads will leave only the uneducated and the unskilled, and our form of government, our way of life, and our people as we know them today will cease to exist. It is a familiar program followed in every satellite government Russia has liberated.

With that in prospect, however remote, can we not for the present tighten our belts a little and deny ourselves some of the nondefense "knicknacks" the pressure groups are urging?

Misrule for the District of Columbia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. W. J. BRYAN DORN
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. DORN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the Federation of Women's Clubs of the District of Columbia very wisely adopted a resolution against so-called home rule. These ladies are tremendously interested in a beautiful, cultural and charming National Capital with an American, patriotic atmosphere. These ladies are taking a stand alongside of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, James Monroe and the other great Founding Fathers of our country.

The Federation's resolution opposing home rule is in absolute keeping with their resolution favoring Washington's Cultural Center. I hope they are successful in both projects. This great and wonderful organization is presently headed by Mrs. T. David Gates in the District of Columbia who is doing an outstanding job as president.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed home rule program would be anything but home rule. It would be misrule with the government of Washington being run by political bosses in the smoke-filled headquarters of some dues-paying society of agitation in other areas of the country.

The following are excerpts from my talk before the Federation of Women's Clubs of the District of Columbia on last Saturday:

You are to be congratulated on your patriotism and foresight in opposing home rule for the District of Columbia. Millions of Americans in every section of the United States share your thinking that representative government and freedom might suffer by home rule in the District of Columbia.

Under home rule in a very short time the Congress, the courts, departments of the Federal Government, and even the President would be subjected to harassment, demonstrations, picketing, undue pressure, and propaganda coined and conceived in a socialistic mill hundreds of miles from Washington, if not in foreign lands.

Under home rule the local political machine would soon become the pawn of more powerful and sinister pressure groups with headquarters elsewhere. There would be no real democracy in Washington under home rule. Local politics would be controlled by pressure groups, propaganda, and stupendous slush funds from other areas. The local machine would become a stepping stone to be used by every Capitol Hill presidential aspirant on his way to the national convention. Both national political parties would use the local political machine to lobby for their pet projects on Capitol Hill at the expense of the taxpayers at the grassroots of our country. If Washington were granted home rule, conditions would become so intolerable that the people of the United States would demand that the Capital be moved.

In considering this home rule question, we all should remind ourselves that the overthrow of every French Republic was bred and nurtured by the Parisian mob of France's capital city. Only last year the Communist coup d'etat in Iraq was made possible by the capital city mobs of Baghdad who, overnight, lynched the government officials, mobbed Americans, and took over the government.

The Founding Fathers moved the Capital to the District of Columbia to escape local political pressure in Philadelphia. The Founding Fathers saw the immediate necessity of the Government operating in an atmosphere free from undue local pressure and mob psychology.

Due Credit to "American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants To Know"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the "American Forum of the Air," America's oldest discussion program, and "Youth Wants To Know" are time honored programs. The radio and television industry has presented these programs to the American public for many years. It has long been recognized that there is a need for programs of this nature. Unfortunately, they have been the victims of poor scheduling, that is to say, they have been presented usually early Sunday afternoon, along with other educational and informative programs.

This year, the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., in cooperation with my friend, Theodore Granik, has pioneered in making these two fine programs available to the American public during regularly scheduled evening hours on weekday nights, when the largest potential viewing and listening audience is available. This move is to be highly commended. This innovation provides the opportunity to present the important issues by leading authorities in their fields. Never before has such a large potential audience been made available by the network for this type of programming.

Both the "American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants To Know" are telecast once each month. The programs are recorded by video tape facilities and are distributed by the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. to television stations throughout the Nation. Many of my distinguished colleagues in the House have had the opportunity of appearing on either one or both of these fine programs and it is most gratifying to know that they will have the opportunity to continue to bring to the attention of the American people the crucial issues facing Congress.

Several of the Members of the U.S. Senate have already appeared in this new series. Senator WAYNE MORSE and Senator BARRY GOLDWATER opened the new series, discussing the need for labor legislation and recently Senator JAVITS and Senator TALMADGE discussed the controversial civil rights proposals pending before the U.S. Senate. On "Youth Wants To Know" the guest was Senator HUMPHREY, who was questioned by high school students regarding his recent trip to the Soviet Union.

Great tribute should be paid to Mr. Donald McGannon, president of the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., and Theodore Granik, founder and producer of the "American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants To Know" for pioneering this new concept in programing. This opportunity for leaders in the field of government, education, science, business, labor and others to debate openly the issues affecting all the citizens of this great Nation, attests to the public service performed by the radio and television industry. The continued success of the "American Forum of the Air" and "Youth Wants To Know," the first to be presented during prime evening time, demonstrates that at last the broadcasting industry has recognized the need for informative educational programing in the most advantageous time periods.

I would like to add a personal note here. Theodore Granik, who produces both of these shows with the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., is, I repeat, an old dear friend of mine. I was the first guest on the "American Forum" 31 years ago, the progenitor of this program and "Youth Wants To Know." On many a night Ted and I struggled to bring these programs into being and my colleagues in the House and Senate have joined me in recognizing the proud record created by both these programs. From my vantage point of 37 years in Congress, I say to Ted and the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co., "Well done."

Rural Mail Carrier Retires

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES G. O'HARA
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. O'HARA of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Frank Pawlowski, a citizen of Ruth, Mich., has recently retired after over 40 years of service as a rural mail carrier. On the occasion of his retirement it is fitting that we should give recognition to his long years of dedicated service to the people of his community.

Following the example set by his father, who was also a rural letter carrier, Mr. Pawlowski served as a substitute rural carrier at Ruth from 1915 to 1918. On May 23, 1921, he was appointed a regular carrier on route No. 1. Over the years he traveled one of the longest rural routes of its kind in the Nation. With perseverance typical of his fellow carriers, he covered his 66-mile route in fair weather and foul. Each winter he battled snowstorms hostile to all movement in the service of his patrons. He can take pride in a lifetime of work well done.

Along with his wife, Gertrude, he can be proud, too, of the fine family they have raised. Their son was educated in law, and is now a colonel in the Air Force. Among their four daughters, they have two nurses and a schoolteacher.

I am sure the Members of the Congress join me in wishing him long years of healthy and happy retirement.

Tribute to Tom Rivers: Ambassador of Recreation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SILVIO O. CONTE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, Howard Henderson, vice president of J. Walter Thompson Co., the world's largest advertising agency, has sent around a memorandum to his friends about a graduate of Mount Hermon School. Since the days of Dwight L. Moody, this Massachusetts institution has enkindled within its students a world vision and world mission. One of these graduates, Mr. Speaker, is Thomas E. Rivers, director general, International Recreation Association, with offices on the United Nations Plaza, New York. In Mount Hermon, Rivers caught a vision which has matured through more than 4 decades of service to recreation. As a young man he learned from John R. Mott that life should be an earnest effort to make every decision in the light of the whole world from the perspective of the dedicated heart.

For nearly 40 years "Tom" Rivers, as he is known around the world, served as an executive of the National Recreation Association. In 1956 a great international recreation congress was held in the city of Philadelphia with the effective cooperation of the Nation's foremost recreation executive, Commissioner Robert W. Crawford. With the active leadership and financial support of the National Recreation Association, the International Recreation Association was incorporated under the laws of the State of New York on October 3, 1956. Among the important projects developed by IRA has been the annual cooperative community recreation exchange project, administered under grants from the State Department. Lord Luke, chairman of the International Recreation Association Board, said at a reception at Buckingham Palace recently that "Mr. Rivers has taken a technical subject and lifted it to the level of statesmanship."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the reason for my mentioning Mr. Rivers in connection with the memorandum circulated by Mr. Henderson is that Paul Douglass, a member of the bar of the U.S. Supreme Court and one of America's leading educators, in an address on "Types of Creative Leaders" at the 13th annual Great Lakes Training Institute of Indiana University at Pokagon Park, selected Rivers as one of our representative creative leaders, "the kind of human beings who dream, pioneer, invent, act, and lead."

Quoting Paul Hoffman's favorite phrase from Kipling, Mr. Douglass said that today there is a search for a principle that will "walk up and down in the hearts of men." He went on to say that the world struggle of ideologies does not seek merely more bread, but rather to increase income as surplus over minimum needs to provide for man the most prized of all desires—leisure in freedom—and the wherewithal to enjoy it. What all the people of the world want, Mr. Speaker, is to share a common dividend of creative leisure from the operation of our heavily industrialized society.

You will remember, sir, that Emerson, one of our Massachusetts immortals, advised us that "every great and commanding moment in the annals of the world is the triumph of some great enthusiasm" and that Thomas Paine observed that "an army of principles will penetrate where an army of soldiers cannot; it will succeed where diplomatic management would fail." Mankind everywhere is yearning for the enjoyment of the creative life in the experience of leisure. As the international ambassador of recreation, Tom Rivers deserves the support of every American. Massachusetts is proud of him.

Bill To Amend Transportation Act of 1958

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. TORBERT H. MACDONALD
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill which provides for thorough consideration and review by the Interstate Commerce Commission before commuter and passenger trains are permitted to be discontinued.

My bill would amend the Transportation Act of 1958, which now permits railroads to automatically discontinue passenger trains 5 months after the application for discontinuance if no formal action has been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I would like to point out that 27 notices to discontinue approximately 100 trains are presently pending before the Commission. And railroads are threatening to discontinue additional service affecting many more thousands of passengers. The records show that a time range of 5 months has been proven inadequate for the Interstate Commerce Commission to properly investigate and make findings upon this flood of discontinuance requests. Thus, it seems to me, the net result would be discontinuance of passenger trains which will be accomplished by default, without public hearings and without a careful determination by proper authorities. This inevitably would be followed by an ignoring of the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, my bill is designed to correct this situation. For example, after the filing of an application for discontinuance of passenger service, the Interstate Commerce Commission must hold a public hearing prior to acting upon the application. Likewise, all interested parties would be permitted to be heard at the hearing. It would seem that the restrictive 5-month time limitation now placed on the Commission should be eliminated. The Commission must be empowered to protect the public interest. Under the present law the Commission has no such power. By following this procedure the interests of both the railroads and the commuting public, as well as the public at large, would be properly recognized, and any decisions regarding railroad passenger service must be made only after all relevant factors have received full consideration in the appropriate body.

I understand very well the financial troubles of the railroads, especially those on the eastern seaboard, and I am willing to assist them in their present difficulties. As a matter of fact, the Transportation Act of 1958, for which I voted both in committee and on the floor of the House, provided $500 million for their relief. On the other hand, I insist that we must give every consideration to the interests of the public.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, this problem is certainly not a brand new one. In fact, 2 years ago I strongly protested the curtailment of passenger service in my Eighth Congressional District by the Boston & Maine Railroad. At that time I stated that I thought such large curtailments were in disregard of the public interest. Many of my constituents cannot reach Boston by public conveyance, inasmuch as the only bus line serving the district has been on a very prolonged strike. The fact of the matter is that for all practical intents and purposes there is no bus service. This, coupled with the continuing abandonment of train service, forces most to reach their place of employment by private automobile. On arriving at Boston, the motorist finds no place to park; he also finds that both he and his car are unwelcome, that parking for pay facilities are nonexistent, and his personal transportation problems almost unsolvable.

Dr. Paul Dudley White recommends bicycling as a way to strengthen our heart and preserve our health. However, the inclement winters and springs of Massachusetts make this alternative to the transportation problem a difficult one, even if at times it seems as the only possible solution to the present attitude of the railroads against carrying passengers.

Many hundreds of my constituents have either purchased or built homes with reliance on train service which was then in existence but presently is merely a memory. Their problem is personal, but their interest is public. To that extent I feel legislation to return the concept of public interest to the running of railroads is imperative.

I realize that my proposal today is not a cure-all for solving the present commuter crisis in cities along the eastern seaboard. But I do believe that maintenance of adequate railroad commuter service is of critical importance to these areas. It is, therefore, my hope that hearings by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, of which I am privileged to be a member, will soon be scheduled on this important legislation.

Passover, 5719

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, now, as the solemn and joyous season of the Passover is observed by the Jewish people, it is appropriate for Americans to think over the relationship between our Nation and the nation of Israel, and the history of the Jewish minority group within our multifarious civilization. This is a time for making sure that our national policy toward Israel keeps to the generous and helpful direction set during the Truman Administration, so that the courageous new country, with its ancient traditions and its strong moral purpose, may form a center of both spiritual growth and material prosperity for the discouraged and impoverished region of the Middle East. As, with the Jewish people, we recall the Biblical tale of oppression in the land of Egypt, let us work with the Jewish people to make sure that no such authoritarian rule, no Communist or other dictatorship, shall prevail in that region, and that no nation or race shall oppress another. We must do all that we can to open the channels of trade, of travel, of immigration and emigration. Political freedom is freedom in name only so long as it does not include freedom of trade and freedom of movement. Our American immigration laws should be liberalized and equalized so as to admit more refugees from eastern European nations, and particularly from Rumania, where the need is particularly pressing.

WE JOIN WITH THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL IN PRAYER FOR PEACE

Within our own borders, and throughout the world, we should be ready to speak and act with firmness and vigor to eliminate discrimination, and to prevent violence against the Jews or any other minority groups. Surely all Christians, and men of good will of all faiths, can join wholeheartedly with the children of Israel in the prayer that forms the final benediction of the Passover Seder:

With songs of praise we have lifted up the cup, symbolizing the divine promises of salvation, and we have called upon the name of God. Let us again lift our soul to God in faith and hope. May He who broke Pharoah's yoke, forever shatter all fetters of oppression and hasten the day when swords shall at last be broken and wars ended. Soon may He cause the glad tidings of redemption to be heard in all lands, so that mankind—freed from violence and from wrong and united in an eternal confidence of brotherhood—may celebrate the universal Passover in the name of our God of freedom.

An Inroad to Federal Control of Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged when I receive a letter such as the one I herewith insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I have received hundreds of letters from the people whom I have the honor to represent in Congress opposing Federal aid to education. This letter from my esteemed friend, Mr. R. E. Wollenhaupt, of Fontanelle, Iowa, sets out well and concise the general feeling about Federal aid to education which prevails in the Seventh Iowa District.

Of course, I also receive a few letters in favor of it, but such letters are becoming fewer and fewer as time goes on, because more and more people are becoming thoroughly convinced they do not want the education of their children controlled from Washington, D.C.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 26, 1959.

Mr. R. E. WOLLENHAUPT, Fontanelle, Iowa.

DEAR MR. WOLLENHAUPT: Thank you so much for your wonderful letter of April 13. It is so reassuring to have a thoughtful and well-considered message. One letter like yours, pleading for fiscal sanity, overcomes a dozen of the opposite variety, which insist that the Federal Treasury pay for everything from cradle to grave.

So that you will know your letter came to a sympathetic correspondent, please let me refer you to the attached speech I made in the House last summer on the subject of Federal aid to education.

Sincerely yours,

BEN F. JENSEN.

Mr. Wollenhaupt's letter and my remarks above referred to, follows:

FONTANELLE, IOWA, April 13, 1959.

Hon. BEN F. JENSEN,
U.S. Representative,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JENSEN: At a parents and teachers meeting held recently at our public school, a film was shown entitled "Breakthrough to Better Schools." This particular film has been developed by the National Education Association and emphasizes the passage of the Murray-Metcalf bill which provides a measure of Federal aid to education for school buildings and teacher salaries.

I personally felt that the film was quite "slanted" to create a favorable attitude toward Federal aid. I also feel that the film does not in itself reveal the total picture as to what may be involved in the implementation of such Federal aid. It would seem to me that there are many ramifications relative to the administration of a Federal-aid-to-education program which might have numerous bad results. Further, that measures of this type are not consistently American in nature but instead reflect a measure of discredit on our forefathers, who, instead of pleading to the Federal Government for assistance, would by the sweat of their brow and hard work, manage to get the job done for themselves.

There is no question that we all want good, adequate schools for the children of our State and Nation and I am sure we are desirous of paying our teachers adequate and proper salaries. I feel, however, that this is not the function or the immediate problem of the Federal Government. Surely this should be, and can be handled at the local levels of Government if people will but put their minds to the task at hand. While costs of building, maintaining, and operating schools are high indeed, I cannot believe that there is any community in this State of Iowa which is unable to meet its financial obligations for adequate school purposes.

It seems to me that for too many years, now, we have been conditioned to follow the course of least resistance and instead of facing our local problems and taking necessary action, we turn to the already overburdened Federal Government to pour out money for measures which we should be providing ourselves. Unfortunately, the Federal Government is itself to blame for this situation due to its removal of the gold standard and inaugurating an irredeemable monetary system.

I firmly support the stand of President Eisenhower to hold the line on Federal expenditures to balance the budget. I hope that all good Republicans give him their unwavering support toward eliminating the reckless and irresponsible spending ventures which have been prevalent for so long.

If additional funds are necessary to care for our schools, additional taxes must be raised at the local levels involved. We all dislike taxes, but it is better to pay as we go than to have the Federal Government make handouts derived from no other source than deficit financing. Presumably such a measure as this bill would be financed in that manner. This method may seem more painless temporarily but in the long run will surely lead to our economic destruction and provide an inroad to socialism or worse.

Perhaps you would be good enough to express your views on Federal aid to education generally and on the Murray-Metcalf bill in particular.

Sincerely yours,

R. E. WOLLENHAUPT.

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 104, pt. 13, page 16737]

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, the basic purpose of education is to develop the minds of a people so they can govern themselves and thus be the masters of their own destiny instead of being a mere servant of an all-powerful government, controlled from the seat of a powerful paternal government.

That was one of the compelling reasons why our Founding Fathers placed great emphasis on the individual and established our free private enterprise system. It was never their purpose that the Congress should establish such laws as would finally bring about a system here where any freeborn American would be beholden to a paternal government for their education.

Mr. Speaker, it will be a bad day for America if the day should ever come when our boys and girls can say to their mothers and fathers, "We owe you little for our higher education," and I fear that day will come if this bill is made the law of the land. For then we will be educating our children to depend too much on a paternal government, and to expect and accept all sorts of Federal controls as is the case in every nation on earth where liberty is gone and where the individual is only a pawn in the hands of a Socialist all-powerful government, because such an act as is here proposed by H.R. 13247, had been ruled the law of the land. We have already gone too far in that direction. Remember that age-old adage:

"Just as you bend the twig so will the tree be when it's big."

That admonition holds just as true today as when those words were first uttered.

Also, let us not forget that, at this very minute, we have a staggering Federal debt of over $275 billion—but not with my vote. Yet, here we are considering a bill which will, over a period of a few years, add billions more which our children and their children will have to pay. Yes, most of the very same Americans that this bill seeks to help will have to pay the bill in burdensome taxes, if they can, or suffer the consequences. The true facts are, there is not a school district, or a county or a State in this Union which is not more able financially than the Federal Government to provide proper and adequate facilities for their children, and I am sure if most of the parents and their good thoughtful children knew that Federal control is written into every title of this bill they would say, "kill it," as would their sons and daughters.

The first responsibility for the education of our children rests on the shoulders of the parents, next on the school district, next on the State, and only in impacted areas where Federal establishments have created a school expense too great for the taxpayers of a school district to support, there and only there should the Federal Government aid, interfere, or dictate.

The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a most interesting and thought-provoking article entitled "The Big Dilemma: Conscience or Votes." The article was written by former Senator William Benton, who, in my opinion, is one of the most able and courageous men to sit in the Senate during the last 25 years. His article, which was published in the New York Times magazine section of yesterday, deals with the whole philosophical problem which faces every politician—namely, whether he ever has a right to compromise his conscience by compromising what he knows is a matter of principle.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BIG DILEMMA: CONSCIENCE OR VOTES

(By William Benton)

Should a legislator compromise his principles in order to be a successful politician? How far should he go in order to be elected? Is it enough to be right most of the time, but to yield, on occasion, to the predilections or even the prejudices of his constituents?

Many people have asked me about the dilemma implicit in these questions which has puzzled students of politics since representative government began. But, paradoxically, I have found that legislators themselves are much less puzzled—and not because they are morally insensitive. The problems they actually confront, either as candidates or as lawmakers, are rarely black-and-white issues of conscience. Almost always they are questions of prudence and judgment—the height of a tariff or a subsidy, the size of a budget item, or, more particularly, the best tactics for advancing a particular cause in the face of opposition from colleagues or from constituents at home.

Nevertheless, the classic dilemma has a new relevance. Issues of civil and human rights—for example, segregation—tend to fall in the category of conscience, and these are critically important today. We had a dramatic example last November in the write-in, paste-in blitz that unseated Representative Brooks Hayes in the Little Rock district because his record, his campaign and his conscience had classified him as a moderate on race issues.

It has been said that I was myself defeated in 1952 on an issue of conscience because I had insisted on denouncing Senator McCarthy and on demanding his expulsion from the Senate. The parallel is valid only in that I was willing, on principle, to take publicly a position that seemed politically dangerous at the time. As it turned out, I lost because 1952 was an Eisenhower year, not on the McCarthy issue, and I ran well ahead of the national ticket.

In the corridors of the Capitol in Washington one hears it said occasionally that if a Congressman votes right 95 percent of the time—that is, in accordance with his own best judgment—he can afford to be "wrong" on 5 percent of his votes—that is, against his own judgment or conscience—in seeking to serve some particular end, including his reelection. (He is supposed to console himself that his defeated opponent would doubtless have done worse.) The same formula has been said to apply to a campaign in which the candidate is forced to take controversial stands.

Is this attitude justifiable? Can such wrong votes be defended?

I invited some of my former colleagues to share in this discussion. They tend to focus on the question, Should a legislator, once elected, compromise as a matter of practical politics in order to push necessary legislation through? They see this as closely intertwined with the question, Should a legislator compromise his principles in order to be elected?

None of these colleagues will openly admit that a principle should ever be abandoned, under any circumstances. Almost all would agree with the formulation of Prof. T. V. Smith, the philosopher-politician, who wrote: "A politician is a man who can compromise an issue without compromising himself, and who can in a pinch give an issue away without himself away."

Two thoughtful Republicans who have just retired—voluntarily—after distinguished careers in Congress come to different conclusions about the issue of conscience and compromise as applied to segregation. I have worked intimately with both. They are men of high principle. Senator Ralph Flanders of Vermont, who seemingly does not want to see Governor Faubus in the Senate, writes me:

"There is a saying to the effect that 'a Senator's first duty is to get reelected.' This sounds a bit cynical, but there is a real vein of truth in it.

"If I were a southern Senator and were facing the Little Rock situation, I would be strongly moved to avoid the extreme segregationist position, but would also avoid crusading for antisegregation. I would join the moderates so far as seemed safe and hope for reelection, knowing that if I were defeated in the primaries my place would be taken by a rabid segregationist."

Representative John Vorys, of Ohio, who was the intellectual leader of the Republican minority interested in foreign policy in the House, says:

"I am extremely cautious about calling political decisions moral issues. On the other hand, I think that Congressmen and Senators are expendable rather than indispensable, and no Congressman or Senator should cast a vote he knows is wrong in order to be reelected. It makes no difference whether the wrongness is on a moral, legal, economic, or other issue.

"As Edmund Burke said: 'Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.'

"Taking the example you mention, I think that if a southern Senator is opposed morally to segregation he should vote his convictions and take his medicine. For one thing, he might be surprised to find how many people admire that kind of courage."

Two of my correspondents cited the vote on the 1957 civil rights bill and reached opposite conclusions. Senator WAYNE MORSE, of Oregon, never one to shirk an unpopular cause and one of the most courageous men in the history of the Senate, argues that the politician's dilemma can usually be resolved if he works hard enough at informing his constituents. He writes:

"Too often and too readily politicians—when they vote against something they know is in the public interest—fall back upon the excuse that 'I know it is right, but people don't understand it.'

"What these politicians don't understand themselves is that it is part of their function in representative government to get the facts across to the people so they will understand. Instead, they become panhandlers for votes. We have many in public life whe are afraid or unwilling to be defeated. Winning is their only goal, not true public service."

Senator MORSE is certain he could not have been reelected to the Senate in 1956, in the face of the Eisenhower landslide, if public opinion, which had opposed some of his votes when he cast them, had not later swung over to his view.

Having battled for civil rights throughout his career, he was nevertheless the only Senator outside the South who voted against the 1957 civil rights bill. Here is an example of his individuality and his spirit. He says:

"Of course, I recognize the need for compromise in legislation. But the civil rights bill of 1957 was passed because Members of Congress wanted to be on record as having voted for something with that title; their bill actually compromised the civil rights guarantee of the 14th amendment. I do not accept the view that such a compromise of principle is ever justified. When a principle is compromised it is destroyed and all that is left is a statement of expediency.

"'But,' says the doubter, 'when does the legislator know when he is dealing with a matter of principle?' The answer is that his brains and conscience always tell him so, and he always knows when he has compromised a principle."

Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, of New Mexico, one of the most able, experienced and humble men in public life, reached a different conclusion about the same measure:

"The House had passed a civil rights bill. It came to the Senate. The Judiciary Committee was bypassed and the bill came at once to the Senate floor. Some Senators were determined to try to pass a civil rights bill with the strongest possible language and the most drastic provisions. They could have adopted all their amendments, perhaps, but could never have passed the bill * * *.

"I became disturbed at the situation because I wanted a civil rights bill passed. * * * I talked it over with Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and out of our conference came my approach to Senator GEORGE AIKEN, of Vermont, whom I greatly admire. We developed an amendment and were subsequently joined in it by a third cosponsor, Senator FRANCIS CASE, of South Dakota. That amendment to section III was not pleasing to those who preferred defeat of the bill to any compromise, but it was adopted by the Senate and paved the way for adoption of another amendment previously offered by Senator O'MAHONEY and others. When the amending process was finished the southerners realized they could not successfully filibuster against the revised bill * * *.

"Maybe the civil rights bill was not everything it ought to be; maybe it will need to be amended in view of Little Rock and other spots. That will, however, come easier because of abuses which followed the passage of civil rights legislation by the 85th Congress and will be much easier than would have been the case had the no-compromise faction had its way and no bill resulted."

Senator JOHNSON of Texas, widely admired as majority leader of the Senate, writes me:

"The real issue is not whether a man should compromise—because I do not believe in compromising a principle—but whether he should insist on asserting his position aggressively on every single issue that comes along.

"Everybody is fond of quoting Clausewitz' dictum, 'War is politics carried on by other means'. The reverse is also true that politics is war carried on by other means. When it is viewed in that perspective the answer becomes somewhat more readily apparent. It would be ridiculous to say that a captain of infantry out on a scouting expedition should charge into a regiment that he meets unexpectedly.

"Nobody would expect him to do so. In fact, he would be court-martialed if he did anything other than the sensible thing, which is to fall back to the main body of troops and gather his forces so he can be ready for action when action is feasible.

"The captain of infantry has not compromised his position because he refused to sacrifice his men or his followers by fighting under impossible circumstances. Similarly, I do not think that the political leader should be accused of compromising his position because he too refused to fight on impossible terrain. It is essential for a political leader to be able to pick the terrain and the time upon which he will give battle."

Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, majority leader of the House of Representatives, whose job requires him to steer legislation through the House, seems to agree with Senator JOHNSON. He writes:

"As between partial progress and no progress, it seems to me that the constructive mind takes the road of progress.

"I never place myself mentally in the position of compromising principle and conscience. But there are times when I might harmonize differences in order to make progress, or maintain unity, and then start the journey from there.

"The extent of 'compromise' or 'harmonization' depends upon the circumstances of each case, the atmosphere, the strength of the opposition, as well as the support for a measure, and other factors. But sometimes there can be no 'compromise' or 'harmonization,' such as the extension of the Selective Service Act in 1941, 3 months before Pearl Harbor."

Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY's book, "Profiles in Courage," written in 1955, consists of case studies of political courage in the Senate going back to 1803. He finds that it sometimes takes courage to compromise. He writes in his book:

"We shall need compromises in the days ahead, to be sure. But these will, or should be, compromises of issues, not of principles. We can resolve the clash of interests without conceding our ideals * * *. Compromise need not mean cowardice. Indeed, it is frequently the compromisers and conciliators who are faced with the severest tests of political courage as they oppose the extremist views of their constituents. It was because Daniel Webster conscientiously favored compromise in 1850 that he earned a condemnation unsurpassed in the annals of political history."

Senator KENNEDY now writes me:

"I think even more now than I did in 1955 that the politician faces this dilemma more than the member of any other professional or occupational group. Others face different moral choices perhaps, wondering when a compromise is one of accommodation or one of principle—but no one else has to do it in such a glare of publicity, or in such an irretrievable manner, on a permanent record, and with only the answer of an 'aye' or 'nay' to choose between."

This last point is of high importance. There are no footnotes in the voting record; each vote is the monosyllable "aye" or "nay." The business executive seldom faces such dilemmas. His mistakes tend to be buried in the overall record of profit and loss—or at least they can be explained in his annual report.

In my opinion, these statements by Senators and Congressmen (and others like them I have not quoted) deserve the highest respect, even from those who may disagree.

Further, my own experience as a legislator persuades me that Congressmen are fully justified in intermingling the question of campaign policies and tactics with the question of legislative policies and tactics. These two are inseparable. The great majority of legislators who are elected in a given year in the United States—Federal, State, and local—have been reelected. From the moment they were first sworn in as legislators they were running for reelection and this is seldom out of their thoughts. Each must run on his legislative record; he knows his next opponent will scrutinize that record with a magnifying glass.

Finally, the issues that actually confront a legislator are rarely simple. When a major bill reaches the floor it is a long, complex document. If a Congressman or Senator disagrees with some aspect of it, he may seek to amend that aspect from the floor—but it is usually an exercise in futility. Generally he must cast his "aye" or "nay" on its net value.

In my judgment it is often impossible for a legislator clearly to separate considerations of prudence from moral principles. Indeed, he must frequently fall back on prudence if he is to advance his moral principles.

One of America's greatest social thinkers, the late Prof. Robert Redfield, discussing progress toward race equality, pointed out that a right and moral action may in some circumstances defeat or postpone the social end it is intended to serve.

Abraham Lincoln never doubted that slavery was wrong. Yet in December 1860, a month after his election as President, he offered to guarantee to the Southern States, in perpetuity, their right to a slave system, providing they agreed there should be no extension of slavery in the territories. Lincoln hoped that this offer might avert civil war; and undoubtedly he hoped also that the slave system would in time dissolve and disappear.

The danger in the argument for prudence is that, for those of us who are less than Lincolns, it can be an excuse for weakness. Like most other men, politicians too often underestimate the long-range values of boldness and stubbornness in defense of an ideal. Gandhi can be an example as well as Lincoln. Gandhi won because he was bold and stubborn and preferred jail to compromise.

I am so impressed with this danger that I cannot personally agree with any argument to the effect that a legislator need be morally right only 95 percent of the time—and can thus give away the other 5 percent even if it involves an affront to his conscience.

Ultimately, each Member of Congress must make his own decision each time a matter of principle arises—to compromise or not to compromise, to stand fast or to yield ground in the belief that his action will help achieve the desired final goal. His burden is that he must make the decision again and again and again—and not just once in a moment of emotional intensity—for there may be some 200 "aye" or "no" rollcall votes each year plus hundreds of votes in committee or elsewhere, any one of which may involve a moral choice.

A whole nation will be watching. But for each Member of Congress the decisions, whatever they may be, must be taken in the solitude of heart and mind and conscience.

Ground-Breaking Ceremonies, Sunday, April 26, 1959, for the New Reserve Training Center, Bellefonte, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, before a large crowd of interested citizens ground was broken Sunday, April 26, 1959, for the Army's new Reserve Training Center at Bellefonte, Pa. It was my privilege to deliver the principal address, which follows:

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, AT THE GROUND-BREAKING CEREMONY FOR THE NEW ARMY RESERVE TRAINING CENTER, BELLEFONTE, PA., APRIL 26, 1959

It is an honor to have been invited to participate in these ceremonies.

The Reserve training facility which will be constructed at this location is one of thousands of similar installations throughout the country authorized by the Congress of the United States to provide our Reserve forces with the necessary physical facilities.

The Army Reserve training facility which will be constructed here will house the 430th Quartermaster Company, and the 1st platoon, A Company, 491st Engineer Battalion.

This armory, when completed, will cost nearly $300,000 and both of these combat support units will then be able to maintain their proficiency in the complicated art of modern warfare.

Speaking of our Reserve forces as a whole, they have not always been in the favorable position of having available adequate training facilities that the Bellefonte units will have available in the near future.

Frankly, prior to World War II and also for a period of 4 or 5 years after World War II, our Reserve forces were sadly neglected.

However, at that time the Congress recognizing the deplorable state of our Reserve forces enacted into law the National Defense Facilities Act of 1950.

The National Defense Facilities Act of 1950 enacted as Public Law 683, 81st Congress, initially authorized the appropriation of Federal funds in the amount of $250 million over a period of 5 consecutive fiscal years for the acquisition, construction, and expansion of facilities for the several Reserve components.

In 1955, Public Law 302 of the 84th Congress increased this basic authorization to $500 million and extended the time period during which this authorization remained in effect until 1958.

Subsequently, by succeeding legislation this general authorization was increased to $668 million.

Under the provisions of this basic law—which is the keystone upon which our Reserve facilities programs operate—Congress has indicated it would underwrite the construction of permanent training facilities throughout the country so as to insure the maintenance of an adequate Reserve program.

Under the provisions of this legislation armories are constructed which are 100 percent federally owned and authority is also given to contribute to the individual States for the construction of new National Guard facilities.

In the latter case, the Federal Government contributes 75 percent of the money required for the development of the Reserve facilities in conformance with Federal requirements.

At this point I would like to briefly review the actual status of this program.

ARMY NATIONAL GUARD

Upon enactment of the National Defense Facilities Act of 1950 the several States and Territories had in existance only 916 armories adequate to properly house federally recognized units, and these facilities were constructed without Federal assistance provided therein.

Subsequent to the enactment of the aforementioned legislation the Army National Guard has completed or placed under construction contract more than 1,000 armories with appropriate Federal contributions as I previously indicated.

U.S. ARMY RESERVE

There are, in the case of the U.S. Army Reserve over 1,810 U.S. Army Reserve centers in use including those constructed, leased, or donated.

However, only 458 of these leased and donated facilities are reported by Army commanders concerned to be adequate for continued longrange use.

Therefore, in the cast of the U.S. Army Reserve the Department of Defense with the permission of Congress has initiated a vigorous and accelerated program of construction designed to replace existing inadequate facilities.

Thus, during 1958 there were 112 new centers under construction and 80 additional centers were programed for fiscal year 1959 and 1960 thereby resulting in a total of more than 465 newly constructed facilities for the U.S. Army Reserve by the end of fiscal year 1961.

NAVAL RESERVE

At present, there are 300 Naval Reserve training centers, 19 Naval Reserve training facilities, 155 electronics facilities, and 9 electronic stations.

Of the 319 training centers and facilities, 74 percent are used jointly with one or more other Reserve components of the Armed Forces.

MARINE CORPS RESERVE

The Marine Corps Reserve occupies a total of 230 facilities.

Of the 230 training centers 156 are jointly occupied with the Naval Reserve, 2 jointly with the Army and Naval Reserve, and one with the Army Reserve.

The remaining 71 facilities consist of 48 federally owned training centers and 25 commercially leased.

AIR NATIONAL GUARD

The Air National Guard program is of comparatively recent origin.

However, during fiscal year 1958 funds in the amount of $22 million were utilized in the construction of facilities for the Air National Guard.

Under the National Defense Facilities Act of 1950, these projects are completely supported by Federal funds and require no State contribution.

At the present time there are 573 Air National Guard units in operation occupying a total of 134 Air Force National Guard bases.

Ninety-three of these bases are flying bases and the balance of 41 are nonflying bases.

AIR FORCE RESERVE

In the case of the Air Force Reserve 37 flying bases are now operational.

Twenty of these bases are jointly used with the Regular Air Force, nine bases are jointly used with the Air National Guard, three bases are jointly used in connection with the Navy, and only five bases are confined solely to Air Force Reserve operations.

In addition to the foregoing, there are 93 Air Reserves centers (nonflying) where tactical nonflying training is conducted.

COAST GUARD RESERVE

Due to its relatively small size, the Coast Guard utilizes training facilities of the other Armed Forces, primarily those of the Navy or existing facilities of Coast Guard operating units.

In a few instances, space is leased for drill sites from other Government agencies or commercial interest.

READINESS OF THE RESERVE

The assignment to the National Guard of concurrent responsibility with Regular Army forces for the manning of Nike batteries located throughout the United States is indicative of not only the state of readiness of various Reserve components but reveals the new mission of the Reserves in modern warfare.

Assignment of 24 more Army National Guard Nike batteries to the air defense of key U.S. cities will take place between June 30 and September 1, 1959.

These batteries, now in their final stages of training, represent elements of 14 National Guard air defense missile battalions in 7 States.

They will take over Nike-Ajax sites from the Active Army and will have full operational responsibility for manning these sites 24 hours a day.

In each battalion, one or more batteries will become active.

The designation of these National Guard units to man Nike batteries will bring to 28 the total number of Army National Guard batteries in the on-site missile program.

The overall program calls for the deployment of 33 battalions at 116 sites by June 30, 1962.

All 24 of the batteries scheduled to go on-site this summer have key personnel currently training at the Army air defense center at Fort Bliss, Tex.

The remaining members are actually training at Nike sites under the supervision of the Active Army.

Final transfer of the sites from the Active Army and deployment of the National Guard units will take place following 2 weeks of field training this summer.

National Guard missile sites are operated in much of the same way as a volunteer fire department.

A nucleus of full-time technicians man the equipment around the clock, keeping it in constant readiness and capable of initiating effective fire on the enemy without additional help.

The remaining members of the unit are citizen soldiers in their communities and keep up on their military skills by attending weekly drills with their units.

In the event of an air attack, they would report immediately to their Nike sites, ready to perform their assigned mission.

Similar to the utilization of the Army National Guard units in connection with the manning of Nike installations is the proposed plan of the Department of the Air Force which envisages utilization of Air National Guard units for the manning of Bomarc defense installations throughout the country.

Inasmuch as these Bomarc installations are still in the process of construction actual assignments of individual Air National Guard units have not occurred.

However, it is fully intended by the Department of the Air Force to utilize these Reserve forces in connection with the future development of this program.

In conclusion, as a member of the House Committee on Armed Services, which has legislative jurisdiction over the Reserves of our country, I wish to take this opportunity to commend the officers and men of Bellefonte's Army Reserve units and at the same time congratulate and thank the citizens of this area for the support they have always given our civilian soldiers, sailors, and airmen who in the final analysis are the bulwark of our Nation's defense.

Program for National Forests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, many of our colleagues know of my interest in natural resources. In recent years, I have become gravely concerned as to what can happen to these resources under the accelerated impact of intensified use. I refer specifically to the 181 million acres of national forests in 39 States and Puerto Rico.

In any vast enterprise of this kind, long-range planning to meet both current and future resource needs is vital. Such plans are of little use if a strong action program fails to materialize. First, however, we must have the basic plans before the Congress can intelligently move into an effective action program.

Notwithstanding the efficient manner in which the Forest Service has managed the national forests over the past 50 years, the next 50 years will be characterized by multiple problems in meeting the needs and demands of millions of people for the resources the forests provide.

It is gratifying, therefore, that the Department of Agriculture has moved to make the next 50 years of Forest Service management of the national forests more complete and comprehensive. They have recently submitted to the Congress a report which provides the needed measures to meet both current demands on the forests and the resource development needs to the year 2000. This report is now in the hands of the House Agiculture Committee. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRANT], chairman of the subcommittee on forestry, has announced hearings on this forest program for May 14 and 15. It is a program that should have the full support of the Members from every State.

The second largest area of national forest land in the Nation is in my congressional district. These 13 million acres are exceeded only by the 15½ million acres of my colleague from the first district of Idaho, Mrs. PFOST. This vast storehouse of natural resources, water, timber, game, fish, forage, and recreation, is dedicated to the use of not only Montana's citizens but also to citizens everywhere in America.

The tourist industry is booming everywhere, people naturally go to the forests for recreation and respite from the tensions arising in crowded urban areas. Our forests in Montana attract thousands of these outdoor enthusiasts. We have beautiful scenery, fine streams, and good places to camp. However, we need additional sanitation and other campground facilities to relieve overcrowding in the presently developed areas in western Montana.

This "program for the national forests" now before the Congress includes the projects necessary to meet the recreational needs of an expected 130 million annual visitors by 1969. For example, it is estimated that 10,000 new camp and picnic areas should be constructed and maintained during the next 10 years. It will be necessary to maintain and expand 5,000 existing improved recreation areas. Also many of the existing areas need improved sanitation, cleanup, and public safety facilities to make them adequate to handle the some 70 million visitors now coming to the national forests.

The annual harvest of timber is expected to increase from 7 to 11 billion board feet of timber within the next 10 to 15 years under this program. Salvage and sale of stagnant timber stands will be increased, up-to-date timber inventories will be made, and timber management plans will be completed for all the national forests. Last year the billion dollar mark in forest receipts was reached. Under this program for full development of the national forests, the second billion dollars in forest income should be realized within the next 10 years. Not only the Federal Treasury, but also every county with national forest land benefits from the increased sale of timber and other forest resources. Twenty-five percent of the gross receipts is refunded to the counties within the forest for schools and roads. Local employment is benefitted in cutting and harvesting the timber crop. Local industries are kept active and the general economy of an area within or adjacent to the forests is enhanced.

Under this program the building or rebuilding of about 90,000 miles of forest development roads and 8,000 miles of trails is planned. Also 149,700 miles of existing roads will be maintained to full standards. In Montana's national forests such roads are necessary if the full cut of timber is to be harvested and if the forests are to be protected and managed in an effective and businesslike manner.

There are many other facets in this complete program for the national forests. It is an essential program which can return benefits many times over the projected costs. An important secondary benefit would be a 60 percent increase in the number of workers harvesting, processing and marketing the nation-forest timber crop and other forest products.

This will mean jobs for some 620,000 more people. Local trade channels alone could be enriched by nearly a billion dollars which the public would spend for hunting and fishing equipment, licenses, lodging, transportation, and other items furnished by communities in or near our forests.

Mr. Speaker, this is a program which will not only improve forest land and its resources but also provide substantial direct financial returns both locally and nationally. The intangible benefits also will be great.

This report would have been complete had it included tentative estimates of costs, schedules, and priorities for placing various phases of the plan into operation and estimates of total benefits as related to the cost of developing these benefits.

We, in the Montana congressional delegation, have had some experience with attempting to secure just such information. Last July, we asked our regional forester to lay out a program to fully develop Montana's forest resources. Regional Forester Charles Tebbe did an excellent job, which has been printed as Senate Document No. 9, "Full Use and Development of Montana's Timber Resources." However, the regional forester did not furnish the cost estimates and priorities we requested, presumably because he was ordered not to.

On January 14, the senior Senator from Montana, Senator MURRAY, the junior Senator from Montana, Senator MANSFIELD, my colleague [Mr. ANDERSON] and I wrote the Secretary of Agriculture. We asked his cooperation in having Mr. Tebbe provide by April 1 the balance of the information we had requested. To date, we have heard nothing further from that request. If we can't get the costs and priorities for a long-range forest resource development program for a single State in 5 months' time, I wonder how long it will take the Congress to get some figures on a program for the whole Nation.

We must remember, too, that even long-range development programs, such as Mission 66 and Operation Outdoors, which were submitted with costs and priorities, are now way behind schedule because requested funds were insufficient to carry them forward at the well-publicized rate.

I hope that, during the hearings, the committee will be able to get some cost figures on this proposal, so the Congress can relate them to the benefits.

Nuclear Super Aircraft Carrier

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, April 27, 1959

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the House Appropriations Committee to reinstate the Navy Department's No. 1 priority—a super aircraft carrier—in the Defense Department's budget for the coming fiscal year.

Fifteen times since World War II, the United States and its allies have been faced with threats to our mutual security on foreign soil, and fifteen times our aircraft carriers were there, prepared to cope with the crisis. Aircraft carriers are, and will be, needed to meet not only world crises, but so-called local conflicts, for a long time to come. Their mightful presence had meaningful deterrent effect in such crises as Lebanon, Quemoy, Matsu, Korea, Jordan, Iraq, Suez, and so forth.

Larger superclass carriers are needed because the latest jet aircraft require minimum 750-foot runways. The only way they can be accommodated is by the building of larger carriers. In addition, American boys are entitled to as much operational safety as is humanly possible to provide. Smaller Essex class carriers have a higher aircraft operational accident rate.

Leadtime on the construction of new carriers is of the essence. It takes at least 4 years from the time money is appropriated to the time a carrier becomes an operational unit in the fleet. If the decision to appropriate funds for a needed carrier is put off 1 year, then a year's precious time is lost in our defense effort.

We are pouring millions upon millions of dollars into outer space research and development. Aircraft carriers concern a defense matter which is a lot closer and of more immediate need to us today.

Because of the increased fuel requirement for jet aircraft, larger carriers with greater fuel storage space are needed. Under today's naval tactics the carrier also carries fuel for its escort vessels. Increased size of our carriers will therefore increase the operational range of carrier task forces. Construction of a nuclear carrier is to be preferred to that of a conventional carrier. While a nuclear carrier will cost approximately $100 million more to construct, its cost can be amortized by lesser costs in other ships over a period of 5 to 6 years. In addition, a nuclear plant will permit less fuel space for the carrier's own operational needs, allowing for more aircraft and personnel.

An aircraft carrier can readily be converted into a mobile propulsion pad for missiles. They have a decided advantage over stationary missile sites. They are constantly on the move and thus better able to elude the enemy's lethal missiles.

As Adm. John T. Hayward stated in a recent telecast, not only are jet bombers here to stay, but in time they will be equipped with the latest missiles. Our mobile aircraft fleet will be needed to bring them within range of the vital targets within the enemy's home borders.

I believe that we must not only plan ahead but must make firm all facets of our lines of defense. Aircraft carriers today are in the forefront of that main line of defense. A delay of a year or two means a delay of 5 or 6 years in obtaining a carrier prepared to defend us.

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1959

(Legislative day of Monday, April 27, 1959)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, the baffling pressures and problems of the times in which our lives are set bring to our lips a cry of our inadequacy.

Who is sufficient for these things?

As the immediate claims all we have and are, we would not dream of days that seem heroic in the cause of freedom, either in the past, when great leaders led crusades for the rights of men, or in some mystical future, when men may find conditions once again calling for fearless daring.

Show us the high adventure that awaits us in these days of destiny.

Reveal to us how vast are the issues and how great the enterprise committed now to our hands in the tangled affairs of our agitated world.

In a time that calls for heroism, make heroes of us all, rising with courage to the challenge of evil, putting on Thy armor to withstand the forces that war against the virtue and happiness of our race, Thy children.

We ask it in the name of Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, April 27, 1959, was dispensed with.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. DIRKSEN, and by unanimous consent, the Insurance Subcommittee of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be the usual morning hour, with statements in connection therewith limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON REVIEW OF SUPPLY ACTIVITIES OF U.S. ARMY IN EUROPE

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a classified report on the review of supply activities, U.S. Army in Europe (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

AMENDMENT OF U.S. INFORMATION AND EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE ACT OF 1948

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to promote the foreign policy of the United States by amending the U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (Public Law 402, 80th Congress) (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A letter from the Director, U.S. Information Agency, Washington, D.C., relating to the above-mentioned proposed legislation; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS PRIOR TO RESTORATION OF BALANCES

A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, three reports prior to restoration of balances, as of March 31, 1959 (with accompanying reports); to the Committee on Government Operations.

CONSERVATION OF FISH AND WILDLIFE RESOURCES OF ALASKA

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, certifying, pursuant to law, that the Alaska State Legislature has made adequate provision for the administration, management, and conservation of the fish and wildlife resources of Alaska, in the broad national interest (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORT ON BACKLOG OF PENDING APPLICATIONS AND HEARING CASES IN FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

A letter from the Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the backlog of pending applications and hearing cases in that Commission, as of February 28, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

EXTENSION OF TERMINATION DATE OF COMMISSION AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON INTERNATIONAL RULES OF JUDICIAL PROCEDURE

A letter from the Chairman, Commission on International Rules of Judicial Procedure, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the act to establish a Commission and Advisory Committee on International Rules of Judicial Procedure to extend the termination date, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT, AND SECTION 152, TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE

A letter from the Director, Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Washington, D.C., transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend section 57a of the Bankruptcy Act (11 U.S.C. 93(a)) and section 152, title 18, United States Code (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF ALIENS—WITHDRAWAL OF NAMES

Two letters from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice, withdrawing the names of Yuen Hong, also known as Wong Kee Leung or Wong Joe, and George Wong from reports relating to aliens whose deportation has been suspended, transmitted to the Senate on February 15, 1958, and February 16, 1959, respectively; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

A letter from the Administrator, General Services Administration, Washington, D.C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Archivist of the United States on records proposed for disposal under the law (with accompanying papers); to a Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. CARLSON members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION 14

"Resolution relative to civil defense

"Whereas the development of new methods of warfare has subjected the civilian population of the United States to increasing risks in the event of an attack on this country; and

"Whereas with weapons now available an enemy nation could launch an attack on virtually any sector of the United States; and

"Whereas the protection and orderly relief of the civilian population in event of attack has thus become a problem that cannot be met solely by the States and local governments; and

"Whereas the 85th Congress, recognizing this broadened concept, adopted Public Law 606, which provides for civil defense responsibilities to be assumed jointly by the Federal Government and the States and their political subdivisions; and

"Whereas Public Law 606 declares as a matter of policy that matching funds will be provided by the Federal Government up to 50 percent to States and local subdivisions for personnel and administrative expenses; and

"Whereas a supplemental appropriations bill to implement the provisions of Public Law 606 was introduced in the 85th Congress but did not pass, due primarily to the limitations of time; and

"Whereas an appropriations bill for the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization will be introduced during the 86th Congress, which, if enacted, will provide funds to carry out the provisions of Public Law 606; and

"Whereas this bill will have the full support of the governors, mayors, government officials on all levels, and civil defense citizens' advisory committees concerned with the protection of life and property in this Country during times of national emergency or disaster; Now therefore be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the members of this legislature respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States to adopt such an appropriations measure for the benefits it will provide to the entire Nation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to Congressman CLARENCE CANNON of Missouri, Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, to Senator CARL HAYDEN of Arizona, Chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION 8

"Resolution relative to the selection of the city of Antioch as a site for an experimental saline water conversion plant

"Whereas Contra Costa County has experienced a 265 percent growth of population in the last 18 years, with an attendant increase of industrial development, which industrial development has greatly manifested itself in the general vicinity of the city of Antioch; and

"Whereas the northerly shore of Contra Costa County, upon which the city of Antioch and its extensive industrial developments are situated, has historically enjoyed an available supply of fresh water throughout most of the year; and

"Whereas that supply has steadily deteriorated, due to salt water intrusion, caused by upstream water diversions and storage on the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers and their tributaries, with the attendant threat to growth of municipal communities and industrial developments in Contra Costa County; and

"Whereas the U.S. Bureau of Reclamation has taken the position that salinity control is not a proper function of the Central Valley project, has only tacitly agreed that releases from Shasta Dam, the only present means of controlling salinity encroachment and brackish conditions, will not be diminished until Contra Costa County finds another solution to its problem; and

"Whereas economical conversion of brackish to fresh water could solve this county's problem by supplying an adequate amount of water for domestic, agricultural and industrial uses as replacement for water lost through upstream diversions; and

"Whereas the Antioch site is an ideal one for a conversion plant since the seasonal variations in salinity of offshore water and the many varied uses in and near Antioch for fresh water, will provide ideal conditions for making economic analysis of the conversion process: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States, and the United States Department of the Interior, to take such action as may be necessary for the selection of the city of Antioch as a site for an experimental saline brackish water conversion plant and that the program be augmented to provide for an additional saline brackish water conversion plant to be located in California; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, and to the Secretary of the Interior."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 87

"Whereas there is an urgent need for small boat harbors to serve the economic, recreational, and safety needs in the Territory of Hawaii; and

"Whereas it becomes necessary to make comprehensive engineering studies to determine the sites best suited to meet the forementioned needs; and

"Whereas the Territory of Hawaii has already appropriated funds for the construction of many small boat harbors and feels that many more are necessary for the safety and to meet the economic needs of our people; and

"Whereas the United States Corps of Engineers has already started studies on needs and costs of small boat harbors with a previous appropriations of $20,000; and

"Whereas it is estimated that to make complete studies of this problem will cost between $300,000 and $400,000: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the 30th Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to appropriate the sum of $400,000 and make it available to the United States Corps of Engineers for the purpose of completing the engineering studies aimed at determining the best and most economical locations of harbors of refuge and small boat harbors in the island chain; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this concurrent resolution be sent to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

"THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
"Honolulu, Hawaii, April 20, 1959.

"We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the Senate of the 30th Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii on April 18, 1959.

"_____ _____,
"President of the Senate.
"JAMES H. KAMO,
"Clerk of the Senate.

"THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
"Honolulu, Hawaii, April 20, 1959.

"We hereby certify that the foregoing concurrent resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives of the 30th Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii on April 18, 1959.

"_____ _____,
"Speaker, House of Representatives.
"_____ _____,
"Clerk, House of Representatives."

A resolution adopted at the 12th annual convention of the International Council of Sugar Workers and Allied Industries Unions, at Salt Lake City, favoring the enactment of legislation to extend the Sugar Act of the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

The petition of Ignatius Page, Jr., of St. Louis, Mo., praying for a redress of grievances; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The petitions of Vincent D'Emidio, the Bronx, Hyman Hershkowitz, of Brooklyn, and Leo Falconier, of Long Island, all of the State of New York, relating to job classifications in the Federal Government; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

A resolution adopted by the Valley-Wide Committee on Streets and Highways, San Fernando, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide funds for the continuance of the construction of the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. KERR:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on Public Works:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 531

"Resolution memorializing Congress to provide the ways and means of constructing the Kaw Dam and Reservoir project upon the Central Arkansas River Basin

"Whereas that geographical area of north central Oklahoma lying within the boundaries of Kay and Osage Counties possesses a natural drainage basin caused by the confluence of the Arkansas River, the Walnut River, and the Little Beaver and Beaver Creeks; and

"Whereas the construction of the Kaw Dam and Reservoir on the main stem of the Arkansas River in Kay and Osage Counties, Okla., would provide the multifold benefits of flood control, development of hydroelectric power, and other allied purposes; and

"Whereas this area, designated as the Central Arkansas River Basin, has in recent years developed a great need for additional water resources in order to supply increasing demands of its industrial, agricultural, and household users; and

"Whereas studies of this great basin area reveal that construction of the Kaw Dam, impounding the waters of the above streams and providing a reservoir with a 1,400,000 acre-feet storage capacity, would be capable of adequately supplying the needs of this area; and

"Whereas this reservoir when constructed will bring an additional $3 million annually in business for north central Oklahoma and south central Kansas due to a growth of industrial and recreational activities; and

"Whereas the construction of the Kaw Dam and Reservoir would provide a sound long-range investment in the general welfare of the area, the State and the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of the 27th Oklahoma Legislature (the honorable senate concurring therein):

"SECTION 1. That we respectfully request the 86th Congress of the United States, now assembled in its 1st session, to provide the ways and means to initiate construction of the Kaw Dam and Reservoir on the main stem of the Arkansas River in Kay and Osage Counties of the State of Oklahoma in the direct interest of flood control, hydroelectric power, navigation, water storage, and conservation and other allied purposes.

"SEC. 2. That the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army Engineer District, Tulsa, is urged to expedite all engineering and planning necessary for the construction of the Kaw Dam and Reservoir for the benefit of the entire State of Oklahoma and the United States of America.

"SEC. 3. That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be transmitted to each member of the Oklahoma congressional delegation.

"SEC. 4. That six copies of this resolution be delivered to representatives of the Corps of Engineers, U.S. Army Engineer District, Tulsa, at the public hearing to be held in Ponca City, Okla., in the Ponca City Junior High School auditorium, located at Sixth and Grand, beginning at 1 p.m. on April 24, 1959.

"Adopted by the house of representatives the 15th day of April 1959.

"CLINT G. LIVINGSTON,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives.

"Adopted by the senate the 20th day of April 1959.

"FRED R. HARRIS,
"Acting President of the Senate."

RESOLUTION OF FARMERS UNION, ELLSWORTH COUNTY, KANS.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Farmers Union of Ellsworth County, Kans., adopted a resolution at its regular meeting on April 9 urging an increase in farm prices.

The Department of Agriculture recently stated that the farmer's share of the consumer's food dollar in 1958 amounted to 40 cents, compared with the 53 cents received in 1946.

The Department also stated that present indications are the farmer will receive less of the food dollar in 1959 than in 1958.

The resolution is most timely, based on the increased reduction in the percentage of the dollar received by the farmer.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the present farm program has failed to increase farmers' income; and

Whereas the Congress needs to take action to improve farm income: Therefore

Resolved, That the Ellsworth Farmers Union in session this 9th day of April request the Congress pass legislation to encourage an upward trend in farm prices; and further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senators ANDREW SCHOEPPEL, FRANK CARLSON, and Congressman WINT SMITH and to the press.

ELLSWORTH COUNTY FARMERS UNION,
W. C. KRUEGER, President,
ROBERT HULSE,
Secretary and Treasurer.

RESOLUTION OF MISSOURI RIVER STATES COMMITTEE

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Missouri River States Committee met on April 15 at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and adopted a resolution urging increased appropriations and authorization for additional reclamation and flood control projects in the Missouri River Basin.

This committee is composed of the Governors of the States of Iowa, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wyoming and was created in 1941.

As Governor of the State of Kansas from 1947 to 1951, I was a member of the committee and served one term as chairman of the committee.

The control of water runoff and the conservation of water for beneficial uses is one of the most important problems confronting the entire basin, and I sincerely hope that we can continue the development of a program that will mean much to the Nation and particularly to the Missouri River Basin.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Appropriations Committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the Missouri River States Committee, consisting of the Governors of the States of Iowa, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wyoming, comprising one-sixth of the area of the United States of America, in meeting assembled, do hereby adopt the following resolution:

Whereas the Missouri River States Committee, created in December of 1941, was organized for the express purpose of securing flood control, irrigation, navigation, power development, and related improvements of the entire Missouri River Basin; and

Whereas through the efforts of the Missouri River States Committee and other groups, the Missouri Basin Project was authorized by Congress in the year 1944; and

Whereas during the 15 years since that time substantial progress has been made in meeting the objectives of flood control, navigation, water supply, and power development and, to a lesser degree, irrigation and other improvements; and

Whereas the orderly development of natural and human resources of the Missouri River Basin is impeded and severely handicapped by the "no new starts" policy; and

Whereas said "no new starts" policy impairs the economic strength of the entire country by preventing the development of natural resources in the basin as an investment in the future welfare and security of the United States as a whole; and

Whereas the construction of planned projects would strengthen the economic base of this region and of our whole country at a time when full development and use of our national resources are urgently needed in the struggle between the free world and the areas of the earth dominated by Communists: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this committee urge the Congress of the United States to implement its authorizations of reclamation and flood control and other projects by appropriating the necessary money for the initiation of said projects; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded by the Chairman of the Missouri River States Committee to the Honorable Clarence Cannon, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States and the Honorable Carl Hayden, chairman of Appropriations Committee of the Senate of the United States.

RESOLUTION OF LODGE 434, SLOVENE NATIONAL BENEFIT SOCIETY, ARMA, KANS.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, Lodge No. 434 of the Slovene National Benefit Society met at Arma, Kans., and adopted a resolution urging an increase in social-security payments.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Social Security System now in existence does not provide adequate funds to enable retired persons to carry adequate to its present position; and

Whereas the retired people have given their productive years to building up our country to its present position; and

Whereas the cost of private health insurance is rapidly rising to a point where millions of retired people cannot afford such insurance, while the Government expends billions of dollars for domestic subsidies and foreign aid; Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the 86th Congress of the United States now in session give serious consideration and support to the health insurance bill introduced by Representative FORAND or similar legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senators and Representatives, and that they be urged to vote for the proposal mentioned above.

STATEMENT AND RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CONFERENCE OF AMERICANS OF CENTRAL AND EASTERN EUROPEAN DESCENT

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the annual meeting of the Conference of Americans of Central and Eastern European Descent, held recently in New York City, adopted a number of important resolutions. This group, representing more than 15 million American citizens from 10 nations, has strongly advocated over the years a policy of peaceful liberation of the enslaved nations and has vigorously opposed the international Communist conspiracy by all means at its command.

Because these people know from first-hand experience the tactics and objectives of the Communists, they recognize the necessity for an American foreign policy based on firmness and strength. This is the only language the Communists understand, and the sooner all Americans recognize that fact, the stronger we will be in our united resolve to curb this atheistic menace and to free the noble peoples now trapped behind the Iron Curtain. As a strong advocate of that position, I am pleased to learn that this fine organization has not wavered in its stand.

The resolutions adopted by the Conference of Americans of Central and Eastern European Descent deserve wide study. I ask unanimous consent that a political statement and resolutions be printed in the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POLITICAL STATEMENT AND RESOLUTIONS

(The following statement and resolutions were adopted at the annual meeting of the Conference of Americans of Central and Eastern European Descent (CACEED), held in New York City on Saturday, February 28, 1959.)

POLITICAL STATEMENT

The Conference of Americans of Central and Eastern European Descent, representing over 15 million U.S. citizens, pledges itself to support and subscribe to a firm and determined policy of the United States of America capable of challenging and resisting Soviet Russian imperialistic expansion and domination. It is our firm belief that the time has come for the United States Government to reject the dangerous policy of expediency and to stand upon principle. The West collectively will only adequately meet the threat and challenge of Soviet Russian Communist aggression by adopting a definite and dynamic policy and program of action, thus recapturing the initiative in foreign affairs.

It is our wholehearted conviction that the Berlin crisis, thrust upon us by the aggressive policy of the Soviet Union, offers the West an opportunity to proceed vigorously toward the elimination of two major causes of tension in Europe: the division of Germany and the subjugation of Albania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and the Ukraine. These causes are at the root of the present international tension and the armament race, and are, by their very nature, interconnected and indivisible. The issue of Berlin cannot be isolated from that of the reunification of Germany, and the problem of Germany cannot be divorced from that of Central and Eastern Europe. Any overall European settlement which would deal exclusively with Germany would soon prove itself unrealistic and would be doomed to failure.

The practical result of any Western plan which, in return for some form of German reunification, would abandon the rest of Central and Eastern Europe, and would at the same time cripple the Western defenses, would be to destroy confidence in U.S. leadership and to weaken, both in the free and captive parts of Europe, the will to challenge Soviet Russian Communist aggression and domination.

In the Russian Communist empire there are millions of human beings who are there against their will and who live under constant terror and oppression. The free world has not established outpost parties behind the Iron Curtain. Yet it has natural outposts there: Conquered peoples, minds that resist totalitarianism. We should bolster the resistance of the captive peoples, who through the past years have constituted one of the most effective deterrents to further Soviet Russian aggression in Europe and Asia, and we should motivate political pressures toward the creation of conditions in which Soviet Russia would have to yield.

The shocking revelation of the murderous Russian assault on 17 American airmen aboard an unarmed transport plane last September reemphasizes the futility of expecting the U.S.S.R. to live up to any accepted standards of conduct among nations. Consequently, every sign of hesitancy, every proposal which would weaken our resistance, only strengthens the conviction of the Soviet Russian rulers that an unyielding and provocative stand on their part will compel us to pass from one concession to another, until the acceptance of any Soviet Russian terms, in a face-saving formula, would appear a tempting course of action.

RESOLUTIONS

Taking into consideration the grave international situation as created by Moscow in connection with the Berlin issue, and firmly calling on the U.S. Government not to yield to Soviet Russian threats and blandishments, the annual meeting of CACEED adopted unanimously the following resolutions:

1. To send a letter of sympathy and encouragement to Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, for a rapid recovery from his present illness. Secretary of State Dulles has proved to be a stalwart and intrepid statesman and leader of the free world; therefore, his statesmanship and leadership is much needed in this hour of aggravated international tension.

2. To support fully and unhesitatingly the endeavors of the U.S. Government in its policy of maintaining world peace and in its growing determination to oppose and challenge the aggressive policies of the Kremlin. In particular, we pledge our full support for a firm U.S. policy regarding Berlin, which we believe, must be defended no matter what the consequences might be.

3. To oppose a "summit" meeting with the Soviet leaders, under the existing circumstances, as we believe that such a meeting would not solve the present international crisis, but would only serve to enhance the prestige and power of the Communist world, and would further weaken the position of the free world, including the United States of America.

4. To prevail upon the U.S. Government to formulate its policy with respect to the captive nations, both inside and outside the U.S.S.R., with the goal of the liberation of those nations. This course would be in line with the liberation policy so strongly affirmed several years ago, which has yet to be implemented.

5. We oppose most vigorously the present Moscow-inspired trends toward disengagement which would create a political and military vacuum, leaving Europe at the mercy of Soviet Russian expansionism. We also warn against the dangers of flexibility which is but another facet of the old coexistence policy and which in the final analysis would eventually terminate in capitulation and surrender to Moscow.

6. We appeal to the U.S. Government to prevail upon the U.S. mission to the United Nations to continue its efforts toward nonrecognition of the Hungarian puppet representation in the United Nations, inasmuch as the present Janos Kadar regime has been installed by the Soviet armed forces and as such does not represent the Hungarian people.

7. We oppose most emphatically the membership of Red China in the United Nations, because Red China has been guilty of many crimes against both the U.N. Charter and human rights, particularly her unprovoked aggression against South Korea in 1950, as a result of which many thousands in the American and other U.N. forces perished.

8. In view of the confessions of genocide made by Nikita S. Khrushchev during the XXth congress of the Communist Party of the U.S.S.R. in February 1956, we again appeal to the U.S. Senate to swiftly ratify the Genocide Convention, and to the U.S. Government to institute, through the United Nations, an investigation into the crimes of genocide committed in the U.S.S.R. and its satellites in the past three decades.

9. We deplore the recent elimination of the Uzbek-language broadcast from the Voice of America system, as well as the curtailment of the Estonian, Latvian, Lithuanian, and Ukrainian broadcasts of the VOA. In our considered opinion these steps constitute an irreparable blow to U.S. prestige and leadership, and indirectly help Moscow to strengthen and solidify its grip over the enslaved non-Russian nations in Europe and Asia. We appeal to the U.S. Government to remedy this deplorable situation by speedy restoration of the curtailed broadcasts.

10. In view of the fact that all refugee and escapee visas under Public Law 85–316 have been exhausted, we earnestly appeal to the U.S. Congress as well as to the U.S. Government for a prompt enactment of new legislation providing for the continuous admission of victims of Communist persecution and tyranny to our shores.

At the same time we deplore most emphatically any endeavors on the part of some U.S. authorities to deport anti-Communist refugees to any Communist-dominated country. Such a policy would constitute a flagrant violation of our principles and would also betray the hopes of our allies behind the Iron Curtain—the captive nations. Our traditional right of asylum should in no circumstances be weakened by political expediency.

11. We fully support and endorse the Herlong-Judd bill (H. Res. 3880, introduced in the U.S. Congress by Representatives A. S. HERLONG of Florida and WALTER H. JUDD of Minnesota), calling for the establishment by the United States of a Freedom Commission, for the purpose of training selected young Americans in the strategy and tactics of psychological warfare.

12. We appeal to the U.S. Government to revise its cultural exchange program with the Soviet bloc, so that it does not degenerate into a one-sided Soviet Russian propaganda vehicle. Thus far, these exchanges have indeed proved to be one-way propaganda for Moscow and its subservient Communist puppets, which has brought about no visible cultural enrichment of the American people.

13. We deeply deplore the recent propaganda exhibition of Soviet First Deputy Premier Anastas I. Mikoyan in the United States. We warned against his visit to the United States, keeping in mind its possible effect upon the morale of the captive nations of the Soviet Russian slave empire. Our fears and apprehensions were fully substantiated, if only because we knew how his tour in the United States would be exploited by the Soviet propaganda machinery. Speaking at the XXIst congress of the Communist Party of the U.S.S.R. at the end of January 1959 in Moscow immediately upon his return from the United States, Mikoyan declared:

"I want to note that in my conversations during my trip to America I no longer heard the United States talking of a policy of containing, repelling, or liberating. On the contrary, both the President and the Secretary of State said that they do not consider it their aim, right, or duty to pronounce an anathema against communism, and that the United States does not wish to interfere in the internal affairs of the socialist countries. We may conclude from these statements of the President and Secretary of State that now they are 'inclined to recognize the principle of peaceful coexistence of countries with different political and social systems.' If that is the case, it is very significant for peace. But these statements must be followed by action to carry them out, and we have every right to expect such action."

We cannot believe that either President Eisenhower or Secretary of State Dulles have made such statements, which in effect would be contradictory to traditional U.S. foreign policy and in contrast with the many official pronouncements of the U.S. position with respect to the captive nations of central and eastern Europe.

We believe that Mikoyan's statement calls for an official denial by the U.S. Government.

14. Finally, we appeal to the U.S. Government to reaffirm its position on the cause of the liberation of all enslaved nations behind the Iron Curtain through proper assessment of their aspirations to freedom and independence, and through official measures and declarations. Such official statements would expressly state that there is no finality in the subjugation of central and eastern Europe, and that neither the acceptance of national communism nor any other expedient policy, can provide a proper course for U.S. foreign policy, inasmuch as it would only strengthen the status quo and endorse the enslavement of so many countries and nations by totalitarian communism.

The world is witnessing today the birth of new independent nations in the former colonies. At the same time, countries in central and eastern Europe, which are rich in ancient culture and which have enjoyed freedom and independence for centuries, are enslaved by the Kremlin. We believe that the U.S. Government, which has always stood for the liberation of colonial peoples, should apply the same principles and policies to the aspirations to freedom of those formerly independent nations of Europe which are now subjugated by Communist imperialism.

We call on our Government for a dynamic policy leading to the establishment of true peace, with justice and freedom, for all nations in Europe as the best guarantee of our own security.

RESOLUTION OF MISSOURI RIVER STATES COMMITTEE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, electric power users in the eastern division of the Missouri River basin are confronted with a shortage of energy. The shortage results from unwise planning for Missouri basin development, the current administration's policy of no new starts on water projects, and its further policy of firming only a minimum amount of the hydroelectric energy it has available for marketing.

Within the past 2 or 3 weeks Missouri basin leaders of both political parties have taken a series of actions to correct the situation. The Missouri Basin Interagency Committee, including representatives of the State governments, refused to accept a new adequacy of flow study presented by Army engineers. The study proposed to allow less water for irrigation, reduce firm power generation, but increase the release of water for the flowing navigation channel in the lower river. The interagency committee then adopted a resolution calling for a study of slack water navigation, instead of flowing navigation, in the lower basin. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD a letter I have received from Gov. Ralph G. Brooks, of Nebraska, assuring unequivocal support of the resolution for a study of slack water navigation.

On April 15—just 2 weeks ago—the Missouri River States Committee, composed of representatives of all of the States lying wholly or partly in the basin, held a meeting at Council Bluffs, Iowa. That committee adopted a resolution which declares that the administration's "no new starts" policy is impeding and severely handicapping the development of the Missouri basin and impairing the economic strength of the entire country. It calls upon Congress to implement its authorizations of Missouri basin projects by appropriating the necessary funds to get them under construction. A copy of the Missouri basin States resolution has been forwarded me by Gov. J. Hugo Aronson, of Montana, and I ask unanimous consent to have the resolution printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the Missouri River States Committee, consisting of the Governors of the States of Iowa, Colorado, Kansas, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, and Wyoming, comprising one-sixth of the area of the United States of America, in meeting assembled, do hereby adopt the following resolution:

Whereas the Missouri River States Committee, created in December of 1941, was organized for the express purpose of securing flood control, irrigation, navigation, power development, and related improvements of the entire Missouri River basin; and

Whereas through the efforts of the Missouri River States Committee and other groups, the Missouri basin project was authorized by Congress in the year 1944; and

Whereas during the 15 years since that time substantial progress has been made in meeting the objectives of flood control, navigation, water supply, and power development and, to a lesser degree, irrigation and other improvements; and

Whereas the orderly development of natural and human resources of the Missouri River basin is impeded and severely handicapped by the "no new starts" policy; and

Whereas said "no new starts" policy impairs the economic strength of the entire country by preventing the development of natural resources in the basin as an investment in the future welfare and security of the United States as a whole; and

Whereas the construction of planned projects would strengthen the economic base of this region and of our whole country at a time when full development and use of our national resources are urgently needed in the struggle between the free world and the areas of the earth dominated by Communists: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this committee urge the Congress of the United States to implement its authorizations of reclamation and flood control and other projects by appropriating the necessary money for the initiation of said projects; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded by the chairman of the Missouri River States Committee to the Honorable CLARENCE CANNON, chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States and the Honorable CARL HAYDEN, chairman of Appropriations Committee of the Senate of the United States.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. KEFAUVER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. 895. A bill to provide for the representation of indigent defendants in criminal cases in the district courts of the United States (Rept. No. 232).

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MURRAY (by request):

S. 1817. A bill to supplement the Federal reclamation laws;

S. 1818. A bill to donate to the Confederated Tribes of the Warm Springs Reservation, Oreg., approximately 48.89 acres of Federal land; and

S. 1819. A bill to amend the act of June 4, 1953 (67 Stat. 41), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior, or his authorized representative, to convey certain school properties to local school districts or public agencies"; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT (by request):

S. 1820. A bill to authorize certain generals of the Army to accept and wear decorations, orders, medals, presents, and other things tendered them by foreign governments; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the remarks of Mr. FULBRIGHT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. MCCARTHY):

S. 1821. A bill to provide for mandatory price support through the marketing year ending in 1964, for milk used in manufactured dairy products and for butterfat; to maintain the productive capacity of our dairy farming industry; to promote the orderly marketing of an adequate national supply of milk and dairy products; to encourage increased domestic consumption of dairy products in the interests of the national health and security; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See the remarks of Mr. HUMPHREY when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. YOUNG of Ohio:

S. 1822. A bill for the relief of Hirsh Marinski; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DODD:

S. 1823. A bill to amend Public Law 85–255, and to further authorize settlement for inequitable losses in pay suffered by commissioned officers; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MURRAY:

S. 1824. A bill for the relief of the heirs of Harmon Wallace Jones; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RANDOLPH (for himself and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia):

S. 1825. A bill to provide for the establishment of a national cemetery at or near Oak Hill, W. Va.; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS

PROPOSED COMMISSION ON THE GOLD MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. MURRAY submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 27), which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

Whereas during World War II, mining operations in many gold mines throughout the United States were discontinued pursuant to Government order; and

Whereas during World War II and subsequent thereto, the cost of mining operations has greatly increased; and

Whereas the price of gold in the United States was fixed during the period of low operation cost at the rate of $35 per ounce by the Federal Government and that price has continued until the present time; and

Whereas as a result of the foregoing conditions more than 90 per centum of the gold mines scattered throughout the United States have been forced to close: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby established a commission, to be known as the Commission on the Gold Mining Industry (hereafter referred to as the "Commission") which shall be composed of sixteen members as follows: (1) Five members who are Members of the Senate; (2) five members who are Members of the House of Representatives; and (3) six members from persons in private life who are familiar with the gold mining industry. The members who are Members of the Senate and three of the members from private life shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, and the members who are Members of the House of Representatives and three of the members from private life shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, but not more than three of the Members appointed from either House of Congress shall belong to the same political party. The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation other than compensation received as Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, but they shall be reimbursed, in accordance with Senate regulations, for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in connection with the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

SEC. 2. Vacancies in the membership of the Commission shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the Commission, and shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of the original selection. The Commission shall select a Chairman and a vice chairman from among its members at the organization of the Commission and at the beginning of the Eighty-sixth Congress. The Vice Chairman shall act instead of the Chairman in the absence of the Chairman.

SEC. 3. The Commission may hold such hearings, sit and act at such places and times, require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, administer such oaths, take such testimony, procure such printing and binding, and make such expenditures as it deems advisable.

SEC. 4. The Commission may appoint such experts, consultants, technicians, and clerical and stenographic assistants as it deems necessary and advisable. The Commission may utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and establishments of the Government.

SEC. 5. It shall be the duty of the Commission to make a full and complete study and investigation of the gold-mining industry in the United States and to report to the Senate and House of Representatives not later than December 31, 1959, the results of its study and investigation together with its recommendations as to legislation necessary to reestablish as an integral part of the American economy the production of gold in the United States, and the Commission shall cease to exist and all authority conferred by this concurrent resolution shall terminate upon the submission by the Commission of its report provided for by this section.

SEC. 6. The expenses of the Commission, which shall not exceed $200,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

FEDERAL POLICY IN THE FIELD OF AMERICAN INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDERSON (for himself, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. ALLOTT, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. BENNETT, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota) submitted a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 28) relating to the subject of Federal policy in the field of American Indian Affairs, which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas H. Con. Res. 108, Eighty-third Congress, agreed to August 1, 1953, expressed it to be the policy of Congress, as rapidly as possible, to make Indians within the territorial limits of the United States subject to the same laws and entitled to the same privileges and responsibilities as are applicable to other citizens of the United States and that Indians within the territorial limits of the United States should assume their full responsibilities as American citizens; and

Whereas the Eighty-third, Eighty-fourth, and Eighty-fifth Congresses, pursuant to such resolution, enacted several statutes providing for the termination of Federal supervision and control over various tribal groups; and

Whereas H. Con. Res. 108 has been misinterpreted as proposing hasty termination by the Federal Government of trusteeship over Indians prior to the time the tribes and the individual members concerned may be prepared to manage their own affairs without further Federal assistance; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the several Indian tribes and of the Federal Government that a clear understanding of the objectives of Federal Indian policy be set forth as a basis for the adequate preparation of Indians to assume their responsibilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is declared to be the sense of Congress (1) that H. Con. Res. 108, agreed to August 1, 1953, Eighty-third Congress, should be interpreted as stating a foreseeable objective; (2) that, in carrying out the policy objective of H. Con. Res. 108, as clarified by this resolution, the various Indian tribes should be categorized into three groups by the Secretary of the Interior: (a) those tribes that have relatively uncomplicated problems, that have required few services from the Bureau of Indian Affairs in recent years, and whose members are generally recognized as having reached a state of development that would permit termination within a period of five years; (b) those tribes that have more complicated problems that require additional planning, or whose members need further Federal assistance that will better prepare them to manage their own affairs without Federal assistance within a period of five to fifteen years; (c) those tribes that require longer range planning and greater preparation for future responsibilities, or whose members, because of cultural differences, economic status, lack of educational development or substandard health conditions, require maximum Federal assistance to prepare for termination; (3) that Indian tribes and groups should continue to receive appropriate Federal aid as required in order to attain a position of parity with other citizens of their respective States socially, economically, and in terms of education and health; (4) that as a condition precedent to the submission of proposed legislation to carry out the objectives of this resolution, the Secretary of the Interior or his representatives should confer to the fullest possible extent with members of the tribes in order that the Indians concerned may understand any proposed plan under which a program terminating Federal supervision and control would go forward, but with the ultimate responsibility resting with Congress to determine the timing for any legislation; (5) that State, county, and local officials in the States in which the reservations are located should be fully consulted by representatives of the Department of the Interior prior to the submission of any legislative proposal to Congress, and their recommendations and suggestions made a part of any report submitted to Congress in connection with an Indian termination program; (6) that the responsibility for the administration of all termination programs should be assigned to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs who shall, at the beginning of each year, submit to Congress a specific program for each Indian tribe showing, by years, the legislative and administrative measures he proposes to institute in order to carry out the objectives of this resolution.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD (for himself and Mr. HICKENLOOPER) submitted a resolution (S. Res. 110) to print, with additional copies, a report of Senators MANSFIELD and HICKENLOOPER on their observations of the United Nations, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. MANSFIELD, which appears under a separate heading.)

Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KERR, and Mr. HUMPHREY) submitted a resolution (S. Res. 111) amending S. Res. 48, 86th Congress, concerning the development and coordination of water resources, which was considered and agreed to.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. MURRAY, which appears under a separate heading.)

Mr. LAUSCHE submitted a resolution (S. Res. 112) relating to the death of Hon. James G. Polk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, which was considered and agreed to.

(See the above resolution printed in full when submitted by Mr. LAUSCHE, which appears under a separate heading.)

AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN GENERALS OF THE ARMY TO ACCEPT AND WEAR DECORATIONS, AND SO FORTH, TENDERED BY FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize certain Generals of the Army to accept and wear decorations, orders, medals, presents, and other things tendered them by foreign governments. This bill was submitted to the Vice President by letter on April 20, 1959.

The proposed legislation has been requested by the Secretary of Defense, and I am introducing it in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed at this point in the RECORD, together with the letter from the Secretary of Defense to the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1820) to authorize certain Generals of the Army to accept and wear decorations, orders, medals, presents, and other things tendered them by foreign governments, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the following named Generals of the Army are hereby authorized to accept and wear such decorations, orders, medals, presents, and other things as have been tendered them as of the date of approval of this Act by the foreign government or foreign governments listed immediately following their names, and that the consent of Congress is hereby expressly granted for this purpose as required under article I, section 9, clause 8 of the United States Constitution: Name, George Catlett Marshall: Donor Government, Liberia, Centennial Medal. Donor Government, Yemen, belt and dagger; silver filigree, cigarette box, and two filigree bon bon dishes.

Douglas MacArthur: Donor Government, Cuba, Grand Cross of the National Order of Merit Carlos Manuel de Cespedes.

Omar Nelson Bradley: Donor Government, Argentina, Order of General San Martin, degree of Gran Oficial. Donor Government, Brazil, Order of Military Merit, degree of Grand Officer. Donor Government, Italy, Grand Cross of the Military Order of Italy.

The letter presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, April 20, 1959.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is forwarded herewith a draft of legislation "to authorize certain generals of the Army to accept and wear decorations, orders, medals, presents, and other things tendered them by foreign governments."

This proposal is a part of the Department of Defense legislative program for 1959, and the Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to its transmittal to the Congress for consideration. The Department of the Army has been designated as the representative of the Department of Defense for this legislation. It is recommended that this proposal be enacted by the Congress.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The purpose of this proposed legislation is to provide necessary authority for Generals of the Army George Catlett Marshall, Douglas MacArthur, and Omar Nelson Bradley to accept and wear the awards tendered them by foreign governments and held in escrow by the Department of State pursuant to the Act of January 31, 1881 (21 Stat. 604; 5 U.S.C. 115). The Secretary of State is required to furnish each odd numbered Congress "a list of those retired officers or employees of the United States for whom the Department of State under the provisions of 115 of this title (5 U.S.C. 115), is holding decorations, orders, medals, or presents tendered them by foreign governments." (Act of June 27, 1934; 48 Stat. 1267; 5 U.S.C. 115a.)

It is not mandatory that an officer who attains the grade of General of the Army retire from the service because of age. A General of the Army who elects not to retire continues to be carried on the active list and remains available to the Government for consultation. Each general named above chose not to retire. Thus their status, not dissimilar in many respects to that of retired officers, is such that their names will not be included in the list of retired officers forwarded periodically by the Secretary of State to the Congress. It would appear, therefore, that remedial legislation is required if Generals of the Army Marshall, MacArthur, and Bradley are to receive during their lifetimes, the awards tendered them by foreign governments and which are currecently held in escrow by the Department of State. (The awards held in escrow are listed in the enclosure.) The attached legislative proposal is designed to accomplish that equitable and desirable result.

COST AND BUDGET DATA

The enactment of the proposal would cause no increase in budgetary requirements for the Department of the Army.

Sincerely yours,

DONALD A. QUARLES, Deputy.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1949, RELATING TO MARKETING OF DAIRY PRODUCTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am about to introduce a bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may speak on it in excess of the 3 minutes allowed under the order which has been entered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Minnesota may proceed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the dairy farmers of the Nation are on a treadmill. We are in grave danger of allowing the family farm to be wiped out in dairy production. The farm families who produce milk and butterfat for use in the manufacture of dairy products are today among the most underpaid people in America. Without the inadequate price-support program provided by existing law, dairy farmers' net income would probably be little more than half what it is now.

When the American public buys an automobile they expect and know that the price they pay for it will cover all costs of production plus quite adequate profits. The price of that car has been administered by the huge corporations in the industry by tailoring output to demand at a profitable price.

The price we pay for that car is administered to fully cover all the costs of material and parts that are needed for the manufacture of that car.

The price we pay for that car is administered to repay the manufacturing corporation for the rather handsome salaries and bonuses they pay to their president, board chairmen, dozens of vice presidents and a corps of managers, programers, designers, and expediters.

The price we pay for that car is also administered fully to cover the cost to the corporation of paying whatever wages and fringe benefits the workers in the industry are able to obtain by collective bargaining through their union.

We American citizens think this is proper and just. We think the price of a car should be enough to provide an American standard of living to those who produce the car and we know that managers and vice presidents are necessary. We honor the profit system in the automobile industry.

But we do not honor that system on America's dairy family farms. The work required to operate a dairy farm is more continuously confining and demands longer and more irregular hours than any other occupation in the world. The dairy farmer shares with doctors and Senators the unique job feature of being on call 24 hours a day.

Like a Senator, the dairy farmer cannot observe the ordinary working hours; he must work while others sleep or play or rest. Like a Senator, the dairy farmer knows not what hour or minute of day or night he will be called upon.

Long before dawn, the dairy farmer and his wife are at work. And that is not just 5 days a week, or 6. The dairy farmer and his wife must meet the time schedule of a regular milking rhythm on all 7 days. The slightest variation in the schedule of this endless toil may so unbalance the natural instincts of the dairy cows that disastrous drops in milk production may occur.

Not only is the work of the dairy farmer one of long and unusual hours each day of a 7-day week, but it also requires work of a highly skilled and technical nature. As in building an automobile, you cannot trust just any Tom, Dick, or Harry to work with highly refined dairy cows. Training and skill are essential.

Yet the family workers on the dairy farms of this Nation are among our lowest paid groups.

The report issued by the Department of Agriculture on the costs and returns of typical family-operated commercial farms shows that in 1957, the most recent year for which data have been published, the income was 90 cents per hour in the northeastern dairy States; 52 cents per hour in eastern Wisconsin; 63 cents per hour in western Wisconsin; 99 cents per hour on hog-dairy farms in the Corn Belt; and 58 cents per hour on dairy farms in the southeastern part of my own State of Minnesota.

There is something wrong here. These hard-working, skillful family-farm workers who are producing our milk are unable to earn and receive even the standard of wages that Congress has set by law as the bare minimum for unskilled manual labor.

Compare the 58 cents per hour for labor and management that a 20-cow-dairy operator receives in my State of Minnesota to a construction worker's wage of $3.18 per hour, as reported by Economic Indicators. Or the $2.37 per hour a production worker in durable manufacturing earns; that is four times as high as the hourly return earned by the dairy farmer.

Probably no dairy farmer ever expects to have an income equal to that of the president or vice president of an automobile company. Yet the management job of running a dairy farm compares fairly in complexity, difficulty, and importance to the Nation with the job of managing an automobile factory.

As a matter of fact, the management of a dairy farm probably requires a higher grade of continual attention to a more complex process than the managing of an automated factory.

Yet the total income on America's dairy farms is so small that the Department of Agriculture report does not even show return to management as a separate figure. The small return for management to dairy farmers is lumped in with the extremely low labor returns that have been cited.

We expect and know that the price we pay for a car will be administered fully to cover the cost of buying materials and machines used in the manufacture of the car. The dairy farm, like the automobile factory, is a heavy investment operation. The capital investment per worker on a dairy farm is probably $30,000 per worker, double or triple the capital investment per worker in industry as a whole. Yet the return to capital investment on our dairy farms is extremely low, as shown by official Government reports.

There is something wrong about this. The product of dairy farms is absolutely essential to life itself. Nutritionists tell us that milk is the most nearly complete food of all. It is essential to health and is a necessary part of our American standard of living. Yet we have been content to subject those who produce it to substandard income and purchasing power.

Our Federal Government has operated programs to rectify the situation to some extent. The program under existing law was never fully adequate in the first place. But in the past 6 years it has been whittled down and whittled down by administrative action to where, even with the program, our dairy farmers have been forced into the status of second-class economic citizens.

The whittling that has been done to the dairy program needs to be made clear. The value of the program to dairy farmers has been reduced in three ways:

First, the cost of the program has been too large and this has tended to discredit it in the eyes of the public;

Second, the percentage level of price support has been dropped from 90 percent of parity to 75 percent;

Third, the parity price itself for milk used for manufacture of butter, ice cream, cheese, and other products has been dropped lower and lower by administrative action.

The constant whittling down of the milk price-support program has contributed to the continuous process in these past 6 years of lowering farm income and prices nearer and nearer to the level of the so-called free market.

In an administered economy, the dairy family farm cannot survive on the free market. Either we shall force our dairy producers into the status of poverty-stricken, bankrupt peasantry or we shall force the death of the family farm and inauguration of the factory system of milk production.

The senior Senator from Minnesota does not believe that this Nation can afford to allow either of these things to occur. The senior Senator from Minnesota does not believe that the Nation wants this to happen to our dairy farms.

Because the senior Senator from Minnesota believes the Nation wants to preserve and improve its family dairy farms, he is introducing for appropriate reference a comprehensive dairy farm income improvement bill which if enacted and placed into well-administered operation would enable our family dairy farm operators to receive the decent American incomes that they so fully earn by their work, management, and capital investment.

This bill is being introduced simultaneously in the House of Representatives by Representative LESTER JOHNSON of the adjoining State of Wisconsin.

The bill is the product of long hours over many months of patient study and consultation on Congressman JOHNSON'S part. The senior Senator from Minnesota wishes to express his commendation and deep appreciation to Congressman JOHNSON for his effective work in developing this new dairy program. I am honored that he has included me among the many people and groups with whom he has worked in developing this bill. His courtesy in extending to me the honor of joining him as cosponsor of this forward looking proposal is, also, a matter of gratification to me.

Also, Mr. President, the senior Senator from Minnesota wishes to express his thanks and appreciation to all those whose labor and ideas have gone into the preparation and drafting of this proposed program.

This bill which I am introducing today is a carefully drawn proposal. It is the product of the experience and wisdom of countless dairy farmers whom we have consulted. It has had the benefit of the expert advice and assistance of outstandingly competent economists and marketing specialists in the great State universities and State departments of agriculture in our States of Minnesota and Wisconsin.

We have consulted with and taken the advice of the leaders of our great farm organizations and dairy farmers' cooperatives.

This bill has benefited from years of discussion among farmers, legislators, and public employees.

We have consulted with and benefited from the advice of the representatives of dairy product processing groups.

Many of the provisions of this bill were studied, debated, discussed, and developed in long hours of work last year by the Dairy Subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee. An earlier draft of the bill received the bipartisan approval of the members of that sincere and conscientious group without a dissenting vote.

Through further study and consultation with interested groups, the earlier bill has been still further improved.

Mr. President, this bill seeks to provide the basis upon which dairy farmers who produce milk that is used for the manufacture of butter, cheese, and other products can be given a fair and positive opportunity to receive an adequate income.

The bill provides for doing this in ways that will maintain fair prices for consumers of dairy products with greater safeguards than in existing law to protect consumers in case of increasing unemployment.

The bill provides the mechanism by which a more adequate dairy program can be operated at lower cost to the Federal Treasury than the existing program.

As I have said, the bill as presented is the work of many sincere people whose hearts and minds are devoted to improvement of the family dairy farm. In its present form, the bill does not provide exactly what any single one of them wants. The proposal is a product of discussion, negotiation, and accommodation. Only Congressman JOHNSON and I bear the total responsibility for the final bill. We commend it to you for your further study.

Mr. President, the situation faced by the dairy farmers of our Nation is not that of crisis; it is a chronic condition. It is the situation faced by producers in an industry of atomistic competition in a generally price and production administered economy. The low income of the dairy farmer is a chronic condition resulting from unfairly low bargaining power, pushed constantly lower and lower by the relentless advance of dairy farm technology which pushes production up at a more rapid rate than the increase in population and demand. This is a chronic condition, not a crisis.

To correct this condition requires more than a short-term crash program directed at temporary maladjustments. To correct it requires the adoption of a fundamental continuing program that will maintain balance over the years ahead.

This is the kind of program proposed in the bill that Representative JOHNSON and I are introducing today.

Mr. President, neither Representative JOHNSON nor the senior Senator from Minnesota considers this bill as a perfect last word on the subject. Further discussions and suggested improvements from all interested people will be appreciated.

But this is true. The bill is a complete, comprehensive serious suggestion for the solution of a serious problem. Operated by a skillful and sympathetically motivated Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the Federal Dairy Board of dairy farmers, the provisions of this bill would provide a fairly adequate income protection shield behind which dairy farmers could pull their cooperatives together, expand, and build a truly nationwide dairy farmers' collective bargaining device through which they could make still further progress toward a parity of income in an expanding society.

Mr. President, I have here an analysis of how the program would operate under certain stated circumstances. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with the analysis, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1821) to provide for mandatory price support through the marketing year ending in 1964, for milk used in manufactured dairy products and for butterfat; to maintain the productive capacity of our dairy farming industry; to promote the orderly marketing of an adequate national supply of milk and dairy products; to encourage increased domestic consumption of dairy products in the interests of the national health and security; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Agricultural Act of 1949 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new title:

"TITLE VI—MARKETING OF DAIRY PRODUCTS

"PART I—SHORT TITLE; DECLARATION OF FINDINGS AND POLICY; DEFINITIONS

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 611. This title may be cited as the 'Dairy Marketing Act'.

"DECLARATION OF FINDINGS AND POLICY

"SEC. 612. It is recognized that dairy products are strategic commodities essential to the health, welfare, and security of the Nation and that the desired domestic production and consumption of such dairy products are hindered by the depressing effects of low prices to the producers, by wide fluctuations in supply and price to the consumer, and by impaired purchasing power of the consumer.

"It is, therefore, declared to be the policy of the Congress as a measure of national security and in promotion of the general economic welfare, to provide mandatory price support at not less than 90 per centum of the parity price for milk used in manufactured dairy products and for butterfat for the marketing years ending in 1962, 1963, and 1964, in order to maintain the productive capacity of the dairy farming industry, and to provide orderly marketing of an adequate national supply of milk and dairy products.

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 613. For the purposes of this title—

"(1) The term 'manufacturing milk' means milk used to produce butter, cheese, condensed milk (sweetened or unsweetened), evaporated milk, whole milk powder, nonfat dry milk, malted milk, ice cream, ice cream mix (liquid or powder), casein, and any other concentrated or dehydrated milk products.

"(2) The term 'butterfat' means the butterfat content of home separated cream sold by the producer thereof.

"(3) The term 'qualifying producer' means all producers of manufactured milk or butterfat other than producers who have not complied with marketing quotas during years such quotas are in effect.

"(4) In computing parity prices under section 301(a)(1) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, the word 'prices', when used in such section, shall be deemed to include any deficiency payments made under this title.

"(5) The parity price of manufactured milk shall be 90 per centum of the parity price of all milk wholesale.

"PART II—PRICE SUPPORT

"LEVEL OF SUPPORT

"SEC. 621. During the marketing years ending in 1962, 1963, and 1964, the Secretary shall support the price of manufacturing milk and of butterfat to qualifying producers thereof at 90 per centum of the parity price thereof, except that the Secretary may reduce the price support level for either such commodity for any marketing year by 2 per centum of the parity price thereof for each 1 per centum of national marketing base by which the Secretary determines the Board has established marketing quotas larger than the smallest quota which it is authorized to establish for that marketing year under section 633, but the Secretary shall not reduce such price support level for either such commodity below 75 per centum of the parity price thereof.

"METHOD OF PROVIDING PRICE SUPPORT

"SEC. 622. (a) Price support under this title shall be provided through a combination of deficiency payments to qualifying producers as provided in subsection (b) and purchases as provided in subsection (c), or through purchases alone when authorized by subsection (c).

"(b)(1) During each marketing year to which this title applies, the Secretary shall make, from Commodity Credit Corporation funds, price support available to each qualifying producer who, during the marketing year, sold 10,000 pounds or more of milk or milk equivalent by means of a deficiency payment with respect to all manufacturing milk and butterfat sold by him during such year. The deficiency payment for any producer for a marketing year shall be an amount equal to the difference between the price support level established under section 621 for manufacturing milk or butterfat, as the case may be, and the domestic market price per unit of such commodity for that year as determined under paragraph (2), multiplied by the number of units of the commodity marketed by the producer during that marketing year.

"(2) Deficiency payments shall be made to the producers entitled thereto before July 1 of the year immediately following the marketing year in question. For the purposes of this subsection, the domestic market price per unit of manufacturing milk or butterfat, as the case may be, shall be the national average net prices received by producers on sales of such commodity, as determined by the Secretary. A qualifying producer who sells milk under the terms of a Federal milk order shall be eligible for a deficiency payment on so much of his milk as is used for manufactured dairy products or butter.

"(3) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated annually to the Secretary the compliance deposits forfeited by producers under section 643(b), and such other funds as may be required to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for such of its funds as may be expended under this part.

"(c) In making price support available through purchases under this section, such purchases shall be made by the Secretary to fulfill Government distribution program requirements and as an adjunct to deficiency payments, and to correlate the relative prices of the various products of manufacturing milk and butterfat in such a manner that prices to producers for manufacturing milk and butterfat used in the different manufactured dairy products will be maintained in the average relationship they bore to each other during the immediately preceding five-year period. Such purchases shall, so far as practicable, be made in the States or areas in which prices received by producers of manufacturing milk or butterfat are most depressed. Price support may be made available through purchases alone, unaccompanied by deficiency payments, where the Board and the Secretary determine that a price support level of 90 per centum of the parity price for manufacturing milk and of butterfat can be obtained by the purchase of dairy products representing the milk equivalent of not more than 2 per centum of the total expected farm marketings of manufacturing milk and butterfat during the marketing year.

"PART III—MARKETING QUOTAS

"WHEN IMPOSED

"SEC. 631. Not later than March 1 of each calendar year, the Board shall publish its determination of the average price per unit it estimates would be received by producers throughout the United States for manufacturing milk and by such producers for butterfat, in the absence of Federal price support operations, during the next marketing year, based on the assumption that the number of unemployed will not exceed 3 per centum of the labor force. If the estimated average price, as so determined, for manufacturing milk or for butterfat is less than 90 per centum of the parity price thereof, the Board shall impose marketing quotas for the next marketing year, unless it and the Secretary determine, as provided in the last sentence of section 622(c), to provide price support through purchases alone. If, at any time during any marketing year for which marketing quotas are in effect, it appears to the satisfaction of the Board that the average price which will be received by producers throughout the United States for manufacturing milk and for butterfat during the remainder of the marketing year will be more than 90 per centum of the parity price thereof, the Board may, in its discretion, suspend marketing quotas for the remainder of such year.

"DETERMINATION OF MARKETING BASES

"SEC. 632. The national marketing base for milk and milk equivalent for a marketing year shall be the average annual marketings of milk and milk equivalent in the United States during the first three of the immediately preceding four marketing years. The national marketing base shall be distributed by the Secretary, in accordance with regulations of the Board, to States, counties, and producers. Marketing bases shall be established for each marketing year for all producers who desire to market milk or butterfat. Marketing bases shall be assigned to single producers (including partnerships, corporations, and other business entities) rather than to herds or farms. In establishing and adjusting marketing bases of producers, the Secretary shall take into consideration historical production, trends in production, abnormal production during the historical period, and such other factors as may be appropriate to establish such bases in an equitable and practical manner. In establishing and adjusting marketing bases, the Secretary shall utilize the services of local, county, and State committees established under section 8 of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act.

"(b)(1) The Secretary shall provide, by regulations approved by the Board, (A) for the transfer, subject to the provisions of paragraph (2), of marketing bases of producers, in whole or in part during the course of a marketing year, (B) for the assignment of marketing bases to new producers, (C) for the equitable adjustment of marketing bases to avoid hardship, (D) for such other adjustments consistent with the purposes of this title as he deems appropriate, subject to the provisions of paragraph (3), including adjustments for deficit production areas, and (E) for such other matters as may be necessary or appropriate to set up and operate effectively, fairly, and efficiently the program provided for in this title.

"(2) No part of a marketing base which has been established for a producer in a county but has been released by such producer may be reassigned outside such county during a period of three months after release by the original holder, and during such period marketing bases so released shall be utilized to fill applications for additional bases within the county. After the expiration of such three-month period any released bases not assigned to producers within the county may be reassigned to other counties in the State. For a period of three additional months bases may not be reassigned outside the State, and during such period released bases may be utilized to fulfill applications for additional bases within the State. After the expiration of such six-month period, any released bases not reassigned to producers within the State may be reassigned anywhere in the United States.

"(3) An adjustment of marketing bases from year to year in an area by reason of deficit production shall be made only upon a finding by the Secretary that the area does not produce sufficient milk to meet the market requirements for fluid milk for consumers in the area and has no reasonably satisfactory alternative source of supply available to it, except that an area which limits or restricts the entry of milk of suitable quality, as determined by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, from other areas shall not be eligible for adjustment of bases by reason of deficit production.

"ESTABLISHMENT OF MARKETING QUOTAS

"SEC. 633. If marketing quotas under this title are in effect for a marketing year, the Board shall establish a marketing quota for each producer which shall be his marketing base, reduced by not more than 1 per centum thereof for each 5 per centum that the estimated average price per unit (as determined for that year under section 631) for manufacturing milk is less than 90 per centum of its parity price. The marketing quota of a producer, as so determined, may be reduced by the Secretary by an amount which does not exceed 1 per centum of his marketing base, for each 5 per centum that the estimated average price per unit (as determined for that year under section 631) for manufacturing milk is less than 75 per centum of the parity price.

"PUBLICATION AND REVIEW OF MARKETING QUOTAS

"SEC. 634. The provisions of part I of subtitle C of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (relating to the publication and review of quotas) shall apply in the same manner and to the same extent to marketing quotas established under this title as it applies to marketing quotas established under that Act.

"PART IV—COMPLIANCE DEPOSITS

"IMPOSITION AND AMOUNT OF COMPLIANCE DEPOSITS

"SEC. 641. During any marketing year in which marketing quotas are in effect, compliance deposits shall be withheld and collected from each producer who sells milk, butterfat, or dairy products. The amount of the compliance deposits shall be the amount, not less than 25 cents or more than 50 cents per hundredweight of milk or milk equivalent, which the Board determines is required to encourage compliance with marketing quotas. The determination under the preceding sentence may be revised from time to time during the marketing year. If during a marketing year, marketing quotas are suspended under the last sentence of section 631, the Board shall suspend the collection of compliance deposits during the remainder of the marketing year.

"COLLECTIONS OF COMPLIANCE DEPOSITS

"SEC. 642. (a) Every person purchasing milk, butterfat, or dairy products from a producer (except purchases by consumers for other than commercial uses) shall withhold from the purchase price an amount equal to the compliance deposit and shall remit the same to the Secretary of the Treasury. In the case of milk, butterfat, or dairy products delivered to a cooperative association of producers, the compliance deposit shall be withheld at the time of delivery to the association and remitted by the association to the Secretary of the Treasury.

"(b) Compliance deposits shall be credited to a special account in the Treasury. Such special account shall be available for the purposes of making refunds as provided in subsection (c), on drafts issued by the Secretary.

"(c) The Secretary of the Treasury shall have the same authority with respect to compliance deposits required by this part as he has under subtitle F of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to taxes imposed thereunder.

"REFUND OF COMPLIANCE DEPOSITS

"SEC. 643. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture shall annually, prior to July 1 and following the close of the immediately preceding marketing year, provide for the payment from the special account referred to in section 642(b) of a refund to each producer who during such preceding marketing year complied with his marketing quota and to each producer who sold less than ten thousand pounds of milk or milk equivalent, the entire amount of the compliance deposit withheld from him. The Secretary shall prescribe regulations providing that a producer may not meet the requirement of sales of less than ten thousand pounds of milk or milk equivalent by transferring any of his herd to another person if the entire herd continues to be managed and housed as a unit, and that the transferee in such a case shall not be considered a producer. Subject to the provisions of the preceding sentence, no person who would otherwise meet such ten-thousand-pound requirement shall be considered as not meeting such requirement by reason of the fact his cows are housed and milked jointly with those of other producers.

"(b) Funds in such special account which are not refunded shall be forfeited by the producer from whom collected, and deposited in the general fund of the Treasury. The facts constituting the basis for any refund of compliance deposits, or the amount thereof, when officially determined in conformity with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, shall be final and conclusive and shall not be reviewable by any other officer or agency of the Government. In case any person who is entitled to the refund of a compliance deposit dies, becomes incompetent, or disappears before receiving such refund, or is succeeded by another who renders or completes the required performance, the refund shall, without regard to other provisions of law, be made as the Secretary may determine to be fair and reasonable in all the circumstances and provide by regulation.

"PART V—FEDERAL DAIRY BOARD

"CREATION OF BOARD

"SEC. 651. (a) There is hereby established, as an independent agency in the Department, a Federal Dairy Board (herein referred to as the 'Board') which shall be elected by milk producers as provided in this part. Only persons who are milk producers and who obtain the major portion of their income from farming shall be eligible to serve on the Board. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as the Board may require for carrying out its functions and duties.

"(b) In order to assure appropriate regional representation on the Board, the United States shall be divided into fifteen Federal dairy districts to be designated by the Secretary. In designating such districts, the Secretary shall give consideration to (1) complete geographical representation of the United States and (2) the designation of districts so that districts will be areas having equal annual sales of milk, butterfat, or dairy products, as nearly as possible without dividing any county into more than one district.

"(c) Each Federal dairy district shall be assigned one place on the Board. The milk producers in each district shall by ballot elect one Board member and one alternate Board member for the place on the Board. The Secretary shall prescribe the procedure for nomination of candidates and for their election and shall conduct the balloting for election of Board members and alternate Board members not later than February 15, 1961. The Secretary, or an official of the Department designated by him, shall be an ex officio member of the Board. He shall meet and confer with the Board, but shall not be entitled to vote or to receive compensation for his services as a member of the Board.

"ORGANIZATION OF THE BOARD

"SEC. 652. (a) The terms of office of the members of the Board shall expire on March 31, 1964. If a vacancy occurs in the membership of the Board, the alternate member elected for such place on the Board shall serve the unexpired portion of the term.

"(b) Each member of the Board, other than the Secretary or his designee, shall receive a per diem of $80 for each day's attendance at meetings of the Board and while traveling to and from such meetings, together with actual and necessary travel, subsistence, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of his official duties without regard to other laws relating to allowances which may be made on account of travel and subsistence expenses of officers and employees of the United States.

"(c) The Board shall meet as soon as practicable following the election of the members, and thereafter, annually on the second Monday in December and at other times upon the call of the Chairman. In addition, special meetings of the Board may be called at any time by a majority of the members, or by the Secretary. The Board shall meet at least once in each calendar quarter of each year.

"(d) The Chairman of the Board shall be selected by the Board from among its own members. He shall hold office for one year, except that the term of a member elected to fill a vacancy shall be the unexpired term of the Chairman whom he succeeds.

"(e) A majority of the members of the Board shall constitute a quorum, and action may be taken by majority vote of those present at a regular or special meeting at which a quorum is present. The Board may adopt, alter, and use an official seal which shall be judicially noticed.

"(f) The Board may employ such personnel as it deems necessary to carry out its functions, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949; and the Secretary shall make available to the Board the use of any of the facilities and the services of any of the personnel of the Department which it may require for the appropriate conduct of its functions.

"(g) Elected members of the Board are hereby exempted with respect to their holding of such office, from the operation of sections 281, 283, 284, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code, and section 190 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except that this exception shall not extend—

"(1) to the receipt or payment of salary in connection with the member's service on the Board from any source other than a private employer of the appointee at the time of his appointment, or

"(2) during the period he is in office, and for the further period of two years after the termination thereof, to the prosecution or participation in the prosecution, by any such person, of any claim against the Government involving any matter concerning which the member had any responsibilities arising out of his holding such office during the period he held such office.

"STUDY BY BOARD

"SEC. 653. The Board, in addition to its other functions, shall cause to be made a comprehensive study of the production and marketing of manufacturing milk, butterfat, and dairy products, including producers' costs of production, prices received by farmers, areas of production, the relationship between changes in national income and changes in volume of consumption of manufactured dairy products, marketing and processing spreads, relationships between prices received by farmers for milk used for fluid consumption and that used for manufacturing, returns to milk producers on capital investment and labor relative to those of other farmers and of other segments of the national economy, and trends in these factors. The costs of production shall be determined through an audited cost accounting survey of typical dairy farms in each region covering all costs of production on the farm attributable to milk production, with hired and family labor assigned a cost computed on the basis of wage rates for comparable work in milk manufacturing and processing plants in the area and return on invested capital equal to the average annual return on net worth earned by milk handlers and manufacturers during the preceding five-year period. The Board shall submit to Congress not later than January 3, 1963, a detailed report thereon with recommendations for improvement of the dairy support program, covering the probable costs and effects of the proposals recommended and the legislation required to put the changes into effect. The Board may conduct such hearings and receive such statements and briefs in connection with such study as it deems appropriate.

"PART VI—MISCELLANEOUS

"REVIEW OF MILK ORDERS

"SEC. 661. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, milk orders established under provisions of the Agriculture Marketing Agreements Act of 1937, as amended, shall be reviewed and shall be amended for the purpose of computing fluid class prices to take into account the payments made pursuant to this title so that such payments are reflected in basic formula prices under such orders and thus effectuate the purpose of this title to improve farm family income in relation to the criteria provided in such Act. If under any marketing order class I milk is priced on the basis of market price of manufacturing or its products, plus the additional cost of producing milk eligible for fluid markets plus cost of freight and handling from the milk price basing point, as determined by the Secretary, then the first-named item shall be calculated for such purpose by adding the equivalent of such deficiency payments as may be made under this title to market prices.

"REFERENDUM

"SEC. 662. Not later than October 1, 1960, the Secretary shall conduct a nationwide referendum of producers of milk, butterfat, or dairy products who would have a marketing base of more than 10,000 pounds if this title were in effect, to determine whether those voting approve the provisions of this title. If more than one-half of the producers voting in the referendum oppose this title, this title (other than this section thereof) shall not go into effect and the price support operations of the Secretary under section 201(c) of this Act with respect to milk and dairy products shall remain in effect. The Secretary shall conduct the referendum, prescribing such rules and regulations as may be necessary. Any milk producer shall have only one vote and shall vote as an individual, rather than as a business entity. The ballot shall be in the following form:

"UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—OFFICIAL BALLOT—NATIONAL REFERENDUM OF MILK PRODUCERS

"Mark this square if you favor—

☐ Establishment of a dairy income protective program, utilizing deficiency payments, Government purchases, storage and diversion, compliance deposits, and marketing quotas based on 90 per centum of the parity price, as provided in the Dairy Marketing Act.

"Mark this square if you favor—

☐ Continuation of price support utilizing Government purchases, storage and diversion with support at 75 to 90 per centum of the parity equivalent price, as provided by section 201(c) of the Agricultural Act of 1949."

The analysis presented by Mr. HUMPHREY is as follows:

ANALYSIS OF THE PROPOSED DAIRY MARKETING ACT

The bill if enacted would amend the Agricultural Act of 1949 by adding thereto a new title VI.

Part I is the short title of the bill, the declaration of findings and policy, and definitions.

Part II provides a new program of price supports for manufacturing milk and butterfat for the marketing years ending in 1962, 1963, and 1964.

Section 621 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall support the price of manufacturing milk and butterfat to qualifying producers at 90 percent of the parity price if the Dairy Board has established marketing quotas at the minimum level established by later provisions of the Act. For each 1 percent of the marketing base by which the Board does not reduce marketing quotas to the extent provided, the Secretary may lower the level of price support by 2 percent of the parity price. In no event may the Secretary establish the support level for milk and butterfat at less than 75 percent of the parity price.

Section 622 provides that the price supports for manufacturing milk and butterfat shall be carried out through a combination of deficiency payments to qualifying producers and purchasers; or in certain circumstances by purchases alone.

During each marketing year to which the new program applies, the Secretary is directed to make, from Commodity Credit Corporation funds, price supports available to each qualifying producer who during the marketing year sold 10,000 pounds or more of milk or milk equivalent, by means of a deficiency payment with respect to all manufacturing milk and butterfat sold by him during the year. The deficiency payment for any producer for any marketing year is calculated as the amount equal to the difference between the price support level and the domestic market price per unit of such commodity for that year multiplied by the number of units of the commodity marketed by the producer during that marketing year.

Deficiency payments must be made to producers entitled thereto before July 1 of the year immediately following the marketing year in question. The domestic market price per unit used in calculating the amount of the deficiency payment shall be the average national average net price received by producers on sales of such commodity. A qualifying producer who sells milk under terms of a Federal milk order shall be eligible for a deficiency payment on so much of his milk as is used for manufacturing milk or butter.

The forfeited compliance deposits of producers and such other funds as may be required by the Secretary to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation for such of its funds as may be expended in the new program are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Agriculture.

In conjunction with the deficiency payments, the Secretary shall make price support available through purchase of products of milk to the extent necessary to: (1) fulfill Government dairy product distribution program requirements; and (2) correlate the relative prices of the various products of manufacturing milk and butterfat in such a manner that prices to producers for manufacturing milk and butterfat used in the different manufactured dairy products will be maintained in the average relationship they bore to each other during the immediately preceding 5 years. Such purchases, in so far as practicable, must be made in the States or areas where prices received by producers are most depressed.

Price support may be made available through purchases alone, unaccompanied by deficiency payments, where the Dairy Board and the Secretary determine that a price support level of 90 percent of the parity price can be obtained by the purchase of dairy products representing the milk equivalent of not more than 2 percent of the total expected farm marketings of manufacturing milk and butterfat during the marketing year.

Part III provides for establishment and operation of a system of marketing quotas for milk and butterfat sold in cream.

Section 631 provides that not later than March 1 of each calendar year, the Dairy Board shall make a determination of the average price per unit it estimates would be received by producers throughout the United States for manufacturing milk and butterfat, in the absence of Federal price support operations, during the next marketing year, based on the assumption that the number of unemployed will not exceed 3 percent of the civilian labor force.

If the estimated price so determined is less than 90 percent of the parity price, the Board shall impose marketing quotas for the next marketing year, unless it and the Secretary determine to provide the support operations solely through product purchases. The Board may suspend marketing quotas at any time within a marketing year when in its judgment the market price will be above 90 percent of the parity price if no quotas are in effect.

Section 632 provides for determination of the national and farm marketing bases for milk and butterfat sold in cream. The national marketing base for milk and milk equivalent for a marketing year shall be the average annual marketings of milk and milk equivalent in the United States during the first 3 of the immediately preceding 4 marketing years.

The national marketing base shall be distributed by the Secretary, in accordance with regulations established by the Board, to States, counties, and producers. Marketing bases must be established for each marketing year for all producers who desire to market milk or butterfat. Marketing bases shall be assigned to single producers (including partnerships, corporations, and other business entities) rather than to herds or farms. In establishing and adjusting marketing bases of producers, the Secretary is required to take into consideration historical production, trends in production, abnormal production during historical period, and such other factors as may be appropriate to establish such bases in an equitable and practical manner. In establishing and adjusting marketing bases, the Secretary would be required to use the services of the State, county, and local farmer committees.

The Secretary would provide, by regulations approved by the Board, for (A) the transfer of marketing bases, in whole or in part, from one producer to another during the course of the marketing year; (B) assignment of bases to new producers; (C) adjustment of bases to avoid hardship; (D) such other adjustments including adjustments for deficit areas, as he deems appropriate; and (E) such other matters as may be necessary or appropriate to set up and operate the new program effectively, fairly, and efficiently.

When a producer releases his marketing base, it may not be reassigned outside the county during a period of 3 months after release by the original holder, and during such period marketing bases so released shall be utilized to fill applications for additional bases within the county. After expiration of such 3-month period, any released bases not assigned to producers within the same county of the original holder may be reassigned to other counties within the State. For a period of 3 additional months, bases may not be reassigned outside the State, and during such period released bases may be utilized to fulfill applications for additional bases within the State. After expiration of such 6-month period, any released bases not reassigned to producers within the State may be reassigned anywhere in the United States.

An adjustment from year to year in an area by reason of deficit production shall be made only upon a finding by the Secretary that the area does not produce sufficient milk to meet the market requirements for fluid milk for consumers in the area and has no reasonably satisfactory alternative source of supply available to it, except that an area which limits or restricts the entry of milk of suitable quality, as determined by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, from other areas shall not be eligible for adjustment of bases by reason of deficit production.

Section 633 provides that each year when marketing quotas are required, the marketing quota for each producer shall be his marketing base, reduced by not more than 1 percent thereof for each 5 percent of the estimated average price per unit received by producers that such price is expected to be below 90 percent of the parity price. The original marketing quota for each year would be established by the Board. However, in the event the Board has not done so, the Secretary is empowered to reduce the marketing quota of each producer by not to exceed 1 percent of his marketing base for each 5 percent of the estimated market price that such price is expected to be less than 75 percent of the parity price.

Section 634 provides for the publication and review of the marketing quotas in accordance with applicable provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

Part IV establishes a system of dairy marketing compliance deposits to encourage the maximum compliance with marketing quotas.

Section 641 provides that during each marketing year in which marketing quotas are in effect, compliance deposits shall be withheld and collected from each producer who sells milk, butterfat, or dairy products. The amount of the compliance deposits shall be the amount determined by the Board at not less than 25 cents nor more than 50 cents per hundredweight of milk or milk equivalent, which the Board determines is required to encourage maximum compliance with marketing quotas.

Section 642 provides for the collection of compliance deposits by the Secretary of Treasury from every person who buys milk, butterfat or dairy products from a producer (except consumers for other than commercial use) who shall in turn withhold the amount of the compliance deposit from the purchase price. In the case of milk, butterfat, or dairy products delivered to a cooperative association of producers, the compliance deposit shall be withheld at the time of delivery and remitted to the Secretary of Treasury.

The compliance deposits shall be credited to a special account in the Treasury, from which refunds may be made on drafts issued by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Section 643 provides for the refund of the entire compliance deposit to each producer who during the marketing year complied with his marketing quota, and to each producer who sold less than 10,000 pounds of milk or milk equivalent during the marketing year. This section provides for safeguard against the division of herds in order to qualify for the 10,000 pound exemption. The 10,000-pound exemption of a producer who joins in a milking pool is protected.

The forfeited refunds will be deposited in the general fund of the Treasury.

Part V sets up a Federal Dairy Board to carry out certain functions prescribed in the new dairy program.

Section 651 provides for the establishment of the Board in the Department of Agriculture as an independent agency. Members of the Board shall be elected by producers. Only milk producers who obtain the major share of their income from farming are eligible to be elected as members of the Board. Appropriation is authorized to the Board of such sums as it may require to carry out its functions and duties.

To assure appropriate regional representation on the Board, the United States is divided into 15 Federal dairy districts to be designated by the Secretary. The Secretary is required to designate districts in such a manner that districts will be areas having equal annual sales of milk, butterfat, or dairy products, as nearly as possible without dividing any county into two or more districts.

Each Federal dairy district is assigned one place on the Board. The milk producers in each district shall elect one Board member and one alternate Board member by ballot. Such election shall be conducted in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary not later than February 15, 1961. The Secretary, or an official of the Department designated by him, shall be an ex officio member of the Board without compensation or vote.

Section 652 provides that the terms of the members of the Board shall expire on the termination date of the program: March 31, 1964. If a vacancy on the Board occurs, the alternate member elected for such place shall serve the unexpired term.

Provision is made for traveling expenses, subsistence, and per diem compensation of the Board members for each day's attendance at meetings of the Board. Meetings of the Board shall begin as soon as practicable following the election of the members, and thereafter annually on the second Monday in December, and at least once in each calendar quarter, and at any other time upon call of the Chairman, a majority of the members, or by the Secretary.

The Chairman of the Board shall be elected by the Board from among its own members.

The Board is empowered to employ such personnel as it deems necessary to carry out its functions, subject to the civil service laws and the 1949 Classification Act.

Section 653 provides that, in addition to its other functions, the Federal Dairy Board shall cause to be made a comprehensive study of the production and marketing of manufacturing milk, butterfat, and dairy products, including producers' costs of production, prices received by producers, areas of production, the relationship between changes in national income and changes in volume of consumption of manufacturing milk and butterfat and their products, marketing and processing spreads, relationships between prices received by farmers for milk used for fluid purposes and that used for manufacturing, returns to milk producers on capital investment and labor relative to those of other farmers and of other segments of the national economy, and trends in these factors. The costs of production shall be determined through an audited cost accounting survey of typical dairy farms in each region covering all costs of production on the farm attributable to milk production, with hired and family labor assigned a cost computed on the basis of wage rates for comparable work in milk manufacturing and processing plants in the area and return on invested capital equal to the average return on net worth earned by milk handlers and manufacturers during the preceding 5-year period. The Board is directed to submit to Congress a detailed report not later than January 3, 1963 covering the results of the study and making recommendations for improving the dairy marketing program.

Section 661 provides for a review and amendment of Federal milk orders for the purpose of computing fluid class prices to take into account the payments made under the new program in accordance with the criteria established in the Agricultural Marketing Agreements Act of 1937. The purpose of this section is to protect the pricing structure of Federal milk orders where fluid prices are based upon the market prices of manufacturing milk.

Section 662 provides that the new program shall not go into effect until approved by majority vote of milk producers in a referendum called for that purpose. The section also specifies the form of ballot to be used.

FEDERAL POLICY IN FIELD OF AMERICAN INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution on the subject of Federal policy in the field of American Indian affairs. I have been joined in the sponsorship of the resolution by the distinguished Senators from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. GOLDWATER], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT], the senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE], the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. BENNETT]; and the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. President, in 1953 the 83d Congress adopted House Concurrent Resolution 108. Briefly, House Concurrent Resolution 108 expressed it to be the policy of Congress, "as rapidly as possible, to make Indians within the territorial limits of the United States subject to the same laws and entitled to the same privileges and responsibilities as are applicable to other citizens of the United States, to end their status as wards of the United States, and to grant them all of the rights and prerogatives pertaining to American citizenship," and that "the Indians within the territorial limits of the United States should assume their full responsibilities as American citizens."

Resolution 108 went on to enumerate several Indian tribes for whom legislation should be prepared and submitted to Congress. It further stated that once the specified tribes had been released from Federal supervision and control, that offices of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in certain States should be abolished.

Beginning in 1954, the Secretary of the Interior, pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 108, sent to Congress a series of bills to carry out the objectives of that resolution. Extensive and protracted hearings were conducted jointly by the Indian Subcommittees of the two Houses. Bills relating to some six or seven groups of Indians were passed and became law. Other bills were set aside for a variety of reasons.

Mr. President, most of the Members of this body are fully aware of the difficulties we have encountered with some of the so-called termination acts passed in 1954. The Klamath Tribe of Oregon has presented a particularly complex problem on which we have been working at almost every session of Congress since 1954. It is my hope that we now have the Klamath program worked out satisfactorily.

I allude to this one group because it seems to me that perhaps, in embarking on the termination program, we bit off more than we chould chew. If we had an opportunity to go back to 1953, knowing what we know now, I seriously question that the Klamath Tribe would have been selected for termination without giving considerably more thought and study to the manner in which a smooth transition from trust to nontrust status might be worked out for them.

On the other hand, in the intervening years, several termination programs for smaller Indian groups have come along. They have created little or no difficulty for the Indians affected.

Mr. President, I would be less than candid and fair if I did not say that the adoption of House Concurrent Resolution 108 has caused a great deal of consternation among Indian tribes generally throughout the United States. Virtually since the day it passed the Senate we have been urged by Indian organizations, tribal officials, church groups and others to repeal that resolution. I know from personal experience in my own State that Indian tribes are fearful of what may be in the offing regarding termination; they are frustrated; they wonder whether some morning there may be an announcement that no further Federal assistance will be given them. Personally, I think their fears may be justified, simply because House Concurrent Resolution 108 does not say that such things will not happen.

Mr. President, it seems to me the time has arrived for the Congress to clarify the 1953 resolution by the adoption of the measure my colleagues and I are introducing today. This resolution has been drafted only after the most careful consideration. In it we have attempted to spell out in the clearest manner possible what Congress had in mind when it adopted House Concurrent Resolution 108.

I should like to make just a few brief explanatory comments about the resolution.

Let me say at the outset that this resolution would not establish a new Indian policy. It is a restatement of and an elaboration on the policy which Congress adopted in 1953. Initially, it states that the termination of Federal assistance to Indians will occur at some time in the future. It requests the Secretary of the Interior to classify all the Indian tribes on the basis of their preparation for eventual termination. In class 1 are those groups who are ready, or who will be ready, for termination within 5 years. In class 2 are those tribes with more complicated problems requiring additional planning, or whose members need additional assistance so that within 5 to 15 years they may be ready to assume their responsibilities. In the third class are those tribes requiring long-range planning, or whose members because of educational, cultural, economic or health reasons require maximum Federal assistance to prepare for termination.

Because we recognize the needs of Indians, it is stressed that continued appropriate Federal aid should be made available to them in order that their social, economic, health and educational status may reach parity with non-Indians in their States.

The resolution further expresses the sense of Congress that before a termination bill is submitted, representatives of the Interior Department will confer to the fullest possible extent with members of the tribe affected so that the Indians will understand any proposed program and have ample opportunity to express their views on it. This same procedure would be followed with State and local officials in those States having Indian reservations. Only after these steps had been taken would legislation providing for termination be sent to the Congress, and then the Congress would determine the timing for any such legislation.

Finally—and I point to this because it will be of particular significance to the Indians—the resolution calls for assigning the responsibility for the administration of all termination programs to the Indian Commissioner and would direct him to submit to Congress, at the beginning of each year, a specific program for each Indian tribe showing, by year, the legislative and administrative measures he proposes to institute in order to carry out the objectives of the resolution. Thus, on an annual basis, each tribe will know exactly what steps will be taken to prepare its membership for eventual non-trust status, and Congress will know exactly where and how the money it appropriates for the Bureau of Indian Affairs is going to be spent in assisting the Indians.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Mr. MURRAY, has introduced for himself and several other Senators a resolution bearing on this same subject. The chairman of the Indian Affairs Subcommittee, Senator NEUBERGER, has indicated that he intends to hold hearings in the near future on that resolution. I would hope that the resolution I have introduced today may be considered at the same time, and that from those hearings there may be reported to the Senate a fair, just, and reasonable Indian policy statement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this concurrent resolution may be printed in full following my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 28) was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas House Concurrent Resolution 108, 83d Congress, agreed to August 1, 1953, expressed it to be the policy of Congress, as rapidly as possible, to make Indians within the territorial limits of the United States subject to the same laws and entitled to the same privileges and responsibilities as are applicable to other citizens of the United States and that Indians within the territorial limits of the United States should assume their full responsibilities as American citizens; and

Whereas the 83d, 84th, and 85th Congresses, pursuant to such resolution, enacted several statutes providing for the termination of Federal supervision and control over various tribal groups; and

Whereas House Concurrent Resolution 108 has been misinterpreted as proposing hasty termination by the Federal Government of trusteeship over Indians prior to the time the tribes and the individual members concerned may be prepared to manage their own affairs without further Federal assistance; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the several Indian tribes and of the Federal Government that a clear understanding of the objectives of Federal Indian policy be set forth as a basis for the adequate preparation of Indians to assume their responsibilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is declared to be the sense of Congress (1) that House Concurrent Resolution 108, agreed to August 1, 1953, 83d Congress, should be interpreted as stating a foreseeable objective; (2) that, in carrying out the policy objective of House Concurrent Resolution 108, as clarified by this resolution, the various Indian tribes should be categorized into three groups by the Secretary of the Interior: (a) those tribes that have relatively uncomplicated problems, that have required few services from the Bureau of Indian Affairs in recent years, and whose members are generally recognized as having reached a state of development that would permit termination within a period of 5 years; (b) those tribes that have more complicated problems that require additional planning, or whose members need further Federal assistance that will better prepare them to manage their own affairs without Federal assistance within a period of 5 to 15 years; (c) those tribes that require longer range planning and greater preparation for future responsibilities, or whose members, because of cultural differences, economic status, lack of educational development or substandard health conditions, require maximum Federal assistance to prepare for termination; (3) that Indian tribes and groups should continue to receive appropriate Federal aid as required in order to attain a position of parity with other citizens of their respective States socially, economically, and in terms of education and health; (4) that as a condition precedent to the submission of proposed legislation to carry out the objectives of this resolution, the Secretary of the Interior or his representatives should confer to the fullest possible extent with members of the tribes in order that the Indians concerned may understand any proposed plan under which a program terminating Federal supervision and control would go forward, but with the ultimate responsibility resting with Congress to determine the timing for any legislation; (5) that State, county, and local officials in the States in which the reservations are located should be fully consulted by representatives of the Department of the Interior prior to the submission of any legislative proposal to Congress, and their recommendations and suggestions made a part of any report submitted to Congress in connection with an Indian termination program; (6) that the responsibility for the administration of all termination programs should be assigned to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs who shall, at the beginning of each year, submit to Congress a specific program for each Indian tribe showing, by years, the legislative and administrative measures he proposes to institute in order to carry out the objectives of this resolution.

PRINTING AS A SENATE DOCUMENT, WITH ADDITIONAL COPIES, OF THE REPORT BY SENATORS MANSFIELD AND HICKENLOOPER ON THEIR OBSERVATIONS OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] and I served as congressional members of the United States Delegation to the 13th General Assembly of the United Nations. As a result of our assignment as Delegates, we have prepared a report containing our observations on the United Nations. No attempt has been made to catalog in full the international issues and other matters which were considered at the 13th General Assembly. The President may be expected to provide that information for the Senate in his next regular public account of U.S. participation in that organization. We have directed our comments, rather, to the particular role which, as congressional members of the delegation, we were called upon to play. In addition, we have included general observations on the United Nations and U.S. membership therein. In the hope that our report may be helpful to the Senate, on behalf of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] and myself, I submit a resolution asking that our "Observations on the United Nations" be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 110) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That "Observations on the United Nations" be printed as a Senate document, and that five thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION ACT, 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. DOUGLAS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

REPRESENTATION OF INDIGENT DEFENDANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 895) to provide for the representation of indigent defendants in criminal cases in the district courts of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

BUREAU OF SUBMARINES, DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the following Senators be added as cosponsors of the bill (S. 1597) to establish a Bureau of Submarines within the Department of the Navy: Mr. BEALL, Mr. BUSH, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. GRUENING, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DISCLOSURE OF INCOME BY MEMBERS OF CONGRESS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 1603) to require Members of Congress, certain other officers and employees of the United States, and certain officials of political parties to file statements disclosing the amount and sources of their incomes, the value of their assets, and their dealings in securities and commodities, introduced by me (for myself and Mr. HUMPHREY), on April 7, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLICATION OF SALARIES PAID TO SENATE STAFF AND COMMITTEE EMPLOYEES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF RESOLUTION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] may be added as cosponsors of the resolution (S. Res. 99) dealing with the publication of salaries paid to Senate staff and committee employees, submitted by me on April 10, 1959, the next time it is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CARROLL:

Address entitled "Growth for the Nation and the West," delivered by Senator SYMINGTON at the Jefferson-Jackson dinner in Denver, Colo., on April 18, 1959.

By Mr. GORE:

Address on conditions affecting the American economy, delivered by Senator SYMINGTON before the National Press Club on April 28, 1959.

EFFECTS OF RESTRICTION ON IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN OIL AND PRODUCTS

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, on March 18 I set forth on this floor seven ways in which the order of the President, issued on March 10, restricting the importation of foreign oil and its products would harm New England.

Those seven points were as follows:

First. The restriction order is discriminatory to a populous region of the United States which has no natural fuels.

Second. It is a major contribution to inflation.

Third. It is conducive to unemployment.

Fourth. It is harmful to our relations with other oil-producing nations.

Fifth. It will place U.S. industry at a further competitive disadvantage in the world markets.

Sixth. It will weaken our national security.

Seventh. It will contribute to the growing domination of Government bureaucracy over industry and people.

On April 22 the purchasing agent for the State of Vermont opened bids for the furnishing of 4,771,000 gallons of asphalt, to be used by the State in highway construction.

The average low price for furnishing this asphalt was 16 and $^{48}/_{100}$ cents a gallon.

The average price paid for the same grade of material last year was 13 and $^{52}/_{100}$ cents a gallon.

Thus, the increase in the price of asphalt over the price last year is 2 and $^{96}/_{100}$ cents a gallon.

On this one purchase, the cost of asphalt to the State of Vermont has risen 21 percent, or a total of $141,000, over the 1958 average.

This purchase order does not include asphalt required by contractors who have jobs on the State-Federal and Interstate Highway systems.

It is stated quite openly that this 21 percent increase in the cost of asphalt is due to the restrictions on the importation of foreign oil and its products.

It is also freely rumored that the price of gasoline and fuel oil may be expected to rise 2 cents a gallon between now and next fall.

Mr. President, how can we expect to control inflation in this country when Government itself takes actions which result in sharp increases in the prices of necessities?

I hope some statistician will determine the increased cost of the Interstate Highway System because of the increased price in asphalt which already has taken place.

Add to this the anticipated increase in the cost of oils and gasoline, and the penalty on the American taxpayer will prove to be simply enormous.

Why talk about increasing the Federal tax on gasoline, to pay for the cost of the Interstate Highway System, when the increased cost of petroleum products going into the construction of that system will amount to far more than the yield from the tax itself would be?

Mr. President, I will not be a party to increasing the tax on gasoline simply to turn it over to the petroleum industry in the form of increased prices.

The President should take steps to rescind the order of March 10 before further irrevocable damage is done.

CAREER MEMBERS OF THE FOREIGN SERVICE

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly about our Foreign Service and the professional corps of men and women who are specially selected and trained to carry out the foreign policy of our Nation in the day-to-day relations with other countries. These fine people, about 8,000 in number, come from every State and Territory of the United States. Over 6,000 of them perform their diplomatic and consular duties at some 280 posts in 80 foreign countries; and I may say, in passing, that about 50 percent of these posts are considered hardship posts. This career-minded corps has as its main function the protection and promotion of the welfare and interests of the United States and of the American people.

In this troubled world of today, this is a most difficult task. The Foreign Service personnel must be skilled in many fields of endeavor, such as agriculture, labor, science, and other specialized activities in which the United States is vitally interested. They are our on-the-spot observers. They must spend considerable time in reporting on political and economic developments of the country in which they are located, in handling the ever-increasing consular work, which involves the issuance of passports and visas, and in affording protection to American citizens while abroad.

Last year I visited several oversea posts located in Western Europe, Russia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia. I was impressed by the caliber of our representatives in the diplomatic corps and the consular service and the other agency personnel serving in this area. They were dedicated in their service to the United States; and, from my observation, they were well qualified to perform their long and arduous duties, which they must do regardless of the hours involved or the conditions under which they work. To me, this demonstrates the care taken in the recruitment and training of such personnel.

It is unfortunate that today there exists among our Foreign Service personnel a language deficiency. Only about 50 percent of the officers and 30 percent of the new recruits have an effective command of the language of the country in which they serve.

The Department and the Congress well know of the need for improvement of the language-speaking ability of our diplomatic corps; and in the past 2 years, steps to correct this deficiency have been taken. The Foreign Service Institute, which serves as the Department's training center, now includes expanded language training, and refresher courses for its career personnel, as well as advanced training courses for its senior officers. I have reason to believe this stepped-up program will rectify the language deficiencies and will provide advanced training for our career officers, in order that they may better cope with the current and the future problems of our Nation. Here in Washington I have noted that the foreign diplomats seem to have a good command of the English language.

I would be remiss if I failed to mention the exemplary service of the wives of our Foreign Service personnel. They perform an important part of the functions required of their spouses; and many of their posts involve severe living conditions. With their ability and experience, with their dedication and poise, they make outstanding, constructive contributions to our Nation. It has been my good fortune to have been in a position to observe and to know of their dedication and their effective work; and I wish to pay tribute to them and to express to them my profound gratitude. After observing a number of these effective husband-wife teams as they work together in many countries abroad, I have a greater appreciation of their valuable service, and I realize the real bargain America has in obtaining the services of two—husband and wife—for the salary of one.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES G. POLK

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, it is with a deep sense of shock and of profound sorrow that I have the sad duty of announcing to the Senate that only a few minutes ago I learned of the death of JAMES G. POLK, a Representative in Congress from the Sixth Ohio Congressional District. Representative MICHAEL KIRWAN, the dean of the Ohio delegation in Congress, telephoned me this sorrowful news; and I am reporting it at once to the Senate.

JIM POLK was serving his 21st year as a Member of Congress from my State of Ohio. He was a fine friend to me. He and I served together in the House of Representatives throughout the 73d, 74th, and 81st Congresses.

Except for a lapse of four terms, he had, over a period of years, regularly represented a district comprising nine counties in southern Ohio. He had represented his constituency with fidelity and zeal.

JAMES G. POLK was a fine man personally; he was a gentleman of the sweetest character. He was a gentleman who was always helpful to his colleagues. He resided on a farm near Highland, Ohio. In fact, Mr. President, JAMES G. POLK was one of the few real dirt farmers in either branch of the Congress of the United States.

JAMES G. POLK was a graduate of Ohio State University, department of agriculture. He was regarded by his colleagues in the House of Representatives and by those of us who knew him in the Senate as an authority on matters of agriculture.

Mr. President, the untimely passing of JAMES G. POLK is not only a loss to the State of Ohio, but it is a loss to the Nation. I wish to express my personal sympathy to his lovely wife and to the other members of his family. I know it will be very difficult to fill his place in the House of Representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I desire to associate myself with the fine statement which the Senator from Ohio has made about one of the good and great men I have known. I join with the Senator in extending my profound sympathy to Mr. POLK's family.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. It was my pleasure to serve with the late Representative JAMES G. POLK in the House of Representatives. I found him to be one of the soundest and most helpful Members in that body. He called his shots as he saw them. He wore no man's colors. He would depart from the position held by his party when he felt his party was wrong on a particular issue.

He enjoyed the universal respect of Members of the House on both sides of the aisle. I was sorry to hear of his illness, and I deeply regret his passing. I desire to join the distinguished Senator from Ohio in extending to his wife and his family my most sincere sympathy.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, the Senator from New York has stated a fact when he says that JAMES G. POLK was a man of intelligence. He was broadminded. He was an authority on agricultural problems. He was never a partisan in his approach to any matter. He was a great public servant and a fine citizen.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I should like to add my word of respect in tribute to the memory of the late JAMES G. POLK, a Representative from the State of Ohio, to whom tributes have been paid by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas], and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

It was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives with Representative POLK, and to serve with him for several years on the House Committee on Agriculture. No more conscientious, thorough, fearless, or better balanced Legislator ever served in this Capitol. His passing is a great loss. His memory will long be revered by those who were privileged to know him.

SOVIET DEVELOPMENT OF SIBERIA A CHALLENGE TO DEVELOP ALASKA

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, the New York Times yesterday began the publication of a series of five articles which were headlined: "Soviet Building a New World in Siberia."

This is a most important journalistic contribution to our knowledge. It is a factual account of what the Russians are doing to develop Siberia. This factual series is highly pertinent to our national overshadowing problem—the race for survival, the struggle of the free peoples to prevent their conquest by imperialist communism, and the imposition upon the free world of totalitarian tyranny.

I ask unanimous consent that the first of these articles in the New York Times be inserted at the conclusion of my remarks; but I should like to quote briefly now from the text of the first of these articles:

> In a legendary land beyond the Urals that the world knows vaguely as Siberia and superficially as a cruel, barren, wasteland, a new world is being built. It will be a Soviet world with which the pioneers of the old new world—in Suburbia, in the Yukon, in Washington—are going to have to reckon. * * *
> Soviet Communists have come to recognize Siberia as a vast treasure chest, the key to their dreams of plenty and enduring world power. * * *
> In the next 7 years, Moscow will devote to Siberia's development 4 out of every 10 rubles it has to invest—dams that will produce twice as much power as Grand Coulee.

Coal and steel beyond the vision of the Ruhr—these are now not dreams but projects.

Mr. President, what Russia is doing in Siberia presents a specific challenge to the United States to do no less in the area which was once Russian America—for 92 years the District, and then the Territory of Alaska, and now the 49th State.

In physical terms, Alaska is America's equivalent of Asia's Siberia. It lies in the same latitudes. It has corresponding climates. It has vast undeveloped natural resources. It has the greatest undeveloped power potential on the North American Continent. Less than one-fourth of 1 percent of its hydro potential is developed. Its great rivers run wastefully to the sea.

We must meet this Soviet challenge, and I am happy to announce that I think we see our way clear to do so.

Knowing of the great importance of Alaska power development, I have discussed our problem with the Corps of Army Engineers, who have done so much excellent work in Alaska and are familiar with its problems. Gen. Emerson C. Itschner and his associates, on the basis of a preliminary investigation, have recommended studies which should lead to the development of a great dam on the Rampart Canyon of the mighty Yukon River. General Itschner believes that this is the greatest potential power project on the North American Continent, capable of producing at least twice the power of Grand Coulee, and more power than the entire Tennessee Valley Authority system.

After discussing this matter with him, I communicated with our very able and distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and urged him to present a resolution to the Senate Committee on Public Works, of which he is chairman, authorizing the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to make such a study. The Senator from New Mexico, who has been so helpful in the cause of national development both in the field of highways and dams, and has ever shown his great sympathy for outlying areas, communicated with General Itschner, Chief of Engineers, Department of the Army, urging the beginning of studies on the Yukon leading to the construction of this great hydroelectric project.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator CHAVEZ's letter to me, his letter to Major General Itschner, and the committee resolution by the Committee on Public Works of the Senate be placed in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. President, here is the answer to the Soviet plan of Siberian development. I will not burden the RECORD further at this time, except to ask unanimous consent that my press release of today on this subject be included in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alaska?

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 27, 1959]

SOVIET BUILDING A NEW WORLD IN SIBERIA—VAST, RICH AREA IS A BASIS OF DREAM OF PASSING UNITED STATES

(Following is the first of a series of five dispatches on a tour through Siberia and the Soviet Far East made recently by a correspondent of the New York Times.)

(By Max Frankel)

Moscow.—In a legendary land beyond the Urals that the world knows vaguely as Siberia and superficially as a cruel, barren wasteland, a new world is being built. It will be a Soviet world with which the pioneers of the old New World—in suburbia, in the Yukon, in Washington—are going to have to reckon.

From the Urals, where Asia begins, to the Bering Sea, where Alaska ends, in an enormous land mass more than 1½ times the size of the United tSates, are riches beyond the dreams and reach of former conquerors in climates beyond the endurance of the timid.

For centuries the world, including the Russian masters of the area, looked upon Siberia as a province for glory-seeking explorers and as a cold-storage dump for riffraff, malcontents and dangerous revolutionaries.

HELD KEY TO PLENTY

Soviet Communists have come to recognize Siberia as a vast treasure chest, the key to their dreams of plenty and enduring world power.

What the world calls Siberia is technically many things: the Urals, West Siberia, East Siberia, the Soviet Far East; it includes the Buryat and Yakut autonomous republics, such anomalies as the Jewish Autonomous province (Birobidzhan) and much more.

Most important for the Communist rulers, planners, and dreamers, it is one-twelfth of the world's surface with, as yet, less than a hundredth of the world's population, slightly more than 20 million men, women, and children, turning the first stones in a grand and, many of them believe, historic enterprise.

In the next 7 years, Moscow will devote to Siberia's development 4 of every 10 rubles it has to invest. Dams that will produce twice as much power as Grand Coulee, coal, and steel beyond the vision of the Ruhr; these are now not dreams but projects. And a shawled, frail woman herds passengers aboard a plane in the middle of the Siberian nowhere, shouting:

"Let's go, comrades, you are Russians. Let's hurry, we must be first, first in everything. Save time, hurry, we must be first."

And up the wobbly ramp they hurry—a geologist in fishing boots, with two treasured crystals from the Arctic in his pockets and a blond, snub-nosed moppet on his arm, off for 8 months of paid vacation after an arduous expedition; a mustachioed, middle-aged mining engineer in cavalry boots, back in Siberia because his children are grown now and because he lost interest in "European comforts"; a slightly tipsy, brash young man, waving a pair of rugged hands in the air, declaiming, "I'm an ordinary worker, simple, ordinary, but with these hands we'll do it, we'll do it."

LANDSCAPES ARE VARIED

The plane skids along the frozen strip, then skips and finally takes flight. For a minute or two the log cabin outpost and fuel stop drift by below, then, everywhere and for hour after hour, there is a white, wrinkled plateau sprinkled with delicate fir, larch, cedar, aspen.

In 50 hours of flying in Siberia you can see 50 different Siberias; steppe, taiga or tundra; massive, lazy rivers and swift, opal rivers; mile-high young peaks and tired, old hills.

Underfoot it can be black, rich soil, thawing mud or permanently frozen crust. From the porthole of a Soviet jet airliner, it is an ocean of land, passing at 10 miles a minute with barely a twinkle of a house, the few constellations of villages and towns below indistinguishable from the clusters of stars above.

STRANGER SHEDS NOTIONS

The stranger, as he peers out or samples the life in different corners of Siberia and the Soviet Far East, can hardly judge whether the region is truly hurrying toward its mighty destiny, whether Communist planners and wide-eyed Soviet youths have found the way to tame its vastness and harness its riches.

But the stranger was forced in mid-March, when he first set foot in Siberia at Irkutsk, to shed the heavy coat that preconception and coddled Muscovites had compelled him to wear. And in the next 2 weeks he had to shed a good number of notions about Siberia and its people.

If the visitor's eyes saw winter, he felt spring. If living seemed cold and bitter, many of the men and women around him radiated warmth and pride and hope.

No doubt, daily, hundreds of Siberians, like people elsewhere in the Soviet Union, make their way to government offices to see about getting one of the new apartments and abandoning their cramped, old communal quarters, a little more cramped, rustic and quaint in Siberia than elsewhere. Dozens of them daily crowd around to feel the new bolt of wool at the department store and to pinch the few tangerines from China.

CONTACT FOUND EASY

But in Siberia, if you crash the huddles and ask questions, the answers carry a peculiar twist. The visitor was fairly free to inquire. In fact, contact with Russians in Siberia was relatively easy, perhaps because a growing number of Soviet officials are learning to conquer their traditional sense of inadequacy.

If there is confidence at the top of the hierarchy, it is a reflection of the hope below. Listen to the airplane mechanic:

"Oh, life in Moscow was better, all right. But look, there are facts and there are facts. When you do get good material, why a few years ago you could get a good suit made in Irkutsk in 2 weeks. Now it takes 3 months. Over at Chita, you can still get a refrigerator fairly quickly. Here it takes a long time. Why?

"Suddenly people have money, energy and time. Everyone wants a refrigerator. Everyone is having a suit made.

"Yes, facts are facts and we are building. Let there be peace, give us 20, 25 years, and you'll see how we live."

WORKER PROUD OF LAND

At a restaurant table, one of the 30,000 workers resettled at Bratsk to build one of the giant new dams on the swift Angara River drinks a local, insipid beer. He had brought his family from his native, warm Caucasus.

"Our second child is a true Siberian. Born here. You must come and see our beautiful, rich land out here. And be sure to come back after the seven-year plan; you won't recognize it."

At the dingy wooden hotel in Iakutsk, N. P. Temyakov, honored artist of the Russian Republic, for 37 years a Moscow actor, now on tour and for the first time so close to the Arctic Circle, confides on the chilly walk from the outdoor comfort station:

"It's really better here than I expected. And it will be something. It will be. Ah, without us—but it will be."

In the Moscow newspapers, Mikhail A. Lavrentyev, chief of the new Siberian branch of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, writes an appeal to "our venerable academicians and our talented youth": "Come to us, to Siberia, to dream, dare and work together with us."

INCENTIVES OFFERED

And in a little brochure, Konstantin A. Sadolnikov, chairman of the Put Ilyicha [Lenin's Way] Collective Farm near Irkutsk, asks farmers to "come to us," offering two or three private cows, a 6,000-ruble loan and materials to build a new house on the stubborn soil.

Some come, some go back west. Farmers are the hardest to lure, young girls, by tens of thousands, are being urged to join the menfolk, three of every four of whom tell you that they landed in Siberia simply "after the war" or "after the army."

Whatever way they got there, they say that they do not want to leave now, not when there is good work, new opportunity for the young, the "cleanest air in the world."

"No, not now, when we are getting somewhere at last," said the housebuilder.

Whatever the visitor thinks of the rate or quality of progress, he senses momentum. And most of the old and new Siberians he meets find the momentum exhilarating. They are confident their European Russian comrades will catch on and come to help.

In Moscow, the capital not only of the Soviet Union but of the Russian Republic, which encompasses all of Siberia and the Far East to the Pacific, the wealth of the region is depicted in staggering statistics, in plans and goals, in vast potential savings. So, too, in local Siberian administrative bodies.

True, there seems to be everything: cheap and immense waterpower, coal, iron ore, lumber, aluminum, gold, tungsten, nickel cobalt, salt, mica, graphite, asbestos, newly discovered diamonds and miles and miles of nothing waiting to be asked what they have to offer.

Already blueprinted for Siberia are powerful steel mills, huge dams, a chemical industry with oil refining and gas development to feed it, electric railroads and new highways.

What the area needs is people, especially skilled people, more railroads and roads, better river transport, a more expert agriculture to coax the land (which scientists insist is rich enough to support the huge industries of the future), more consumer goods, industries to encourage and lure settlers, decent housing, plumbing, sidewalks, lampposts—everything, in one degree or another.

SIBERIA NOT A GLACIER

They could use more snow in Khabarovsk near the Manchurian frontier and less summer heat in Yakutsk near the Arctic Circle. Siberia is not an anchored glacier.

But it can be extreme—extremely cold and extremely dry, extremely rich and extremely lonely.

Familiar sights help to shorten the distances and obscure the local peculiarities. The baroque green and white railroad terminals of Moscow are reproduced in miniature along the Trans-Siberian Railroad. And after the Communists seized lands and grocery stores and power in 1917, they established in Siberia the same farming system, the same impersonal Gastronoms No. 3 and the same red-draped neighborhood centers for dissemination of party propaganda that operate near the Kremlin.

The Siberian newspaper may be in a strange Asian language and it may arrive a day or 3 days late, but it offers the same standard news, demanding greater effort for the 7-Year Plan, condemning the West and perceiving world-wide acclaim for Kremlin policy.

FORESTS BUT NO PAPER

Of course, there are variations. In Irkutsk, where the visitor is told that local lumbermen had power saws before the Canadians, there is frequent talk of unemployment in Canada. In Chita, a coal-mining center, there are almost daily articles about the "misery" of U.S. miners.

Orders come from Moscow and tribute goes to Moscow. The charming little Siberian plaster dolls on sale in Red Square are not found in Siberia. The only evidence of the skill of Siberian artisans is in local museums.

There are endless forests but few paper bags. The paper napkins at the table, as in Moscow, are barely large enough to cover an average-size mouth. A schoolteacher in Yakutia wanted an explanation for the roll of toilet tissue the American carried with him. Oh, yes, of course, he had heard of it, he said.

But the same schoolteacher spoke knowledgeably of U.S. electric power output and of the drive to surpass that effort in Siberia. A fellow passenger on a plane spoke excitedly of the uses of rivers and forests, not for fishing and hunting, but for waterpower and timber.

The great industrial cities of West Siberia—Novosibirsk, which is also the home of a vast new brain center for Siberian science, Omsk Tomsk—these are closed to the Western traveler. He must head straight for the still more remote, presumably more primitive centers.

The visitor finds that Siberians care more about nature than about legislation out there, far from Moscow. They know in Siberia what it takes to raise the grain on a stingy river bank and to deliver the bread to cities, whose lemons and settlers arrive only by occasional plane. They know that to daily in fixing a tractor in a year of early thaw may leave the tractor on one river bank and its farm on the other for an entire summer.

Yet, on both banks of the river and in many corners of Siberia, heads are held high. There are tangible if modest rewards for work.

Men still struggle to break out of the small Siberian pockets of settlements, but there is no evidence to contradict Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's contention that political prisons have been emptied and that imaginations and dreams have been liberated.

Just how high heads are held in Siberia had to be demonstrated by a drunkard. The stumbling little man in padded jacket and knee-high boots was the first Soviet citizen in 2 years to beg the stranger for a handout.

"I must get some medicine quickly, can't you help?" he asked. The foreigner wanted neither to help nor embarrass and simply said, "No, friend."

The man dug into his breeches and found two slips of paper with prescriptions.

"Surely, friend, there are authorities to help you?" the stranger asked.

"Ah ," he replied. "That would take a long time. Couldn't you give me something?"

"I can't help you. Besides, I'm a stranger here. Why don't you go home?"

"A stranger? From where?"

"The United States."

His bombshell dropped, the foreigner walked briskly away. But a moment later there was a firm hand on his shoulder and the same, now more sober voice, whispering: "You must not go away thinking things are like this with us. It is only I * * * it is only I."

Hon. ERNEST GRUENING,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR GRUENING: I have your letter of April 23, concerning the desirability of having a study made of the Yukon River Basin, Alaska, with particular reference to the Rampart Canyon site.

Enclosed is copy of resolution adopted by the Committee on Public Works which authorizes the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to make this study, together with copy of letter of transmittal to the Chief of Engineers.

With all good wishes,
Sincerely,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman.

APRIL 24, 1959.

Maj. Gen. E. C. ITSCHNER,
Chief of Engineers,
Department of the Army,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GENERAL ITSCHNER: Enclosed herewith are original and four copies of resolution adopted by the Committee on Public Works, at the request of Senator ERNEST GRUENING, of Alaska, asking the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to make a review of the Yukon River Basin, Alaska, with particular reference to the Rampart Canyon site.

It is my understanding that the analysis made of the Rampart power site thus far has been based on limited data and site reconnaissances in connection with current studies being made by the Corps of Engineers. The purpose of the resolution is to authorize a detailed consideration of the Rampart Canyon project.

Since the Rampart Canyon site offers one of the most outstanding opportunities for the development of a large block of hydroelectric power at a very reasonable cost per kilowatt, I believe that detail studies on this project should be initiated as soon as possible.

In addition to the Rampart project, I understand that there are a great number of potential hydroelectric projects in Alaska which, although of lesser magnitude than Rampart, would lend themselves to earlier development to care for the immediate power needs of the State. In this connection, I am informed that a review report is being prepared on the Cook County Inlet report and that the Bradley Lake area which is situated in the southwestern portion of the Kenai Peninsula appears to present an excellent opportunity for early development of a hydroelectric project. It would seem to me that if it is at all possible, that a potential such as Bradley Lake should be studied in detail as soon as possible with a view to submitting a hydroelectric power project for authorization at an early date.

I would appreciate any action which you can take to expedite investigation of hydroelectric potentials not only at the Rampart site and on the Kenai Peninsula, but also in the southeastern area of the State.

Sincerely yours,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman.

COMMITTEE RESOLUTION

Resolved by the Committee on Public Works of the United States Senate, That the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, created under section 3 of the River and Harbor Act, approved June 13, 1902, be, and is hereby, requested to determine the advisability of improvements in the interest of hydroelectric power and other water uses in the Yukon River Basin, Alaska, with particular reference to the Rampart Canyon site, in connection with investigations authorized by the Flood Control Acts approved June 30, 1948, and May 17, 1950.

Adopted April 24, 1959.

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman.

(Requested by Senator ERNEST GRUENING, of Alaska.)

STATEMENT OF SENATOR ERNEST GRUENING ON CONSTRUCTION OF RAMPART CANYON DAM

The greatest hydroelectric power project in the world moved closer to accomplishment on April 24 with the adoption, at my request, of a resolution by the Senate Public Works Committee authorizing the Corps of Engineers to make an intensive study of the Rampart Canyon dam site on the Yukon River in Alaska.

The construction of a mighty dam and hydroelectric facility at Rampart Canyon, on the Yukon, will provide the United States with the largest source of hydroelectric power yet developed. It has been estimated that the installed power capacity of this site could exceed 5 million kilowatts, more than half again the entire capacity of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Such a dam would dwarf Grand Coulee, both in terms of power capacity and in terms of water storage. A reservoir at Rampart would store more than 1.5 billion acre feet of water in a lake covering more than 10,000 square miles.

The site is ideally located, in the heartland of the State of Alaska, approximately 90 miles northwest of Fairbanks and about 400 miles north of Anchorage. Thus, the construction of the facility here would provide power for established communities, but at the same time, is in a location in which economic disruption would not be caused by the flooding incident to construction of the reservoir.

A new era of economic development in the United States would be a reality with the availability of the tremendous amounts of low cost power which would be made available at Rampart. It has long been recognized that the most valuable, but so far least utilized, natural resource of Alaska is its abundant hydroelectric power. To develop this resource on the scale which would be possible with the construction of the Rampart dam would power an industrial complex for the expansion of the domestic economy greater than any now existing in the free world.

Much has been reported concerning the development of giant hydroelectric projects by the U.S.S.R. In this field of development, as in others, it is imperative for the United States to move ahead continually to insure our security.

The value of the Rampart project to the economic development of this country is obvious. The immediate need for hydroelectric power in ever-increasing amounts during the Second World War is well-remembered. There is no question that even larger quantities of such power will be needed to meet any future threat from hostile powers.

For peacetime purposes, this source of power will mean that there is available to this country a new frontier of industrial development. Alaska is still a new country with unlimited resources for development. Now that this great land has become a State there exists not only the unexcelled supply of raw materials to supply the economy of an expanding U.S. population, but, also, the existence of a State government which will energetically encourage and facilitate industrial development.

Preliminary investigations of the development of hydroelectric power at Rampart Canyon have been undertaken by the Corps of Engineers and by the Bureau of Reclamation of the Department of Interior, both agencies having agreed on the magnificent possibilities of this project. With the adoption of the resolution of the Senate Public Works Committee, more concentrated work will now be possible to develop specific engineering plans for the construction of the Rampart Dam.

In power producing capability, the dam would be two and one-half times as big as Grand Coulee, the largest now in the United States. Its power could be produced at the low rate of about 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, preliminary studies indicate. Meteorologists say the existence of the enormous Rampart reservoir will substantially modify the climate of interior Alaska. Cost of the project is estimated by the Corps of Engineers, on the basis of preliminary studies made to date, at between $900 million and $1.5 billion.

PAYMENT OF AMERICAN WAR DAMAGE CLAIMS AND THE RETURN OF VESTED ASSETS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, the problems relative to vested assets, the seizures and blocking of assets of our former enemies—the Italians, Hungarians, Rumanians, Bulgarians, Austrians, Japanese, and Germans—have been and are constantly before the Senate and our colleagues. Likewise, the payment of American war damage claims is of great concern to us and to many American citizens.

The Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended, is the result of several acts of Congress upon which have been grafted Executive orders. There have been many amendments since the act was first passed in 1917. The same situation prevails so far as the War Claims Act of 1948 is concerned. The later act is now being administered by the Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

Because of the many inquiries from my colleagues and others interested in one phase or another of these acts of Congress, their administration, and the entire field of vested assets and war damage claims, I have prepared a statement for the RECORD which, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Trading With the Enemy, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD following this brief statement.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOHNSTON, OF SOUTH CAROLINA, CONCERNING THE TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT AND PROPOSALS FOR THE PAYMENT OF AMERICAN WAR DAMAGE CLAIMS AND THE RETURN OF VESTED ASSETS

Because of a widespread misunderstanding of the responsibilities and functions of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Trading With the Enemy Act, and pending bills affecting the payment of American war damage claims and a return of alien property, a statement should dissipate much of the confusion in the public mind. Several bills provide for the return of the privately owned properties of our former German and Japanese enemies seized under the provisions of the Trading With the Enemy Act. Others provide for a partial return with a confiscation of the balances. One bill provides for total confiscation and a diversionary use of the proceeds. A few of the bills provide for a payment of part of the American war damage claims and a partial return of vested assets or their proceeds.

The Trading With the Enemy Act was enacted on October 6, 1917. Its principal purposes were (a) to immobilize the properties of enemy nationals in World War I; (b) to prevent commercial transactions between the merchants of the United States and Germany and her allies; and (c) to hold the properties in trusteeship for the ultimate disposition of such assets by the Congress. Confiscation of such properties was never in the mind of the Congress when the original statute was enacted.

In 1923, the Congress authorized by the Winslow Act a return up to $10,000 in value of the vested properties seized during World War I. In the War Claims Settlement Act of 1928, Congress provided for a return of 80 percent in value of the seized properties; the remaining 20 percent was retained as security for the payment of American war damage claims, costs of administration, etc. In 1934, because of the worldwide depression and the defaults of the Hitler government, further returns of the balance of 20 percent were prohibited by the Harrison resolution.

Shortly after the commencement of World War II, the provisions of the Trading With the Enemy Act were reactivated and enlarged by Executive orders under the War Powers Act. Provision for the appointment of a Custodian of Alien Property was made.

WAR CLAIMS ACT STARTED CONFISCATION

In 1948 the War Claims Act was passed to provide payment of claims, limited in amount, for the detention and ill-treatment of prisoners of war. Certain religious groups were paid for property losses sustained by them as the result of the military action of the Japanese and German forces. As a ready and available source of funds necessitating no direct congressional appropriations, the Congress provided that no returns of the private properties be made and that the proceeds therefrom be applied to the payment of these categories of minor war claims. Two hundred and twenty-five million dollars of the estimated $612 million in value of the seized properties have thus far been expended in the payment of these war claims. Since 1942, Congress has appropriated from the liquid assets about $70 million to the Custodian's office for his administrative expenses. That office has had an average of over 300 persons employed annually since 1942 with an annual payroll for them in excess of $3 million. That expense does not include the costs paid in administering the going concerns operated by the Office of Alien Property.

The Office of Alien Property except for the adjustment of its claims program has virtually completed the administration of its affairs. Only a few assets are yet to be sold. It is contemplated that by July 1, 1960, the affairs of the Office of Alien Property will justify its discontinuance as a division of the Department of Justice.

The properties of Japanese nationals were seized and vested up to the time of the Japanese Treaty on April 28, 1952. The President, by informal order on April 17, 1953, directed that no further seizures be made of the privately owned German properties. Thus it is apparent that much of the property was seized long after hostilities ceased and the necessity for seizures no longer existed.

The estimated values of the properties at the time of their seizures amounted to $390,808,000. The appreciation in values of the vested properties, the net income we have received from their operation and other properties received through our agreements with foreign governments have swelled the original total to a present estimated total of $600 million. In any consideration of the value of the properties, one must take into consideration the value of the currency or its purchasing power at the time of each vesting. The totals in terms of dollars does not and cannot present a true picture, because 50 cents then would purchase what now requires $1.

The estimated percentages of the values by countries of the vested assets are German, 76.2 percent; Japanese, 16.7 percent; the balance consists of properties of our former enemies, the Italians, Hungarians, Rumanians, Bulgarians, and others.

Following the peace treaties with Italy, Hungary, and the others, provisions have been made for a return of the values of the properties of the nationals of those countries. Thus, provision by law and treaty has been made and the returns practically completed for all of our former enemies except those in Germany and Japan. In the latter case, there has been a partial settlement by the treaty of peace with Japan.

Only then do the properties of German and Japanese individuals and concerns controlled by them require the attention of Congress. A disposition of the complex problems involved in the payment of American war damage claims and a return of the proceeds of the vested assets are embraced within the framework of S. 672 and H.R. 1372. Neither Representative VAN ZANDT nor I contend that our respective bills are perfect in every detail. We do contend our approach is comprehensive and, if followed, a complete solution may result. No governmental property of the former governments of Hitler or Tojo is included in any proposal now pending before the Congress. No return of any property will be made to any war criminal of either country.

Congress, by several amendments to the Trading With the Enemy Act, provided relief for American creditors against their German and Japanese debtors. Complaints arose with respect to the conduct of the business affairs of many of the properties, involving political favoritism, etc., inefficient procedures for the payment of and adjudication of conflicting title and debt claims, and also regarding the failure to make available to everyone the advances and discoveries in scientific and technical uses of a considerable part of the seized properties. As a result of these and other complaints, the Senate by resolution in 1952 created the Subcommittee on Trading With the Enemy Act to examine and review for it the administration of the Trading With the Enemy Act by the Office of Alien Property of the Department of Justice. Each succeeding Congress has extended the subcommittee.

The late Senator Willis Smith, of North Carolina, became the first chairman of this Judiciary Subcommittee. In the Republican controlled 83d Congress, Senator EVERETT M. DIRKSEN was designated chairman. Since March 18, 1955, after the Democrats succeeded to the control of the Senate, I have served as chairman. Serving along with me as members of the subcommittee were Senators McClellan, of Arkansas; Daniel of Texas; O'Mahoney of Wyoming; Dirksen of Illinois; and Langer of North Dakota. I have again been designated in the 86th Congress as chairman of this subcommittee and serving with me as members of the subcommittee are Senators MCCLELLAN, of Arkansas, DODD, of Connecticut, O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming, DIRKSEN, of Illinois, LANGER, of North Dakota, and KEATING, of New York.

Continuing studies, investigations and reports have been issued as required by the Senate resolution creating and continuing the subcommittee. Extensive public hearings have been held on many bills which have been introduced affecting the provisions of the Trading With the Enemy Act. Over the years, over 3,300 pages—much in fine print—of evidence was presented to the subcommittee. Briefs, arguments, and written testimony were submitted, a preponderance of which contended that the private properties of our former enemies should not be confiscated, but should be returned either in kind or in their reasonable value.

There was a considerable number who for varying reasons contended that no return should be made but that the private properties of some 40,000, more or less, German and Japanese owners should be held in lieu of reparations, due from the Governments of Germany and Japan to the United States. The subcommittee has not favored this latter view because no subcommittee has been willing to apply the doctrine of confiscation to the private properties of a few in the satisfaction of any obligation owed by the owners' government to the United States.

The subcommittee has been faced with a few objections to return on the part of some of our newly made citizens because of unsatisfied complaints they have against their former governments. Faced with the rule that our Government will not and cannot assume the burden of urging the satisfaction of claims of persons whose losses occurred when they owed allegiance to another government, the subcommittee can offer no helpful solution to those perplexing questions.

JUDICIARY TWICE APPROVED PROVISION FOR FULL RETURN

After most exhaustive and painstaking hearings and thorough consideration of the many factors involved, Senator DIRKSEN introduced S. 3423 on May 7, 1954. In brief, this bill provided for a full return, with certain exceptions, of all the privately owned properties of the former owners who were German and Japanese. The justification for such a return met with the approval of the Senate Judiciary Committee and the bill was favorably reported to the Senate. Congress adjourned in 1954 before S. 3423 could be considered.

The administration seemed not to favor Senator DIRKSEN's bill. Among other reasons it was urged that no provision was made in it for the payment of any American war damage claims.

As a result of the continued study and further public hearings, the subcommittee recommended and the full committee unanimously reported out favorably to the Senate my bill in the 84th Congress, known as S. 4205. This measure provided for a full return in kind or value of all privately owned properties which had been seized under the Trading With the Enemy Act and a full payment of all American war damage claims. These returns and payments were to be made progressively. Procedures and methods were adopted which permitted such a result without the necessity of any additional direct appropriations. Like S. 3423, S. 4205 failed of passage in 1956 by reason of the adjournment of Congress.

A modified version of S. 4205 was introduced by me on January 14, 1957, and was known as S. 600. This bill likewise directed a full return of all vested assets or their values and a full payment of all American war damage claims not otherwise provided for by law. The bill contained provisions preventing a return of properties to war criminals of Germany or Japan, governmental properties, and properties to those residing in the Soviet-dominated countries.

A number of bills have thus far been introduced in the House and Senate. Some provide for technical amendments to the Trading With the Enemy Act for specific purposes. A few relate to provisions for the commencement of a program for the payment of war damage claims. Representative VAN ZANDT has introduced H.R. 1372 which is in identical terms with the provisions of S. 600 of the 85th Congress. I have revised in some instances the provisions of S. 600 to make it conform to adjusted conditions and they appear in S. 672 now pending and on which limited hearings will be scheduled.

There has been some criticism of these return bills and of me personally for authoring two of them. Much of that criticism may be traced to a lack of understanding of the reasons which prompted my action. I have long felt that a wider knowledge of the complex problems, the traditional American concepts of the human and property rights involved, and a fuller appreciation of our own national interests would dispel most, if not all, of the objections which reasonable persons could possibly entertain.

What are the reasons back of these full return bills? Why has OLIN D. JOHNSTON supported one and been the author of three others? What are some of the problems involved and the questions presented? How can it be in the interest of the people of the United States to divest themselves of title to over $600 million worth of property?

So far as I am concerned, the answers are clear. My duty is plain. My responsibility with respect to the problems is not difficult to assume. What has been the American way of handling such problems?

JOHN ADAMS DECLARED "INVIOLABLE PRECEPTS"

Before our Constitution was adopted, John Adams said: "The moment the idea is admitted into society, that property is not as sacred as the laws of God, and that there is not a force of law and public justice to protect it, anarchy and tyranny commence. If 'thou shalt not covet' and 'thou shalt not steal' were not commandments of Heaven, they must be made inviolable precepts in every society before it can be civilized or made free." (From Works of John Adams, by Charles Francis Adams, Boston, 1951, vol. 6, p. 9.)

There would have been no U.S. Constitution had the Bill of Rights (first 10 amendments) not been forthcoming as an integral part of our Constitution. While the fifth amendment provides protection for one from testifying against himself, it also contains very salient provisions which protect property rights. Those provisions are: "No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The foundation of property rights originating in Holy Writ is inscribed as part of our basic constitutional rights. Our history and tradition as a free people are built upon them. The concept of our free society is founded upon them. The free enterprise system depends upon their unsullied maintenance as principles of governments. The principle is clearly stated by a U.S. Senator in his testimony before the subcommittee recently when he said:

"The unpaid American war damage claims should be paid. Private property or its reasonable value should be returned. Now, of all times, we who set the moral standards for the peoples and governments of the world must of all things adhere to them or be willing to pay in lives and our material fortune the unthinkable price involved in the savage doctrine of confiscation.

"Confiscation is the attribute of communism. Private ownership, the integrity of property rights, and contractual obligations, on the other hand, are the distinguishing characteristics and handmaidens of the free world. The issues involved are just that simple."

SANCTITY OF PRIVATE PROPERTY IS BASIC AMERICAN LAW

It is an historic fact that the United States has never practiced confiscation of the properties of our former enemies. During the Revolutionary War, several of the Colonies confiscated the properties of the English Tories. This was compensated for in our first treaty—the Jay Treaty—with England in 1794. The formula set out in that treaty has been the uniform pattern for all of our subsequent treaties of commerce, friendship, and navigation with other governments.

The language of the present Speaker of our House of Representatives which he used in 1923 in support of a full return of German properties after World War I has vital force today. He said in one of his official reports:

"From the days of Hamilton and Jefferson and Marshall down to now every man who had a reputation that extended beyond the community in which he lived * * * has looked upon the question of confiscating private property for the satisfaction of a public obligation with obloquy. That has been our policy * * * the most savage doctrine ever announced by any people anywhere was that private property should be taken for the satisfaction of a public obligation."

Every Secretary of State of the United States without exception from Thomas Jefferson—our first Secretary—through Mr. Dulles has opposed confiscation. Each has sought to maintain the doctrine of the inviolability of contractual rights and the sanctity of private property in time or war or national emergency.

Let me quote the convincing testimony of Secretary Dulles before our subcommittee on the return of vested assets and how it is essential in our (American) interests to make return and avoid confiscation. Secretary Dulles also dispelled all doubts as to validity and permanence of the Paris reparations agreement and other unratified executive agreements, for when questioned by Senator DIRKSEN at the hearings, Secretary Dulles testified in part as follows:

"The policy adopted after World War II, of completely eliminating ownership of enemy private property was a departure from historic American policy after other wars. I, myself, have had some experience in this field. I worked on this very problem at Parish in connection with the Treaty of Versailles at the end of the First World War.

"I can say frankly that I would like to see a return to our historic position, the position of the sanctity of private property in time of war, to return to that historic position to the extent that may be practical, although I recognize that there are considerable difficulties in dealing with the matter on that basis after so long a period of time.

"As I stated in the Department's letter to the committee, to which I referred, there is no objection from any foreign policy viewpoint to the return, as a matter of grace, of vested German property and of Japanese property. In point of fact, any action of this character would be welcomed both by the governments of the Federal Republic of Germany and of Japan as an indication of return to more normal relations, and would, of course, be welcomed by the many owners of the property.

"I personally feel deep sympathy for the burdens which have been placed upon large numbers of people who had small property holdings in this country representing interests in estates and trusts and investments, pensions, life insurance policies, and the like.

"Insofar, however, as the problem involves the matters of foreign policy, I have no hesitation in recommending adoption of legislation along the general lines of this bill.

"Secretary DULLES. The agreement alluded to is, I think, an agreement which was made at Brussels, if I recall.

"Senator DIRKSEN. I am referring, Mr. Secretary, to the Paris reparations agreement. It was either in 1945 or 1946.

"Secretary DULLES. Yes. I am familiar with that agreement.

"In my opinion, the agreement, whatever its intent may have been as an executive agreement, was without authority whatever to bind the Congress of the United States in this matter. The property had been vested by action of Congress. I believe Congress has the right to decide what to do about the matter. I do not believe that the freedom of Congress in this matter has been curtailed in any way by this executive agreement. I am not a believer in the power of the President, through executive agreements, to cut across the normal legislative powers of Congress.

"I may say that, as a matter of interpretation of that agreement, it can be argued that it was not intended to operate in perpetuity but was designed as a temporary measure perhaps to assure against a revival of German militarism and the use of German important commercial assets possibly as an instrument of German militarism. I think that that danger has passed and that if the agreement be given that interpretation—which I think is a reasonable one—then the action which you contemplate is not only compatible with the powers of Congress but also is compatible with the executive agreement itself.

"Of course, the action taken at the end of the First World War is perhaps a closer example in that the Treaty of Versailles authorized the powers who had then vested German property to retain it. Most of them did. But the United States consistently, with its policy of recognizing the sanctity in time of war, did make restitution, by and large, of the seized property.

"I believe that in doing so we enhanced our own prestige in the world and that it was good business from the standpoint of the United States to do it. I believe that the foreign policy of the United States should be conducted with a view to promoting the long range interests of the United States, and I believe that it is in the interest of the United States to have a policy and stick to a policy which means that if foreigners invest their property in this country, have interest in this country, have bank accounts here, insurance policies here, annuities here, things of that sort, they can be sure that is a safe place in which to have them.

"In the long run, I believe it is in the interest of the United States to establish that kind of reputation, which we have had over many years. And I believe we get indirect benefits from such a policy which need to be weighed in the scales as against the immediate military cost to carry out such a policy.

"I would think that in an era when we expect the American interests abroad, American capital investments abroad, that it is wise for us to adhere ourselves strenuously to the highest standards of conduct in relation to those matters. That puts us in a better position to call upon others to apply the same standards"

"Senator DIRKSEN. In the statement, Mr. Secretary, that was submitted this morning, I noticed an observation to this effect: 'In the event that Congress should see fit to provide for return of German and Japanese assets, it may be appropriate to work out some of the terms and conditions with the Governments of the Federal Republic and of Japan. These negotiations would also probably be required with other governments with which the United States has concluded agreement for the resolution of intercustodial conflicts.' "

"Senator DIRKSEN. On the basis of your familiarity, Mr. Secretary, with the situation in Europe particularly, and the conversations that you have had with Adenauer or other responsible persons in the West German Government, is it your notion that this kind of action by the Congress either in the form of partial restitution, or complete restitution would have a definite impact upon the good will and on our relationships with West Germany and with Japan?"

"Secretary DULLES. I believe that the impact would be extremely good from the standpoint of our relations with these countries. I believe that our relations with both of them are sufficiently good so that we do not in a sense have to buy their good will; we have done plenty. But I think that when you live up to a high principle in relation to certain countries and peoples, it makes an impression which is not won merely by grants, however generous they may be.

"Therefore, I believe that to be actuated by historic American principle in this matter in relation to German and Japanese assets would have a very beneficial effect upon our relations with the people concerned.

"But as far as the foreign relations aspect of the legislation goes, I would say that the maximum of good will would be obtained if there could be a total restitution in favor of the small people who in aggregate make up a very considerable number. I do not have before me the precise number involved.

"But there are many, many cases of small and impoverished people who had small savings in this country, who perhaps were in receipt of annuities which had been provided for them by relatives in this country, and small savings, bank certificates, or life insurance policies."

It is difficult for one to disagree with the principles enunciated by Mr. Dulles, especially so when he follows the unbroken precedents of all of our former Secretaries of State.

World conditions have changed greatly since the Jay Treaty of 1794. In fact, there exist today many more reasons than existed following World War I, why it is in our own national self-interest to return private property seized in time of war. A consideration of a few of those facts constitutes a compelling reason why privately owned properties should be returned and why as a nation we should avoid the stigma of confiscation.

The Trading With the Enemy Act Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee was created in 1952 by a resolution of the Senate sponsored by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, who is the ranking Republican member of the Senate Judiciary Committee as well as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. While the Senator does not favor a full return of the vested assets, he has urged an early settlement of the disputed issues. The overall objectives stated by Senator ALEXANDER WILEY in a press release a few days prior to Chancellor Adenauer's visit to the United States in May of 1957 are worthy of thoughtful consideration and early solution.

Among other things, he said:

"(1) Advancing the foreign policy position of the United States by assuring the best possible relations with friendly governments such as with our honored wartime Allies; with our former foe—but now—happily—our strong ally—the Federal Republic of Germany; with the Republic of Switzerland and others.

"(2) Protecting the investment of private capital throughout the world by maintaining the sanctity of contracts.

"(3) Protecting the interests of the taxpayers of the United States, as such.

"(4) Getting the Federal Government out of private business.

"(5) Protecting the rights of claimants against alien properties, especially American claimants.

"(6) Protecting the special interest of America's ex-servicemen and their survivors.

"(7) Evaluating our responsibilities, whatever they may be, in the interest of fairplay, to the owners of the vested properties.

"(8) Protecting the communities in which vested companies are operating, including, of course, the rights of the sizable working forces involved, together with other objectives as well."

Some of the foregoing aims stated by the Senator have been accomplished in substantial measure. Others require, as he says, most careful study and consideration. To these ends the chairman of the subcommittee is dedicated.

AMERICAN INVESTMENTS ABROAD JEOPARDIZED BY CONFISCATION

A most important fact to remember is that the United States today is the leading creditor Nation in the world. While no exact figures are available, we do know that Americans have private investments abroad in excess of $50 billion. As taxpayers, every American citizen has a direct interest and an investment at an initial cost of over $5 billion in our defense installations scattered throughout the free world. As taxpayers, every American citizen has a direct interest and an investment now exceeding $4 billion in the loans made through our Export-Import Bank to private concerns and their governments in foreign investments. These latter interests concern you and me directly because our money paid in the form of Federal taxes supports and maintains them.

Almost half of our high Federal tax burden is expended each year for the support of our national defense programs. We have spent over $35 billion annually for our national defense since 1945. Our national defense program is large because we seek by it to maintain our free way of life. The cornerstone of our free way of life is our right of ownership of private property. When property rights are destroyed, freedom and free government are lost. This truth is undeniable.

In addition to the direct interest so many Americans have in private investments abroad, and the very large defense investments all Americans have in foreign countries, we have engaged in other programs since 1947 which have resulted in our people having to continue to pay heavy taxes. I refer to our foreign-aid programs. Every justification for any foreign aid expenditure falls of its own weight when stripped of the reason that we spend this money abroad to support our free way of life and to preserve and extend American principles. Thus, it is argued that foreign-aid expenditures, aggregating now more than $70 billion, have been in our national self-interest. That reason has been the justification. While I have not agreed with such contentions, others have agreed and they have prevailed. I do know, however, that you and I are taxed heavily each year for the support of these programs. You and I know that we are burdened with heavier taxes than are the peoples of any other nation on the globe. Their total staggers the imagination. No American escapes a share in that burden. Everything we buy has some form of tax levied against it.

Add these figures up and you can see a stupendous investment; $50 billion in private investments, $8 billion directly invested by all of us together with the $70 billion spent in foreign aid and the more than $35 billion each year for national defense. As the leader among the free nations of the world setting, as we must, the tone of morals in business and private conduct, for the world, can we afford the penalty of inflicting upon others a principle involving confiscation? Look at what happened in the Middle East. The Congress passed a $200 million special foreign-aid program (Eisenhower Doctrine) for the ostensible purpose of keeping some of the countries in the Middle East as our allies in the struggle against communism. If, as a permanent policy, we confiscate these alien properties, as Egypt threatened to confiscate the properties of the French, English, and Israelis, it requires little imagination to conclude that we stand to lose far more than all the rest of the world combined. Why? Because we have more at stake. It is a sad commentary on our laws that Egypt boasted in her press that she was following the provisions of the American Trading With the Enemy Act in what Nasser was doing. Those news articles asserted that if it is proper for the United States to confiscate the private property of its former enemies—the Germans and Japanese—then Egypt had every right to nationalize or confiscate British and other alien property in that country. Fortunately, Nasser recanted. He has refused to confiscate. The evils to befall him were too great. He has established a commission which, I am advised, is now beginning to return the properties he seized to their rightful owners.

Not all of the properties whose original value at the time of vesting amounted to $390,808,000 belonged to our former enemies. Over 20 percent of that amount, namely $87,801,000 was American property. It originated in the United States. It helped our war effort through the taxes paid on it and by its owners. It is known as estate and trust properties. Let me illustrate—an American citizen dies leaving an estate of $25,000 to his five relatives in Germany or Japan. These relatives have been denied their legacies because the Attorney General has seized and vested these estates. Another illustration will help. An American veteran of German or Japanese origin, honorably discharged from service in the American Army, dies. His social security and death benefits were seized and confiscated by the Department of Justice. His relatives are denied the right to inherit these benefits earned under American laws by American nationals. Another illustration proves how unseemly our vesting program has been construed and administered. A young German student was studying at Harvard University under the Fullbright Scholarship program. This young man testified before the subcommittee. He was a guest in this country while studying here at your and my expense. He was, however, the legatee under a will of an American relative and entitled under that will to $2,500. This legacy has been confiscated. Think of one department of the American Government educating this boy at the expense of all of us on one hand and another branch of our Government seizing and confiscating his private property earned and produced here on the other hand. Or, consider the case of a lady who testified before us. She married an American officer overseas. She is now an American citizen living here and rearing a family of three children. The Russians seized and confiscated her estate in East Germany. The United States seized and confiscated a substantial inheritance here in America which was left to her by an American relative. She is deprived of both her properties. Our existing law needs to be changed to prevent these obvious injustices. These illustrations could be multiplied by the hundreds. They all go to prove how wholly unnecessary and wrong it has been to so administer the Trading With the Enemy Act—a necessary war measure—but not needed in time of peace. They all go to show how essential it is for the Congress to pass corrective legislation as it did following World War I.

CONFISCATION AND COMMUNISM GO HAND IN HAND

There is another consideration which has influenced my views respecting the necessity for the return of these properties. It did not take us long after the close of the war to learn the bitter lesson that our present enemy is Russia and Russian communism. That country has no respect for the right of private property. We learned soon that if we could enlist the Germans in West Germany and the Japanese in the cause for free, democratic representative government, they would eventually become our stanchest and strongest allies. That effort of ours is an accomplished fact today. Thoughtful Americans realize that both Germany and Japan are our most reliable and trustworthy friends among the free nations of the world. It cost us many billions of dollars to achieve this result. We loaned and gave West Germany, consisting of about 60 million persons, over $3¾ billion. We did the same for 80 million Japanese at a cost of well over $2 billion. We made an outright gift of $2¾ billion in our settlement of postwar loans to these 60 million Germans. We are prepared to scale down the Japanese debts to its 80 million inhabitants in the same percentage of reductions. Who is there to say that it is fair to make a gift of about $4 billion to 140 million Germans and Japanese and retain and penalize from some 30 or 40 thousand of the same persons for the private property they either invested here or to which they are entitled by our laws of inheritance? Such properties amounted to less than a half-billion dollars when they were first seized. If Germany and Japan owe the United States anything by way of war reparations that obligation should rest equally upon all Germans and Japanese alike. That burden should fall on all the millions of people in these countries, not on the few thousand who may benefit from a return of the small amount of properties seized here in America.

Those Japanese and Germans who invested their properties here did so because they felt those properties were safe and secure under our constitutional protections. They felt their properties would be protected under our laws. Is it right to deny to them the equal protection of our laws? Certainly, there can be little justification in law or morals to deny our German and Japanese friends the benefits of trust, estate, and guardianship properties originating here in the United States.

Now, with respect to the payment of American war damage claims, every sense of moral justice dictates an early payment of them. Every nation, except the United States, which engaged in World War II, has already made some provision to indemnify its nationals. We have done much, sometimes too much, for others and nothing for our own citizens. Many civilian lives were lost, many suffered personal injuries, and there have been millions of dollars in losses in property damage. Except for the small prisoner of war claims and a few religious organizations operating chiefly in the Pacific area, no comprehensive war damage claims act has been passed by the American Congress. I agree with many that this is a shameful neglect of our own people. S. 672, which I introduced, makes ample provision for the payment of all proper American war damage claims.

Notwithstanding the use of over $295 million of the vested assets by our own Government, the State Department opened an avenue for the payment of American war damage claims and the return in value of all the vested assets. The payments may be financed through the remittances made to us by Germany and Japan in the settlement of our postwar loans and grants to those countries. This is advantageous to us for two reasons, namely, (a) it makes additional appropriations with a resulting increase in our tax burden unnecessary; and (b) by our payment of the American war damage claims we will fix the exact amount of our total war damages so that when a peace treaty settlement is made with Germany, our negotiators will then know precisely how much in war damages is chargeable against Germany.

Such a method of payment of war claims and return of vested assets was initiated by the State and Justice Departments in presenting draft bill S. 2227, though payments in that bill were in each instance limited to $10,000. No one has been able to answer satisfactorily why it is just to return $10,000 and confiscate the balance of any vested account. That concept employed by S. 2227 was extended in the provisions of S. 672 to provide for full return and to make full payments so that no fresh appropriation will be required.

SUMMARIZATION "THOU SHALT NOT STEAL"

To summarize a few of the important reasons why the United States should make a full return in kind or its reasonable value of all assets vested in wartime and subsequent vestings and also make full payment of American war damage claims, I believe:

1. That our foreign-aid programs since the close of World War II will have been useless should we adopt a policy of confiscation which becomes a denial of the principles of the free world.

2. That our enormous national defense spending which bids fair to continue indefinitely at such an enormous rate with its crushing tax burden upon us all will have been in vain unless the fundamental concepts of the free nations are continued unimpaired.

3. That our tremendous private and governmental investments will be imperiled by our adoption of a policy of confiscation; hence it is essential in our own national self-interest to effectuate returns of privately owned properties or their proceeds without delay;

4. That every reason in good morals and justice exists why we should finance the payments now of all legitimate American war damage claims. No reason exists why the United States should provide funds for others and other nations so they may pay their own damages, and we continue to neglect the rightful demands of our own citizens.

In conclusion the question is asked—Why have we done all these things since the close of World War II? We have done them in the interest of our free way of life. We have done them in an effort to extend the principles of freedom, representative democracy, and the blessings of liberty to other nations and peoples. Confiscation is a barbaric relic of the Dark Ages. If we would have others do right by us, we must do right by them. Should we turn back the pages of history and embark now, at such peril to our own interests, upon a vicious program of confiscation? To me, enduring and fundamental principles are at stake. They demand positive and right action.

My actions shall be charted to the only course I know to preserve those principles which have made us the greatest nation on earth today. To do otherwise, I would betray the past, endanger the present, and imperil the future of my country. To do otherwise, I would "covet my neighbor's property," and history could convict me of violating a cherished commandment, "Thou shalt not steal."

THE AMERICAN FARM PARADOX

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, Robert G. Lewis has written a highly impressive analysis of the American farm paradox for the new May issue of the Progressive magazine.

Bob Lewis was until 2 weeks ago my administrative assistant. He did a tremendously fine job in my office in every way. He left my office, to my very great regret, to become special agricultural coordinator for the Governor of Wisconsin, Gaylord Nelson.

In my judgment no one is better qualified than is Bob Lewis to write on the subject of this analysis. He writes from an immensely well-documented understanding, and he writes with brilliant clarity and perception.

Mr. Lewis not only points out that Benson has spent more of the taxpayer's money than all other Secretaries of Agriculture combined and with just about the poorest results, but also shows exactly how the course of present agricultural policies will lead to further and further devastation of the American family farmer. Mr. Lewis points out that ever lower farm income and prices will eventually curb excessive production but only after either, first, farmers' incomes become so low that they have no money to invest in technological improvements to cut their production costs, increase their efficiency, and so boost overall farm production enough to keep up with or ahead of population growth—and this is not only a low, deprivation level; it is a terrible cost in lost efficiency for our economy; or second, American farm products move into aggressive competition in world trade, to the devastation of the economies of our allies, such as Canada.

Mr. President, Bob Lewis talks sense in urging the concern of all Americans who cherish our free political institutions to work to preserve the family farm as the kind of free economic institution on which our free political system is based.

I ask unanimous consent that the article by Mr. Lewis be printed in the body of the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE POVERTY OF ABUNDANCE

(By Robert G. Lewis)

Ezra Taft Benson has spent more money in 6 years as Secretary of Agriculture than the combined outlays of all the previous Secretaries who have held the post since it was created 97 years ago.

If he stays on in the Cabinet—which seems probable—and if he continues to spend public money at the present rate—which appears inevitable—Secretary Benson's total expenditures in 8 years will be well on the way to doubling everything that has gone before. The Library of Congress recently totaled up the public expenditures of Secretary Benson's predecessors all the way back to 1862. The total came to $27.6 billion. Benson's total spending bill will reach $31 billion at the end of the fiscal year on June 30, and he's still going strong.

The current estimate of Federal expenditures for agriculture in fiscal year 1959 is $6.9 billion. In 1951, total expenditures amounted to only $650 million—less than a tenth as much.

Ezra Taft Benson as a profligate spender does not jibe at all with the image of the man that is commonly fixed in the public mind. It is one of the bewildering ironies of our time that Benson's record should be at such extreme variance from the picture of conservative, thrifty, almost parsimonious regard for the taxpayer's comfort which is projected upon the public screen by his personality, his speeches—and his public relations.

The budgetary term "expenditures" is a poor measure of the cost of the farm program to the public particularly when used in short-term comparisons. It represents gross outlays by the Department during the year, without reflecting anticipated recovery of funds, repayable loans, expenditures properly chargeable against other years' operations, large amounts expended for foreign aid, and many millions of dollars spent for services to the public and other Government agencies.

President Eisenhower himself was the first to employ this distortion in talking of farm program costs, and he has persisted in doing so. In fact, he turns the implicit misconception into explicit misinformation: repeatedly he has referred to Agriculture budget expenditures as accounting for half or so of farmers' total net income, which has been running at $13 billion and under per year recently.

The true picture of net losses to the Government on farm price support operations is startling enough. Losses last year alone amounted to almost $1.1 billion—more than the total for the entire 20 years under the administrations of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman. By June 30 the total value of farm surpluses in Government hands will amount to about $9 billion—more than six times as much as in 1953. The size of the surplus and the amount of price support losses will grow even more next year.

Compounding the ironic paradox of Benson's record is the bitterness of the farmers' resentment. In normally Republican strongholds of the Corn Belt and the Great Plains States, where Republicans enjoyed almost a total monopoly on House and Senate seats when Benson took office in 1953, the Democratic tide has now swept well beyond half way toward a complete reversal of the "solid Republican" tradition.

The dimensions of the farm income problem are equally startling. The realized net incomes of farm operators in 1958 is estimated at $13 billion; although higher than last year, this is 21 percent less than in 1951, and the Department of Agriculture predicts a further decline of 5 to 10 percent in 1959. The long decline in farmers' incomes has run counter to the rest of the economy. Total national income rose 27 percent from 1951 to 1958, and total nonfarm personal incomes climbed 43 percent.

To compare farm income with itself does not adequately answer the question of equity. The total per capita income of farm families—both from farming and nonfarm sources—averaged 56 percent of the average for nonfarm families in 1951. In 1957 there were 3,330,000 fewer persons living on farms, but their average per capita incomes dropped to only 46 percent of the nonfarm average.

Nor can the disparity in returns to farmers be explained away as a consequence of millions of unproductive, inefficient, and submarginal small farmers dragging down the overall average. There are millions of people with low incomes in the general population too—the unemployed, the nonemployable, relief cases, old age pensioners, the poorly paid household workers, and millions of low-wage unorganized workers in industry, service trades, offices, and retailing.

The fact is that substantial, competent, skilled, and efficient farm operators are receiving returns far too low to compensate them adequately for their labor, management skill, capital investment, and risk. The Agricultural Research Service of the U.S. Department of Agriculture reports that after allowing a charge for capital at the current interest rate on farm mortgages, Corn Belt grain farmers, with an average investment of $100,000 in 233 acres of land and other farm capital, received only 66 cents an hour as a return on labor of the farm operator and his family in 1957.

How can this drastic decline in the fortunes of the farmer be squared with the awoved aim of the present administration to free him and to strengthen his standing in the American economy?

The perplexing and dismaying predicament into which the Eisenhower administration's agricultural affairs have fallen is the consequence of its attempt to face two ways at once on farm policy.

One face is turned toward conservative orthodoxy. It evokes an image or stern determination to cut out this farm "subsidy" nonsense, to free the farmer from Federal regimentation, and to straighten out once and for all the "mess" that 20 years of Democratic "meddling" brought upon American agriculture.

The other face is turned toward the farmers—with an eye cocked at farm belt ballot boxes.

In his 1952 Presidential campaign, General Eisenhower declared for "not merely 90 percent of parity—but full parity." The Associated Press described at length the promised "plan which he said would guarantee present price supports for another 2 years and then would lead to higher prices for the farmers."

In 1956, the President redoubled his bid for the farmers' favor. "Ahead," he promised, lies "full income parity," which he defined as the farmers' "full share in our country's good times." The "full income parity" promised in 1956 was almost exactly double the 100 percent of price parity promised in 1952. Farm prices actually averaged 100 percent of parity in 1952, but farmers' incomes reached only 52 percent of parity with nonfarmers.

Earnest assurances were echoed in the interim by Secretary Benson. "The retreat of farm prices and incomes * * * seems to have been stopped a few short months after we took office," he told the National Grange in November 1953. A year later he told the Farm Bureau, "We are headed in the right direction at last." Another 2 years and he was assuring a feed dealers' convention that "The downward slide in prices * * * has been checked. Yes, we are on the right track, and we are going to stay on it."

Yet at the end of 1958, farm prices averaged only 80 percent of parity—a measure of constant purchasing power. This is the lowest since the years before World War II.

The administration's ambivalent farm policy posture has proved impossible to manage. The grotesque twin-headed policy has wandered sidewise into a deepening blind alley where it has become hopelessly mired in its own contradictions.

Secretary Benson readily fixes the blame for his difficulties—squarely on the heads of his predecessors. In his 6th year's summing-up on December 31, 1958, Benson acknowledged the continuing "serious problems which," he said, "have been developing from the old, unsound programs."

However, an objective review by the Library of Congress disclosed that the Eisenhower administration has received from Congress close to everything it has requested in farm legislation. Democrats and Farm Belt Republicans have complained noisily, but not a single major administration proposal has been turned down.

The truth is that the Administration has never proposed a fundamental correction of the shortcomings of the farm program that it inherited from the Democrats in 1953.

Under this program, market prices for a limited number of farm commodities were "supported." The Government offered loans at 90 percent of the parity price to producers who would agree to store their crops and hold them off the market. If market prices rose above 90 percent of parity, the farmer could pay off his loan and sell his products. If not, the Government took possession of the stored commodities in full satisfaction of the loan.

Some commodities—including cheese, butter, dried milk—were "supported" by outright purchase at the 90 percent of parity price.

The fatal inadequacies of the rigid 90 percent of parity program were sharply accented by the gigantic crop of 1948. The law permitted only six "basic" crops—corn, cotton, wheat, rice, tobacco, and peanuts—to be brought under any form of control on output. Acreage diverted from basic crops was certain to be shifted immediately to others. The big feed supply soon marched to market—on the hoof, in the milk can, in the egg case and chicken crate. There was no way to protect the tumbling markets save an out-pouring of Federal funds to buy livestock products and other nonbasics.

This does not mean that, inadequate as it was for an orderly, comprehensive job, the narrowly based rigid supports program was altogether ineffective. Calculations indicate that the farm food product price level would have fallen some 50 percent between 1951 and 1955, instead of the 20 percent that actually occurred, if the Government had not been accumulating stocks under this program.

The ambitious Brannan plan proposals were advanced by the Truman administration early in 1949 to cope with the impending collapse of the rigid 90 percent of parity program. It provided for three main reforms:

One. Full coverage for a broader range of commodities than the six "basics," to extend protection to a more realistic cross section of agriculture, and to cope with the tendency to shift acreage from basic crops to others.

Two. A wider and more flexible choice of methods of support, including direct payments to farmers.

Three. Authorization to apply effective measures for controlling production of any supported commodity in rough conformity to demand.

The Korean war temporarily masked the long-range shortcomings of the rigid 90 percent of parity support program. But as the wartime surge in demand faded, they reappeared with increased force. Farm prices plunged sharply below 100 percent of parity beginning late in 1952.

Despite the forewarnings, the Eisenhower administration's farm policy was bound by the President's campaign-time endorsement of rigid 90-percent supports. "And here and now, without any 'ifs' or 'buts,' I say to you that I stand behind—and the Republican Party stands behind—the support laws now on the books," General Eisenhower had declared at Kasson, Minn., adding: "These price supports are only fair to the farmer to underwrite the exceptional risk he is now taking."

The liabilities of the rigid support system mounted swiftly, in the form of heavy outlays for surplus stocks acquired by the Government. Marketing quota controls were imposed with maximum severity, but the land and other resources forced out of production of basic crops were simply shifted to others. Farm income slumped severely.

In 1954 the 2-year commitment to rigid supports endorsed by the campaigning General Eisenhower expired. The burden of surplus stocks was already embarrassing, and its future dimensions were foreseeable. The political revolt against Republicanism was already running strong in the farm belt.

In direct contradiction of Eisenhower's specific campaign pledge to give other crops "the same protection now available to the basics." Secretary Benson used his discretionary authority to reduce prices of nonbasic crops at every opportunity. And in 1954 the President asked Congress to activate the sliding scale system of supports originated in 1948 by the Republican 80th Congress but repeatedly withheld from operation by subsequent Congresses.

The sliding scale system was based on a theory that cutting farm prices would result in lower production and increased markets. Farmers were assured that the downward slide in basic commodity prices would allow the surpluses to be absorbed, whereupon prices would rise in a market free from Government controls.

Few farmers believed the promise of better times through lower prices, but the administration's claque of theorists and publicists happily embraced the illusion of relief from heavy Government farm program costs. The illusion persisted with remarkable durability, although Government costs continued to mount, controls on farmers were tightened more than ever, and farm prices skidded dizzily.

The only important discrepancy between what the administration has asked and Congress has given in the way of farm legislation occurred in the 1954 sliding scale law. The administration wanted authority to cut price supports all the way from 90 to 75 percent of parity the first year—in 1955. Congress demurred, allowing farmers 2 years to absorb the full shock of the one-sixth slash in gross incomes.

Benson still harks back to the halfway stopper on the sliding scale's action in 1955 as his prize example of congressional obstinacy against doing right.

But under the campaign-time guns of 1956, President Eisenhower overruled the price support rates set by Benson under the new sliding scale law, and boosted them back approximately to the midpoint set by Congress for the year before. What had been too much too soon for Congress in 1955 was too much too soon for the Republican National Committee 1 year later.

Administration farm planners approached the 1956 presidential election in near panic. Hog prices crashed to depression levels in December 1955—to only 50 percent of parity. Republican farm belt politicians prevailed at last in the White House. Something had to be done.

The soil bank was the major product of political panic in 1956. During the 1955 session congressional soil bank plans were flatly rejected by the administration. As late as 3 months before the President's annual farm message, top officials were still publicly opposing the scheme.

But in January 1956, the President recommended to Congress that farmers be paid if they would leave part of their cropland unplanted or if the crop thereon, if any, shall be plowed under or otherwise physically incorporated into the soil.

This was a drastic reversion to the emergency policies of 1933. The Republican soil bank engendered a mighty effort at reshuffling the conservative rhetoric that had been directed for a quarter century against this kind of thing. In a speech at the National Farm Institute in Des Moines, Iowa, on February 17, 1956, Secretary Benson said:

"Destroying food in a day when there are millions who suffer from malnutrition is just neither Christian nor American. You remember the public outcries against the killing of little pigs in the thirties, the pouring of kerosene over millions of bushels of potatoes in the forties. * * *

"There is one other way, the only sound way yet devised. It is the heart of the administration's new provisions for a broadened farm program * * * the soil bank. * * *"

Conceived as a forthright, massive, and expensive effort to curb farm output, the soil bank did not live up to expectations. In 3 years' time, farmers were paid more than $1½ billion to destroy or not plant their crops. Farmers were paid from half to three-quarters of market prices for not producing crops.

The gigantic tide of Government payments pumped millions of badly needed dollars into farmers' pockets. But it failed to solve the farm problem, and passed unmourned into history last year.

With the soil bank busted and all in conspicuous shambles, administration doctrine has now retreated all the way back to the comforting convention of the pre-New Deal era: the marketplace should regulate agriculture. Price supports should be reduced until they do not artificially support prices, and the parity concept itself should be discarded. This, in essence, is the heart of the President's and Secretary's recommendations to the present Congress.

The administration scored a signal advance toward its now-acknowledged goal in 1958, and it furnishes a crowning example of the breathtaking contradictions that have characterized Benson's stewardship.

Corngrowers were offered the choice of higher supports this year than were available to producers last year, combined with wide-open abandonment of all controls on planting, versus the old, weakened program of feeble controls and faint supports. Not surprisingly, farmers voted 3 to 1 for the short run advantage; they were willing to settle for 1 big year at Uncle Sam's expense, and let the Democrats clean up after the ball.

Benson designed and lobbied for the bill, and praised it as "steps in the right direction." It is marching the Nation straight to a final extravaganza of spending and surplus that will dwarf everything that has gone before.

Last year's corn crop was an alltime record; Department of Agriculture crop reporters foresee a staggering 12-percent boost above that in 1959. Farmers are pulling out their fences and planting corn from boundary to boundary.

Both the Republican administration and the Democratic opposition share the blame for the lack of realism and logic in our farm policies. There has been little effort in the political debate on the farm issue to define the real choices that confront us, and the hard facts that delimit them. Administrative action has stood infirmly upon serious misconceptions as to the nature of our agricultural economy, the range of choices open to us, and the real consequences of the alternatives. All too often the opposition has contented itself with pointing out the incongruities as they appeared.

The primary characteristic of the agricultural economy that sets it apart from all other major industries and furnishes the basic cause of the farm problem is the remarkable lack of variation from year to year in the total resources employed in farm production. Farmers simply put every resource at their command into an annual effort for maximum production, regardless of price and income consequence. During the period 1920 to 1950 the index of total inputs in agriculture moved within the narrow range of 100 to 110 and showed no discernible trend.

It is really not surprising that farmers should put all their available resources—of labor, land, machinery, livestock, and capital—into each year's production effort. Farmers are generally hard pressed for money, and their motive is to produce as much as they can to increase their income. Individual farmers are the decisionmaking unit, and the individual farmer can have no perceptible influence upon total supply and prices by withholding his resources; he has no bargaining power. Nor can farm resources be shifted readily to nonfarm uses. If the farmer himself gets another job in town, his land and other productive resources will be sold or rented to another farmer. The farmer has little choice, if he wants to improve his income, but to buckle down and work as hard as he can on the farm. For these reasons, the full farm resources of each farm are almost certain to remain in the farm production race.

The lack of long-term variation in total agricultural inputs is a result of the relatively constant acreage of farmland and the farmers' urge to produce as much as he possibly can. Barely enough new farmland has been developed, particularly since 1920, to offset the requirements for suburban growth, highways, airports, and other nonfarm uses. As new, more efficient technology makes it possible for farmers to cut down on the amounts of some kinds of farm inputs, other types of inputs are substituted. For example, the total labor used in all farmwork held almost constant at 23 billion man-hours per year from 1910 through 1935, then declined sharply by nearly 40 percent by 1957. But the increased employment of capital by farmers just about offset the declining use of labor in agriculture to hold the total resources used almost constant.

The dynamic man-made variable in agriculture that accounts for the long-run expansion of American farm production is technological advance—increased output per unit of input. Willard W. Cochrane, professor of agricultural economics at the University of Minnesota and president-elect of the American Farm Economics Association, says: "This rate of increase (in farm production) must be ascribed to technological advance; there is nothing else to ascribe it to. * * * Farm operators generally have adopted a wide range of new and improved production methods, improved plant varieties, improved breeds of livestock, improved sanitation practices, the general-purpose tractor, and endless machine hookups; new methods of insect and pest control, supplementary irrigation, new views on fertilizer application, improved feeding practices, and so on."

Technological advance depends upon two principal factors: The availability to farmers of improved techniques, and their ability to adopt them. There is a considerable backlog of improved techniques not yet universally applied by farmers. The effective limiting factor is more generally the ability of farmers to adopt the improved technology they know about, and this limit is the available capital for investing in the new machinery, breeding stock, and production supplies. When farm prices and incomes are poor, technological advance is slow or nonexistent; when prices and incomes are good it has been rapid.

The readiness of farmers to adopt technological advances has enormously important and often overlooked implications for farm policy. Farmers are undoubtedly the most persistent savers in our society. Young farmers manage to squeeze money for farm improvements out of meager incomes amounting to 50 cents to a dollar an hour on their labor, at the cost of severe deprivation of their family living standard. As they grow older, the habit lingers. It is almost universally true that the farmer's cows will have running water in the barn before his wife gets it in the house. To suppose the farmer's wife resents this would betray a city dweller's lack of understanding; a farm wife is aware that running water for the cows is a capital investment which will increase family income, while running water in the kitchen is primarily a consumption expenditure.

Technological advance in agriculture is grossly exaggerated by extraordinary surges in demand such as those of the wartime and international famine emergencies in the 1940's. The National Government pleaded that farmers expand production to the maximum possible limits. Farm prices rose sharply in response to the increased market demand—which certainly represented genuine social needs. Just as promptly, farmers plowed back much of their added income into technological advances. When the unusual demands tapered off, the expanded U.S. farm plant could not be scaled down accordingly. And the Government inherited a share of the responsibility for adjusting the farmer to the declining market demand.

Maintained by a steady level of inputs and given a persistent upward thrust by technological advances, farm products pour out of the American fields and pastures in a steadily rising flood, in peace and war, good times and bad, high prices and low, fair weather and foul. Farmers shift their production from one commodity to others in response to changes in price and other factors, but their aggregate output, individual and total, is invariably the most they can produce. In the first half of this century, total farm output increased by an average of 2 percent per year; adjusted for abnormal weather, no year's output varied by more than 4 percent from the year before. Technological advance is a hand on the throttle of farm production, but it is a hand that can only hold still or push ahead; productive steam, once turned into the farm economy, cannot be shut off by any device yet applied.

Manufacturing production varies much more sharply. In contrast to the comparable maximum year-to-year change of 4 percent in farm production, U.S. manufacturing production decline 17, 18, and 23 percent below the preceding year in each of the depression years of 1930, 1931, and 1932. The cumulative drop in annual manufacturing output in the 3 years was 48 percent; farm output increased 3 percent in the same period. On the economic upswing, manufacturing output jumped 46 percent in just 2 years after Pearl Harbor, while farm output gained only 9 percent.

The demand side of the farm economy is approximately as stable as the supply side. For one thing, the dimensions of the human stomach do not change from day to day, year to year, or even from generation to generation. Over the past 50 years Americans have consumed close to 1,565 pounds of food per capita each year.

However, this does not mean that per capita consumption of farm resources has not increased. Consumption of more expensive, high resource-using foods has increased sharply as average family incomes have risen. Since 1919 consumption of meats rose 24 percent, and dairy products exclusive of butter by 31 percent. At the same time, consumption of such low-resource-using foods as potatoes dropped 46 percent and of flour and cereals by 26 percent.

Thus the rising American standard of living has increased the per capita market for farm resources. Less grain is consumed directly by humans; more is fed to livestock to produce more expensive foods. But there is evidence that this manner of expanding the market for farm output is approaching its limit. A study of family food consumption by income groups made by the U.S. Department of Agriculture in 1955 shows that some 60 percent of the total U.S. population has already achieved a standard of living beyond which further increases in income will have little effect upon consumption of farm food resources.

This leaves population growth as the major expander of domestic food consumption. U.S. population is currently expanding at an annual rate of about 1.8 percent. This corresponds to an average annual increase of slightly more than 2 percent in farm output since 1950. The tiny, fractional margin by which supply—generated by technological advance in agriculture—outruns and stays ahead of a rising level of domestic civilian demand fed mainly by population increase, is the basic key to the American farm problem.

Small as the true annual farm surplus may be, it is extremely significant in relation to farm prices and incomes, because the aggregate domestic demand for food is severely inelastic. Just as the study of food consumption patterns showed that additional family income results in little qualitative and quantitative change in food purchases by most families, so it is with retail food prices. Consumers shift their food buying from one product to another when specific prices change, but tend to maintain a stable standard of diet. And as more lower-income families rise above the diet-improving range of incomes, the demand for farm food products can be expected to become increasingly inelastic.

Professor Cochrane, who has made particularly enterprising studies of the supply and demand elasticities for food, calculates that the demand elasticity for food at retail under contemporary conditions is so small that an increase of 2 percent in the supply of food will drive retail food prices down by 10 percent. But this is not the worst of it from the farmer's standpoint. Farmers are now getting only 40 cents of the consumer's food dollar. The costs and profits which account for the other 60 cents are not affected; they have climbed substantially throughout the recent period of falling farm prices. The entire 10 percent drop in retail prices must come out of the farmer's 40 cents; in other words, prices farmers receive will drop 25 percent.

This, then, is the economic dilemma of American agriculture. The picture is almost unique in our present-day economy. Farm prices are fashioned by the interaction of an unmanaged, ever-burgeoning supply countered by severely inelastic demand, with technological advance characteristically outrunning population growth. As a result, farm prices and farmers' incomes are subject to chronic depression, relieved only by intermittent surges in demand arising from war or other unusual circumstances.

The administration's confused attempts to achieve an automatic rationalization of the farm problem by resorting to the antiquated law of supply and demand have been completely inadequate to cope with the powerful forces at work.

The sliding scale was ineffective in discouraging production; controls on the basics were effective in shunting the surplus problem from one group of commodities to others, but did nothing to cope with the overall farm price decline. Prices settled quickly and rested on the reduced supports; the sliding scale proved to be equally as rigid as 90 percent of parity—but at a lower price level.

Even the massive soil bank plan foundered on one of the simple verities of farm economics: It limited only one of the inputs available for farm production—land. Undiminished total quantities of labor, machinery, fertilizer, and other farm inputs were applied to the reduced acreage, resulting in increased yields per acre.

Moreover, there was little genuine will on the part either of farmers or of the administrators to make it truly effective. Many millions of dollars were paid to destroy crops that were already dead—killed by drought and frost and flood. Much of the acreage put into the soil bank was far less productive than claimed; the poorest acres went in first. Loose administration and the lack of identification of the soil bank with a genuine will and realistic complementary programs to raise and maintain farm prices were translated into extremely poor morale among the farmers who participated.

The proposal now favored by the administration—to abandon parity and fix supports at 75 to 90 percent of the average market price of the preceding 3 years—can afford no more immediate relief than the earlier switch from rigid 90 percent of parity supports to the sliding scale. Moreover, it could not be enacted in time to apply to any crops earlier than 1960.

Under the new proposal, farm prices would drop by as much as 25 percent in the first year, tapering off to about 3 to 8 percent a year. But farm output would not be restrained nor demand importantly increased nor large governmental outlays avoided until farm prices had descended to drastic limits.

One limit would be the point at which farmers' incomes became so low that they had no money to invest in technological improvements to cut their production costs, increase their efficiency, and so boost overall farm production enough to keep up with or ahead of population growth. This is very low indeed and measures extreme deprivation.

Another limit is the point at which American farm products would move into aggressive competition in world trade. In many respects this represents a dangerous route; a sharp break in world wheat prices would gravely undermine the economies of such allies as Canada, for example. And many smaller countries whose internal stability depends heavily upon the proceeds from relatively small exports of agricultural and other raw materials might be endangered by large-scale American exports.

Long before any such drastic limits are reached, the more pragmatic limit of political toleration will assert itself on behalf of the badgered taxpayer and the bedeviled farmer, to demand rational and economic management of the American people's stake in agriculture.

INVASION OF PANAMA

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, this morning's newspapers contained some very disturbing news about invasion forces which originated from Cuba having been successful in landing on the shores of Panama, and already being in control of one of the small villages of 500 people there.

Mr. President, on April 15, on the floor of the Senate, I predicted that this kind of action would take place, and I urged that the United States through its representative to quickly advocate the creation of a police force under the jurisdiction of the Organization of American States to stop this kind of aggression from one country against another country in Central and South America. Unfortunately, the idea did not get very far.

As we read the story in the newspapers this morning, we can conclude that there is a sizable force, and that the invaders mean business. People on both sides are already being shot and killed. I think we can understand the importance of trying to formulate immediately some policy whereby we can stop this unwarranted aggression against Panama.

Mr. President, this morning by telephone, I talked to the President of Panama, Ernesto de la Guardia. He is a very fine, democratic gentleman, who attended Brown University in the United States. President de la Guardia is, in fact, a great believer in democratic principles and has run a thoroughly democratic government in Panama since he became President. When we observe these invading forces coming from Cuba, it can no longer be said that they are seeking to overthrow a government which is ruled by a dictatorship, since there has been in Panama, under Ernesto de la Guardia, one of the most democratic governments ever found anywhere in Central or South America.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I am happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on American Republics Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORSE. As the Senator from Florida knows, I have stood shoulder to shoulder with him in every position he has taken this year, and last year also, with regard to the Latin American problems. The Senator from Florida is as well versed on those problems as any Member of the Senate, and I desire to associate myself with his remarks.

It is about time that we should take a long, hard look at the source from which this kind of agitation is coming in Latin America.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the able Senator from Oregon for his remarks and compliment him on his interest and approach to this vital area of this world.

Mr. President, during my conversation with the President of Panama this morning he stated, "Let us not kid ourselves into believing that this is just a group of adventurers from our own country or even from Cuba. These people are mostly Cubans but directed by and led by militant Communists. Their ambition is the long stated one of taking over the Panama Canal. The leaders of the invading forces really desire to put a squeeze on the United States of America.

Mr. President, I think the time has come when the U.S. Government can no longer afford to let this kind of situation develop, for eventually we may have to take possibly more drastic action than would be necessary if we took meaningful action today.

The Organization of American States is meeting this afternoon at 12:30. At that meeting I understand the Organization is going to invoke article VI of the Rio Treaty, which will call for the foreign ministers of all Latin American countries to meet together and to decide forthwith what should be done. I have reason to believe that the Organization of American States may call upon the United States not simply for small arms and ammunition, which we gave to Ernesto de la Guardia's government yesterday, but may call on us for possibly the use of a destroyer or two for the purpose of intercepting new invading forces—now reported en route from Cuba to Panama. These ships would not be representing the United States but the OAS. I think the time has come for us to follow such a firm program and to cooperate with the Organization of American States in organizing a Western Hemisphere police force to keep the peace. Let us give them the help which they need now, including the arms and destroyers necessary to stop unjustified invasions and aggressions. If we, the members of the OAS, do not stop this invasion now, Mr. President, I regretfully predict that in the next 2 or 3 months it will come to haunt us as nothing has haunted us since the Communists under Dictator Arbenz took over Guatemala. This is even a worse situation in Panama. We have a large stake in Panama and in the Panama Canal. Mr. President, perhaps this invasion of the Republic of Panama is not approved by Fidel Castro, Prime Minister of Cuba. I do not think they are. But, apparently Raul Castro has some interest in this. These invaders are known Communists. They are now seeking to destroy and take over democratic governments now existing in Central America. The United States had better wake up and adopt a firm and realistic policy, or we will live to regret our indecision, our soft shoe policy.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. Let me make two points very quickly.

On the basis of such information as I have in my position in the Foreign Relation Committee, I am very fearful that these are Communist-dominated agitations and invasions.

Second, I am very much concerned about communism in Cuba. I am not interested in what people say in speeches. I have asked the State Department for a copy of a speech which the brother of Fidel Castro made not so long ago in Cuba. It was one of the most bitter denunciations of the United States that could be imagined. In my judgment, he followed the straight Communist line in his speech. I think we had better take a look at the situation before it is too late.

Mr. SMATHERS. He made that speech at the University of Havana at the same time Fidel Castro was visiting Princeton University and making a somewhat pro-American speech.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to say to the Senator from Florida that I thoroughly approve of the United States putting itself at the disposition of the Organization of American States.

As I understand the Senator, it is not his desire or intention that we should participate unilaterally, but it is his intention that if the organized conscience of the Americas asks for our aid, we will give all the aid possible to carry out the mandate.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator is correct. As usual, with his decisive mind and precise speech he states principles I want to state, better than I can state them. The point he has made is exactly what I was trying to say. We must not act unilaterally, but we must act with the OAS in giving immediate assistance to the democratic government of Panama.

I am informed by the President of Panama that there are two more invasion ships on the way from Cuba, and that he has no means of repulsing them. If there is an uprising in the city, led by Communists operating from the inside and the Government of Panama is compelled to draw the few troops it has from the mountains and bring them to the city, that means that the city becomes an isolated fortress, and one end of the Panama Canal is completely exposed, and from that point on no one knows exactly what will happen.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMATHERS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted that the distinguished Senator from Florida is emphasizing the importance of the Organization of American States. I express the hope that in some way we can bring about a strengthening of that organization, so that in the case of Panama, as has happened over the decades in the past throughout Latin America, it could be in a position effectively to intervene. I do not mean in a physical sense, but in the way in which it intervened in Honduras not so long ago, to bring about an amelioration and settlement of the situation in that troubled Republic.

So I express the hope that we may strengthen, as much as possible, the arrangement under which the Organization of American States operates. I hope that at the earliest opportunity Canada may occupy the vacant chair, long awaiting her, so that we may have a real hemisphere organization, comprising all the countries in this part of the world.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the able Senator from Montana.

If we establish a police force for the Western Hemisphere, in my judgment it will mean a great benefit to all the Central and South American countries. They are fearful that they may be invaded by some unfriendly country which is now their neighbor. Therefore they have to devote a very large share of their budgets to military expenditures.

If we can once establish an Organization of American States police force, and bring about such a situation that each country will know that such police force will be available to it should it be under attack, it will mean that each of the countries, instead of spending more than half of its budget in building military defenses, will be able to divert a great deal more of its money into economic development, better roads, schools, and constructive things of that nature.

There is a great deal of virtue in the idea of a police force for American States.

Let me say to the distinguished occupant of the chair, the Vice President of the United States, that I endeavored to call the White House this morning and talk with the President about this dangerous situation, developing throughout the Caribbean area. As I understand, he was busy having a conference with Republican leaders. However, I was able to tell one of his assistants about this idea of an OAS police force for keeping the peace and to urge him to give leadership at this particular time, to see if we cannot establish the police force as a fact, not only with respect to aid to Panama and the other helpless countries of Central America but, in the long run, to bring about a quicker, more constructive development of Latin America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to commend the able Senator from Florida for his industry and intelligence in this entire field. He has been one of the leaders in bringing to the attention of the Congress from time to time the problems in this hemisphere and the solutions to such problems.

Only a few days ago I expressed to the Senator my grave concern over the situation to which he refers today. I think he has rendered a great and constructive service by bringing this problem to the attention of the Senate and the American people. I certainly hope that careful consideration will be given immediately to the suggestions he has made.

Mr. SMATHERS. I thank the able majority leader for his generous comments. He has long been interested in this entire area and is highly regarded by the people of Latin America for his continued efforts in their behalf.

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in view of the policy luncheon which is held every week on this side, I wish to take a few moments to say something about the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? If the Senator is to make a speech, I should like very much to insert something in the RECORD.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall require only about 4 minutes. I will not trespass too long upon the time of the Senate.

Mr. President, I once asked Bob Taft why he ever voted for the confirmation of the nomination of Dean Acheson to be Secretary of State. I said, "Your views are diametrically opposed." His answer was that, so long as the nominee was a man of character and of reasonable competence and reasonable qualifications, the President was entitled to have whomever he wanted, so he supported that nomination.

The President has indicated that he wants Clare Boothe Luce to serve as our Ambassador to Brazil. Unless she is impeached on grounds of character, competence, or qualification, I believe every Member of the Senate ought to support the nomination.

The first question is, Is she a person of character? All I know is that 22 Members of the Senate served with Clare Boothe Luce in the 78th and 79th Congresses, including the majority leader, the minority leader, the very distinguished assistant majority leader, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. ROBERTSON], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commere [Mr. MAGNUSON], the chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy [Mr. ANDERSON], and many others. There are 14 Democratic Members of the Senate and 8 Republican Members in this Congress who served with Clare Boothe Luce, and who know her.

It is not a question of testimony. It is not a question of hearsay. It is a question of what we know. We know her to be a person of character, and we know her to be a person of competence.

Who will deny her competence, in the field of journalism, the field of art, the dramatic field, lecturing, publishing, and so on? I believe that her competence in those fields and her experiences in Italy conjoin to indicate what an excellent background she has in almost every field of human enterprise. I believe that such a background is fruitful, indeed, in fashioning the capacity to adjudge facts and conditions, which capacity would serve her well as a representative of this country in Brazil.

In our search for competence, I think we too often assume that in the diplomatic field one must have broad business experience. That may be so in some cases, but I would make an exception of Brazil. In Brazil the people set great store by everything in the cultural field and in the field of performance talents. I was in Brazil when the symphony orchestra stopped in the middle of its performance because a very distinguished American soprano sang off half a note. If anything indicates the high state of cultural appreciation in Brazil, that would certainly do it. Mrs. Luce's cultural background and talents would appeal particularly to this, the largest of the Latin-American countries; and it would help her immeasurably in serving as our representative there.

Why is she opposed? Because of a remark about Franklin Roosevelt or Harry Truman? Who has not said such things in past campaigns? I came to Washington with Franklin Roosevelt in 1933. I was here all through his administrations, and also through the Truman administration. I know the situation. I had a few things to say myself that on occasions almost scorched the paper. I wish to say for Mr. Truman that I received a letter from him yesterday. It is a wonderful letter. I had spoken about my visit to him when I left Washington because of an eye malady. I went to see him, and I told him what a great man he was. Later, when I ran for the Senate he just about took my ears off me in great fashion. [Laughter.] Everyone understood.

I said some nice things about the man of Independence, and he sent me a nice note for it. He said, "You never should have left there. I hope we can visit soon."

We have been the best of friends no matter what has eventuated in some of the campaigns.

Therefore I say, Why thrash old straw or beat an old bag of political bones? [Laughter.] This is an entirely new matter which is before us. When I say a bag of political bones——

Mr. MORSE. Would the Senator wish to change that phrase? In my speech I referred to her as a charming lady. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not for a minute would I yield to an implication otherwise. When I spoke of a bag of bones I meant the bag of bones the senior Senator from Oregon brought before us.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must rise to the defense of the lady.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am referring to the old bag of political bones, these old canards.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. I merely wish to add a few other thoughts. In Brazil, where Clare Boothe Luce will serve as our Ambassador, the fine arts have been brought to a state of almost unequaled advancement. No country in Latin America has so many and long-established learned societies. The Brazilian Academy of Letters, modeled on the French Academy, has existed for 60 years. The Brazilian Historical and Geographical Society is the oldest of such societies on this continent, and goes back 121 years.

Diplomacy is something more than a knowledge of coffee prices and which cattle strains are best for Brazil. It is something more than imports or exports or the value of the cruzeiro. It is the art of developing good will with people and gaining their confidence.

Can that be adequately done without a sympathetic understanding of people through an appreciation of their strivings, their yearnings, their hopes, their aspirations? What was said in a political campaign is unimportant. What she can do through a common bond at the cultural level in furthering our interests and developing the best friendly relations is all important. Because she is accomplished in this field, her nomination should be unanimously confirmed.

I am addressing myself particularly to my friend, the senior Senator from Oregon, whose capacity for tolerance and forbearance and whose grace of spirit are nationally known. I hope that he will now feel that his soul has been unburdened, his conscience cleansed, and his fidelity to public duty properly discharged; so that he can now join with his colleagues in the Senate in confirming the nomination of this accomplished woman who will so capably and ably represent us in Brazil, and make unanimous her endorsement by the Senate.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, many persons have discussed Mrs. Luce's personality and her character and her ability to be a good diplomat. I should like to add a word. I spent several days in her office in Italy when she was our Ambassador there. I can truthfully say that, in my opinion, there never was an ambassador who has served with more efficiency and more fairness and a greater understanding of what her associates were doing in their various capacities, than Mrs. Luce. From my conference with her in the Embassy at Rome I became convinced that she knew her responsibilities and how to carry them out in the best interests of our country in its relations with Italy.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to join in the debate with respect to Mrs. Luce. I, too, have had personal experience with reference to her serving as our Ambassador in Italy, and have had some opportunity to appraise the results of her service. I have also had the opportunity to be rather close to the mission of our new Ambassador, who succeeded Mrs. Luce as Ambassador to Italy, Ambassador Zellerbach. I speak from my own rather intimate knowledge of that situation, because Ambassador Zellerbach has been a personal friend of mine for a quarter of a century. The reputation and the record of the work left in Italy by Mrs. Luce is an outstanding record and is known to all.

Without in any way endeavoring to beg the question with respect to campaign statements, they stand, as Mrs. Luce has said, and there is no question about them.

I say the important evaluation is with respect to her record as our Ambassador while she served in Italy. Aside from my own personal knowledge and the results of her work, I think we can rely upon the appraisal of the Senator from Montana, the deputy majority leader [Mr. MANSFIELD], whose statement before the Committee on Foreign Relations I should like to read at this time. It is short, and appears at page 7, as follows :

Senator MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have no questions to ask. All I want to say, for the record, is this:

That we have to judge a nominee on the basis of their performances. Like the distinguished chairman of this committee, I came to the Congress the same time that the Congressman from Connecticut did. She served in the House for 2 years and made a very commendable record. There were many occasions when we were on opposite sides of the fence.

She served as our Ambassador to Italy for almost 4 years, and I believe is the first woman ever appointed to represent us in a Latin country. She did it under difficulties, and I think her record there was outstanding.

There are some things that some people do not get credit for, and I think perhaps not enough of the story has been told about Ambassador Luce's part in the settlement of the Trieste question, and to a lesser degree, in the settlement of the Austrian State Peace Treaty.

I think that ought to be in the record.

I have no questions, Mr. Chairman.

There are few Ambassadors whom the United States has sent abroad who have had greater successes, as our distinguished friend from Montana has pointed out, than the settlement of the very vexing Trieste question and the settlement of the Austrian Peace Treaty. In both of them Italy was very importantly involved; and with respect to the former it was the determining factor in the settlement of the Trieste issue.

Therefore, Mr. President, judging this matter upon the record of what an Ambassador has accomplished and what an Ambassador can accomplish in a country like Brazil, and considering, as the Senator from Montana has said, the attractiveness of a personality like that of Mrs. Luce on a people like the people of Brazil, I shall vote to confirm her nomination.

EXPANSION OF AMERICAN AID TO POLAND THROUGH POLISH-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on April 10, 1959, I commented on the floor of the Senate upon the importance of strengthening American aid to Poland. I pointed out the continued close ties between the Polish and American peoples. Despite artificial obstacles which have been imposed between them, by the Communist government of Poland, our two peoples remain warm and cordial in their relationships and mutually devoted to the same ideals of liberty and sovereignty.

In my April 10 remarks, I arranged for the printing in the RECORD of the information which I had requested from the State Department with regard to programs of Polish aid, undertaken by the U.S. Government and by private sources during the period 1957 to 1959.

Today, I wish to add further facts to that picture.

I now bring to the attention of the Senate the text of a followup letter just received from the State Department which completes the narrative summary on American aid to Poland. This letter from Assistant Secretary of State William B. Macomber, Jr., sets forth the aid supplied by the United States to Poland from the end of World War II to 1956.

I submit these facts because I believe that:

(a) The Congress and the American people will be glad to have at hand a full account of the manner in which they have assisted, and very rightly so, the brave country which was the first to take up arms in the defense of liberty in World War II.

(b) I should like the Polish people, too, to have available these facts insofar as that is possible.

I know, of course, that there is gratitude in the hearts of the Polish people, because, in many contacts with Polish-American groups, there have been innumerable instances when they have told me of the devoted and appreciative expressions from the land of their fathers to the people of the United States.

MEETING UNFULFILLED NEEDS

(c) But most important, I submit this summary as an indication that the job is still undone. The needs of Poland today are vast. I hope they will be met through constructive American action.

Senators may recall that I have introduced a new bill to carry out the concept of "Food for Peace."

Contemplated in this measure is authority for the establishment of binational foundations which would use the counterpart proceeds of American food sales abroad for supporting health, education, and other worthy purposes in foreign lands.

NEED FOR A POLISH-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

I can think of no other country where I would like to see such a binational foundation established sooner than Poland—the country which has been among the first in the affection of free peoples all over the world.

A Polish-American foundation, with an outstanding binational board of directors, dedicated to the health of the Polish people, the improvement of educational opportunities for the Polish people, and other sound purposes, would be a new chapter in a history of cooperation which reaches back to the immortal contributions of Tadeusz Kosciusko and Casimir Pulaski.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the letter from Mr. Macomber, dated April 22, 1959, be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 22, 1959.

The Honorable HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations, Committee on Government Operations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: In accordance with your request of February 27, 1959, I am transmitting herewith the information desired by your Subcommittee on American medical assistance furnished to Poland during the period between the end of World War II and 1956. Information relating to programs conducted during the period between 1957 and 1959 and to other questions raised in your letter was sent to you in my letter of March 18, 1959.

1. Contributions by the American National Red Cross: In October 1944 the Director and Assistant Director of the American National Red Cross operation in the U.S.S.R. went to Poland to survey relief needs. They took with them $50,000 worth of basic medical supplies to expedite the initiation of a relief program. These supplies were released on a replacement basis by the Soviet Alliance of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. The American National Red Cross sent supplies to these societies to replace those which had been advanced for Polish relief. At the end of the war the American National Red Cross began an intensive program of assistance to Poland. Chapter-produced garments valued at more than $4,500,000 were sent to that country. The S.S. Birka was chartered to carry 1,200 tons of supplies, and motor vehicles to distribute them were also sent. Some of this tonnage was undoubtedly medical supplies, but precise figures are not available. By June 1, 1946, the American National Red Cross had also shipped more than 97 million surgical dressings, 9 million vitamin tablets, and large quantities of soap, medical kits, drugs, blankets, and shoes. The National Children's Fund of the American Junior Red Cross had sent 50,000 educational gift boxes, children's shoes, and cod liver oil. The total value of the assistance sent by the above date was approximately $8,400,000.

During the period from July 1, 1946, to June 30, 1947, the American National Red Cross made a grant for study in the United States to a nursing student from Poland; hospital equipment was supplied to Polish Red Cross hospitals; and chapter-produced garments and other relief supplies were furnished to the victims of floods in Poland. No figures are available, however, on the monetary value of the assistance here noted.

The value of the material assistance provided by the American National Red Cross to Poland between July 1, 1947, and June 30, 1950, was as follows: 1948—$73,937.80; 1949—$562.71; 1950—$1,528.30. There are no statistics available to indicate what percentage of these funds was used for medical assistance. Between July 1, 1950, and June 30, 1957, no material assistance was furnished to Poland by the American National Red Cross.

2. Contributions by American voluntary agencies: Between 1947 and the first quarter of 1950 the value of the medical aid furnished to Poland by American voluntary agencies totaled $326,298. The following agencies contributed to this total: American Friends Service Committee, American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, American Relief for Poland, CARE, Church World Service, Foster Parents Plan, Mennonite Central Committee, Unitarian Service Committee, Catholic Relief Services, NCWC. No record has been found of medical aid furnished by the foregoing agencies to Poland between 1950 and 1956.

3. Contributions by foundations: Precise information is not available on the contributions of various American foundations toward medical assistance to Poland. It is known, for example, that one of the first research fellowships granted by the Rotary Foundation was awarded to a specialist in child psychology from Poland, but the value of this grant is not of record. Nor is it known to what extent other fellowships have been granted to Polish students by Rotary International. As of 1954–55, 606 fellowships had been granted to students from 57 countries, 32 of them for work in the field of medicine.

In 1946 the Rockefeller Foundation awarded a grant of $53,000 to the Institute and School of Hygiene in Warsaw for the purchase of equipment and supplies. Of this sum, $2,750 was paid during 1946, and the school continued to draw on this fund through 1949. In that year approximately $1,656 was paid; and at the end of 1949 approximately $1,849 remained unspent.

During 1948 the foundation made payments amounting to $6,153.82 to the University of Cracow School of Nursing. As of December 31, 1948, $1,329.67 remained unpaid of the sum designated for the use of this school.

The medical sciences division of the Rockefeller Foundation in 1946 awarded 52 grants-in-aid ranging from $300 to $7,500 and totaling $149,950 as assistance to institutions in 19 countries, including the University of Wroclaw, Poland. During 1946 the medical sciences division also awarded medical science fellowships to six Polish students. Information on the exact value of such fellowships is not available to the Department. Other grants-in-aid were made to schools and libraries abroad to purchase supplies and equipment. One such grant was made to the University of Warsaw to purchase apparatus and materials for a neurological clinic.

At the request of the Polish Minister of Education for help in meeting the needs of educational and scientific institutions, the Committee for Rehabilitation of Polish Science and Culture, Inc., was founded. The Rockefeller Foundation appropriated $50,000 to the committee for this purpose. The U.S. International Book Association acted for the committee in placing orders and assembling books, and UNRRA assured their prompt shipment abroad. Approximately a thousand volumes were distributed to each of the libraries of 10 institutions, including the Medical School at Gdansk and the Universities of Warsaw, Lodz, Cracow, Poznan, Torun, Wroclaw, and the Curie-Sklodowaka University at Lublin.

During 1949 the Rockefeller Foundation made 304 grants-in-aid ranging from $200 to $10,000, of which 71 were in the field of the medical sciences. Two grants in aid were made to Poland, but no information is available concerning the amount of the grants or whether they were for medical education.

The foundation paid only a negligible sum to the Institute and School of Hygiene in Warsaw during 1950, and no funds were advanced during the period 1951–55.

4. Other assistance:

In a report entitled "Foreign War Relief Operations" (H. Doc. 262, 79th Cong., 1st sess.), prepared by the American National Red Cross and the War Refugee Board in 1945, there is a statement on the supplies requisitioned from governmental agencies for direct shipment abroad for the period between May 1, 1944, and April 30, 1945. The value of drugs shipped to Poland during this period was $16,923.12, and the value of drugs ordered for shipment was $53,541.66, making a total of $70,464.78.

A study issued by the Department of Commerce in April 1947 entitled "U.S. Government Transactions with Poland July 1, 1940–December 31, 1946," contains the following information on the amount of free relief and rehabilitation furnished to Poland:

American National Red Cross (out of funds provided by Congress): Medical supplies and equipment, $392,426.

UNRRA: Medical supplies and equipment, $7,648,675.

The report entitled "Economic Recovery in the Countries Assisted by UNRRA" (Washington, 1946) states that supplies delivered or to be delivered by UNRRA during 1946 included $30,000 worth of medical and sanitation aid to Poland (exclusive of freight).

I trust that the foregoing information may be of use to the committee. If I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to call me.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

UNIFIED COMMAND IN FIELD OF STRATEGIC WEAPONS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, one of the concepts which have been discussed more and more vigorously in recent months is a unified command in the field of strategic weapons. This is a concurrent idea with one suggesting that a unified command be developed for the planning and operation of limited war operations.

One of the most incisive and succinct discussions of the strategic forces command concept was set forth in an editorial entitled "New Service Feud," published in the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune of April 19, 1959.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the writer of this editorial has made several excellent points, among them being that there is some question about the wisdom of making one service responsible for the future fortunes of a weapons system in which it had no real interest, and indeed had expressed considerable opposition. On the other hand, there clearly appears to be a need for a command structure which would develop operational control over all strategic weapons delivery systems which have no real validity or relevance in a limited war situation.

I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW SERVICE FEUD

A new brawl within the Armed Forces is in the making. The potential antagonists, again, are the Air Force and the Navy. The prize will be control of the Navy's submarine-launched, intermediate-range atomic missile Polaris.

The Polaris is plainly a strategic weapon; that is, it is designed to reach behind an enemy's outer lines of defense and destroy vital targets in his homeland. The missile itself has only intermediate range (1,200-plus miles), but carried by submarines close to hostile shores—even under the polar icecap—it acquires the equivalent of intercontinental range.

That makes it competitive with the Air Force's intercontinental range missiles and manned bombers. In Air Force eyes, continued Navy control of the Polaris weapons system (meaning the submarines as well as the missile) constitutes an intolerable naval invasion of its monopoly on strategic operations.

So the Air Force is pressing to have the Polaris and its launching subs transferred from Navy command to SAC—the Strategic Air Force. Naval reaction can be imagined.

It is obviously vital to have all strategic weapons under centralized control. Presently this is attempted at the joint chiefs of staff level through a system of preselection and allocation of wartime targets. The system has its faults, the chief one being lack of flexibility.

But that doesn't mean the cure is to hand the Navy-developed Polaris weapons system over to the Strategic Air Command.

Another suggestion is the creation of a jointly staffed strategic forces command which would take control of the Air Force's strategic-range missiles and planes as well as such naval strategic weapons as Polaris-launching subs and surface vessels. Both the Air Force and Navy object to this proposal, but that doesn't disqualify it. And if the inflexibility of the present system for controlling strategic weapons cannot be cured, the creation of the proposed strategic forces may well be the best, if not necessarily perfect answer.

Many people consider the Polaris a potentially more reliable weapon than the ICBMs and preferable for its great mobility also—a moving submarine cannot be pinpointed in advance as an enemy missile target, as ICBM launching bases can. Yet it's plain that without the Navy's self-interested initiative, Polaris would never have been developed by the Air Force and our total military security would have been that much weaker.

There seems some question about the wisdom of making the Air Force responsible for the future fortunes of a weapon in which it had no real interest—and against which some Air Force partisans have campaigned—until it was on the brink of becoming operational. The Air Force downgrading of the Army-developed, land-based intermediate range Jupiter missile, once the weapon had been transferred to its control, would not seem to bode well for a SAC-controlled Polaris.

In any case, fur—or gold braid—is going to fly before this issue is settled. And it comes at an especially unfortunate time, with the administration and Congress almost at swords' points over the adequacy (or inadequacy) of the Defense Establishment and with the top civilian authority (next to the President), the Secretary of Defense, marking time for retirement.

AMENDMENT OF SENATE RESOLUTION 48, RELATING TO DEVELOPMENT AND COORDINATION OF WATER RESOURCES

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, I submit on behalf of myself and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] a resolution providing for two minor amendments to Senate Resolution No. 48 to create a Select Committee on Natural Water Resources. Senate Resolution 48 was agreed to by the Senate on April 20.

The amendments set forth in the resolution were recommended at the organization meeting of the select committee on Monday, April 27.

The distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] was the unanimous selection as chairman, and the distinguished senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] was made vice chairman.

The first amendment, on page 3, line 13, proposes to increase the membership of the committee by four additional members, to be named by the Vice President. Two are to be from the majority party and two from the minority party. The purpose of this amendment is to give representation on the Committee to areas of the country, particularly the Central Mountain States, the East, and Southeast, which are not represented in the designations announced last Friday, April 24, on page 6632 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The select committee did me the honor of making me an ex-officio member.

The second amendment, page 3, line 18, provides that eight members, instead of six, shall constitute a quorum.

These amendments were referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, as the sponsor of the Resolution No. 48, which was agreed to by the Senate on April 15, 1959. The committee reports favorably on the resolution informally with the recommendation that it do pass.

I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution so that this important select committee may complete its organization and get to work on the job ahead of it because the national water resources are the concern of the entire country.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MURRAY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I commend the distinguished senior Senator from Montana for the very constructive suggestion he has just made. This study of the proper utilization of our water resources is, in my judgment, one of the most important studies in which the 86th Congress will engage. It is a study which will affect every State in the Union and every river valley.

The original resolution, drawn in all good faith and in good conscience, nevertheless did not provide an adequate geographical representation on the committee of all sections of the country. I was particularly concerned lest the Delaware Valley, on which four States abut, which are represented by eight Senators, should not have representation on the committee.

An all-purpose study of that valley is being conducted by the Corps of Engineers, and an aggressive, wide-awake citizens' committee, with a grant from the Ford Foundation, is studying problems of governmental organization to implement the study by the Corps of Engineers.

It seems to the eight Senators from the four States involved that one of the States, at least, should have a representative on the select committee. This is not a matter of partisanship. Frankly, it does not make any difference to us whether the representative on the committee is a Republican or a Democrat.

I am happy that the eminent senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and also the able junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], who have been so active in support of the resolution, are so receptive to the suggestion which some of us have made in this regard. I thank them for their courtesy and consideration and indicate to them the strong support which they will have for the resolution from all the Senators in the area I have mentioned.

Mr. MURRAY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. I am certain the action we are about to take will take care of the problem he has described.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 111), submitted by Mr. MURRAY, for himself, Mr. MORSE, Mr. KERR, and Mr. HUMPHREY, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 48 of the 86th Congress is hereby amended to add at the end of section 2(a) the following language: "The Vice President is hereby authorized to appoint four additional members to the said committee, two Senators of the majority party and two of the minority party."

Page 3, line 18, strike "six" and insert "eight."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 111) was considered and agreed to.

THE CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, this morning there was published in the Washington Post an editorial entitled "Along the C. & O. Canal."

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALONG THE C. & O. CANAL

It is too bad more of the persons who seem anxious to inundate part of the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal Park with a high-level Potomac River dam could not have been along on the hike reunion with Justice Douglas last weekend. They would have found an especially lovely stretch of river valley where the emergent yellow-green leaves on mountainsides take on an almost autumn hue, where flowering trees and birds and wildflowers and history going back to the time of Braddock provide a never failing tonic. They would have found a widespread enthusiasm among the people of nearby Maryland, demonstrated in the outpouring at Hancock as previously in other communities, for preserving the irreplacable scenic and historic values along the old towpath in a national historical park.

Most of all they would have found a determination not to be misled by the false arguments over Washington's future water supply. Obviously water for the metropolitan area is a paramount requirement. But there are alternative means to a high-level dam for meeting any such need if water alone is the objective—low-level reservoirs, for example, which would not flood the canal. The creation of a national historical park would in no way prevent any development which Congress might find necessary for Washington's water supply. In fact, the park bills which were considered last year contained a specific reservation for water.

What is not acceptable is the kind of reservation inserted this year to sneak through a section envisaging a power dam under the guise of protecting a water source. This is the real argument. Some rural co-ops which seek subsidized hydroelectric power have ganged up with certain Members of Congress who seemingly are indebted to public power groups—the same Members who last year smothered a park bill in the House after it had passed the Senate. These people need to know that such tactics are likely to bring a demand for a reexamination of the preferences accorded power co-ops and such other perquisites as tax exemption and governmental loans at 2-percent interest.

Inasmuch as the C. & O. Canal is already a part of the park system, it is not surprising that supporters of a national historical park would prefer no new bill at all to one which would withdraw 35 miles of river valley in a section not far above Washington—especially after the attack on the entire concept of the National Park Act by Chairman GRACIE PFOST of the House Public Lands Subcommittee. Maryland Congressman JOHN FOLEY, who is on both sides of the question with one bill identical to the constructive measure of last year and another bill permitting the power withdrawal, presumably learned at the Hancock reunion how at least some of his constituents feel.

There is no shortage of power in this area; what is in increasing shortage is recreation space for an expanding population. It is possible both to preserve the C. & O. Canal Park for the future and to protect Washington's water sources by passing a bill devoid of the extraneous gimmicks that now clutter the argument.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make some brief comments on the editorial.

I do not know of any Member of the Senate in recent years who has taken a more definite stand on the matter of river basin development than I have. Consistent with that stand, I recommend a reading of the editorial entitled "Along the C. & O. Canal," as published today in the Washington Post, because in my judgment the C. & O. Canal problem involves great danger that some well-intentioned groups will overlook some pertinent facts which need to be remembered in connection with river development.

Mr. President, I never argue about facts. I try to find out what they are.

It seems to me that there is quite a difference between the problem of building the proposed dam on the Potomac River and the problem of building a great multiple-purpose hydroelectric dam on some of the major streams of the Nation.

So, Mr. President, the first fact we should establish is whether the proposed dam on the Potomac River is essential to guaranteeing a future water supply which will be adequate for the District of Columbia and the surrounding area; or whether it is true that, from an engineering standpoint, other sources of water would meet the water-supply needs of this area, without the construction of the proposed dam.

Of course, this matter involves one of the several criteria which we should keep in mind when we deal with river-basin development. We must consider water needs, power needs, fish problems, recreational needs, and navigation needs; and we must evaluate all of them from the standpoint of the controlling question of wherein is to be found the greater public interest. That is what I would have my friends keep in mind as we deal with the C. & O. Canal problem.

If the final answer is that there are other means of obtaining the needed water supply for the District of Columbia without the construction of this dam, that criterion does not favor construction of the dam.

What about power? Is there a power shortage in this area? Is there in this area a great need for power? That is a question of fact, and we must ascertain the answer.

However, so far as I know, on the basis of my understanding of the facts, at the present time there is no power shortage in this part of the country.

Let me say, as one who has fought here for 15 years for the protection of the public's interest in public power projects along with private utility projects, that I have never favored discriminatory legislation which would seek to put private power operations out of business. We need both private and public operations.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do not favor construction of the dam if it is true that at the present time there is in this area adequate power for both its present and its future needs.

Mr. President, what about recreation? It seems to me that we should obtain the facts in connection with this proposal, from the standpoint of the recreational needs of the area. If the other needs can be met without construction of the dam, then, Mr. President, in view of the fact that construction of the dam would make impossible the development of a great recreational park area for the benefit of the young people of the country, I will vote for the park.

Mr. President, I wish to pay my compliments to two great conservationists on this issue. One of them is Prof. Spencer Smith, of the University of Maryland. He has been in the vanguard in regard to the conservation phases of the C. & O. Canal project. I admire his forthrightness, his courage, and his foresight in regard to the position he has taken on this matter.

To those of my friends who are opposed to his position, I say quite frankly, "Come forward with the facts, if any there are, which would show that Professor Smith is wrong."

I also wish to pay my compliments to another great conservationist, who for some years has been a leader in connection with this matter. I refer to Associate Justice William O. Douglas, of the United States Supreme Court. To my friends who have taken a position on this question opposite to the one taken by him, I say that before Justice Douglas went on the Supreme Court, as a citizen of the State of Washington he was one of the great advocates of the development of needed public power projects. He is not an antipower advocate. But he is stressing the point that when all the criteria I have enumerated are evaluated, the public interest is to be found in the development of the recreational potentials of the C. & O. Canal area.

So I wish to have this editorial printed in the RECORD, because I think both sides in connection with this controversy should take a long look at the editorial, and then should come forward with the facts in answer to the question whether the greater public interest is to be found in construction of the dam or in preservation of the area as a park for the benefit of both present and the future generations.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The Senator from Oregon.

THE FOREIGN AID BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a very excellent article entitled "The Annual Headache." The article was written by Walter Lippmann, and was published today in the Washington Post.

I think there is so much merit in Mr. Lippmann's article that it should be printed in the RECORD, because I intend to refer to the editorial in the Foreign Relations Committee, in connection with the discussion of the foreign aid bill.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ANNUAL HEADACHE

(By Walter Lippmann)

The foreign aid bill, which calls for money to be spent in foreign countries, is an annual spring headache for the U.S. Congress. This year it is more of a headache than ever, what with the deficit which puts the President in the position of wanting to save at home in order to be able to spend abroad.

This difficulty is compounded by the fact that the bill, as it comes from the administration, inspires no enthusiasm and little confidence. For the men who have to lead the fight for foreign aid, it is a very poor cause in which to enlist their effort. For the administration bill, which was shaped not by the Department of State but by the Bureau of the Budget, is an inefficient bill.

The way it provides for foreign aid in annual installments prevents a constructive use of the foreign aid, which requires the long-term planning of investment. The amount of aid provided is in the total inadequate, and in the allocation between military and civilian use it is in some part at least misdirected.

Thus in the debate with those who oppose all foreign aid, the supporters of the bill find themselves burdened with a bill about which it can fairly be said that it will not achieve its professed objectives, and that it is in this sense a waste. It is like a project to build half a bridge at a poor place to cross a river. Or shall we say that it is like that tunnel from the new Senate Office Building to the Capitol which, so it is said, just does not arrive at the Capitol?

It is necessary, therefore, to amend the President's bill in order to have a measure behind which the believers in foreign aid, who are a multitude, can with a good conscience rally. This is the purpose of the Fulbright amendments, which were introduced on Friday. I think it is fair to say that these amendments take account, which the administration bill does not, of the findings of the Draper committee which the President himself appointed. They reflect also the views of Secretary Herter and of Under Secretary Dillon.

The Fulbright amendments follow two main principles. One is to provide for a period of 5 years enough funds to permit development loans at the annual rate of $1.5 billion. This would make possible orderly financing of investment programs which, in countries like India, could bring about a substantial rise in the standard of life.

The other principle of the Fulbright amendments is to deemphasize without abolishing the military part of foreign aid. The amendments do not reduce the amount. One of them gives the President the authority to transfer up to 30 percent rather than, as at present, up to 10 percent of the military aid to civilian uses. Another gives the American Ambassador greater control over the recommendations for military aid made by the American Military Mission in the country to which he is accredited.

These amendments dealing with the military side of foreign aid ought to open the door to a better supervision of the aid agreements made up by our military men and the local military commanders. In the official propaganda of the administration all of these programs are lumped together under the general notion that they enable military allies to encircle and contain the military power of the Communist states.

No distinction is made between genuine allies, like Britain, Canada, and France for example, and political clients like, let us say, Pakistan. It is an unhealthy pretense to plead that we are arming Pakistan in order that Pakistan may defend itself against a Soviet attack or, more farfetched still, that Pakistan could or would do anything substantial to defend Iran and Turkey if they were attacked. The real reason why we give arms to Pakistan is to keep the Pakistani Army commanders friendly to the United States rather than to the Russians. What we do is to subsidize the ruling powers who, in so many underdeveloped countries, are the leaders of the army.

The world being what it is, I would not say that this is always a wicked or unnecessary thing to do. But Congress is not a good judge of how necessary it is to do it in each of the countries where aid is being furnished. Neither is the Pentagon a good judge. The judgment should be made by the President and the Department of State. It should be a cool political judgment, not a hot and excited judgment. Above all, there should be no self-deluding propaganda that if the United States gives jet planes to a Latin American dictator, it is helping the free world to defend itself against Russia and China. What it is doing when it gives the jet planes to the dictator is to help the dictator to defend himself against his internal enemies, and that may or may not be a good thing to do in the national interests of the United States.

ALASKA'S JURISDICTION OF ITS FISH AND WILDLIFE RESOURCES

Mr. GRUENING. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Interior late yesterday took an action which is full of meaning for the people of the State of Alaska. Acting in pursuance of the Alaska Statehood Act and of enactments of the Alaska State Legislature, which has just ended its first session at Juneau—and I may say it has been a highly successful session which reflects great credit on both the legislators and the acting Governor—Mr. Fred A. Seaton certified that Alaskans have made adequate provision for the administration, management, and conservation in the broad national interest of the fish and wildlife resources of Alaska.

The significance of this action by the Secretary of the Interior is that it will mean that these important resources, which heretofore have been administered wholly by the Federal Government, will shortly hereafter be a responsibility of the State of Alaska.

The fine print of the Statehood Act provides that jurisdiction will not actually pass to the State until January 1 following the expiration of 90 legislative days after the Secretary's certification. We are not able, of course, to say definitely whether 90 legislative days remain of this session of Congress, so that transfer of the fisheries and wildlife can occur on January 1, 1960. This matter involves rather close figuring. If the Alaska Senators can persuade our colleagues to remain here through the month of August, we can achieve that desirable result. We Alaskans shall be torn between the desire to get back to Alaska as soon as possible and the desire to have this session continue for another 90 legislative days.

What I want to emphasize here is that Fred Seaton did his duty without delay and without quibbling, in certifying, as he did last night, that Alaska is prepared to manage her priceless fish and wildlife heritage. It was only last Friday that the distinguished senior Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] and I, as well as our colleague in the other body, delivered in person to the Secretary of the Interior a certification from the Governor of Alaska that our legislature had acted to establish laws and mechanisms to administer the fish and game.

We left with Mr. Seaton for his study a copy of the Alaska Legislature's enactments on this subject. That he should, on the first day following the weekend, take his gratifying action of last night speaks well for the Secretary's genuine concern for Alaska's welfare and for the future welfare of the fish and game resources of the last frontier.

I have not always agreed with Secretary Seaton's actions—especially during the last campaign—but I want to say today that he is entitled to all praise for the action he took yesterday in certifying Alaska's readiness to manage our fish and game resources in the broad national interest. That was an action which took courage, because we know there are powerful interests which would like very much to see the Federal Government hold on just as long as it can to the regulation of the Alaska salmon fisheries particularly. That was an action which took courage for another reason, which has to do with the nature of bureaucracy. It is not often, when the head of a Federal department has discretion in the matter, as Mr. Seaton did here, that such official will voluntarily take an action which will cut down on his own power and limit his own responsibilities. The fish and game in Alaska have been administered by an agency within Mr. Seaton's Department of the Interior—namely, by the Fish and Wildlife Service. The Secretary's action of yesterday will end the jurisdiction of that Bureau, we hope, on January 1, next, certainly no later than January 1, 1961.

A great and rich panoply of resources is affected by the Secretary's certification. The Alaska salmon is known around the Nation and indeed around the world as an outstanding food fish. The salmon industry has for many years been Alaska's greatest industry. Other commercial species of fish occur in Alaska in relative abundance—halibut, crab, clams, shrimp, cod, and many other species. I do not want to fail to mention the sport fish affected by this action—the fighting rainbow trout, which are bigger than rainbows found in other States; the Dolly Varden pike; and the several species of salmon, king and cohoe, which double as both sport and commercial fish. When we go fishing in Alaska we throw back as too small many a fish which would be considered trophy size elsewhere.

The Alaska moose are the biggest moose in the world, as the records of the Boone and Crockett Club will testify. The Alaska brown bear are the largest carniverous animals on earth. Other big game animals in the biggest State include caribou, elk, bison, deer, mountain sheep, and mountain goat, and they all come bigger and better in Alaska. Small game and fur bearers found in great abundance in our State include the wolverine, mink, wolf, fox, coyote, lynx, marten, beaver, weasel, muskrat, and otter.

Marine animals off our shores include the walrus, seal, the priceless sea otter, and the whale. Birds are present in Alaska in great abundance, and the State provides the nesting grounds for many of the ducks and geese so prized by hunters in other States when they are making their long migrations. The bald eagle, our national bird and symbol of American power and strength, exists in Alaska, and nowadays almost only in Alaska. We have thousands of eagles and would be glad to export them to States from which the eagle has vanished to enable them to restore the national bird all through the Nation.

Alaskans have a love for all these animals and fish. We think we can do a better job of protecting, preserving, and utilizing them than has been done in the past. Our fish and wildlife are an important part of our Alaska heritage. We are conservationists by instinct and necessity. If our fish are depleted, our industries decline. If our wildlife decreases, a part of our enjoyment of life ebbs away.

It is because of this important regard which we give to our fish and wildlife resources that Alaskans have deplored the tragic depletion of our salmon runs under Federal management. This has been a depletion which has been so serious that whole areas have had to be closed entirely to fishing, as Bristol Bay is this year, or drastically curtailed.

We think we Alaskans can do a better job in regulating the Alaska fisheries than has been done in the past. The work of rebuilding our resources is about to begin. Secretary of the Interior Fred Seaton's certification of yesterday sets the stage. The people of Alaska commend him and commend the Congress for placing the control of our resources in our hands. We are determined to set an example in sensible management which the Nation will applaud. This is justice. This is democracy in action. This is America at its best.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE UNITED NATIONS DESCRIBED BY THE AMERICAN ASSOCIATION FOR THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, frequently the United Nations comes under unjustified and unfair attack. Yet the United Nations is our one best continuing hope for world peace, because while nations talk together they do not go to war.

A most informative and thorough brochure detailing the achievements of the United Nations has just been published by the American Association for the United Nations, which consists of leading citizens in our own country who are active in arousing and sustaining public support for the work of the United Nations. I am pleased that my wife, Maurine, is a member of the board of this outstanding organization.

So that Members of the Senate may be informed regarding the worldwide program of the United Nations for peace, health, brotherhood, improved economic conditions, and world understanding, I ask unanimous consent that the publication of the American Association for the United Nations be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the publication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.N. ACTION IS ACTION FOR PEACE

UNITED STATES IN THE U.N.

It was U.S. initiative which helped to bring the U.N. and many of its specialized agencies into being.

It was the United States which asked for U.N. action in Korea, first to help bring about a united Korea, and then to repel the aggression against South Korea.

It was the United States which took the initiative to bring the Middle East and Hungarian crises to the U.N.

It was the United States which introduced the Uniting for Peace Resolution which, in times of aggression or threats of aggression, makes possible U.N. action by the General Assembly if the Security Council is prevented because of a veto from fulfilling its responsibilities.

It was U.S. initiative which launched the U.N. on its atoms for peace program.

The United States recognizes that in this world of ours, which can be spanned in hours by plane, where science can bring about either undreamed of progress or complete devastation, the U.N. must continue to succeed.

But, whether the United States continues to support the U.N. and to strengthen it, the decision is ours—for we, the people, are responsible for U.S. foreign policy.

The U.N. record of action for peace is impressive. We the people owe the U.N. our active support.

U.N., 1945–59—THE RECORD SHOWS

In 1946, by airing the complaints of Iran, Syria, and Lebanon, the U.N. brought about the withdrawal of foreign troops from these three countries.

From 1947 to 1954, the U.N. kept military watch over Greece's northern borders to prevent outside aid coming to the Communist guerrillas in Greece.

The U.N. effected a cease-fire in Kashmir and stopped what might have become large-scale hostilities. The issue is not yet solved, but U.N. observers are still in the area and armed hostilities have not been resumed.

It was U.N. mediation which helped Indonesia to achieve her independence from the Dutch—through peaceful negotiations, not through bloodshed.

U.N. action brought about a cease-fire in Palestine. As a result of U.N. efforts armistice agreements were signed in 1949 between Israel and her Arab neighbors. The U.N. has supervised compliance with the agreements.

In 1956 when France, Britain and Israel took armed action against Egypt, U.N. secured a cease-fire and withdrawal of troops; created the U.N. Emergency Force to ensure peace along the Egyptian-Israeli border; and arranged for clearing the Suez Canal.

In 1958 the U.N. Observation Group in Lebanon and the special representative in Jordan safeguarded peace and security in those countries.

In Korea, the U.N. took collective military action to repel the aggression against South Korea and to safeguard its independence and restore peace.

With U.N. experts and a $148 million fund, the U.N. Korean Reconstruction Agency helped Korea to rebuild.

The U.N. has helped relieve other suffering resulting from war and hostilities.

The U.N. Refugee Fund has assisted 34,900 refugees since 1955 and has as its main target a closure of all the refugee camps in Europe.

Also the U.N. is caring for nearly 1 million Palestine refugees, while providing education for the children in 380 U.N. schools and vocational training for the adults.

In enlisting the aid and cooperation of member governments, the U.N. helped bring about resettlement of 171,000 refugees from Hungary following the hostilities of 1956.

Originally established to help children and mothers in war-torn countries, UNICEF (U.N. Children's Fund) is now benefiting more than 50 million mothers and children each year in over 100 countries and territories.

U.N. TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE—CORNERSTONE OF PEACE

The U.N. stands ready to give technical assistance to underdeveloped countries which request U.N. help in their economic and social development.

To finance the work, the U.N. raises the money through voluntary national contributions, and shares the funds with seven of its specialized agencies, those concerned with agriculture, labor, health, education, telecommunications, meteorology, and civil aviation.

The World Bank (which makes loans for economic development) and the Fund (concerned with stable currencies and monetary reforms) also participate but receive no funds. UNICEF helps to advance the aims of the program.

Since 1950, over 6,500 experts have been recruited from 80 countries and sent on U.N. assignments into some 125 countries and territories.

As a result:

Millions of acres of land are being reclaimed for food, for settlement.

The resources of Asia and Latin America are bing explored systematically for the first time.

Some farmers are seeing their first scythe, hoe, or rake. Others are being taught power farming, scientific breeding, the use of fertilizers and insecticides.

Fishermen have seen that motor power and modern gear mean catches of 2 to 3 tons a month, instead of one-half ton a year. Rice paddies stocked with fish are yielding within 6 months 300 pounds of fish per acre.

Countries like Indonesia and land-locked Ethiopia are beginning to see civil aviation a reality; others their first network of weather stations.

One-sixth of the peoples of the world have benefited from the mass campaigns against disease. In the tropics, for yaws alone, over 10 million were treated with penicillin. Countries like India, Afghanistan, Ceylon now have modern methods for the control of malaria.

In Latin America, in the Arab States, and in the Far East, over 1,000 experts are at work on national programs for fighting illiteracy and for mobilizing community effort for needed projects.

Personnel is being trained in all fields, to carry on after the U.N. experts finish. Some 14,000 persons have been sent abroad to learn advanced skills.

For this work the U.N. has been spending $28–$32 million yearly. The special fund was recently established to make possible an expansion of this program.

To supplement this work, the International Finace Corporation was created to promote private investments.

U.N. ACTION—FOR RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

U.N.'s Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) although only a declaration, has had a powerful impact. It has been invoked to uphold civil rights within countries, used in drafting the constitutions of new states, such as Israel and Indonesia, and has spurred many countries to take legislative action to advance human rights in harmony with it.

There has been U.N. action to protect minorities, the refugee, and the person without a country * * * U.N. action to advance the political, economic, and social rights of women * * * U.N. action to fight forced labor, and to outlaw genocide, the mass destruction of a people because of their race or religion.

U.N. action helps dependent peoples:

The U.N. set Italy's prewar African colonies on the road to freedom. * * * Some 18 million dependent peoples in Africa and the Pacific are under direct U.N. supervision, in U.N.'s Trusteeship System. Strides are being made in their economic and political advancement. * * * The U.N. watches over another 125 million people by scrutinizing the anual reports which member nations are obliged to submit on conditions in their non-self-governing territories. The number of dependent peoples is diminishing as the territories become self-governing or independent.

U.N. ACTION—ATOMS FOR PEACE

Since December 1953 when President Eisenhower proposed to the General Assembly that an international atomic energy agency be established, the U.N. has taken great strides.

The first U.N. endeavor in the atoms-for-peace program was an international scientific conference in 1955 where over 1,400 scientists and engineers from 73 nations exchanged scientific and technical information on the peaceful uses of atomic energy. An even larger number—some 2,000 delegates—attended the second scientific conference in 1958.

For its members, the U.N. has made a worldwide survey of scientific information on the effects of radiation.

The specialized agencies are busy on research on the effects of atomic energy and its possibilities.

After months of negotiations, 81 countries met at U.N. headquarters in September 1956 to consider and approve the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency. An autonomous intergovernmental agency, under the aegis of the U.N. and reporting to the General Assembly, IAEA is an important instrument for the worldwide sharing of information, technical skills, radioactive materials and nuclear fuels for peaceful projects. It provides a means by which the atom can be progressively removed from military stockpiles and placed at the service of all mankind.

FAO—FOOD AND AGRICULTURE ORGANIZATION

FAO seeks better ways to produce, store, and distribute food.

It fights animal diseases: rinderpest, hoof-and-mouth, Newcastle disease of chicken, etc. As a result, millions of cattle have been saved, and the way paved for new industries to come into being.

It searches for better seeds—rice, wheat, barley, etc. Over 200,000 separate cross pollinations have been made in the search for hybrid rice. Hybrid corn raised the value of Europe's crop by $50 million.

FAO fights plant pests and diseases. It is out to destroy the locust.

FAO helps to develop fisheries and forests, and to launch new industries using these resources.

FAO assists UNICEF in its extensive feeding programs in 53 countries and in its efforts to see milk and food processing plants established; 150 out of 180 projected are already functioning.

FAO has done much to improve nutrition, from getting national nutrition services started to testing the acceptability of fish flour as a protein food.

ILO—INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATION

ILO brings together labor, management, and government to work jointly on common problems. By setting labor standards, research and technical assistance, the ILO helps raise conditions of livelihood of millions of workers throughout the world.

ILO assists governments to organize employment services, train their manpower, improve industrial safety and health, and apply modern systems of social security and labor legislation.

ILO seeks to aid workers by safeguarding freedom of association, eliminating forced labor, and promoting better labor-management relations. Its industry committees bring closer understanding of the particular problems of individual industries.

Its studies of the social consequences of the industrial use of atomic energy and of automation are directed to application of new techniques to obtain better living standards.

ILO resolutions and recommendations to governments, together with its conventions which are binding if ratified, lay down standards with regard to a wide range of subjects such as hours of work, protection of wages, holidays with pay, work by women, child labor, labor inspection and maritime working conditions.

WHO—WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

Some hundreds of millions of people have benefited from campaigns WHO has undertaken against such diseases as malaria, tuberculosis, and yaws.

WHO is out to eradicate malaria before mosquitoes develop resistance to DDT and other control insecticides.

WHO helps governments to strengthen their public health services and train their health workers.

In 1958 WHO worked on nearly 800 health projects in 132 countries and territories. UNICEF contributes equipment to many projects jointly undertaken with WHO.

WHO standardizes drugs, so that they will be of uniform strength throughout the world. Its "International Pharmacopoeia" (five languages) provides formulas for making up medicines of uniform strength anywhere.

WHO organizes research against disease, including a network of polio laboratories and work on zoonoses, animal diseases which can be transmitted to man.

WHO sends out daily broadcasts on the outbreak of pestilential and other communicable diseases, so that nations as well as ships and planes can take action.

WHO has brought into being a set of health regulations for world travel.

UNESCO-UNITED NATIONS EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC, AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION

UNESCO, since 1951, has been carrying on a global campaign for extension of free and compulsory education, advising governments on such problems as financing the expansion of schooling and revising curricula.

It operates two regional fundamental education centers in Latin America and the Arab States and has helped establish 33 national centers on fundamental education programs for the adult.

UNESCO encourages the use of mass media in education and in promoting international understanding.

UNESCO is helping underdeveloped countries, too, to establish science and engineering faculties in their universities, organize research programs, and bring into being documentation centers to service industry and research institutions.

Its own research ranges from how to make the desert fertile to compiling lists of translations published within the year.

UNESCO has brought new organizations into being—the European Organization for Nuclear Research and many professional international organizations in education, science and culture.

UNESCO has brought treaties into force—on freer transit of educational materials, on copyright protection.

WEATHER AND COMMUNICATIONS

The International Telecommunication Union draws up regulations for the world's radio, telephone and telegraph services. It allocates the frequencies for radio communication. It promotes standardization and develops new facilities.

ICAO has worked out standards which are in force today in international civil aviation—standards for licensing personnel, airworthiness of a plane, equipment at aerodromes, etc. It has mapped out some 40,000 facilities needed to make civil aviation safe around the globe, and checks to see that they come into being.

It arranges for the joint support of facilities like the North Atlantic weather-reporting ships. ICAO drew up the word alphabet used in radiocommunication between plane and ground station.

The Universal Postal Union works out the world's laws for foreign mail.

It is thanks to the World Meteorological Organization that there is uniformity and coordination in the world's exchange of weather forecasts. A WMO plan governs recruitment of ships (some 2,500) which volunteer their services for weather observations. WMO helps to promote facilities as well as practical application of meteorology to farming, transportation, public health, etc.

The Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization provides machinery for cooperation in regulations and practices relating to shipping.

U.N. IN SUMMARY—IS THIS WORTH YOUR 62 CENTS?

The U.N. is a center for harmonizing the action of nations in the attainment of common ends.

It is spurring economic and social progress and advancement of human rights.

It organizes combined efforts wherever and whenever there are common problems before nations.

The U.N. can boast of two Nobel Peace Prizes—the 1950 award to Under Secretary Ralph Bunche for his mediation efforts in Palestine, and the 1954 award to the U.N. Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees.

The U.N. has rolled up an impressive list of "firsts." To cite a few: In Korea, for the first time in history collective armed action, under the authority of the international community, was taken to stop aggression. * * * The first Braille Library in the Near East came into being with U.N. help. * * * The U.N. helped Asia establish its first DDT factory and its first penicillin factory. * * * Saudi Arabia is exporting packaged dates for the first time because of assembly-line packaging. * * * The U.N. established the first truly international police force.

The U.N. represents the collective will of 82 member nations to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war and to build peace based on law and justice.

Toward these ends, the U.N. has brought about the peaceful settlement of disputes, has kept many an explosive situation under control, and has set up the most comprehensive program of action for peace ever to be undertaken.

Estimated U.S. contributions to the United Nations, including the specialized agencies and voluntary programs, calendar year 1959

"SEARCH FOR PEACE" AWARD TO MRS. ELLEN STOUTENBERG

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, in a few weeks, the eyes of the world will be focused on Geneva, where the East-West

Foreign Ministers Conference will once more seek ways toward world peace. Men of good will everywhere pray for the success of this latest effort—conducted at the highest political level—for world peace.

In my home city of Philadelphia, a radio station, WIP, has been conscientiously working toward this same goal at the level of the average man, the radio listener.

"Search for Peace," a program conceived and developed in Philadelphia at radio station WIP, has just been singled out for service to the entire world. The May issue of McCall's magazine, on the newsstands today, announces that Mrs. Ellen Stoutenberg, producer of this series of public service radio programs, is one of seven women to win the coveted Golden Mike, the highest honor given exclusively to women in the radio and television field.

Since January 1958, over 100 well-known personalities of different political beliefs, varying national backgrounds, and many professions, have gone before WIP microphones and talked peace. Their message has been carried over the international "Search for Peace" network.

The unique aspect of "Search for Peace" is its worldwide distribution. Started as a public service on a local station level, Benedict Gimbel, Jr., president and general manger of WIP, conceived the almost startling idea of offering tapes of the programs, at no cost, to stations anywhere in the world. "Search for Peace" is now heard on 100 stations, coast to coast, in the United States; over the 100 stations of the Australian Broadcasting System; and on the Canadian Broadcasting Co.; and in places as far away as Aruba, Netherlands Andes.

Through the facilities of Voice of America, it is heard on stations normally beyond the reach of commercial radio. And I have been informed that KHUH of Honolulu will bring this message of peace to our 50th State.

Over 100 people, including John Foster Dulles, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, singer Harry Belafonte, novelist Pearl Buck, columnist Walter Lippmann, historian Arnold Toynbee, and Israel's Ambassador Abba Eban, have taken part in "Search for Peace." I am proud to say that I participated in this worthwhile effort, as did my colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator JOSEPH CLARK, and my predecessor, Senator Edward Martin. Senator STYLES BRIDGES is another Member of this body who has given his views on peace as part of this series.

In making the award, the editors of McCall's and the judges, stated:

Mrs. Stoutenberg and the staff of WIP have taken a step which eventually may prove that peace has a dynamic quality that can excite and inspire.

I should like to congratulate my good friend Ben Gimbel, and the staff of WIP. "Search for Peace" is concrete evidence of the constructive use of one of the world's most effective means of communication—radio.

It is strong evidence, too, of a broadcast station which places the public good above gain, in the finest tradition of its industry.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks, the editorial comment on "Search for Peace," from the May issue of McCall's:

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ellen Stoutenberg, the young, dynamic assistant program director of Philadelphia's Station WIP, was handed one of the year's most challenging assignments last year by her boss, Station President and General Manager Benedict Gimbel, Jr.

He asked, "What is the best thing one radio station can do to promote world peace?" The challenge was a question out of the beginnings of man set in mid-twentieth-century language. Ellen Stoutenberg's answer was a series of radio programs called "Search for Peace," which invited world-famous personalities, and little-known people as well, to sit before WIP's microphones and talk about peace. There were no interviews, no questions. Some people talked 15 minutes, others 30.

The programs initially were broadcast in prime commercial time over WIP. Within 6 weeks after the assignment was handed to her, Mrs. Stoutenberg was ready to go on the air with a full month's programing. The program series started in January 1958. To date, more than 100 persons have broadcast their views. It has become a regular feature on more than a hundred stations in the United States, plus outlets in Canada, North Africa, and Australia.

"This series," one of our judges said, "comes to grips with the central problem faced by our world. The original concept for the Philadelphia area and its later availability to all radio stations as a free public service deserve the highest praise."

WIP President Gimbel could have had no better person on hand than Ellen Stoutenberg when he decided that his station would actively pursue peace. She is a woman who feels that "communications is our most important weapon in today's world. We have lost sight of how powerful it can be."

To illustrate this, she quotes the former consul of Israel in New York, Max Varon. "Until you go to the Middle East and see the Arabs sitting in the desert huddled around a radio, listening to it before they make up their minds on a given issue, you have no idea of the power of radio. It can control or poison minds."

Ellen Stoutenberg is well backgrounded in the field of public service. Before joining WIP she had served with the adult-education program of the Ford Foundation, was program director for Baltimore's WITH and had long experience with the American Foundation for Political Education. A native of Athens, Pa., she was educated in the public schools of Annapolis, Md., and Elmira Business College, Elmira, N.Y. She now lives in suburban Philadelphia with her 14-year-old son James.

She readily admits that the biggest difficulty of "Search for Peace" was organizing it so that it could be handled by one person. "We didn't have any great budget but we did get enthusiastic response from everyone we asked to participate. No one turned us down on the basis of the idea. Arnold Toynbee came to our studios. Bertrand Russell recorded his statement in his home in England through the British Broadcasting Co. Frank Lloyd Wright taped his statement in his settlement, 'Taliesin,' at Spring Green, Wis."

WIP took newspaper ads to alert listeners to the new series, and set up a program folder which listed all commentaries for a month in advance. Forty thousand of these folders were distributed through public libraries and welcome wagon hostesses, and were enclosed in mailings by civic organizations.

To spread the "Search for Peace" to a wider audience, the services of the Philadelphia Junior League were enlisted. Through their national organization and through an advertisement placed by WIP in Broadcasting, recordings of the series were made available to stations across the country. An avalanche of requests came in for the "Peace" material. Clerks, janitors, engineers pitched in to put kits together or give a hand where needed. "Peace had become a personal thing to us all."

Mrs. Stoutenberg and the staff of WIP have taken a step which eventually may prove that peace has a dynamic quality that can excite and inspire.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, is there further morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires whether there is further morning business. If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. CLARK. If I may have the attention of the acting majority leader, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD] for a moment, if morning business is concluded, I suggest to the acting majority leader and the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], the acting minority leader—and I have also made this suggestion to the majority whip, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD]—that the absence of a quorum be suggested at this point, that the quorum call last no longer than 1:30 p.m., and at that time we undertake to ascertain whether the Senate would be willing to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement with reference to the Luce nomination which would give 15 minutes' debate to each side, and that, in conformity with the agreement reached yesterday, the Senate vote at 2 o'clock.

I wonder if my colleagues who are temporarily occupying the chairs of the majority and minority leaders think that would be good procedure.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOLDWATER. How does one control the length of a quorum call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Parliamentarian advises the Chair it is not possible.

Mr. CLARK. It is my thought that the way to do it is the way we always do: At 1:30 p.m., unanimous consent would be asked that further proceedings under the quorum call be dispensed with.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If we wanted to agree on a really slow call, it is possible that we would not go through the call once; but if the clerk went through the call once, it would not be possible to have the call rescinded.

Mr. CLARK. We could have a nice, long, slow call, which the clerk frequently brings about, and which lasts more than 10 minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would permit me to move that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce, after which the absence of a quorum might be suggested.

Mr. CLARK. I am agreeable to that.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. DIRKSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Edwin A. Robson, of Illinois, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Illinois; and Latham Castle, of Illinois, to be U.S. circuit judge for the seventh circuit.

By Mr. HART, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

Eugene Worley, of Texas, to be chief judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals; and Arthur M. Smith, of Michigan, to be associate judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.

EXECUTIVE SESSION—NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business to consider the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I think we should notify the Senate attachés that the call may well be a prelude to a yea and nay vote on the nomination set for 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, after consultation with the acting minority leader, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining half hour be divided between the proponents and the opponents of the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, 15 minutes to a side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Brazil?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I make the further request that the remaining time be allocated equally between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Let me recapitulate what I said yesterday. I say to my Democratic colleagues that, when the memory and reputation of the great Franklin D. Roosevelt have been called into question in this debate, I shall be at a loss to understand how Democrats can fail to vote against this nomination.

Among the many objections I raised to her lack of diplomacy, there is one which there is no way of avoiding. She still stands by her statement that Franklin Roosevelt lied us into a war.

She stands by her attacks on Truman and on Acheson. I say that that raises a question of judgment. When we vote for a diplomat, we have the duty to vote for someone who, we are satisfied, has the judgment and stability essential for diplomacy.

The argument has been made that we have not always applied such standards in the past. History does not bear out that contention, but even if it were so, it is not a reason for failing to apply the standards now. If we have been lax in this respect in the past, that is no justification for perpetuating the laxity.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Latin American Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations I say that Latin America needs career diplomats, career Ambassadors from the United States, and not politicians who are sent down there to pay off political debts—politicians who do not have the qualities of diplomacy which are necessary.

Remember, her speech of October 13, 1944, is not the only speech Mrs. Luce made which shows that she is not now fit to fill a diplomatic position. In the hearing the other day, in her replies she made it clear that although she had changed her mind about her intemperate language, she had not changed her mind about the meaning of her statement.

In Chicago, Ill., on October 13, 1944—and we cannot erase this indelible writing from the pages of American history—this nominee said:

> Shall we trust the making of a new peace to the tired, shaking hands of a man who could not keep the one he inherited when he was young and strong?
> Although a majority of the American people may forgive him, history never will, in the end. For he is the only American President who ever lied us into a war because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it.
>
> Thus in the end, the shame of Pearl Harbor was Mr. Roosevelt's shame.

Later in the same speech she said:

> Mr. Roosevelt far from being a great statesman, is, in the field of statecraft, not only untrustworthy but also incompetent.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point the article from the New York Times of October 14, 1944, carrying the story of Mrs. Luce's speech in full.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT "LIED US INTO WAR," MRS. LUCE DECLARES IN CHICAGO—SHE TELLS RALLY THAT HE IS "UNTRUSTWORTHY AND INCOMPETENT"—QUOTES CHARGE FOR WHICH LYTTELTON APOLOGIZED

CHICAGO, October 13.—Representative Clare Boothe Luce of Connecticut asserted tonight that President Roosevelt was "not only untrustworthy but also incompetent" in the field of statecraft.

In an address prepared for delivery at a Republican-sponsored meeting in Orchestra Hall and distributed in advance to the press by western Republican headquarters, she said:

"Shall we trust the making of a new peace to the tired and shaking hands of a man who could not keep the one he inherited when he was young and strong?

"Although a majority of the American people may forgive him, history never will, in the end. For he is the only American President who ever lied us into a war because he did not have the political courage to lead us into it. Thus, in the end, the shame of Pearl Harbor was Mr. Roosevelt's shame."

Contending that "Mr. Roosevelt, far from being a great statesman, is, in the field of statecraft, not only untrustworthy but also incompetent," Mrs. Luce added:

"In the precise words of President Roosevelt in 1937, I quote: 'To keep the peace is the fundamental policy of the United States.' Did Mr. Roosevelt prevent war? In other words, did Mr. Roosevelt's fundamental policy succeed or fail?"

QUOTES BRITISH MINISTER

She said "New Dealers" often presented "extenuating circumstances," among them that the United States was the victim of an unprovoked attack by Japan, and continued:

"In June of this year Oliver Lyttelton, British Minister of Production, declared in London, I quote: 'Japan was provoked into attacking America at Pearl Harbor. It is a travesty on history to say that America was forced into the war. It is incorrect to say that America was ever truly neutral.'

"No, the theory of the unprovoked attack will not wash. Why did he (President Roosevelt) never tell us that, if Japan conquered China, and Germany overwhelmed Great Britain, they would then completely dominate our oceans, and that this one fact alone made the war our war?

"He did not tell us. First, because he did not have the courage to admit that his 7-year policy of isolation and appeasement had been a failure, which had contributed to bringing the war about, and that the only way left to redeem this failure of his statesmanship was for the Nation to go to war. Secondly, he did not tell us the truth because he wanted a third term."

The Representative said that during 7 peacetime years the President did not seek to achieve greater collective security in the world, and "not a single hint did he give to the people of the many secret and specific warnings he was receiving, and Mr. Hull was receiving, from his Ambassadors and his military observers abroad of the growing danger to America" from Japan.

"Arms for the Nation were the President's for the asking," Mrs. Luce asserted. "He did not ask."

APOLOGY BY LYTTELTON

Capt. Oliver Lyttelton made a personal apology in the House of Commons June 21, the day after he made the remarks about America which Representative Luce quoted in her Chicago speech, the Associated Press here said yesterday.

The British Minister of Production did not deny he had remarked at an American Chamber of Commerce luncheon in London that the United States had provoked Japan to attack, but disclaimed any intention of giving this as his belief.

Asserting that he was only trying to express gratitude for lend-lease aid prior to the Japanese assault, Captain Lyttelton said:

"I ask the House to believe that the fault was one of expression and not of intention, and I hope that this apology will undo any harm which the original words may have caused here or in the United States."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I shall await with interest in the future, the speeches, at Franklin Roosevelt memorial dinners, of my Democratic colleagues who vote for this nomination today. Her statements were malicious distortions, they were untruthful, and that goes to the question of judgment and competence required in an Ambassador.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MORSE. I yield myself 2 more minutes.

I also point out that on October 1, 1944, as a Member of Congress clothed with the trust of that office, she said in Philadelphia:

> I always believed we had to get into the war, but I would like to have had us led into it, not lied into it.

It was no foreign war that Franklin Roosevelt responded to at Pearl Harbor. It was a war thrust upon us. I think the American people know what the verdict of history will be with respect to this statement. I could not vote for such an undiplomatic person.

"Oh," it is said, "the Senator from Oregon makes rather harsh statements." I have truthfully, but jocularly, answered that argument before. I am not a candidate for a diplomatic post.

In the things I have said in criticism of President Eisenhower and his policies, I have questioned the political morality of his administration; I have questioned his judgment on many issues; but I have never questioned his loyalty or his patriotism, and I have never questioned his veracity. He has been mistaken in judgment, in my opinion, many times, but I have never questioned his veracity, nor his devotion to his country.

The next point I wish to make very quickly, while I wait for the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]—I hope he has been sent for—is that her so-called documentation, as I pointed out yesterday, is no documentation at all. She might as well have said, "Go to the Congressional Library and find out if I am right." She offered no documentation. As I pointed out in the RECORD yesterday, I received a telegram from Prof. Basil Rauch, who is a professor of history at Barnard College, Columbia University. That telegram reads as follows:

APRIL 23, 1959.

Senator WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.:

The statement by Mrs. Luce misrepresented my book "Roosevelt from Munich to Pearl Harbor." My book proves on the basis of the documents that those who make charges against President Roosevelt such as Mrs. Luce have abused the facts of history.

BASIL RAUCH,
Professor of History, Barnard College, Columbia University, New York, N.Y.

Professor Rauch points out that Mrs. Luce misinterpreted his book "Roosevelt: From Munich to Pearl Harbor," and that there is nothing in the book which would justify her in citing him as authority for her misstatements of fact.

I pointed out that her record in Italy does not entitle her to this nomination. In Italy she intervened in domestic political and economic policies, contrary to the clear duty of an Ambassador.

What do Senators suppose we would say if the British Ambassador to the United States, during an American political campaign, tried to interfere in an American election? The demand would be, "Send him back to England, because he is persona non grata."

In fact, that has happened in our history.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 more minute.

She intervened in the domestic politics and economic policies of Italy, as I documented in my speech yesterday.

Lastly, I do not see how we can vote to send this nominee to Brazil when it is well known that Brazil has a government oil monopoly. Her views are well known; and in my judgment we have no right to send as Ambassador to Brazil someone who will be at least beclouded with the suspicion that she is representing the oil interests of America, and she and her consort did in Italy, in my judgment.

Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How much time does the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield time to the Senator from Pennsylvania if he desires it.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not desire to speak at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does either side wish to yield some time?

Mr. MANSFIELD. If no Senator wishes to speak, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the time to be charged to the opponents?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. There is an agreement in effect that the vote be taken at 2 o'clock. Inasmuch as we have no speakers on the floor, the time for the quorum call will have to come out of our time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I rise to speak briefly on the confirmation of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce as Ambassador to Brazil.

I do not speak in the belief that Mrs. Luce needs any defense in a personal sense. I speak, Mr. President, because I think that the people of Brazil are entitled to better knowledge of the person who has been named as the Ambassador from the United States than they could get from reading certain remarks reported in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I speak, moreover, Mr. President, because I think that the interests of the United States are served by having the record preceding the vote on her confirmation show that this Ambassador is not a frustrated politician with vindictiveness of venom in her spirit but is a woman of broad sympathies and of great ability and accomplishments.

Let a record of cold facts speak.

Since January 1955, in the last 4 years, and later than all the incidents mentioned in a critical speech made yesterday on this floor, Mrs. Luce has been the recipient of the following awards:

Poor Richard Club's Gold Medal of Achievement, Philadelphia, Pa., January 1955.

George Washington Honor Medal Award—Freedoms Foundation, Valley Forge, Pa., 1956.

Dame of Magistral Grace of the Sovereign Military Order of Malta, Rome, December 1956.

Knight of the Grand Cross of the Order of Merit of the Italian Republic, Rome, December 1956.

Fourth Gimbel National Award, Philadelphia, January 1957.

Laetare Medal, Notre Dame University, South Bend, Ind., March 1957.

"Great Living Americans" Award, U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Washington, D.C., April 1957.

Institute of Social Sciences, Gold Medal Award, December 1957.

Cordell Hull Award, December 1957.

Distinguished Service Award of the National Society for Crippled Children and Adults, Dallas, Tex., November 1958.

Catholic Institute of the Press Award, New York, N.Y., February 1, 1959.

Possibly the award committee for a single recognition might have been misled, but I submit that the wide range of these honors is the evidence of a character and reputation that no political critic can slander.

With respect to the attempt to paint Mrs. Luce as a bitter partisan, and particularly on the subject of Franklin D. Roosevelt, I wish to remind Senators of a tribute by Mrs. Luce to Mrs. Roosevelt, widow of the late President.

It was in 1951, May 21, that Mrs. Luce, speaking at the Williamsburg Settlement Award dinner, said:

> Mrs. Roosevelt is the best-loved woman in the world today. No woman has so comforted the distressed or so distressed the comfortable. * * * The interpretation of her actions are often as mean as they are silly. That is because this generation has forgotten the injunction—"Judge not that ye be not judged."

If other proof that Mrs. Luce, while voicing her opinions with respect to certain events was not activated by partisan or political considerations when her country's good was concerned, a letter by her to the Prime Minister Nehru of India, written some years ago but published only this month in a book by Mr. Nehru offers additional evidence.

In that letter, Mrs. Luce pointed to the problems plaguing the world in our day and pleaded for an accord between our countries, India and the United States. She expressed the hope that Nehru would sit down with President Roosevelt and together work out ways in which we might be helpful to the people of Southeast Asia.

Now one word, Mr. President, as to Clare Boothe Luce as an Ambassador.

Among all the postwar trouble spots, none was more menacing than Trieste. I was in Europe, in Italy in the fall of 1953, and I personally observed and felt some of the tension that existed between Yugoslavia and Italy and cast its spell over the continent. Memories are short indeed, Mr. President, if Senators have forgotten the tact, the statesmanship, and the good spirit which Mrs. Luce brought into that troubled area. Trieste was the spot then considered most likely to touch off world war III; she helped to make it one of the least likely.

And finally, Mr. President, one word about the propriety of naming a woman as Ambassador to Brazil. It was not only with an intent of great friendship and genuine helpfulness that President Eisenhower named the former Ambassador to Italy to this high post in Brazil.

May I remind Senators that in Brazil, a woman is one of the great national heroes. I refer to the Regent Isabelle, daughter of the Emperor Dom Pedro II. She it was who freed the slaves of Brazil by an executive proclamation on the 13th of May 1888, while her father was in Europe.

Every visitor to Rio de Janeiro is told he should visit Petropolis, the former capital city a few miles up in the mountains. There he will visit the palace of the Pedros. There he will see the mementos and the paintings and the statuary that pay tribute to the memory of a woman, who in her way and her day was the great emancipator and is enshrined in the affection of her people as Abraham Lincoln is in the United States.

So, Mr. President, the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce is not only the appointment of a brilliant, able, experienced diplomat but is an appointment intended to be a compliment to the people of a great country, the Republic of Brazil. I express the hope that Senators in casting their vote will give to Mrs. Luce and to the people of Brazil an expression of the confidence and good will that are important in the relations between our two great countries.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon I had occasion to state my reluctant conclusion that this nomination should not be confirmed on the ground that Mrs. Luce had shown throughout her public career, and in particular in her appearance before the committee, such a lack of objectivity and such a lack of judgment that she could not be expected to make a satisfactory Ambassador to Brazil.

Furthermore, I pointed out that her inevitable identification as the wife of Henry Luce, plus the fact that Mr. Luce would spend, by Mrs. Luce's own admission, 6 months of every year with her in Brazil, was another reason why her nomination should not be confirmed. The Latin-American policy of the Luce publications, as I had occasion to state then, has been habitually and customarily to distort the facts in order to bring them into accord with the policies of those publications.

Since last night I have had occasion to read more carefully the statement which was filed by Mrs. Luce after the hearings, and which appears on page 27 of the published hearings. I suggest to Senators that that document alone evidences such a lack of objectivity, such a lack of judgment, such a determination to distort the facts as to make the confirmation of her nomination inadvisable.

First of all, she mistakes a position taken by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] when she says that he advocated the principle of political conformation. He did not. Then, indicating it was that sort of question, she suggests that that is an improper standard. Of course it is.

Second, she said that a month before the election in 1944 she had accused President Roosevelt of being less than honest and truthful in his dealings with the American people. That, too, is a distortion. She said he "lied us into war."

She said she had apologized for her intemperate comments. She has not apologized, as appears on pages 6 and 7 of her testimony. On page 7 she said:

> I stand by my statement.

Finally, as the ultimate distortion, she said at the end of her statement:

> Strict conformity to the political tenets of the majority party is hardly a sound basis on which to judge the qualifications of any person for a diplomatic position.

Of course it is not. Nobody has said it is. To pretend that the Senator from Oregon has categorized his position in that way is nothing short of distortion.

For these reasons, I hope the Senate will reject the nomination.

I yield back the remainder of my time to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am not unmindful of the arguments which the able senior Senator from Oregon and other Senators have made against the confirmation of this nomination. To me, the personal attacks which Mrs. Luce made upon President Roosevelt and President Truman during political campaigns were not merely intemperate; they were indefensible.

Similarly, it is entirely possible that Mrs. Luce made mistakes as Ambassador to Italy, although it seems to me that the mistakes were more those of policies formulated in Washington rather than mistakes on the part of Mrs. Luce, whose responsibility it was to carry out the policies.

But granted that Mrs. Luce made mistakes; granted that along with thousands of others Mrs. Luce made intemperate statements in the heat of political campaigns 10 or 15 years ago; are these in themselves reasons for the disqualification of a Presidential appointment of this kind? Are we to assume that Mrs. Luce, or any of us, for that matter, do not learn from experience, do not, with the years, mature in judgment? After all, all of us live in glass houses.

What is it that we are seeking in an Ambassador? Are we seeking a living public servant who has the capacity and courage to make a contribution to the Nation, but who, inevitably, has human shortcomings? Or do we seek someone who needs no eraser on his pencil because he never uses a pencil for fear of error? Where should be found anyone who fits that description? Would we want him or her if we found him?

It has not been a practice of the Democratic Party to conduct political inquisitions in the Senate, and I hope it will never be. Let us keep the record clear and distinct on that point. We do not need a public confession of past errors from Mrs. Luce. What counts is not what Mrs. Luce said 15 years ago, but what she will do now and in the days ahead.

Long ago the American people made clear what they thought of attacks on Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Truman by electing and re-electing both men. I dare say that Mrs. Luce knows even now that Brazilians cherish the memory of Franklin Delano Roosevelt no less than do the people of the United States. After years of deteriorating relations, it is one of the few assets which she will have in conducting the Nation's affairs with Brazil, and I fully expect her to preserve it and to use it with the greatest of care.

As for her record as Ambassador to Italy, I believe it compares with that of other Ambassadors during the Eisenhower administration and is distinctly superior to many, career and non-career.

Whatever significant errors she may have made, if indeed any are directly traceable to her, they are more than counterbalanced by her constructive achievements in Italy. She was hard-working, imaginative, and dedicated to the pursuit of the policies of this Government and to the furtherance of friendly relations between Italy and the United States. Her part in solving the Trieste question was a diplomatic effort of the highest order, as were also her efforts in helping to bring about a satisfactory Austrian State Peace Treaty.

I believe Mrs. Luce will make a similar constructive contribution with respect to our policies and relations with Brazil. I urge the confirmation of her nomination.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

I say most respectfully to the distinguished Senator from Montana that the issue is not what Mrs. Luce said on October 13, 1944. The issue is what she said on April 15, 1959. Let me read it to the Senator from Montana and to other Senators from the public hearings:

> The CHAIRMAN. You think he lied us into a war?
>
> Mrs. LUCE. I stand by my statement.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. I was hoping that time had mellowed your judgment a bit, but it hasn't. That is quite clear.
> Mrs. LUCE. Time has mellowed my language, I hope, my judgment; but the accuracy, historical accuracy, I must stand by.

Again I say to my Democratic colleagues: I will await with interest their acceptance of invitations to speak at Roosevelt memorial dinners in the future if they vote to confirm the nomination of this slanderer of the great memory of the great humanitarian, Franklin Roosevelt, whose memory is revered all over Brazil.

This woman has beclouded her usefulness in Brazil. This woman, in my judgment, has destroyed her effectiveness in Brazil.

I say further to the Senator from Montana: I know of no member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who has stood out more emphatically for career diplomats than he has. It is said that we are asked to confirm today the nomintation of a career diplomat; but we are really being asked to confirm the nomination of a political appointee, who, in my judgment, has demonstrated that she has neither the tact nor the diplomacy nor the qualifications to serve as Ambassador to Brazil.

Last of all, I wish to say that Mrs. Luce's record in Italy was such that she does not deserve to have her nomination confirmed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived; all available time on this question has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for the information of the Senate, I should like to announce that immediately following the vote on the question of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce, we shall proceed to consider the treaty which is on the Executive Calendar. The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has informed me that his statement on the treaty will be very brief; and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] expects to speak for less than 5 minutes; and then we anticipate taking a yea-and-nay vote on the question of ratification of the treaty. So I should like to have all Senators be on notice not to leave the Chamber after the yea-and-nay vote on the question of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Brazil.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I hope the vote will not be taken until the Senate is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered. Senators who are in favor of advising and consenting to the nomination will vote "yea." Senators who are opposed to advising and consenting to the nomination will vote "nay."

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAVEZ (when his name was called). Mr. President, on this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON]. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay." Therefore, I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent, and his pair has been previously announced by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ].

The result was announced—yeas 79, nays 11, as follows:

YEAS—79

So the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce was confirmed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nomination was confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the President be notified forthwith of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified immediately.

TREATY OF AMITY, ECONOMIC RELATIONS, AND CONSULAR RIGHTS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE SULTAN OF MUSCAT AND OMAN AND DEPENDENCIES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive A, the treaty between the President of the United States of America and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman.

I am informed the Senate is likely to vote on the treaty within the next 10 minutes. Then we shall proceed to the consideration of the supplemental appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the treaty (Ex. A, 86th Cong., 1st sess.), a treaty of amity, economic relations, and consular rights between the President of the United States of America and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and dependencies, together with a protocol relating thereto, signed at Salalah on December 20, 1958, which was read the second time, as follows:

TREATY OF AMITY, ECONOMIC RELATIONS, AND CONSULAR RIGHTS BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE SULTAN OF MUSCAT AND OMAN AND DEPENDENCIES

The President of the United States of America and Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, desirous of promoting friendly relations between the two countries and of encouraging mutually beneficial trade and closer economic intercourse generally have resolved to conclude a Treaty of Amity, Economic Relations, and Consular Rights, and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

Walter K. Schwinn, Consul General of the United States of America;

The Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, in person,

Who have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

There shall be firm and enduring peace and sincere friendship between the United States of America and the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies.

ARTICLE II

1. Nationals of either party shall, subject to the laws relating to the entry and sojourn of aliens, be permitted to enter the territories of the other party, to travel therein freely, and to reside at places of their choice. Nationals of either party shall in particular be permitted to enter the territories of the other party and to remain therein for the purpose of: (a) Carrying on trade between the territories of the two parties and engaging in related commercial activities; or (b) developing and directing the operations of an enterprise in which they, or companies of their nationality by which they are employed and which they represent in a responsible capacity, have invested or are actively in process of investing a substantial amount of capital. Each party reserves the right to exclude or expel aliens on grounds relating to public order, morals, health, and safety.

2. Nationals of either party shall receive all possible protection and security within the territories of the other party. When any such national is in custody, he shall receive reasonable and humane treatment, and, on his request, the nearest consular representative of his country shall be notified as soon as possible. He shall be promptly informed of the accusations against him, allowed ample facilities to defend himself and given a prompt and impartial disposition of his case.

3. Nationals of either party within the territories of the other party shall, either individually or through associations, enjoy freedom of conscience and religious toleration and enjoy the right to engage in religious worship. They shall be accorded most-favored-nation treatment with respect to engaging in philanthropic, educational and scientific activities. They shall be enabled to communicate by legal means with other persons inside or outside such territories. The provisions of this paragraph shall be subject to the right of either party to apply measures that are necessary to maintain public order and to protect public morals and safety.

ARTICLE III

1. Companies constituted under the applicable laws and regulations of either party shall be deemed companies thereof and shall have their juridical status recognized within the territories of the other party. As used in the present treaty, "companies" means corporations, partnerships, companies, and other associations, whether or not with limited liability and whether or not for pecuniary profit.

2. Nationals and companies of either party shall have free access to the courts of justice and administrative agencies within the territories of the other party, in all degrees of jurisdiction, both in defense and in pursuit of their rights. Such access shall be allowed upon terms no less favorable than those applicable to nationals and companies of such other party or of any third country, including the terms applicable to requirements for deposit of security. It is understood that companies not engaged in activities within the country shall enjoy the right of such access without any requirement of registration or domestication.

ARTICLE IV

1. Each party shall at all times accord fair and equitable treatment to nationals and companies of the other party, and to their property and enterprises, and shall refrain from applying unreasonable or discriminatory measures that would impair their legally acquired rights and interests.

2. Property of nationals and companies of either party, including direct and indirect interests in property, shall receive all possible protection and security within the territories of the other party. Such property shall not be taken except for a public purpose, nor shall it be taken without the prompt payment of just compensation. Such compensation shall be in an effectively realizable form and shall represent the full equivalent of the property taken; and adequate provision shall have been made at or prior to the time of taking for the determination and payment thereof.

3. The dwellings, offices, warehouses, factories, and other premises of nationals and companies of either party located within the territories of the other party shall not be subject to entry or molestation without just cause. Official searches and examinations of such premises and their contents shall be made only according to law and with all possible regard for the convenience of the occupants and the conduct of business.

ARTICLE V

1. Nationals and companies of either party shall be accorded national treatment with respect to establishing, as well as with respect to acquiring interests in enterprises for engaging in commercial activities within the territories of the other party. Moreover, nationals and companies of such party shall in no case be accorded treatment less favorable than that accorded to nationals and companies of any third country with respect to establishing or acquiring interests in enterprises for engaging in industrial and other business activities within the territories of such other party. The provisions of this paragraph do not include the practice of professions.

2. Neither party shall discriminate against enterprises established within its territories that are owned or controlled by nationals and companies of the other party, as compared with any other enterprises engaged in like activities, in the application of any laws, rules, or regulations affecting the conduct of such enterprises.

3. Nationals and companies of either party shall enjoy the right to continued control and management of their enterprises within the territories of the other party; shall be permitted to engage accountants and other technical experts, executive personnel, attorneys, agents, and other specialized employees of their choice, regardless of nationality but subject to the provisions of article II regarding the entry and sojourn of aliens; and shall be permitted without discrimination to do all other things necessary or incidental to the effective conduct of their affairs.

ARTICLE VI

1. Nationals and companies of either party shall be accorded most-favored-nation treatment within the territories of the other party with respect to leasing real property needed for their residence or for the conduct of activities pursuant to the present Treaty, and national treatment with respect to: (a) purchasing or otherwise acquiring personal property of all kinds, subject to any limitations on acquisition of shares in enterprises that may be imposed consistently with Article V; and (b) disposing of property of all kinds by sale, testament, or any other legal manner.

2. Nationals and companies of either party shall be accorded within the territories of the other party effective protection in the exclusive use of inventions, trade marks and trade names, upon compliance with the applicable laws and regulations, if any, respecting registration and other formalities.

ARTICLE VII

1. Nationals and companies of either party shall not be subject to the payment of taxes, fees or charges within the territories of the other party, or to requirements with respect to the levy and collection thereof, more burdensome than those borne by nationals, residents and companies of any third country. In the case of nationals of either party residing within the territories of the other party, and of nationals and companies of either party engaged in trade or other gainful pursuit or in nonprofit activities therein, such taxes, fees, charges and requirements shall not be more burdensome than those borne by nationals and companies of such other party.

2. Each party, however, reserves the right to: (a) extend specific tax advantages only on the basis of reciprocity, or pursuant to agreements for the avoidance of double taxation or the mutual protection of revenue; and (b) apply special requirements as to the exemptions of a personal nature allowed to nonresidents in connection with income and inheritance taxes.

3. Companies of either party shall not be subject, within the territories of the other party, to taxes upon any income, transactions or capital not reasonably allocable or apportionable to such territories.

ARTICLE VIII

1. Each party shall accord to products of the other party, from whatever place and by whatever legally authorized carrier arriving, and to products destined for exportation to the territories of such other party, by whatever route and by whatever legally authorized carrier, treatment no less favorable than that accorded like products of, or destined for export to, any third country, in all matters relating to: (a) customs duties, as well as any other charges, regulations and formalities levied upon or in connection with importation and exportation; and (b) internal taxation, sale, distribution, storage and use.

2. Neither party shall impose restrictions or prohibitions on the importation of any product of the other party, or on the exportation of any product to the territories of the other party, unless the importation of the like product of, or the exportation of the like product to, all third countries is similarly restricted or prohibited.

3. Either party may impose prohibitions or restrictions on sanitary or other customary grounds of a noncommercial nature, or in the interest of preventing deceptive or unfair practices, provided such prohibitions or restrictions do not arbitrarily discriminate against the commerce of the other party.

4. Each party reserves the right to accord special advantages: (a) to adjacent countries in order to facilitate frontier traffic, or (b) by virtue of a customs union or free trade area of which either party may become a member, so long as it informs the other party of its plans and affords such other party adequate opportunity for consultation. Each party, moreover, reserves rights and obligations it may have under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and special advantages it may accord pursuant thereto.

ARTICLE IX

1. The parties recognize that the development of their economic relations will benefit from conditions of maximum freedom with respect to carrying out financial payments and transfers between their respective territories and between nationals and companies of the two parties. Accordingly, each party undertakes to refrain from applying restrictions on such payments except to the extent that shortages of foreign exchange may require. In that event, the party applying restrictions undertakes to administer them in a manner not to influence disadvantageously the competitive position of the commerce, transport, or investment of capital of the other party in comparison with the commerce, transport, or investments of any third country.

2. Nationals and companies of either party shall be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded nationals and companies of the other party, or of any third country, with respect to all matters relating to importation and exportation.

3. Neither party shall impose any measure of a discriminatory nature that hinders or prevents the importer or exporter of products of either country from obtaining marine insurance on such products in companies of either party.

ARTICLE X

1. Between the territories of the two parties there shall be freedom of commerce and navigation.

2. Vessels under the flag of either party, and carrying the papers required by its law in proof of nationality, shall be deemed to be vessels of that party both on the high seas and within the ports, places, and waters of the other party.

3. Vessels of either party shall have liberty, on equal terms with vessels of the other party and on equal terms with vessels of any third country, to come with their cargoes to all ports, places, and waters of the other party open to foreign commerce and navigation. Such vessels and cargoes shall in all respects be accorded national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment within the ports, places, and waters of such other party; but each party may reserve exclusive rights and privileges to its own vessels with respect to the coasting trade and inland navigation.

4. Vessels of either party shall be accorded national treatment and most-favored-nation treatment by the other party with respect to the right to carry all products that may be carried by vessel to and from the territory of such other party; and such products shall be accorded treatment no less favorable than that accorded like products carried in vessels of such other party, with respect to (a) duties and charges of all kinds, (b) the administration of the customs, and (c) bounties, drawbacks, and other privileges of this nature.

5. Vessels of either party that are in distress shall be permitted to take refuge in the nearest port or haven of the other party, and shall receive all possible friendly treatment and assistance.

6. The term "vessels," as used herein, means all types of vessels, whether privately owned or operated, or publicly owned or operated; but this term does not, except with reference to paragraphs 2 and 5 of the present article, include fishing vessels or vessels of war.

ARTICLE XI

1. The present treaty shall not preclude the application of measures:

(a) regulating the importation or exportation of gold or silver;

(b) relating to fissionable materials, the radioactive byproducts thereof, or the sources thereof;

(c) regulating the production of or traffic in arms, ammunition, and implements of war, or traffic in other materials carried on directly or indirectly for the purpose of supplying a military establishment;

(d) necessary to fulfill the obligations of a party for the maintenance or restoration of international peace and security, or necessary to protect its essential security interests;

(e) denying to any company in the ownership or direction of which nationals of any third country or countries have directly or indirectly the controlling interest, the advantages of the present treaty, except with respect to recognition of juridical status and with respect to access to courts of justice and to administrative tribunals and agencies; and

(f) regarding its national fisheries and the landing of the products thereof.

2. The present treaty does not accord any rights to engage in political activities.

3. The most-favored-nation provisions of the present treaty relating to the treatment of goods shall not extend to advantages accorded by the United States of America or its Territories and possessions, irrespective of any future change in their political status, to one another, to the Republic of Cuba, to the Republic of the Philippines, to the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands or to to the Panama Canal Zone.

ARTICLE XII

Each party shall have the right to send consular representatives to the other party, subject to the approval of such other party as to the persons appointed and the places at which they reside. Such consular representatives shall be permitted to perform such consular functions and shall enjoy such privileges and immunities as are in accordance with international law and practice and as provided in the protocol to this treaty.

ARTICLE XIII

Each party shall accord sympathetic consideration to, and shall afford adequate opportunity for consultation regarding, such representations as the other party may make with respect to any matter affecting the operation of the present treaty.

ARTICLE XIV

The territories to which the present treaty extends shall comprise all areas of land and water under the sovereignty or authority of the United States of America, other than the Panama Canal Zone and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and of the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies.

ARTICLE XV

The present treaty shall replace and terminate as between the United States of America and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies the treaty of amity and commerce signed at Muscat September 21, 1833.

ARTICLE XVI

1. The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Muscat as soon as possible.

2. The present treaty shall enter into force 1 month after the day of exchange of ratifications. It shall remain in force for 7 years and shall continue in force thereafter until terminated as provided herein.

3. Either party may, by giving 1 year's written notice to the other party, terminate the present treaty at the end of the initial 7-year period or at any time thereafter.

In witness whereof Walter K. Schwinn, Consul General of the United States of America, on behalf of the President of the United States of America, Dwight D. Eisenhower, and Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, on his own behalf, have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereto their respective seals.

Done in duplicate in the English and Arabic language, both equally authentic, at Salalah in the Kingdom of Oman, this 20th day of December, 1958, which corresponds to the 9th day of Jumada II, 1378.

PROTOCOL

With respect to the provisions for the exchange of consular representatives contained in article XII of the Treaty of Amity Economic Relations and Consular Rights between the President of the United States of America and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, it is understood that consular officers of either party serving in the territories of the other party are permitted to exercise the following functions and to enjoy the following rights, privileges, and immunities:

1. In connection with the protection of nationals of the sending state, a consular officer may:

(a) Interview, communicate with, advise or assist citizens of the sending state;

(b) Visit and communicate with citizens of the sending state who are taken into custody.

2. In the event of the death of a citizen of the sending state, a consular officer may, within the discretion of the appropriate judicial authorities and if permissible under local laws.

(a) Take provisional custody of personal property left by the deceased;

(b) Represent the interests of absent heirs in estates of deceased persons;

(c) Receive for transmission to his nonresident countrymen money or movable property of all kinds due them from estates.

3. With respect to shipping:

(a) A consular officer may visit vessels of the sending state or be visited by their masters and crews;

(b) Without prejudice to the right of the administrative and judicial authorities of the receiving state to take cognizance of crimes or offenses which disturb the peace of the port or to enforce the laws of the receiving state applicable to vessels of any state in its ports and territorial waters, it is the intention of the Parties that a consular officer shall have jurisdiction over controversies, including wage and contract disputes, on board vessels of the sending state in the territorial waters of the receiving state; and

(c) A consular officer shall be informed by the local authorities in case vessels of the sending state are wrecked in the territorial waters of the receiving state, so that he may help to safeguard the interests of persons on board and of the owners of the vessels and cargoes.

4. In connection with notarials and miscellaneous services, a consular officer may:

(a) Issue notices to and receive declarations from citizens of the sending state required by the law of that state;

(b) Validate acts, documents, or other legal instruments;

(c) Take evidence in behalf of courts of the sending state;

(d) Administer oaths;

(e) Obtain copies or extracts from documents of public registry; and

(f) Inquire into matters pertaining to the interests of citizens of the sending state.

5. A consular officer may renew and issue passports and issue visas.

6. A consular officer has the right to communicate with his government and other consular and diplomatic establishments of the sending state:

(a) By public means;

(b) By courier;

(c) By sealed official pouches or other official containers; and

(d) By public telegraph either in clear or in coded language.

7. Throughout the period of his assignment in the receiving state, a consular officer who is a national of the sending state and who does not have the status in the receiving state of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence and who is not engaged in any other business, shall have the privilege of duty-free import of baggage, effects and other articles, including vehicles and vessels (but not larger than motor launches) for the personal use of himself and his immediate family. Such consular officer shall also be exempt from all manner of direct taxes or similar charges except with respect to:

(a) The acquisition, ownership, or occupation of immovable property situated in the receiving state;

(b) Income received from sources within the receiving state; and

(c) The passing of property at death.

8. The immunities of a consular officer or employee who is a citizen of the sending state and not a permanent resident of the receiving state and who is not engaged in any other business include:

(a) Exemption from the jurisdiction of the courts of the receiving state with respect to acts performed within the scope of his official duties;

(b) Exemption from having to produce documents from consular archies or give evidence on matter falling within the scope of official duties;

(c) Exemption from arrest or prosecution except when charged with crimes other than misdeameanors;

(d) Exemption from having him or his dependents subject to the requirements of alien registration, residence permits, and similar regulations applicable generally to aliens;

(e) Exemption from all estate, inheritance, succession, or similar taxes imposed in the receiving state with respect to movable property belonging to the estate of a deceased consular officer or employee and used by him in the performance of his official duties, and which does not exceed in value two times the amount of all salary and allowances received by such consular officer or employee in the year immediately preceding his death.

9. The rights of the sending State include:

(a) The right to own, lease, or build buildings and appurtenances necessary for consular offices and staff residences;

(b) Inviolability of archives;

(c) Inviolability of official correspondence.

(d) Immunity from entry or search except in case of a disaster, or unless there is ground for belief that a crime of violence has been or is about to be committed or that an individual suspected of a crime has taken refuge in a consular building;

(e) Exemption from taxation, other than charges levied for services or local public improvements by which the premises are benefited;

(f) Duty-free import of materials and equipment for the construction and operation of consular buildings and appurtenances, including residences; and

(g) Duty-free import of all articles, including vehicles and vessels (but not larger than motor launches) for the official use of the consular establishment.

In witness whereof Walter K. Schwinn, consul general of the United States of America, on behalf of the President of the United States of America, Dwight D. Eisenhower, and Sultan Said bin Taimur bin Faisal, Sultan of Muscat and Oman and Dependencies, on his own behalf have signed the present protocol and have affixed thereto their respective seals.

Done in duplicate in the English and Arabic languages, both equally authentic, at Salalah in the Kingdom of Oman, this twentieth day of December one thousand nine hundred fifty-eight, which corresponds to the ninth day of Jumada II one thousand three hundred seventy-eight.

WALTER K. SCHWINN.
SAID BIN TAIMUR.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has a brief statement to make on the treaty. I hope the Senate will come to order. It would save us time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the proposed treaty of amity, economic relations, and consular rights with the Sultan of Muscat and Oman would supersede a comparable treaty of friendship and commerce signed at Muscat in 1833. The State Department feels that the old treaty is no longer adequate. It was originally designed to guarantee the rights and security of American seamen and shipowners whose vessels might have foundered on the Omani Coast or dropped anchor in the harbor of Muscat. There was, of course, little economic intercourse at that time between this country and the territory of Oman, then as now a backward and feudal area.

The new treaty is similar to 17 that have been formed since the war, and comparable to about 18 other treaties made before the war. The purpose of this treaty is to provide rules and guarantees for the day-to-day conduct of business and trade in the city of Muscat and the territory of Oman. The Department of State expects that such an agreement will in turn provide conditions favorable to investment in the area. It will also provide a basis for an agreement to reopen a U.S. consulate in the area.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senate is in confusion, not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is quite correct in his observation. The Senate will please come to order.

The Senator from Arkansas may proceed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, Muscat and Oman is an independent state, with traditional associations with Great Britain. Yet both the boundaries and sovereignty of the territory of Oman are matters of considerable dispute. The British contend that Oman, both the coastal and inner mountain region, comes under the suzerainty of the city of Muscat and its Sultan. The Arab League has been arguing on the side of an independent status. The question was brought before the United Nations in 1957, and the United States abstained, on the ground that the legal character of Oman's boundaries was in doubt.

However, the Committee on Foreign Relations has been assured by the Department of State that this treaty is nothing more than what it purports to be, and will have no political repercussions in the Arab world. Indeed, the neighboring Arab states have been informed, and none of them has offered any objections. This is a remote, largely underdeveloped territory. But it is bordered by areas rich in oil and may itself contain rich fields. It is likely that American investment in Muscat and Oman is on the rise. The Department of State wishes to establish consular representation in the country, and the committee is confident that this will be a useful move.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to speak for a few moments about the treaty, because it may present an analogy—and I want to be sure it does not—to a treaty we entered into with Saudi Arabia in June of 1951, under which that government has excluded American personnel, even American military personnel, on the ground that they were of the Jewish faith.

Mr. President, I know of nothing more antithetical to our institutions and traditions than such an attitude. Whatever may be said for our practical situation with the Saudi Arabian Government, in view of the fact that we have an air base at Dhahran, and that we may face other problems in the Arab world, I would certainly not wish to be a party to agreeing to the resolution of ratification of a treaty under which the kind of inequity and the kind of attitude which prevail in Saudi Arabia, and which are so opposed to all our traditions and institutions, could exist.

Mr. President, I also point out that under the Saudi Arabian treaty the particular section under which it is alleged the action can take place is section 14, which says that all American personnel must obtain Saudi Arabian visas. There is also a provision in subsection (d) of section 2 of the treaty that a detailed list of names and identities of personnel and employees who are to enter the country must first be submitted to the Saudi Arabian Government.

Mr. President, I understand that the particular treaty which is before the Senate now follows a classic pattern for such treaties. Indeed, it is compared with the treaty which we made with Iran. In respect to Iran there is no such situation as I have described with respect to Saudi Arabia, so far as I know, but I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations a question, if I may have his attention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend. The Senate will be in order.

The Chair understands that the Senator from New York desires to address a question to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JAVITS. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I should like to ask whether there is any provision in the treaty presently under consideration, with the Sultan of Muscat and Oman, which could lead us into the same kind of cul-de-sac we face as to the Saudi Arabian treaty. That is the first part of my question. The second part is whether the Senator feels we might get into such a situation, based upon his own inquiry and investigation with respect to the treaty before us.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I respond to the Senator from New York that I am confident we will not. This is a very simple treaty, and it does not involve anything similar to the considerations which led to the situation in Saudi Arabia, to which the Senator has referred. I am quite sure this will not be the same.

Mr. JAVITS. Though I speak unilaterally, I am sure that the Senator from Arkansas deprecates as much as I do the situation we encountered in Saudi Arabia.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator from New York is quite correct. He knows that problem grew out of a very difficult situation related to the airbase at Dhahran. There is nothing with regard to the treaty presently under consideration, which is comparable to the other situation.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the treaty will be considered as having passed through the various parliamentary stages up to and including the presentation of the resolution of ratification, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive A, 85th Congress, 1st session, a treaty of amity, economic relations, and consular rights between the President of the United States of America and the Sultan of Muscat and Oman and dependencies, together with a protocol relating thereto, signed at Salalah on December 20, 1958.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the resolution of ratification of the treaty?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the resolution of ratification of the treaty? On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is necessarily absent, and, if present and voting, he would vote "yea." The Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] is detained on official business, and if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 89, nays 0, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein, the resolution of ratification of Executive A is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

ARMED FORCES NOMINATIONS REPORTED FAVORABLY AND PLACED ON THE VICE PRESIDENT'S DESK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that sundry nominations in the armed services reported favorably and placed on the Vice President's desk be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JAMES G. POLK, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

MODIFICATION OF REORGANIZATION PLANS II OF 1939, AND NO. 2 OF 1953—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. 25)

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the President's veto message withholding his approval from Senate bill 144 be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair) laid before the Senate the message from the President of the United States withholding his approval from Senate bill 144, to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939, and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953, which was read.

(For veto message, see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 27, 1959, p. 6816.)

The Senate proceeded to a reconsideration of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 30 minutes, the time to be divided equally between the majority leader and the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The time of 30 minutes is divided equally.

The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the time for debate has been fixed at 30 minutes with 15 minutes to each side. At the end of the debate we shall vote on the President's veto of the REA reorganization bill. The veto message is short, and it seems to me that it states the whole case very well. In returning the bill without his approval the President analyzes the whole matter when he says:

> The bill provides that, in the approval and disapproval of loans, the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) shall not be subject to the supervision, direction or other control of the Secretary of Agriculture. In all other respects the functions and activities of the REA would be exercised within the Department of Agriculture under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will suspend until the Senate is in order. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Illinois may now proceed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The President uses one phrase which I believe expresses the whole story. He states that the enactment of the bill into law would mark "a major retreat from sound administrative policy and practice."

I thoroughly concur in the sentiment expressed by the President in his message. I point out that REA was placed in the Department of Agriculture, under the Secretary of Agriculture, 20 years ago. It was done in the administration of Franklin Roosevelt. It has worked well, and it is working well today. The operation is quite in accord with the recommendation which was made by the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch. They felt that one of the weaknesses in the executive branch of the Government was the lack of a clear line of responsibility from the top to the bottom in some of our agencies and departments.

In placing REA in the Department of Agriculture, with authority vested in the Secretary, we conformed to the recommendation of that Commission, consisting of some of the finest administrative brains in the country, and we followed out a long line of practice which goes back to the Roosevelt administration. Nothing has appeared in the record to indicate that the bill should have been enacted by Congress in the first instance.

The REA Administrator appeared before the committee, and among other things he said that the Secretary and the Director have never interfered with his position and that he, the Administrator, makes the loans. I point out that there is something more involved here than just this matter.

If we can do this in this instance, what is to prevent us from saying to Secretary Seaton, of the Department of the Interior: "You supervise and control all of the Interior Department except projects which come within the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Reclamation"? What is to permit Congress from saying to the Secretary of the Treasury: "You run your show, but when it comes to loans for defense purposes, you shall have nothing to say about them"? What is to prevent Congress from saying to Secretary Benson, "You run your show, but when it comes to loans made under the Farmers Home Administration, there, of course, you shall have nothing to say whatever"?

This, then, becomes a weapon, which, in my judgment sets a dangerous precedent which will one day haunt the National Legislature if it fails to sustain the veto today.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Senator from Illinois was a Member of Congress during the time I was Secretary of Agriculture. At that time the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration had the same authority he now has. Certain authority would be taken away from the Secretary of Agriculture by the bill. I do not like to embarrass the Senator from Illinois, but did the Administrator have any complaints from any of the Senator's constituents that the Secretary of Agriculture then was interfering with the work of the Rural Electrification Administration? I can only say to the Senator from Illinois that, so far as I recall I never interfered with a single loan made by the Rural Electrification Administrator, except one time, and then, on that loan, he subsequently told me he thought I was right. I gave him support hundreds of times when he needed help in particular situations. I believe that the Secretary of Agriculture can help more than hinder the Administrator if he has the authority which he now has and which he would lose if the Humphrey bill were enacted. Therefore, I say to the Senator from Illinois that I intend to support the veto of the President of the United States.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I remember when the distinguished Senator from New Mexico became the Secretary of Agriculture while we were both in the House of Representatives. I remember the days when we stood together on the House Appropriations Committee, and I recall many felicitous conferences we had when he was Secretary of Agriculture and I was chairman of the Subcommittee on Agricultural Appropriations of the Committee on Appropriations. We always found a common ground. We did so because the line of authority ran from the top to the bottom whenever any difficulty arose.

That is all that the President of the United States is asking for with respect to the veto. It ought to be sustained.

No case can be made that the REA has suffered as a result of the present arrangement. The power output has doubled. In the past 6 or 7 years the agency made the greatest progress it has ever made. In excess of a billion dollars have been loaned. There has been no interference. Delinquencies are almost at the vanishing point. The net worth of the cooperatives has practically tripled. There has been no quarrel whatever on that score. There has been a little difficulty with respect to a cooperative in Indiana. Suddenly there comes a proposal to shear a Cabinet member of his authority over a component agency.

I wonder what would be said if in a large corporation the board of directors said to the president, "You run the show, but you will have nothing to say about the sales department." How efficient would it be? How far would any suggestion like that get? Yet it is proposed to say to a Cabinet member, "You can supervise, you can do all these things, but you cannot touch a very important function in one of your component agencies."

I point out that under the law the REA Administrator is appointed for 10 long years. He cannot be disciplined by the Secretary. He cannot be removed. I can think of all sorts of difficulties which might arise unless, in the first instance, there is supervisory authority from top to bottom, so that difficulties will never eventuate and have to fall into the lap of the President of the United States. It is bad practice to enact his kind of legislation.

I hope that as we realize the long-range implications of the bill there will be enough votes in the Senate today to sustain the veto of the President of the United States.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Illinois has said, and also with what the Senator from New Mexico has said. As a Senator who favored the establishment of a separate agency for REA when the issue was before the Senate a few weeks ago, I voted against the bill as it passed, which left REA in the Department of Agriculture but took away from the Secretary any rights to loan supervision.

I believe that the bill as it passed fails to provide good administrative practice. What it proposes is not good business practice in any sense of the term.

As I said a moment ago, I favored establishing a separate agency, if that is what they wanted, but not to leave it in the Department of Agriculture and shear the head of the Department of administrative power while at the same time he had the responsibilities as head of that Department.

I believe the President's veto is utterly sound, and I certainly hope that it will be sustained. It is a matter of good business, good administrative policy, and plain commonsense.

Mr. ANDERSON. I find myself in agreement with what the Senator from Iowa has said. I did not vote for a separate agency. However, if we are to give a man authority and put him off by himself, we should provide him a separate agency. However, if he is supposed to be under the head of a department, we had better let the head of the department have some jurisdiction over him.

I am a member of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and I am very much interested in reclamation, as most Senators know. I would not for a moment favor legislation which would give Mr. Dominy, who is the new head of the Bureau of Reclamation, authority to decide what reclamation projects shall go through, with the Secretary of the Interior having no authority over that subject.

I could go through the other Departments. My friend Bob Anderson has authority over the Treasury Department. I would not think of setting up a Bureau of Internal Revenue, so that the Director of that Bureau would be under the Secretary of the Treasury but that the Secretary of the Treasury could never have a word to say to him. He might be appointed for 10 years.

That, I think, is the tragic administrative error which is contained in the bill which was passed and which the President, most properly, has vetoed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the majority leader is in control of the time on this side, but he has given me the privilege of using some of it. I yield myself 5 minutes.

I have listened to the arguments which have been advanced again today in support of the President's veto message. The arguments are the same as were made at the time S. 144 was passed. Let us look at them for a moment.

I know there is serious concern in this body over the administrative practice. The truth is that there was a group of Senators who wanted a completely independent agency for REA. The argument for the independent agency was as follows: That the REA is a bank, in fact; that REA is in the business of lending money; and that, therefore, REA should be separate and distinct from and clear of any political consideration.

Congress, in establishing REA, provided that the Administrator would be appointed on a nonpartisan, 10-year basis, so that no matter what administration was in power, the REA administrator would have more years of tenure of position than the two terms of any administration. This is the only way we have of insulating an administratve agency from political control.

I repeat: There is a strong feeling in the Senate that, on the one hand, REA should be in the Department of Agriculture, with which I agree. On the other hand, there is a feeling that REA should be a completely independent agency. So what was done by S. 144 was to keep REA, for purposes of accounting, personnel, bookkeeping, budgeting, and presentation of REA policy to Congress under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture. That fulfills the requirement of the Hoover Commission in its relationship to what is called good housekeeping—the housekeeping functions of an agency within a department.

The second feature which was recommended by certain Senators—and I believe a substantial number voted for it—was an independent agency, which made REA, so far as its loanmaking functions are concerned, and so far as the granting of funds to local rural cooperatives is concerned, independent of any kind of political control. The REA Administrator has complete authority, as he had at the inception of the REA act. Second, the REA Administrator has complete authority, as he had under the Reorganization Act of 1939.

Why was it that S. 144 was brought before us? Because at the time of the Reorganization Act of 1953, the Secretary of Agriculture said, and the record so reveals, that if any administrative changes were to be made in REA—administrative changes about which many Senators worried, and so expressed themselves—the Secretary would notify the appropriate committees of Congress before anything was done. He also said he intended to do nothing in that respect. He intended only, as he said, under the terms of the overall Reorganization Act, to keep REA as it was under the act of 1939.

What happened? The Secretary of Agriculture did do something. He appointed a man who did not require Senate confirmation to be the supervisor of all farm credit services. One of those farm credit services was REA. That supervisor, a Mr. Scott, who, I am certain, is a very fine man, found himself in the position of having supervisory control over a presidentially appointed, Senate-confirmed REA Administrator. In other words, for the first time since the beginning of REA, an official was appointed who had supervisory power over the REA Administrator exclusive of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] testified before our committee as to the possibilities of this happening. Other Senators did the same. The Secretary assured them it would not happen. The Secretary assured me that it would not happen. But it did. Therefore, what we have attempted to do is to protect the administrative soundness of this agency, on the one hand, and the fiscal independence of the agency, on the other hand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield myself 2 minutes more.

This procedure is not unusual. The best argument which can be made in this body is for an independent REA agency, in terms of the complete independence of the agency. But that would violate what are called administrative procedures of management, personnel, budgeting, and accounting.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Small Business Administration grants money and makes loans. It does not have over it a Secretary who has the right to counteract the making of such loans or grants. The Small Business Administration, which is a loanmaking agency, and has on its board the Secretary of Commerce, does not permit the Secretary of Commerce to deny the making of loans.

We are asking the same thing for REA: That the REA Administrator, who is not a political appointee, whose term overlaps those of the Secretary of Agriculture and the President, be granted complete independence in the loanmaking functions.

Let us consider another great agency in the Government. I should like to know how some Senators would feel if TVA were under the thumb of the Secretary of the Interior in some of its activities relating to its financing. No; they want independence for TVA when it comes to its financing. So do I. I think this is exactly where a sound principle of fiscal management is involved. We do not want to have political considerations advanced where loans or grants are to be made available. That is why we have selected means and methods, in this particular measure, to keep the administration of REA in the Department of Agriculture, but the loanmaking functions in the independence of the REA Administrator.

No one is trying to insult the Secretary of Agriculture. No one is trying to say there has been corruption in REA, or even mismanagement. All we are saying is: An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

We are saying that some Senators in 1953 were worried that someone would tamper with REA, and found their worries being fulfilled. There was some tampering. The agreement was not kept. What we are doing is exactly what was done in 1939, because from 1939 to 1953, while it is true that the Secretary of Agriculture had the overall, general supervision, he did not appoint somebody to be supervisor over REA, as in the present situation. He left the REA autonomous; he left it independent. What we are attempting to do is to blend the original act of 1936 with the Reorganization Act of 1939. Both of them were sound. Both of them worked well. I think we have a good objective.

I regret that the President has seen fit to veto the bill, because the bill does not violate sound principles of administration. If it does violate sound principles of administration, then so does the Small Business Administration; so does the Housing and Home Finance Administration. I think the bill contains good principles, principles which should be maintained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield? I had 3 minutes, which I have already yielded.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is no analogy between REA and TVA. TVA is an independent body, created by Congress. It has always been independent.

But the REA is a component agency in a Cabinet Department, and there is no analogy whatsoever between it and the TVA.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I say most respectfully that in the financing functions of the two there is an analogy. The analogy is that when it comes to the money the REA is a loaning agency, and the TVA is a financing agency. Furthermore, I point out that, under the urging of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] we have taken the first step, namely, that of preserving the independence of the loan-making functions of the Administrator. Then we have taken the second step; we have acted on the basis of the recommendations of the Hoover Commission reports—in particular, one of the fundamental principles of those reports, to the effect that the housekeeping functions, the budgeting, the purchasing, the procurement, the minutiae—the total functions of the Administration—be kept within the Department of Agriculture.

This measure provides for good administration, and at the same time it protects the independence of the REA in its vital function of granting loans.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the greatest study of administration ever made disagrees with the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I appreciate that.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Is it not true that the Administrator of the REA is picked on the basis of his special qualifications to handle the affairs of the REA, particularly its loans; and his nomination is confirmed by the Senate?

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Whereas the supervisor whom the Secretary of Agriculture can, and recently has, placed over the Administrator of the REA is not confirmed by the Senate and need not have any special qualifications in connection with the REA; is that not true?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Tennessee is absolutely correct.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Is it not also true that the supervisor, over whom the Senate has no power of confirmation, and who is not particularly selected on the basis of his ability in connection with REA matters, has been using this power of supervision over the Administrator of the REA?

Mr. HUMPHREY. He has testified that he has the power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Missouri, for whatever purpose he wishes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, as a member of the Government Operations Subcommittee in the last Congress, I had the opportunity to hear the members and leaders of REA cooperatives from all over the country.

These experienced men had come to Washington to ask Congress to restore to their REA Administrator the full authority for making loans and handling other financial matters.

This bill as originally conceived, was in response to the requests—the pleas—of these REA people. It was not—as some have said recently—a slap at the Secretary of Agriculture. It is sound legislation that gives to the REA Administrator—nominated by the President and approved by Congress—the authority to handle the most important function of this program—that of loan making.

I supported this bill in committee; I voted for it and spoke in its behalf on the Senate floor, because I believe it is a sound bill and is in the best interests of the future of REA.

I regret that the President saw fit to veto this bill, and believe it important for the future of the REA that the Congress take prompt action to override this veto.

Mr. President, I now wish to ask the distinguished Senator from Minnesota whether it is true that the Secretary of Agriculture has not done what he agreed he would do in regard to the handling of the REA?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes. In fact, the Senator from Missouri has raised the point which precipitated this bill. The Secretary of Agriculture, in response to an inquiry by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], said that if any changes relating to the REA were to be made under the Reorganization Act of 1953, he, the Secretary, would first come to the committees of Congress and would propose the changes and would obtain congressional advice and consent before such changes were made. But nothing of that sort ever occurred. Instead, the changes were made. A supervisor was placed in charge—one who is not appointed by the President or confirmed by the Senate. The supervisor has testified that he has supervisory control, even if he has not exercised it. I believe the Senator from Missouri has put his finger directly on the reason for this proposed legislation. It is not proposed because there has been maladministration. It is proposed because there has been a violation of the understanding which the Senate had as to the reorganization.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield further?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Does the distinguished Senator from Minnesota recall that last February, the Secretary of Agriculture agreed to present an omnibus farm bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. He did, indeed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, how much time remains under my control?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota does not know, does he, that up to this time any omnibus bill has come to us from the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I know of none. In fact, I know to the contrary; I believe the Department has indicated that it is not going to send such a bill to us.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, in view of past experience it is no surprise to me to find that REA members throughout the Nation and so many Members of this body want to return to the REA Administrator the loan making functions now in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

I hope that in the interest of the future effectiveness of the REA the Senate will override the President's veto.

I thank the Senator from Minnesota for yielding to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to use further of the time remaining under his control?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I suggest that those who favor supporting the veto now use the time available to them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, how much time remains to our side?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, let me ask how much time remains to our side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the proponents have 3 minutes remaining and the opponents have 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield the remaining time under my control to the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I cannot vote to override the President's veto of this bill. The bill itself does nothing to improve the program of the REA. The bill violates the concepts of good government, by delegating authority to a subordinate official of the Department—in this case the Administrator of REA—and by giving the head of the Department no control over the action of such official, for whose acts he is otherwise responsible.

If the veto were overridden, such action would be interpreted by the country as simply an expression of malice toward the Secretary of Agriculture. I do not like such tactics at all.

I realize that the Secretary has antagonized many persons, and that some are justly provoked with him. But I do not like the idea of getting even in this way.

Mr. President, congressional action to override this veto would not hurt Secretary Benson in the least. On the contrary, it probably would enhance his stature in the eyes of the public, who will recognize this measure for what it is.

But congressional action to override the veto of this bill would hurt the REA and the work of that great organization, and would arouse in the minds of the people a suspicion that perhaps the promoters of this bill are not particularly interested in the extension of light and power to the rural areas, but are more interested in getting even with an administration which they disapprove.

Mr. President, I hope Members who are so ardently supporting the bill and are so ardently advocating overriding the veto of the President will have equal ardor when it comes to protecting the just rights of the REA and the provisions which are necessary if it is to continue the good work it has done up to now.

So, Mr. President, I think Senators who vote to override the veto will not be proud of themselves; and I do not believe the people of the country will be proud of them, either. Instead of helping the REA, an overriding of the veto would be bound to hurt the work of that great organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time under the control of the proponents has been consumed.

The opponents have 3 minutes remaining under their control.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I yield to myself the time remaining under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of my colleagues during the 3 remaining minutes available on this question.

I deeply regret that this question has been turned into a sort of popularity contest as between the Secretary of Agriculture, on the one hand, and good administration, on the other.

Of course there are differences of opinion as between the Secretary of Agriculture and many Members of the Senate. The Secretary of Agriculture expresses his opinion with deep conviction and, at times, with a very sharp and pointed pen; and some of us express our views with equally deep conviction and with sharp words.

Mr. President, in this case we are talking about the Reorganization Act of 1953 and what has been done under it, in violation of an agreement relating to that act. In that connection, I call attention to pages 24 and 25 of the hearings, where we find that the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] pointed out the very possibilities we now face and where, let me add, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] likewise said:

> It requires the Secretary, to the extent practicable, to give appropriate advance public notice of delegations of functions, and to afford opportunity for interested persons or groups to place their views before the Department. In view of this very clear mandate, it would be most unrealistic to think that any Secretary of Agriculture might disregard the will of Congress by using the "to the extent practicable" provision as an excuse to avoid the notice of hearings. Actually, hearings should generally be required. This is a sound provision which will insure careful consideration of any proposed transfers or delegations.

That was the interpretation which was given to the Reorganization Act; and the position taken by those Senators was taken in good faith.

So, Mr. President, in this case we are concerned with the question of good and proper administration. The issue now confronting us is not whether we are in favor of, or are opposed to, the President and his administration. The vote is entirely upon whether the Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953 was good legislation. A majority of this body did not think so in 1952, because the same proposed Act was presented then. They did think so after the election of 1953. But even then a substantial number of Senators were dubious. That substantial number later on were proven to be right.

Some of the most ardent advocates of responsible administration in the Department of Agriculture raised a warning flag to us. I was one of those who voted with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] and other Senators, with doubt as to the efficacy of Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953.

The time is at hand to correct the original wrong and to set the house in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired. All time allotted for the debate has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Gore	Monroney
Allott	Green	Morse
Anderson	Gruening	Morton
Bartlett	Hart	Moss
Beall	Hartke	Mundt
Bennett	Hayden	Murray
Bridges	Hennings	Muskie

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Chair state the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill, Senate bill 144, pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

All time has been exhausted. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANDERSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] and the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. I am informed that if they were present and voting they would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay." I therefore withhold my vote.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family.

I further announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

The yeas and nays resulted—yeas 64, nays 29, as follows:

NOT VOTING—5

Anderson	Byrd, Va.	O'Mahoney
Bible	Frear

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, the yeas are 64, and the nays 29. Two-thirds of the Senators present and voting having voted in the affirmative, the bill, on reconsideration, is passed, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding, and the Secretary will notify the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as author of S. 144—the Humphrey-Price REA bill—I am extremely gratified by the Senate's decision to override the President's veto of this constructive legislation designed to protect REA cooperatives throughout the country.

The vote was a reassuring demonstration of the unity of the Democratic Party and its dedication to the best interests of agriculture. I want to express my appreciation for the close cooperation of the Majority Leader Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and chairmen of both the Senate Committee on Agriculture Senator ELLENDER and the Senate Committee on Government Operations Senator MCCLELLAN for all three were helpful in obtaining this overwhelming victory. I also wish to thank every Senator, Republican or Democrat, who voted to override.

I am confident similar action will now be taken by the House of Representatives, to enact this legislation into law.

Actually, it is a victory for good government—for the purpose of the bill was to protect REA loans against political manipulation, either by the present Secretary of Agriculture or any future Secretary of either party. It serves notice on this or any future administration that the legislative branch is not willing to let politically-appointed Cabinet members arbitrarily defy the intent of Congress in administering programs enacted by the Congress.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that the senior Senator from Oregon desires to make a personal statement. At the conclusion of the statement to be made by the Senator from Oregon, we expect to proceed with the consideration of the supplemental appropriation bill.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR MORSE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

I have in my hand a very interesting news release. I happen to be one of those politicians who can take it as well as dish it out. Whenever a politician reaches the point where he cannot laugh at himself, then he ought to get out of politics. I hope my colleagues who voted against me a few minutes ago will pardon my chuckle at their expense in view of their votes. I say that because not so soon did I expect that those of us who voted against the nomination of Clare Boothe Luce would be proved so right. We had pointed out in the debate her complete lack of tact and diplomacy and we have been proven right by this very interesting bit of news on the wires. It reads:

> Mrs. Luce said in New York: "I am grateful for the overwhelming vote of confirmation in the Senate. We must now wait until the dirt settles. My difficulties, of course, go some years back and began when Senator WAYNE MORSE was kicked in the head by a horse."

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, I was confronted with that Republican smear all through my 1956 campaign. It came out by the reams. It was a whispering campaign with such a windy blow to it that it not only rustled the leaves of Oregon but, in some parts of the State, almost tore the sage brush up by its roots. The people of Oregon answered that smear by a large majority of votes for me against the hand-picked candidate of the President of the United States, who was taken right out of his Cabinet to "get me." They thought that this smear was one of the devices they could use. But, Mr. President, the people of Oregon passed upon my mental judgment.

I am not surprised that this slanderer, whose nomination the Senate confirmed only a few minutes ago, would make this kind of statement, because yesterday, for three hours and a half, I documented her record. This is an old, old pattern of emotional instability on the part of this slanderer; the same pattern which caused her to put on a scene in the Roman Parliament after her candidate for President of Italy was defeated. We read the newspaper statements about her conduct, and the widespread comment at the time that if she had been a male ambassador, she would have been recalled.

But the issue is settled. I simply happen to be one of those persons, whether before the final bar of the court when the decision is rendered, or before the final bar of the U.S. Senate when a decision is rendered, who believe in government by law. I take the decision.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on American Republics Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I am much concerned about Mrs. Luce's relations with all the Latin American countries, including Brazil.

The nomination of Mrs. Luce has been confirmed. I wish her well. So far as my subcommittee is concerned, on a strictly impersonal, professional relationship, she will have the full cooperation of my committee.

I promise to the Nation that each night in my prayers I will pray for God's guidance to this lady, so that for the welfare of our Nation she will be more stable in her ambassadorial duties than she was when she issued this press release this afternoon. [Applause.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, so long as we have great Senators like my friend, the Senator from Oregon, with a durable sense of humor, and so long as we have Ambassadors and Ambassadresses with an equal sense of humor, I am confident that the whole continent will be safe for freedom. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I suspect that the able Senator from Oregon feels a little bit the way I felt when I was in Chicago in 1952. I lost, there; and, today, he has lost, here.

I remember that I was then a member of the Indiana delegation, and we were supporting Senator Taft for the Republican nomination for the Presidency. Back in those days, the able Senator from Oregon was a Republican. I remember that the Oregon delegation sat just ahead of the Indiana delegation. And I remember——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield for an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARTHY in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CAPEHART. I ask the Senator from Oregon to wait a minute, please.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, let me say that that was after I was kicked by the horse. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I remember that the chairman of the Oregon delegation—the able Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]—was in favor of the nomination of General Eisenhower; and I remember that the Oregon delegation wore big, high hats. In fact, I believe the one the able Senator from Oregon wore was perhaps a little higher than the others. At any rate, the Oregon delegation sat just ahead of the Indiana delegation; and we could not see anything over their high hats, particularly because the able Senator from Oregon and the other Oregon delegates kept jumping up and cheering and cheering and cheering for Eisenhower. And we lost. I think one of the reasons why we lost was that we could not see what was going on—because of those high hats.

On that day I felt the same way, I am sure, that the able Senator from Oregon feels today, after having lost on the question of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce. I am sure his memory is not so short that he does not remember the days when he was a Republican. I recall the days when he used to attack former President Roosevelt; and I remember that in those days he had the most glowing things to say about General Eisenhower, in fact, more so than anyone else in the entire world, even to the point of jumping up and down and keeping the Indiana delegation at the convention, who favored Senator Taft, from seeing what was going on there.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to thank the Senator from Indiana for relating that little bit of history; I am very appreciative of his action. It shows that I have the kind of mind that can change when I find out what the facts are. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAPEHART. But, Mr. President, I am not too certain that I can agree with the able Senator from Oregon. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I regret very much that I cannot look upon this incident with the lightness with which it has been generally regarded. To me, it is a matter of gravity; and I do not contemplate letting the statement go unchallenged.

I voted in favor of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce. I did so on the basis that she was cleared by the Senate in 1953; and after she had been cleared by the Senate in 1953, I did not feel that the Senate would be justified in making a search now into what happened prior to 1953.

I never doubted the sincerity of purpose of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]; and I felt that, as a Senator—and I am certain that my colleagues feel the same way—he had a right and duty to express his honest views.

When the vote was taken, I voted in favor of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

But, Mr. President, I think the statement she made following the Senate's confirmation of her nomination indicates an absence of rationality so serious that if she had made such a statement before the vote was taken, I would not have voted in her favor. Certainly one who makes a statement which implies what her statement did violates every precept of propriety. Somewhere in the Bible it is written that one should beware of making statements of that character in regard to any person.

So, despite the power of this lady, I do not think the Senate can stand idly by and can consider this incident lightly.

In the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Oregon stated that this matter is of grave importance. He said "I realize the power of this lady." I said to him, "WAYNE, there will not be the audacity to use that power to harm you." I regret to say that today there are evidences that that is what is contemplated.

I disagreed with the Senator from Oregon. But I would not be true to myself if I remained silent after the occurrence of this incident. If the nomination of Mrs. Luce were now before the Senate, I would vote against confirmation.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I wish to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] for having stated so well what I think many of us on the floor of the Senate feel at this time.

I am among the Senators who voted in favor of confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce. But I wish to commend the Senators who showed the good judgment of voting against confirmation of her nomination.

I had hoped that after her intemperate statements in 1952—which, after all, were made in the heat of a political campaign—and after her experience in Italy, where she served as the representative of our nation to that great nation, she would have obtained enough judgment not to engage in intemperate remarks. But as we have learned today that experience has not profited her. We are sending to one of the largest nations in Latin America an Ambassador who is apparently more skilled in invective than in diplomacy.

I wish to pay tribute to the Senators who have had the courage to call this matter to the attention of the Senate.

Furthermore, if I now had the opportunity to do so, I would join the Senator from Ohio in voting with the group of Senators who voted against confirmation of the nomination of Mrs. Luce, and who did so because they believed that she had demonstrated her unfitness for ambassadorial service. If at this time I had a chance to vote on the question of confirmation of her nomination, I, too, would vote "nay."

Mr. McGEE subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to inject at this point the question which was brought up by the distinguished Senator from Oregon. It seems to me that we in this body have an obligation not only to represent our own political following, not only the people of the United States, but we have an obligation to take a stand before the eyes of the world, because when an Ambassador or an Ambassadress is appointed, he or she will speak for all the people of a united America, and that person should be chosen with great care.

Like the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] I, as one who voted for the confirmation of Mrs. Luce, am somewhat reluctant to see the Senate dismiss this matter with so little thought and with such slight consideration.

This is not a matter for Democrats or for Republicans. It is a matter now for Americans. Our one hope, and that represented to us in the hearings, which I read carefully, was that, with all the mistakes of the past, the years had brought a maturity of judgment to the nominee. God knows, if ever in our history we ever needed maturity of judgment in these troubled hours of the world, it is now. And we are now being asked to send to Brazil this lady who, on her first opportunity to illustrate her judgment on the confirmation of her nomination by this body makes the intemperate declaration which we heard as reported by the press.

I not only regret my vote, as my colleagues have likewise expressed their sentiments, but I urge that the proper authorities in this administration now give due weight to this intemperate remark and possibly reconsider the appointment of the nominee who it is now contemplated will go to Brazil.

What is to prevent this Ambassadress from making the same kind of a comment in a release south of the border, so to speak? What is to prevent her touching off another kind of intemperate series of incidents such as those I noted published in her husand's magazine not many weeks ago?

For those reasons, I think the Senate would do well to heed the significance of what has happened. I applaud the Senator from Oregon for his gracious spirit of good humor and good sportsmanship. Mr. President, this is not a matter of political give and take, or a matter of good humor or sportsmanship, but it is a matter of concern to the people of the United States.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGEE. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I feel in my heart if Brazil had known that Mrs. Luce would make this kind of statement, Brazil would have notified the State Department she would not be received as Ambassador.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the bill as reported to the Senate makes appropriations of $2,820 million, which is an increase of $162,600,000 over the House version of the bill, but is still $80,750,000 under the budget estimates.

The bill contains an item of $1,336 million for reimbursement to the Commodity Credit Corporation for costs of various farm programs.

It contains an item of $200 million for the Development Loan Fund—an increase of $100 million over the House version of the bill.

The bill contains, in title II, an item of $414 million for increased pay costs. The total cost of increased pay is estimated to be $1,059 million, including $176 million for increased pay costs as a result of wage-board action. Much of the cost was absorbed or transferred, so it is not necessary to recommend appropriations for the full costs.

Some other major items in the bill are: Defense education activities, $75,300,000; payments to and assistance for schools, $44,600,000; grants for public assistance, $151,560,000; Veterans' Administration costs, $120,265,000; Department of Defense costs, $188,329,500.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments to the bill be agreed to en bloc, and that the bill as thus amended be regarded for the purpose of amendment as original text; provided that no point of order be considered to have been waived by reason of agreement to this order.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona modify his request with the understanding that, although the Senate agrees to the committee amendments en bloc, individual amendments may be taken up individually?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and that points of order will not apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The committee amendments agreed to en bloc are as follows:

On page 2, line 7, after the word "Research", to strike out "$3,666,700, to" and insert "including not to exceed $35,000 for the alterations to the meat laboratory at Beltsville, Maryland, $4,174,110, of which $4,074,110 shall", and in line 12, after the word "control", to strike out "$2,180,700" and insert "$2,423,000".

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I compliment the chairman and members of the Senate Appropriations Committee for the action they have taken on this bill. The total amount suggested is about $81 million below the amount requested by the President, but, at the same time, the bill contains adequate funds. The saving on the President's request which the committee suggests, amounts to almost 50 cents for each man, woman, and child in our Nation.

I should like to ask a few questions about certain funds added for the Forest Service by the committee.

There are two increases, $2,500,000 for Forest Land Management and $500,000 for forest roads and trails to be used in areas especially burdened with unemployment. Is it the position of the chairman that Montana, with the unenviable record of leading the Nation in unemployment, would rank high in the allocation of these funds?

Mr. HAYDEN. I would not want to say that any particular State would receive any particular allocation.

Mr. President, in recommending that $2,500,000 be appropriated for the development of the national forest under the appropriation "Forest land management" and that $500,000 for the same purpose be provided for the construction of forest roads and trails, the committee had in mind the following situation:

There are national forests situated in many areas of the country which are especially burdened with unemployment, and to me this means that the rate of unemployment is substantially greater than the national average. There is a tremendous backlog of work existing in these forests, as is true of all the national forests.

The committee felt that an appropriation of $3 million for the remainder of fiscal year 1959—that is, until July 1—would create a sizable number of job opportunities in these areas, and at the same time provide for a better development of the resources of the forests concerned. These funds would be used, for the most part, for the thinning and pruning of timber, which would result in more and better timber to meet the increasing demand for quality timber; the elimination of excessive forest fire fuel, a very wise conservation practice; the development and rehabilitation of recreational areas; the rehabilitation of physical structures, such as fire towers and warehouses; and the construction of a limited number of roads and the replacement of bridges. I want to make it clear that all of these projects are included in the present work plans of the Forest Service and will be done at sometime.

Mr. President, this is the type of work which needs to be done in our national forests to conserve this priceless resource, and it is the type of work which will create the maximum number of job opportunities for the funds provided.

It is my hope that the Senate will adopt the committee amendment so the Congress will have an actual experience on which to base further action of this nature.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the chairman. I think he has answered my next and last question.

There is no specific mention made of using the funds for reforestation, treestand improvement, range improvement, and similar work on the soil conservation efforts. Is such work also possible?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; so long as it is planned work, and in an area burdened with unemployment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the chairman, and wish only to add that both he and his counterparts in the other body have consistently demonstrated wisdom in their handling of these important money bills. They always find places to make savings which have escaped the attention of the President's staff. Moreover, they always find places where insufficient funds have been allocated, and the committee endeavors to correct the deficiency. I congratulate the committee again for an excellent job.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I call attention to the item in line 5, page 7, "Forest land management."

In his usual careful way our own "director of the budget"—the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]—has again demonstrated that he and his nonpartisan team, the Committee on Appropriations, have both superior fiscal understanding and a heart. The American people are fortunate that we have in our Appropriations Committee men of such broad interest and deep understanding.

I am particularly pleased by the committee action adding $3 million to the Forest Service budget. These funds are to help relieve some of the critical unemployment we have in the Nation. I regret that I must stand on the floor of this body today and say that Montana again leads the Nation in unemployment. On behalf of those in my State who are unemployed, I thank the committee for the consideration they have shown. I particularly commend the new Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD] for his leadership in this matter.

Every cent provided by the committee could be used on "Operation Outdoors" alone.

Is it not correct to say that when this program was announced by the Secretary of Agriculture it was planned to spend for capital investment in forest recreation $6,600,000 in 1958 and $10,300,000 in 1959?

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MURRAY. Is it not also true that only $7,300,000 has been available for this part of the program?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is true.

Mr. MURRAY. Thus today we are already $9,600,000 behind the administration's schedule. Is it also true that use of the forests is well above original estimates and our campgrounds are badly overcrowded?

Mr. HAYDEN. According to the latest information, the Senator is correct.

Mr. MURRAY. Am I correct that there is no doubt this money can be effectively used for an already planned program?

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MURRAY. Montana leads the Nation in unemployment, and we have recreation areas such as the Crystal Lake forest camp near Lewiston, which badly need full development.

I know the chairman agrees with me that this supplemental appropriation should enable us to push ahead on projects such as this, which are vital from a conservation standpoint, and work on which will help alleviate unemployment.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the intent of the committee.

Mr. President, a typographical error appears on page 24, line 1, of the bill. It now reads, "Salaries and Expenses, Office of Minerals Mobilization." It should read, "Salaries and Expenses, Office of Minerals Exploration."

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be corrected accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona on page 24, line 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the chairman of the Appropriations Committee or the chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense a question on the Air Force portion of the bill. The Senator from Arizona and the Senator from New Mexico will recall that the committee denied the request of the Department of the Air Force for a restoration of $9,100,000 reduced by the House in the appropriation "Military Personnel." We did this on the assumption that in such a large appropriation, the $9,100,000 could be absorbed. But we certainly did not intend that it would be necessary for the Air Force to reduce military strength in order to absorb this amount. I should like to ask the chairman, as a point of clarification, if he does not agree with me on this matter.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do. While the Air Force has made considerable adjustments in its military personnel program to reduce costs under this appropriation, and even though it is getting toward the end of the fiscal year, it is felt that perhaps some additional action can be taken which will permit the absorption of the $9,100,000 reduced by the House and concurred in by the Senate Committee on Appropriations. It is not the intent of the committee by this action to require the Air Force to reduce military strength below that planned in fiscal year 1959 to meet minimum mission capability.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that is the understanding of the subcommittee.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I congratulate the able Senator from Arizona and the senior Senator from New Mexico.

There is contained in this appropriation bill an item of $1 million for Navajo-Hopi roads. I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona three questions. The first is: Does the Bureau of Indian Affairs now have the money to contract for the highway job for which bids were opened this month?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, anticipating favorable action by the Congress on the 1959 supplemental, the Bureau advertised 28.7 miles of road on Route 3. Bids were opened and disclosed a low bid of $663,000. This is considered to be a very good bid, as the Bureau estimate was $905,000. There can be no award of this contract until funds are made available.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD, at the conclusion of the statement just made by the able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, there be printed in the RECORD a financial statement with reference to the sums the Senator has mentioned, and also a brief statement as to the situation with regard to these funds.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Financial statement—Indian Bureau road construction and maintenance, Apr. 21, 1959

(Fund 14x2364 (liquidation of contract authorization)—section 104(c) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956)

Total contract authority available for obligation, July 1, 1958	$10,248,686
Obligations through March 31, 1959	6,142,625
Unobligated balance April 1, 1959	4,106,061

Financial statement—Indian Bureau road construction and maintenance, Apr. 21, 1959—Continued

Programing of the unobligated balance:
(a) Non-contract-construction items, such as engineering, supervision, and miscellaneous force account construction for April, May, and June	$850,000
(b) Road maintenance for April, May, and June	590,000
(c) Contracts scheduled for award April, May, and June, regular Federal-Aid Highway Act program	2,666,061
Obligations scheduled for regular Federal-Aid Highway Act program, April–June	4,106,061
Federal-Aid Act cash available July 1, 1958	15,882,114
Cash disbursements through March 31, 1959	11,002,502
Unexpended cash balance April 1, 1959	4,879,612
Unpaid outstanding obligations, March 31, 1959	3,377,728
Unobligated cash, April 1, 1959	1,501,884
Estimated cash requirements for April, May, and June obligations:
(a) Non-contract construction	783,000
(b) Maintenance (mostly force account)	492,000
(c) Estimated contract earning due for payment	226,884
Total estimated cash need	1,501,884

SUMMARY OF UNFUNDED OBLIGATIONS

Scheduled obligations for April, May, and June	4,106,061
Unobligated cash, April 1, 1959	-1,501,884
Unfinanced contract authority, June 30, 1959	2,604,177

There is available to the Bureau of Indian Affairs $15,882,114 for liquidation of obligations incurred under the Federal Aid Highway Act. On March 31, 1959, there has been expended $11,002,502 which leaves a balance of $4,879,612 available for meeting contract obligations of $7,582,661, for the balance of the fiscal year.

This would allow for a balance of $2,604,177 in unfunded obligations on June 30, 1959. This is a reasonable amount and is based upon work yet to be accomplished by contractors for which payment would not be required until the following fiscal year, 1960.

It is estimated that expenditure of the unexpended balance of $4,879,612 on March 31 will be as follows:

1. $3,377,728 will be required to meet outstanding obligations in the same amount and for which earnings will accrue during the period April through June.

2. $1,501,884 will be required to meet contractor earnings and other expenses under obligations amounting to $4,106,061 which will be incurred during the period April through June.

The expenditures reflected above are those estimated and required to meet earnings under obligations incurred under the Federal-Aid Highway Act. The fund requirements are such as to leave no balance for funding Navajo-Hopi Routes 1 and 3.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why is it important that those roads be constructed without delay, I will ask the chairman?

Mr. HAYDEN. Contract authority for those road improvements was granted by an amendment to the Navajo-Hopi Act which will terminate soon. Therefore, it is important that the contract now pending be awarded as rapidly as possible. Delay also permits rising costs to reduce the overall usefulness of the authorization earmarked for these roads.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. While the general appropriation will be beneficial to the Navajos as such, it will also be beneficial to the economy of the area of the four States of New Mexico, Colorado, Arizona, and Utah. There are many operations going on in that area because of uranium. Hence, this will not only benefit the Navajos with respect to their own ideas of roads, but it will also be of help because they will be provided an opportunity to work.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank my colleague for his comments.

My third question to the chairman of the committee is, Will the benefits extend to surrounding States—Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico—or will they be limited to the reservations and to Arizona?

Mr. HAYDEN. The benefits created by improvement of these roads will be felt throughout the region. The highways will permit commerce between Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona and the Indian tribes to begin on a modern scale. Improvement of these roads will link newly developed oil fields, uranium holdings, and tribal activities with markets in the surrounding States. They also will provide modern access to Glen Canyon Reservoir area.

Mr. ANDERSON. I thank the able chairman of the committee, and I again express my appreciation to him and to my colleague from New Mexico.

The able Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and I were both very much interested in the road project. We went to the reservation and participated in the project. We both appreciate very much what the able Senators on the Appropriations Committee have done.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to point out for the RECORD that Federal funds are the only funds available, I believe, to complete this road program. The Indian reservations have no money of their own, and the State cannot tax them. These reservations are not eligible for any regular Federal grants. As I understand the situation, it was necessary to come to the Congress for these special appropriations.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct, but there is an agreement that after the roads are built the roads will be maintained by the State of Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield first to a member of the committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I desire to make a motion, which has the approval of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. President, I move that the following provision be included in the bill on page 33, after line 21:

OTHER

Payment to the Philippine Government

For payment in full and final settlement to the Government of the Philippines as authorized by the Act of June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1115), $23,862,751, to be derived from receipts under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (31 U.S.C. 408b).

The reason for the motion is as follows: This language was put into the bill by the House of Representatives, and it came to the Senate. We held no hearings on the question, because there was no objection to it and no requested change in it by the executive department.

On the day the committee went into executive session an article was published in the newspapers to the effect that the Vice President of the Philippines had said that if this money were put into the gold reserve it would be a waste.

Consequently, on motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, the committee unanimously deleted the language from the bill and decided it wanted to know more about the matter.

Since that time the State Department representative and General Romulo, the Philippine Ambassador, have informed the committee further about the item.

This comes about as a result of the act of June 19, 1934. When the United States went off the gold standard, the Philippine Government had in the United States a gold standard fund of $19,112,253.42, and a Treasury certificate fund of $37,163,803.50, or a total of $56,276,056.92; that is, the gold bullion value of these deposits prior to diminuation of the gold content of the dollar was $56,276,056.92.

If this were converted into currency at the new valuation of the dollar, as computed by the Treasury Department, there would be a value of $95,282,398.87.

Therefore, the gross adjustment to the Philippine Government deposits if the reserves had been in gold, as computed by the Treasury Department, would be $39,006,341.95.

The Philippine Government received, from January 1, 1923, to the close of business January 30, 1934, on the gold standard fund and the Treasury certificate fund deposited in the United States the sum of $15,143,591.17.

This leaves a net adjustment to the Philippine Government deposits, as shown in Public Law 73-419, of $23,862,750.78.

This had been asked for by the Executive before World War II; I believe in 1937, 1941, and 1942. It was not approved at those times because it was felt there was no urgency.

During World War II, and after the war, with the large rehabilitation program, the Philippine Government did not press for these funds, but it did start to press for them 2 or 3 years ago. When President Garcia visited in the United States in July of last year he discussed this matter with the President and with the Secretary of State. The President made a commitment at that time that he would try to obtain these funds. The Philippine Islands need the funds now, because of the difficulties they are having with the foreign exchange rate.

That is the reason the matter is submitted now. It could not be submitted last year, because it was considered too late, so it was submitted in the supplemental request.

That is the explanation for the motion.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts. The sum recommended to be paid to the Philippine Government was authorized by Public Law 419 of June 19, 1934, and is payable out of receipts already set aside in the Treasury following the devaluation of the dollar in 1934. I recall the Senate's approval of this authorization very distinctly, as I had submitted on May 28, 1934, for the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, its favorable report on the bill.

I will say to the Senate that I recall this matter distinctly now, upon refreshing my mind. I had completely forgotten about it, to tell the truth. The committee report which was submitted on May 23, 1934, was submitted in the 73d Congress. That was quite a long time ago, and I hope Senators will pardon an old man for forgetting a little bit. I had forgotten about the exact provisions.

I stated in the report the reason why the appropriation should be made.

In order that Members may have some of the background on this proposed payment, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the report, No. 1209, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT NO. 1209—PHILIPPINE CURRENCY RESERVES ON DEPOSIT IN THE UNITED STATES

The Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3530) relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States, having considered the same, report favorably thereon without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill is as follows:

"A bill relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, when the funds therefor are made available, to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value (resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar) of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its treasury-certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances.

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the receipts covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, the amount necessary to establish the credit provided for in section 1 of this Act."

The purpose of this bill is to readjust the currency reserves of the Philippine Islands to meet the effect of the order of the President of January 31, 1934, revaluating the American dollar. The monetary system of the Philippine Islands is interlocked with our own by an act of Congress of March 2, 1903, as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the unit of value in the Philippine Islands shall be the gold peso consisting of twelve and nine-tenths grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, said gold peso to become the unit of value when the government of the Philippine Islands shall have coined and ready for, or in, circulation not less than five million of the silver pesos hereinafter provided for in this Act, and the gold coins of the United States at the rate of $1 for two pesos hereinafter authorized to be coined shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, in the Philippine Islands."

On January 31, 1934, the insular government had on deposit in American banks $56,276,056.92, a fund constituting the major portion of the currency reserves of the Philippine Government, on which the circulation of the insular government is based. This fund, deposited in dollars, has always been considered as the equivalent of gold. Applying the same revaluation as given the U.S. gold dollar by the proclamation of the President, this fund now amounts to $95,282,393.87, or an increase, had the fund been in actual gold, of $39,006,341.95.

It is obvious that any change in the value of our dollar automatically changes in the same proportion the value of the peso, the standard unit of value in the Philippine Islands. It is also obvious that the Presidential proclamation of January 31, 1934, in effect, expanded the currency reserves of the United States, but contracted the reserves of the Philippine Government, since the Philippine reserves are in dollars.

In a conference between officials of the Treasury Department, the Bureau of Insular Affairs, acting for the Secretary of War, and the Budget Officer, it was decided that the full amount of this credit should not be given to the reserve funds of the insular government, but from this $39,006,341.95 should be deducted $15,143,591.17, the interest which was accrued to the insular government since January 1923. This leaves a balance of $23,862,750.78, which it is thought by the President and the above-named officials represents the sum which should be credited to the Philippine Government on the books of the Treasury in order to restore the gold value of the Philippine currency reserves as of January 31, 1934.

When the gold content of the U.S. dollar was diminished, we took credit on our books for approximately $2,811,013,126. Had the insular government had on deposit on the date of the above-mentioned proclamation, gold bullion, or actual gold coins, as their currency reserve, there would have been no need for this legislation, or any adjustment for the reason that their gold would have increased in value as did the U.S. gold.

During the fall of 1932 the government of the Philippine Islands made representations to this Government with a view of including specific stipulation in the depository agreements that withdrawal of its currency reserve funds should be in gold coin of the United States at the election of the Philippine Government. The Secretary of War, through the Bureau of Insular Affairs, acting for this Government, stated that he did not deem as expedient the amendment of the depository agreement as suggested by the Philippine Government.

In March 1933, 10 months prior to the President's proclamation, other representations were made on the part of the Philippine Government seeking the assurance that deposits of the Philippine Government in the United States stand on an equal basis with the deposits of the U.S. Government and recommended that all deposits of the insular government, except $10 million required for ordinary expenses, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Under conditions obtaining in this country in 1932 and 1933, the officials of our Government deemed it inadvisable to accede to any of these requests, although the Philippine Government had every right to make these requests and to expect them to be granted.

Again on June 29, 1933, the Governor General of the Philippine Islands officially requested that "our gold standard and Treasury certificate funds be converted into gold coin of the standard existing at the time these deposits were made with the depository banks; this coin to be deposited in the U.S. Treasury or Federal Reserve banks and authority of the President secured to earmark it for their account, by amending the Executive order of April 5, 1933 (which was the first order of the President restricting the circulation of gold). There will be, however, no necessity for withdrawing the above-mentioned deposits from the present depository banks at this time if it is possible to obtain Government assurance that conversion into gold of the standard existing, as above outlined, may be made at a later date."

From time to time between June 29, 1933, and January 17, 1934, numerous cables were sent by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands expressing concern and stressing the necessity for assuring the gold content of the Philippine reserves on deposit in the United States. Likewise a letter on January 16, 1934, from the Acting Secretary of Finance of the Philippine Islands was sent to the Secretary of War again expressing the desire of the Philippine Government that its deposits be treated by the U.S. Treasury as deposits of coined gold. This request was in turn sent to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Secretary of War on January 17, 1934.

On January 17, 1934, 2 weeks prior to the Presidential proclamation, the following cable was sent by Governor General Murphy to the Secretary of War.

"Referring to telegram from this office June 29, No. 212, in particular, as well as other previous cables pertaining to Philippine currency. Have you further information relative to earmarking in gold Treasury certificates funds and the gold-standard fund? Believe allotment of gold to these funds on the basis of present gold content is but fair to Philippines, thus granting Philippine Government same advantage as United States in reduction of content of gold dollars backing gold-standard fund and Treasury-certificate fund. Am exceedingly anxious to receive definite decision."

At any time, following these representations, prior to January 31, 1934, the Treasury Department could have lawfully sold to the Philippine Government gold in the amount of their currency reserves on deposit in the United States at the old value of $20.67 an ounce, or could have authorized the earmarking of gold to be paid for by the Philippine Government with the funds on deposit in the United States. This, however, was not done, although the insular government from time to time has been given assurance by our officials that their interests would be equitably adjusted.

Our Government, not having acceded to these suggestions and requests is certainly morally obligated to expand the base of the currency reserves of the dependent government, and to do so without further delay in order to avoid further possible domestic and international financial complications.

It should be borne in mind that we are dealing in this bill exclusively with the currency reserve funds of the Philippine Islands, and that question should not be confused with the question of individual transactions between the people of the two governments.

In the case of the Filipino people, they have been forced to take the personal loss—their gold has been turned in just as was the gold of our own citizens—but no benefits will accrue to them or their government until the value of their gold reserve is reestablished by the Government of the United States. In the case of our own citizens, while the individual may not have been credited, nevertheless, the credit goes to the Federal Government, or the whole of the American people, each State of course having the same currency system as the Federal Government. It is quite certain that if any State had a separate monetary system tied in with the national money by an act of the Federal Government the government of such a State would undoubtedly have the same rights and equities as are sought to be established by this bill.

The Philippine National Bank now owns Liberty bonds and other obligations of our Government amounting to approximately $17,000,000. Likewise, many American securities are held by individual Filipinos. Those obligations will be paid, not in gold, but in legal currency, which means that they will be paid with a devaluated dollar. It should also be stated that the insular government has outstanding bonds of the Manila Railroad payable in pounds, guilders, and Swiss francs. In amortizing these bonds in foreign currencies, due to the difference in exchange, as a result of the action of the American Government in revaluing its money, a loss of approximately $10 million will be sustained by the insular government. Surely no one can fail to see the inequity in a failure of our Government to make the insular government whole in a loss occasioned by our own action.

The currency reserves of the Philippine Government are by law held in two funds, namely: The gold-standard fund, the legal limits of which are not less than 15 percent nor more than 25 percent of all the money in circulation and available for circulation by the Philippine Government; the treasury-certificate fund, which by law must consist of peso for peso, or $1 for every 2 pesos, for every Philippine treasury certificate issued or available for issue. Of the $56,276,056.92 Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States as of January 31, 1934, $19,112,253.42 pertained to the gold-standard fund and $37,163,803.50 to the treasury-certificate fund. The amount held in the gold-standard fund is approximately $8 million more than was actually required by law to be held in this fund on January 31, 1934, with the amount of money in circulation on that date.

However, should increased business demand an increase of money in circulation in amount in excess of $32 million, the excess of the gold-standard fund over the legal maximum limit of 25 percent would be wiped out immediately. Thus, in order to maintain the maximum limit of 25 percent in the gold-standard fund it has been the policy to have an excess to allow for an increase in the money in circulation and to always insure the parity of the peso with the dollar.

The experts of our Government have decided that the credit of $23,862,750.78 is just, equitable, and fair, and the committee feels that no great government can do less than what is proposed in this bill for its dependent people. It is in no wise suggested that any and all funds on deposit in this country to the credit of individuals and the insular government, over and above the funds actually held as currency reserve funds, should be enhanced in value by an act of Congress.

Coincident with the Independence Act, a refusal on the part of the American Government to meet its moral obligation in readjusting the currency reserves of the insular government, the value of which is interlocked with our own monetary system, is inconceivable. Such refusal would be an omission unworthy of a great Government and of the Congress, on whom this responsibility now rests.

Following are certain letters and memoranda from the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, explaining the purpose of the bill and recommending its enactment:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 10, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Banking and Currency Committee, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Receipt is acknowledged of your clerk's letter of May 4, 1934, transmitting a copy of the bill (S. 3530) relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States, and requesting a report thereon.

I understand that this bill has been recommended by the War Department. In view of the circumstances surrounding the deposits in the continental United States, of the currency reserves of the Philippine Islands, a dependency of the United States, the bill meets with the approval of the Treasury Department.

Respectfully,
H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 4, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: I am writing to your committee to request favorable consideration of S. 3530 which was introduced in the Senate at the request of this Department.

The purpose of this bill is to credit the Philippine Government with the profits, due to the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar, on its currency reserve deposited in the United States at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, and authorizing the appropriation of funds for this purpose.

The draft of this bill was prepared in consultation by officials of the Treasury Department and of this Department, and has received the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

At the suggestion of the War Department the major portion of the currency reserves of the Philippine monetary system has been maintained in the form of U.S. currency deposited in banks in the continental United States. The Philippine Government has always considered these deposits as the equivalent of a gold reserve.

The proclamation of the President issued on January 31, 1934, reduced the gold content of the dollar. The effect of this proclamation was not only to reduce in terms of gold, the value of the Philippine currency reserve funds, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States, on the other hand, enjoyed an increase in the value of the currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar. As the Philippine currency is interlocked with the U.S. gold dollar under laws enacted by the U.S. Congress, it is equitable that any change in the dollar which produces a profit on the currency reserves of the General Government should produce a corresponding profit on the currency reserves of this dependency.

The reestablishment of its currency reserves as of their former gold value of January 31, 1934, would be of great advantage to the Philippine Government in their affairs at the present time. It is hoped that an appropriation providing for this purpose can also be secured at the present session of Congress.

I am enclosing copy of a letter from the Director of the Budget in which he advises me that the expenditures contemplated by the proposed bill would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

There is also enclosed for your information a copy of a memorandum prepared in the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which sets forth in detail the necessity for this legislation. Should you desire further information regarding this matter, it is suggested that you call upon Brig. Gen. Creed F. Cox, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of this Department.

I urgently recommend the early enactment of S. 3530.

Sincerely yours,
GEORGE H. DERN,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF INSULAR AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 30, 1934.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.

Subject: Philippine currency reserves.

The monetary system of the Philippine Islands was originally established by Public, No. 137, of the U.S. Congress approved March 2, 1903. The unit of value prescribed was the gold peso which was definitely interlocked with the U.S. gold dollar at the rate of $1 for 2 pesos.

Act No. 938 of the Philippine Commission, approved October 10, 1903, which was enacted under authority granted by Public, No. 137, of the U.S. Congress, placed the Philippine Islands upon a gold-exchange basis and provided that part of the gold-standard fund should be deposited in the United States.

A portion of the currency reserve funds of the Philippine Islands have therefore been deposited in the United States under authority granted by the U.S. Congress, for over 30 years.

It became necessary in 1922 to reconstitute the currency reserve funds of the Philippine Islands which had been dissipated due to the operations of the Philippine National Bank. This was done by the sale of bonds in the United States.

Act No. 3058 of the Philippine Legislature approved June 13, 1922, issued pursuant to authority contained in the Philippine Organic Act (Public No. 240, 64th Cong., approved Aug. 29, 1916), reconstituted the currency reserves of the Philippine monetary system into two funds, namely, the gold-standard fund and the Treasury certificate fund. The inauguration of these reconstituted funds took place on January 2, 1923, and upon the suggestion of the then Secretary of War, the major portion of these funds were placed on deposit in the United States in member banks of the Federal Reserve System, which were approved by the Secretary of War as depositories of Philippine public funds and designated by the Governor General of the Philippine Islands as branches of the treasury of the Philippine Islands in the United States.

This memorandum refers to these reconstituted monetary reserve funds.

The laws of the Philippine Islands require certain reserves to be maintained against the currency of the Philippine Islands in circulation or available for circulation. So long as the United States was redeeming its currency in gold, that portion of the currency reserves deposited in the United States was equivalent to a gold reserve. The Philippine Government has always considered dollars of the United States as in every way equivalent to gold coins and for this reason has maintained since January 2, 1923, the major portion of its currency reserve funds on deposit in the United States.

The Philippine Government since October 1932 has been interested in trying to have these accounts made payable in gold coin. When this was discouraged by this Government, the Philippines expressed a desire to transfer their funds to the U.S. Treasury. The Treasury Department expressed the view that it was not authorized to take deposits of such funds.

The proclamation of the President issued on January 31, 1934, reduced the gold content of the dollar. The effect of this proclamation, as far as the Philippines were concerned, was not only to reduce, in terms of gold, the value of accounts representing its gold-standard fund and Treasury-certificate fund, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States enjoyed an increase in the value of its currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar. The Philippine Islands enjoyed no corresponding increase with respect to the reserves maintained in this country for its currency, the reason being that with the consent of this Government those reserves were maintained as bank balances in this country.

On January 30, 1934, the Philippine Government had on deposit in the U.S. currency reserves of a gold value of $56,276,056.92. It therefore requests this amount of its currency reserves be made available, either in the form of additional credits or in gold coin, dollar for dollar, so as to rehabilitate, in its gold value as of January 30, 1934, the currency reserves of the Philippine monetary system. This could be accomplished in either of the following ways:

(a) For the Secretary of the Treasury to establish on the books of the U.S. Treasury a credit in dollars in favor of the Philippine Government equivalent to the profits on the amount of its deposits in the United States as of the opening of business on January 31, 1934, due to the diminution of the gold content of the dollar; or

(b) The Treasury of the United States to sell to the Philippine Government gold bullion, figured at the rate of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, to the dollar, equivalent to the amount of its deposits in the United States as of January 30, 1934.

Either of these methods would serve the purpose of reestablishing the currency reserves of the Philippine Government at their former level, and in the same relative relation to the currency circulation in the Philippine Islands as the gold reserves of the United States have assumed to the currency in circulation in the United States.

This question has been discussed with the Treasury Department and that Department agrees that the preferable way to make this adjustment is to establish on the books of the U.S. Treasury a credit in dollars in favor of the Philippine Government equivalent to the profits on the amount of the deposits representing Philippine currency reserves, less the interest that has accrued thereon since their reestablishment in 1923 (the interest being deducted because the Philippines would not have had the benefit of this interest if its reserves had been maintained in metal). This Bureau believes this would be an equitable arrangment in view of all the circumstances connected with the maintenance of the Philippine currency reserves in the United States. The Governor General of the Philippine Islands has been consulted and has expressed his approval of this arrangement.

The following computation shows the status of the balances of the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States at the opening of business on January 31, 1934:

(a) Gold-standard fund	$19,112,253.42
(b) Treasury certificate fund	37,163,803.50
Total	56,276,056.92
The gold bullion value of these deposits prior to the diminution of the gold content of the dollar	56,276,056.92
Converted into currency at the new valuation of the dollar as computed by the Treasury Department	95,282,398.87
Profit to the Philippine Government (if the reserve had been in gold) as computed by the Treasury Department	39,006,341.95
Less the total interest received by the Philippine Government from Jan. 1, 1923, to close of business on Jan. 30, 1934, on the gold-standard fund and Treasury certificate fund deposited in the United States	15,143,591.17
Net profit to the Philippine Government as shown in the proposed bill	23,862,750.78

There is enclosed herewith the draft of a bill designed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to set up a credit on the books of the Treasury in favor of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, which is the amount equal to the increase in value, resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar, of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the Government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its Treasury certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances. The bill also provides for the necessary appropriation to establish the credit.

This draft has been prepared in consultation with representatives of the Treasury Department and the War Department has received the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands.

To summarize, and to emphasize the salient points of this claim of the Philippine Government, the equities involved are:

(a) The Philippine currency is interlocked with the U.S. gold dollar under laws enacted by the U.S. Congress, and any changes in the dollar which effect a corresponding change in the Philippine peso that produces a profit on the reserves of the general government should produce a corresponding profit on the reserves of this dependency.

(b) The major portion of the Philippine currency reserves have been maintained in this country in the form of bank balances since 1923 at the suggestion of the War Department.

(c) The Philippine Government has always considered their currency reserves deposited in the United States as a gold reserve, and prior to the banking crisis in the United States these reserves could have been withdrawn in gold at any time.

(d) That the conversion of these currency reserves into gold coin when conditions in this country appeared to make such conversion desirable could have been legitimately done, except that the interests of this Government made it undesirable to do so at the time.

(e) That the claim involves the currency reserves only and does not take into account the other Philippine public funds deposited in the United States.

It is recommended that the bill be transmitted to the chairman of the Insular Committees of the Senate and House, requesting its immediate introduction in the Congress.

Drafts of letters for your signature herewith.

CREED F. COX,
Chief of Bureau.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, May 3, 1934.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Reference is made to your letter of April 25, concerning the proposed bill relative to Philippine currency reserves deposited in the United States, and to the informal submission by your Bureau of Insular Affairs on April 30 of a draft of a new bill (being a redraft of sec. 2 of a bill submitted to the President on Mar. 23) reading as follows:

"A bill relating to Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to establish on the books of the Treasury a credit in favor of the treasury of the Philippine Islands for $23,862,750.78, being an amount equal to the increase in value (resulting from the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar) of the gold equivalent at the opening of business on January 31, 1934, of the balances maintained at that time in banks in the continental United States by the government of the Philippine Islands for its gold-standard fund and its treasury certificate fund less the interest received by it on such balances. There is hereby appropriated, out of the receipts to be covered into the Treasury under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, by virtue of the reduction of the weight of the gold dollar by the proclamation of the President on January 31, 1934, an amount necessary to establish such credit."

In reply you are informed that the expenditures contemplated by the proposed bill would not be in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Very truly yours,

L. W. DOUGLAS,
Director.

The President has recommended the enactment of the bill in the following letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 7, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: With the approval of the United States, the Government of the Philippine Islands has for many years maintained in banks in this country the major portion of the currency reserves of its monetary system, and has always considered these deposits the equivalent of a gold reserve.

The effect of my proclamation of January 31, 1934, was not only to reduce, in terms of gold, the value of these currency reserves, but indirectly to devalue, in terms of gold, the entire currency circulation of the Philippine Islands. The United States enjoyed an increase in the value of its currency reserves corresponding to the decrease in the value of the dollar.

As the Philippine currency is interlocked with the U.S. gold dollar under laws enacted by the U.S. Congress, it would be equitable to reestablish the Philippine currency reserves on deposit in the United States at their former gold value as of January 31, 1934.

I am advised that S. 3530, now under consideration before your committee, is designed to accomplish this purpose.

I recommend its enactment.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts send his motion to the desk?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I move that the amendment be included in the bill. That was my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We do not have the amendment at the desk.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I want to speak on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 33, after line 21, it is proposed to insert:

OTHER

Payment to the Philippine Government

For payment in full and final settlement to the Government of the Philippines as authorized by the act of June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1115), $23,862,751, to be derived from receipts under section 7 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 (31 U.S.C. 408b).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I was asking recognition on this item, and the Senator yielded to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not been acted upon. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I was the member of the Appropriations Committee who asked that this item be eliminated from the bill, and almost unanimously the committee agreed to do so. Why did we take that action? Because there was not a single word of testimony to substantiate the appropriation.

When we start passing out $23 million in lump sums, such action should be supported by substantial testimony. Since that time, informally and directly, I have obtained the information which would justify me in approving this $23 million appropriation, but I still say that it was the responsibility of the agencies of Government which were involved to see that the proper testimony was presented to the Appropriations Committee, and not stick an item of $23 million in the bill, to go to the Philippines or any other country, unless it was supported by evidence. That was why the action was taken. Now I am perfectly willing to take other action.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from New Hampshire is absolutely correct in the position he has taken, but now we have the facts in the matter, as they have been so clearly stated by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] and the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I very much hope that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be agreed to. Payment of these funds is overdue, and they should be paid. I am sure, as the Senator from New Hampshire has indicated, that had these facts been before the committee, he and the committee would not have taken the position they did. But we now have the facts.

We know that the funds are due and that they should be paid, and therefore that the Senate should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BRIDGES. I agree with the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

The amendment was agreed to.

MILITARY PROCUREMENT INFORMATION RELATING TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, at a time when the question of how wisely the Department of Defense uses its appropriations to promote our national security has become of some concern, and at a time when the adequacy or inadequacy of the military budget holds the attention of the Congress, of Government officials and of every thoughtful citizen, I feel compelled to bring to the notice of the Senate this fact:

The Department of Defense, systematically and by force of long habit, is throwing away taxpayers' money just as effectively as though the actual dollar bills were tossed on a bonfire.

This waste is accomplished by the simple expedient of avoiding the savings which invariably accrue from competitive bidding and relying instead upon giving contracts without competition to favored companies which, as sole sources of supply, ask and receive for their products sold to the Department of Defense prices which bear no relation to reality.

I shall illustrate this procurement evil, Mr. President, with facts and figures furnished me as chairman of the Small Business Committee by the Department of the Navy. First, however, I desire to emphasize that pouring good money down the sole source drain is not a new problem, nor will the information I provide today come as a shocking surprise to purchasing officials and contracting officers of the Department of Defense and its components.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a table entitled "Sole Source Awards Compared with Competitive Awards, 1958, Ships Parts Control Center, Mechanicsburg, Pa."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Sole source awards compared with competitive awards, 1958, ships parts control center, Mechanicsburg, Pa.

Mr. SPARKMAN. At my request, the committee staff has added to this table the last column, headed "savings."

As long ago as June 26, 1957, I addressed the Senate on this subject, stating then that "the Department of Defense conducts a large portion of its purchasing activities with a reckless disregard for the very rudiments of sound purchasing methods. These practices would be intolerable in the world of business for the simple reason that no business could be conducted at a profit which consistently and as a matter of method paid outrageously inflated prices for its raw materials, its supplies, and its equipment. Yet the payment of premium prices, over and above a reasonable market price, is a common custom of the Department of Defense."

The only evidence, Mr. President, that has come to my attention between then and now that this serious flaw in the purchasing practices of the Department of Defense has received the attention it deserves reached me in a letter dated February 24, from Rear Adm. J. W. Boundy, Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, Department of the Navy. To this letter was attached a list of 42 products which, during the year 1958, had been bought for the first time on a competitive bid basis as opposed to noncompetitive awards to sole sources of supply the previous time these same items had been purchased at the Navy's Ships Parts Control Center at Mechanicsburg, Pa.

The summary shows that during 1958, some 19 small business concerns bid for the first time on 38 of the 42 items purchased and the dollar value of these successful bids was $38,026.25. Four large concerns bid for the first time last year on four items with a value of $1,182.90.

The total paid out by the Navy for these items was therefore $39,209.15.

This is the point: Had these selfsame items been bought in the same quantities from the previous sole source suppliers on a noncompetitive basis, the cost to the Navy would have been $131,362.25.

It may be clearly seen that simply by opening up these purchases to competitive bidding, the Navy in this one series of contract actions saved $92,153.71.

The percentage savings, Mr. President, averages 70 percent. This means, based on the Navy's experience at its Ships Parts Control Center, that for thousands of common-use items bought at military purchasing installations throughout the country, military contracting officers are paying $100,000 for supplies and equipment from unnecessary sole-source suppliers which, under competitive bidding, could probably be bought for $30,000.

For the start which the Navy has made to eradicate unnecessary and costly sole-source buying, as evidenced by these data from the Ships Parts Control Center at Mechanicsburg, it would seem that the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and especially Comdr. O. R. Blanton of the Ships Parts Control Center, are entitled not only to official commendation, but also to the grateful thanks of the Nation's taxpayers.

It is edifying, Mr. President, to examine a few of the specific transactions reflected in this table. We find, for instance, that as a sole source the Welin Davit and Boat Co. received $18.25 per unit for a certain type of bearing sleeve, the stock number of which is listed in the table. When competitive bids were solicited on this product for the first time last year, the Gatke Corp., of Chicago, supplied the Navy with this item for $4.05 per unit. Here the saving to the taxpayer amounted to 77 percent.

Again, as a sole-source supplier, the Westinghouse Corp. was paid $277.44 per unit for a gear assembly which, under competitive bidding for the first time in 1958, was sold to the Navy by the Glove Gear Co. of Royal Oak, Mich., for $27.50 per unit. Competition here resulted in an astonishing 90-percent saving to the Government.

As a former sole supplier, the General Electric Co. sold carbon packing to the Navy for $82 per unit. Last year, the Navy was able to buy this carbon packing from the Charles E. Chapin Co., of Hackensack, N.J., for $15 per unit, with the taxpayers again benefiting by an 82-percent saving.

The Navy bought a specific type of coupling assembly from the Worthington Corp., as an alleged only source of supply, for $134.05 per unit. When this item was opened up to competitive bidding in 1958, the Navy was able to purchase the same coupling assembly from the Rubright Machinery Co., of Baltimore, for $81.88 per unit. In this instance, the saving to the Treasury amounted to 39 percent.

Last year the Navy bought bearing sleeves from the Waukesha Bearing Corp., of Waukesha, Wis., on a competitive basis for $189.85 per unit. Previous noncompetitive awards for this item had gone to the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. at a unit price of $425. Thanks once again to a little competition, the net saving to the Government on this item amounted to 55 percent.

As a final specific example of the wanton waste which the taxpayers of this Nation have been forced to shoulder because of the predilection of military contracting officers to rely on unnecessary sole sources as a means of handing out military contracts, I refer again to a purchase action by the Ships Parts Control Center for bearing sleeves during 1958. These were bought from True Alloys, Inc., on a competitive basis for $2.50 per unit. Prior to the presence of True Alloys, Inc., as a competitive factor in this particular procurement picture, the Navy had paid the Ingersoll-Rand Co. an even $30 per bearing sleeve. This, Mr. President, would amount to a 91-percent premium.

So far, the specific examples I have cited have shown what happens to prices when the procurement doors of the military purchasing installations are opened to competition from small business concerns. An examination of the list from which these examples have been taken, however, will reveal that whereas the greater share of the savings resulted from small business competition, there are instances where a large company has underbid a small company and where one small company has offered prices lower than those of a competing small concern.

The point is, Mr. President, that it is competition and competition alone, regardless of the size of the selling companies, which is essential if our military officials want to avoid having to pay two and three times what a product is worth.

Every year the top supply and logistics personnel of the Department of Defense and its components come before the Subcommittee on Government Procurement of the Senate Small Business Committee and proclaim the loftiest of intentions to bring new sources of small business supply into the mlitary procurement system. So far, however, the only concrete evidence that any organized effort in this direction is being made has come to us from the Navy's Ships Parts Control Center.

There are, I believe, between 500 and 600 Department of Defense offices throughout the country which conduct purchasing activities. Our minds must shrink from contemplating how many millions upon millions of dollars the officials of these hundreds of installations have squandered throughout the years because of their lack of success in finding new sources of supply to compete with unnecessary single source producers. We have seen how just one such office saved 70 percent on the cost of 42 common-use items through competition. It seems proper to inquire to what extent the Department of Defense is today continuing to pay $100,000 for products which through competition could be bought for $30,000? Commonsense dictates that this sole source giveaway be brought to a halt.

Here is a situation, if I ever saw one, Mr. President, that cries out for management control at the highest level. One cannot expect a busy Secretary of Defense to be intimately aware of everything that goes on in every one of his Department's farflung purchasing offices. Yet the reputation of Secretary McElroy for business acumen is such that we know without having to be told what he would have done as president of Procter & Gamble had he found one of his company's purchasing agents consistently paying a premium to one supplier when he could have made the same purchase at a 70-percent saving from another supplier. A competitive purchasing system would have been installed immediately and negligent personnel would have been fired or replaced. Similar corrective changes should take place in the Department of Defense.

I am writing to Secretary McElroy for the purpose of calling this procurement problem to his attention. In the last analysis, the only way to lick this problem is for the Department of Defense to attack it with all possible vigor. It may be that the Secretary will want to send instructions to every purchasing official of the Department, requiring a written justification for every sole source purchase when there is any reason whatever to believe that additional sources for the product may be available.

This is a matter which should be of vital concern to every Member who wants to see the Government run on a business-like basis. Such wasteful practices as I have described today and documented should also be of particular interest to the members of the Appropriations Committee and the Armed Services Committee. Needless to say, this problem is of the greatest concern to the members of the Small Business Committee, all of whom realize that year by year the share of small firms in military procurement has dwindled from a high of 25 percent in fiscal year 1954 to 17 percent in fiscal year 1958. In the first quarter of fiscal 1959 there was a further decrease to 16.6 percent.

This downward trend of small business participation in military purchases can be reversed, provided the Department of Defense bestirs itself. One way would be to increase the share of small firms in research and development contracts which is currently running at about 3 per cent of the total spent for such purposes. A second way to make it possible for small concerns to bid on military contracts would be to provide specifications, drawings, and engineering data for a long list of products which are now sold to the Department by sole sources because the information on which other potential suppliers might submit is lacking.

Yet a third way to broaden the base of military procurement would be for the Army, Navy, and Air Force to place greater emphasis on the Small Business Administration's set-aside program, which has a great unrealized potential.

It is my intention, Mr. President, to offer an amendment to the Department of Defense appropriation bill for fiscal year 1960 when it comes before the Senate. My amendment will propose that of the estimated $20,200 million to be made available to the Military Establishment during fiscal year 1960 for supplies and services to be procured in the United States and its Territories, not less than $4,040 million of that amount shall be expended for supplies and services with qualified small business concerns. This is a modest goal. To reach it will only require the additional expenditure of approximately $311 million more with small firms than the dollar value of the contracts such firms obtained in fiscal year 1958, which was $3,729,018,000.

In conclusion, I want to make this observation: In my years of experience as chairman of the Small Business Committee I have yet to encounter any military procurements wherein a newly introduced element of competition did not result in the Government's being able to buy the products involved at a lower price than formerly. For the Department of Defense to continue to pay noncompetitive sole source suppliers of common use items premiums ranging as high as 90 percent on items obtainable elsewhere is not only fiscal madness, it is an utter abrogation by the military of its moral duty not to squander public funds.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I am appreciative of the fact that I am given the opportunity to follow the distinguished chairman of the Select Committee on Small Business. The subject which he has brought to the attention of the Senate is an important one, and I emphasize what he has so well said, that at the present time small business is not receiving its proportionate share of Government contracts.

Mr. President, although the Congress has often set forth its desire with respect to awarding the small-business concerns, a fair proportion of the appropriated dollar for supplies and services in the continental United States, the Department of Defense records of awards going to small business as prime contractors has progressively decreased year after year at an alarming rate: Fiscal 1954, 25.3 percent of $11,448 million; fiscal 1955, 20.5 percent of $14,930 million; fiscal 1956, 19.6 percent of $17,750 million; fiscal 1957, 16.6 percent of $19,133 million; fiscal 1958, 17.1 percent, of $21,827 million; first half of 1959, 13.3 percent of $10,050 million.

The small business firms should at least get 20 percent of the appropriated dollars for fiscal 1959 and 1960 and we in Congress should insist that this be done. This could mean only an increase of approximately $300 million on what they receive in fiscal 1958. There are many ways to do this. For instance, in fiscal 1958 there were $508,732,000 in awards on which small concerns could not bid because of proprietary controls or standardized specifications. In fiscal 1958 there were awards made amounting to $13,971,326,000 which had no known small business sources. Efforts should be made by the Department of Defense to find more sources.

There should be more procurement made on an advertised competitive basis. During the past 5 years only 15 percent of the total dollars awarded have been advertised. Some 85 percent of the awards made were without competition and one reason why small business is not receiving a fair share of the Government business.

The net awards to the first 100 large companies amounted to 74.2 percent of the dollars spent in the continental United States; 25 of these 100 companies received 57.5 percent of the dollars spent. These awards were largely made under what is known as the "Weapons System Concept" of procurement and there is some question as to whether this system when used is in the best interest of the Government and the small business community.

In fiscal 1958 there were $635,422,000 awards made in which small business could not participate because it could not meet quantitative or delivery requirements. The requirements should be broken down into smaller quantities and delivery dates extended to allow small business to participate.

Mr. President, it was my privilege, a few days ago, to chair the Subcommittee on Government Procurement and I was surprised and worried by the documented statements by small-business men as to the unfair conditions faced in an effort to secure and process Government contracts.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916), making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 15, line 6, after the word "facilities", it is proposed to insert : "; no part of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase of science, mathematics, and modern language teaching facilities, which are sold, manufactured, or otherwise identified as originating in Communist or Communist-dominated countries."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment proposing limitation of expenditure of part of the appropriation provided for defense educational activities in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare appropriation in this so-called second supplemental Appropriations bill, H.R. 5916.

Mr. President, I recently, on March 12, brought to the attention of this body the Soviet invasion of the American market with various scientific and laboratory equipment for use in American secondary schools and colleges. We have now for some time been aware of the declared Soviet economic offensive against us. We would, indeed, have to be very sound asleep not to be aware of it because the Soviets themselves have told us in no uncertain terms and they have suited their actions to their words. I pointed out on March 12 the Soviet techniques concentrating on different phases of free world economy. By selective dumping and underselling tactics, industries could be destroyed one by one.

Mr. President, important as is the aspect of piecemeal economic destruction, there is in their latest incursion into the field of scientific laboratory equipment a far greater significance. Cold war and economic war offensives are only a part of what is the overall struggle for the minds of men. The flooding of our secondary schools and colleges with Soviet scientific equipment is a direct frontal assault in that never-ending struggle.

The youth of America is daily treated to stories of Soviet scientific superiority. Hardly a day passes but what someone is hailing some new Soviet achievement. Much of this is propaganda, witting or unwitting, but nevertheless it does have its impact. What effect, Mr. President, do you think it will have on the young people entering upon careers in the field of science, after reading those stories to find that indeed in the pursuit of their studies, they are using Soviet-made scientific demonstration apparatus? To my mind, it would merely confirm to them the propaganda stories to which they have been subjected. Certainly in the expenditure of Federal public funds, expressly earmarked for the purchase of such equipment, the least we can do, as prudent legislators, is to try to safeguard the use of those funds so that we are not in any way aiding the Soviet effort for world domination.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Has the administration taken a position on this subject?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not think it has. At least I am not aware of it.

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator proposing, on the one hand, that Congress appropriate money to give aid to the States in developing a program of scientific education, and, on the other hand, telling the States, "You must not spend this money in the most economical way; you must spend the money to 'buy American'; you must not buy these products from a foreign country; you must use the money to buy American equipment"? Is this not an innovation in the Federal-State relationship in the field of aid to education?

Mr. BRIDGES. In answer to my very able and distinguished colleague from Tennessee, I will say I am not attempting to stop the use of scientific equipment purchased from various countries of the world, and used in teaching in the laboratories and schools. I am trying to stop the use of Federal funds for the purchase of such equipment from the Soviet Union or other Communist countries. These countries are attempting to dump this material into our schools. All of it is marked, "Made in Russia," and has the Communist imprint on it. The amendment provides: "which are sold, manufactured, or otherwise identified as originating in Communist or Communist-dominated countries." That to me clearly states, as was my intention, the prohibition against the purchase of identifiable items.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. How is the superintendent of education in a county in Alabama, for example, to know whether a stirring rod or glass tube or a mixing pot has been made behind the Iron Curtain, or whether it has not been made behind the Iron Curtain? Is not the Senator proposing an unworkable amendment? Is not the Senator proposing an innovation in the Federal-State relationship in this field?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not know that I am proposing an innovation in the Federal-State relationship; we certainly make drastic wage stipulations in Federal funds to States for road building. I am doing a very practical thing in trying to shut off the use in our schools, in which boys and girls at a very impressionable age attend classes, of equipment which is being dumped into this country by Russia and which is marked as Soviet-produced products. It would not be surprising if the students gathered the idea that we in this country are unable to make the equipment or that the Soviets make it better.

Mr. GORE. The Senator's amendment is not confined to artices which are marked. I wonder how a child in a chemistry class could be impressed by a glass tube, whether it was made in Czechoslovakia or Germany or Tennessee. It seems to me that it is a bit farfetched to suggest that our children will be subverted by the use of a test tube or mixing pot or stirring rod or, perchance, a microscope, manufactured in Czechoslovakia or Poland.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am sure that the boys and girls in New Hampshire schools would prefer to use a microscope made in Tennessee rather than one made in Russia.

Mr. GORE. That is not the question. Congress is appropriating money in the bill now before the Senate to aid States in the development of a science education program. Yet the Senator proposes to place an impossible task on the shoulders of the administrator of the program in a county of Tennessee or Alabama, by telling him he must not spend the money in buying equipment until he can ascertain that it positively was not manufactured in Poland or Czechoslovakia or the Soviet Union.

At one time I was the county superintendent of education in a county of Tennessee. I know what limited facilities the superintendent has. How could the superintendent of Smith County in Tennessee determine whether a glass tube was made in Czechoslovakia or anywhere else?

Mr. BRIDGES. The Senator from Tennessee, like the Senator from New Hampshire, taught school. I taught a class in science in secondary schools. Therefore, I am familiar with the problem. I say that this type of equipment is being dumped into this country with the intended result of its being used by schools. I have already spoken to the point about identifiability.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator really believe that the children of our schools are going to be stirred into unpatriotic zeal by the use of some little piece of equipment which has not been made in America?

Mr. BRIDGES. I am not objecting to the fact that it has not been made in America. I am objecting to Soviet Union propaganda and I have already remarked on its probable effect.

Mr. GORE. The Senator's amendment is broader than that. It covers material manufactured outside the Soviet Union. How is the administrator of a county program to determine whether a piece of equipment is made in a foreign country? Would the Senator read his amendment again?

Mr. BRIDGES. After the word "facilities," on page 15, line 6, I proposed to insert a semicolon and then add: "No part of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase of science, mathematics, and modern language teaching facilities which are sold, manufactured, or otherwise identified as originating in Communist or Communist-dominated countries."

Mr. GORE. So it is not confined to the Soviet Union.

Mr. BRIDGES. The amendment states Communist or Communist dominated countries. As I have repeated the matter of identification is clear.

Mr. GORE. Oh, no. I beg the Senator's pardon. It says: "teaching facilities which are sold, manufactured, or otherwise identified." It is not necessary that they be so identified.

Mr. BRIDGES. Furthermore, the customs laws require that the articles be appropriately stamped as to country of origin.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I am sure the interpretation of the language is that the articles would be identified in some manner. I know that there is quite a flood of this material coming into our country from the Soviet Union. I support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. I believe the adoption of the amendment is vital in the context of our life-and-death cold war struggle with the Soviet Union.

It is important, in considering this problem, to differentiate between good faith commerce among the nations of the world and the blatant attempts by the Soviet bloc to use international trade as a political and propaganda tool.

While I strongly endorse our State Department's efforts to expand peaceful trade with the world, including the Soviet Union, I believe we would be derelict in our duty if we permitted the use of public funds to abet the economic cold war designs of the Russians.

We can and must draw the distinction between legitimate foreign trade and commerce planned as a weapon in economic warfare. The scheme of the Soviets to flood the American market with low-priced, high-quality scientific equipment is similar in some respects to their previous efforts to drop the world price of aluminum, and thus upset the market in that commodity. There appears to be a good deal of truth in the allegation that these Soviet moves are merely individual steps in a Soviet master plan to "discombobulate" one American market after another.

The fact that this Soviet scientific equipment can be sold in this country for anywhere from one-half to one-fifth the cost of products made in the United States indicates that the Soviets have priced their goods to be used for political and propaganda purposes. They seek by this move to make a two-pronged attack on America by the sale of these products.

First, they can undermine an important industry which cannot possibly turn out quality goods at the low prices at which the Russians are producing them. Many outstanding firms in the State of New York could be undermined, both directly and indirectly, by massive imports of microscopes, electronic equipment, projectors, and other scientific apparatus. Some of this material is already coming into the United States and is going into our schools directly from the Soviet Union.

The second objective is that the Russians hope to create indelible impressions on the minds of the young American scholars who would use this equipment in their schoolwork. It is complicated, well-designed equipment; it is not merely test tubes or something of that kind. With their aim to shake America's confidence through Russian scientific achievements, they hope to solidify their grasp on youthful American minds by impressing them with the scientific equipment used in the classrooms.

The total U.S. market for school laboratory equipment has been reliably estimated to be about $6 million a year. But the total sales potential, when the National Defense Education Act—which is what we are talking about—goes into effect, with its provision for the purchase of scientific equipment by schools and junior colleges, cannot be calculated. It may at least double the present market.

I, for one, do not propose to let this increased market be gobbled up by Communist manufacturers selling goods to be purchased by funds supplied by American taxpayers. This amendment should be adopted. It strikes me that the wording of the amendment is appropriate. The objective of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is to combat Soviet tactics which are designed primarily to promote Russian political interests, to undermine American industries, and to influence young Americans.

The Soviet economic challenge cannot be measured—nor should we try to meet it—on the same terms as the business competition of our friends around the world. Let us never forget the ultimate objective of the Soviets. Right now they are concentrating on economic infiltration. Although Soviet scientific equipment represents merely one aspect of this overall endeavor, it is a particularly disturbing endeavor.

I hope the amendment will be overwhelmingly adopted, even with such modification as may be needed. The fears of the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee about the identification of such products are not well founded. The wording of the amendment means that the product must be identified in some manner.

It seems to me that we must show the world that we intend to fight, tooth and nail, this Communist economic cold war offensive. That is the objective of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the senior Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I think I understand the purpose of the amendment. I am concerned about the effect which the Russian scientific products are having upon our national security. Therefore, I make two suggestions to the Senator from New Hampshire: First, perhaps the point made by the Senator from Tennessee could be dealt with in the amendment by requiring a specific mark of identification on the product. Second, and I think equally important, it is necessary, I believe, to make an exception for products used for demonstration and comparison. I do not think anyone would want us to be blind, even in the schools, to what the Russians are doing. I do not think that is the intention of the Senator from New Hampshire, because he has had too much experience in this field.

So merely by way of suggestion, I commend these two thoughts to the Senator from New Hampshire, so that the amendment may be whipped into shape.

Also, the Senator perhaps may wish to address himself to the national security implications. If all we were dealing with was dumping, we would have to deal with residual oil, aluminum, antimony, manganese, and tin, some of which the Russians have already dumped, and others of which they have the capability of dumping.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I have received a number of complaints concerning the subject of which the Senator from New Hampshire has spoken. One was from a very large firm in Massachusetts, American Optical Co.; others were from smaller firms, Kirkland Instrument Co. and Cambosco Scientific Co., with which I am not so familiar. I have taken up these complaints with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Secretary Flemming has written that from the point of view of the Department the objection is that such action as is contemplated under the proposed amendment may be considered Federal interference with the local schools. But that can be balanced against the dumping by the Russian Government of scientific material, not only for school purposes, at such a low price that, even if the full tariff is imposed, the price is still as I understand, less than 50 percent of the price for which the American Optical Co. can produce and sell similar goods.

It seems to me that we should give consideration to that aspect of the matter balanced against the aspect of possible Federal interference with local schools.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. First, has the Department of Commerce had an opportunity to consider the amendment?

Mr. BRIDGES. So far as I know, it has not.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Have any hearings been held on the amendment?

Mr. BRIDGES. So far as I know, no hearings have been held.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire know how large the imports of this material have been?

Mr. BRIDGES. I know that samples of his equipment have been exhibited and I am reliably informed that orders may now be placed in sizable quantity. I am not prepared to give a complete itemization.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Are the imports substantial in quantity?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not know if they have been up to the moment. I hope not. I am trying to stop them. Various articles concerning this problem published in outstanding national magazines, have been called to my attention; and there have been other instances in which I have been informed personally and directly of such occurrences.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does not the Senator believe that this is a subject which comes within the purview of the Battle Act and the regulations which have been promulgated thereunder, in connection with our allies, in the attempt to control East-West trade?

Mr. BRIDGES. I believe that is a part of the general theory of the act but I do not know whether the Battle Act would specifically cover this.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is this not a field in which not only the United States has an interest, but in which our allies also have an interest?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not know that our allies would have a particular interest in school equipment being dumped into this country.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator may remember that last summer a question was raised about the dumping of aluminum. It was not dumped specifically into this country; I think it was dumped into the London market. Also, a large quantity of benzene was sold to the Dow Chemical Co. That matter was taken up with the Department of Commerce, which is now considering it. But it strikes me that this is not a very orderly way in which to legislate in this field. I myself think there must be adopted some new policy whereby we and our allies will coordinate our efforts to meet the type of action which was encountered in the case of aluminum, tin, and lead.

I think this approach, without hearings having been held to determine where we are going and what we are doing, is subject to the criticism of shooting in the dark at something which we think threatens us.

I do not believe this matter has been sufficiently prepared for the Senate to pass upon it very intelligently. I do not believe it is an isolated case. I think it is a part of the overall policy of the protection of the free world economy against what we call dumping. I am not sure whether it is dumping.

A few days ago I had a conversation with one of the visiting members of the International Chamber of Commerce, many of whom were in Washington last week. He had recently been in Poland. I asked him about his experiences there. He was associated with the Imperial Chemical Co., and he went to Poland to visit their chemical plant there. He threw entirely new light on the question. He said, "I do not know whether they are dumping or not. In my opinion, they do not know what their costs are. Their plant is very well equipped, but in their system of economy they have developed no method of determining their costs."

He said that actually these people were very eager to discuss ways and means of discovering what their costs are; and he said, "I don't know for sure whether they are deliberately dumping these materials, or whether they don't know, and just have some on hand at a particular time, and sell them for whatever they think they will bring."

It seems to me that in this case the Senator has raised, in connection with an appropriation bill, a matter which is very serious and should be considered by the appropriate legislative committees as a part of an effort to find a solution to the overall problem of what the free world is to do in regard to, let us say, a raid by a state trading company. I am not unsympathetic with the objectives. But I do not like to accept to an appropriation bill an amendment which deals with a matter about which we know very little, and which has not been submitted to the proper department of the Government, and has not been developed in the way we usually develop legislative provisions.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I appreciate the comment which has been made by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. I would say that this is not so much a matter of trade as it is a matter which has propaganda value. If the high schools and secondary schools of our country use in their science laboratories Soviet-made equipment, which is so identified by the pupils, it will have tremendous propaganda value on their young minds. That is the main point I am making.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If that is the main point, then I certainly think the State Department, which is given the responsibility of dealing with such propaganda matters—in fact, the Congress appropriates more than 100 million a year in that connection, and the distinguished Senator participates in the consideration of that item—should be given an opportunity to look into this question. However, I did not think that was the main point in this connection. Instead, I thought the main point was one of trade.

I must say that I am very dubious about the propaganda effect. On the other hand, I am not very dubious about the trade effect. I think the trade problem is a very difficult one for us to solve.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Arkansas has raised the question whether this is a serious matter, or whether the case referred to is an isolated one, and so forth.

I call attention to the fact that in late January there was, in New York City, an exhibit of Russian-made scientific equipment. It was set up at the meetings of the American Physical Society and the American Association of Physics Teachers, at the Hotel New Yorker, in New York City. The purpose of the exhibit was stated to be to promote the sale to American schools of Soviet-made equipment, such as microscopes, electronics equipment, projectors, and other apparatus for use in classrooms. In other words, it was apparently a well-planned move of a semiofficial character by representatives of the Soviet Union.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Assuming that to be so, I still believe it would be very improvident for us to legislate in the way now proposed—in other words, to attach to an appropriation bill such a rider, which relates to a decision which obviously affects our foreign policy, and to do so in the absence of any hearings at all.

I think this matter goes far beyond the proper scope of a rider to an appropriation bill. Obviously the matter involves our basic foreign policy. If such exhibits are permitted, apparently they are in accordance with our policy, or else such exhibits would not have been permitted.

I believe this matter deserves serious consideration by the appropriate committee, which should weigh the effect of the admittance or the exclusion of such items. Perhaps they should be excluded. But I do not think the way now proposed is the proper way to handle the matter.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, if I may give a partial answer to what the Senator from Arkansas has said, let me ask a question: Is it not wise to act on this problem before a large volume of such items is admitted? Later, it might be more difficult to act than it is now; and such action on our part at a later time might more seriously impair the interests of those who in good faith have made commitments. Under those circumstances, congressional action, at a later time, in interferring with the admission of such equipment might be even more disastrous in its effect on those who have proceeded in good faith.

Upon referring to my notes, I find that a news item in regard to such importations states that they were made by a local company which was said to have ordered 6,000 pieces of such apparatus from the Soviet Union. The president of the company said he was sure that was the first importation of such Soviet equipment for sale in this country, and that he believed there was an American market potential of about $1 million during the next two years for the Soviet equipment, which he hopes to sell to schools and colleges. He said he first had become aware of Soviet physics teaching equipment through a photograph on the cover of an American scientific journal, and that, impressed by the apparent quality of the item, he made inquiries, and later visited the Soviet Union, to see its equipment for himself. He said he had been particularly impressed by the evidence that the Russians had set up mass production of physics-teaching equipment about 8 years ago as a part of their "crash program" in science education; and he went on to describe what the equipment consists of — namely, microscopes, projectors, a device for studying wave motion, electronic apparatus, and basic items, such as blocks for demonstration of solid geometry principles, and so forth.

It seems to me that this matter has already reached such proportions that we should face the problem now, one way or the other, and either should say we are going to let such items be imported or should take action to bar them from coming into this country from Communist countries or Communist-dominated countries.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. But does not the Senator agree that, at least, hearings should be held on the matter, so there will be some record in regard to what is being done?

Although probably the Senator's State has the greatest interest in this matter, the Senator has no specific information, other than that such items are being offered for sale.

I believe that, at the very minimum, we should obtain reports on this matter from the Department of Commerce and the Department of State.

The pending amendment is clearly legislation on an appropriation bill. Furthermore, it seems to me, the amendment would change the policy. Perhaps it should be changed; but I do not believe the way now proposed is the proper way to change it.

In the case of the items I have mentioned—for instance, in connection with the aluminum industry and other large, basic industries—I am convinced in my own mind that something should be done. But I am not convinced that what is now proposed is what should be done. I do not know how this matter should be handled; but I believe hearings should be held and the matter should be taken seriously.

On the other hand, a rider to an appropriation bill does not seem to me to be the appropriate way to proceed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HILL. Let me say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I find myself much in sympathy with what he has said; and certainly I would not wish to have the Senate take any action which would permit such dumping in our country by the Soviet Union. Of course, not only scientific equipment but many other items have been cited in this connection—for instance, the dumping of aluminum.

Let me say that these funds are to be matched by the States and local communities; in fact, they will not be available for expenditure except as they are matched dollar for dollar by the States and the local communities. So we must consider the fact that we are not simply dealing with a matter which concerns only the Federal Government. Instead, it very definitely brings into the situation the States and the local communities.

Furthermore, we have not had an opportunity to look into this matter. We have not had any hearings at all on it.

My good friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, made a very forthright statement earlier today about the amendment which deals with the Philippine Islands, a matter about which he had taken a position in the committee. Certainly he was justified in doing so, because at that time we had had no evidence or hearings or testimony or facts. But subsequently the facts were brought to his attention, and they were subsequently brought out on the floor of the Senate. So, being a wise man, he changed his position.

Therefore, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to give us an opportunity to hold hearings and to go into this matter and to obtain the facts, particularly since this matter really involves the States and the local communities more than it involves the Federal Government, insofar as the educational programs are concerned. So let us have an opportunity to obtain the facts.

Incidentally, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire is a member of the Subcommittee on Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare, and that subcommittee soon will hold its hearings on the question of educational funds. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire is ex officio a member of the subcommittee. So I think the way to handle this matter is to hold a hearing on it before the subcommittee, and have the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire be there, where he, together with the rest of us, can go into these questions and can obtain the facts.

I believe at least we would then know the basis on which we were proceeding. We would have more facts. We would know the situation with respect to the States, the local communities, and the school districts.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I also belong to the subcommittee of the Senator from Alabama. I believe I am sympathetic with everything the Senator from New Hampshire has said, but I hope such a study will take place.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I appreciate the discussion on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I should like to associate myself with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. This problem becomes an international one, and is far more important than merely the matter now pending before the Senate. There are three committees involved, the Foreign Relations Committee, the Finance Committee, and the committee having to do with health, education and welfare.

I plead that the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his amendment, in order that we not get into any difficulty because of this proposal.

Mr. BRIDGES. I believe it is an amendment which might well be taken to conference. If it is necessary to perfect it in any way, it could be perfected at that time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HILL. The Senator and I have sat on a good many conferences. We know that when we go into conference no witnesses appear before the members of the conference and no evidence is given. Sometimes the conferees become snarled in other questions, and an opportunity is not afforded to get to the facts of a particular matter. There are many different items in this supplemental bill, dealing with many activities and phases of the Federal Government.

Mr. BRIDGES. I have noticed that the Senator from Alabama is very effective in conference.

Mr. HILL. When the U.S. Senate sends me to conference as its agent, I do my best to uphold the position of the Senate. However, the Senator from Kansas is quite correct about this matter. There is involved not only a question of appropriations, but a question perhaps belonging to the Foreign Relations Committee and the Finance Committee, of which he is an honored and distinguished member.

I join the Senator from Kansas in his appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire that he withdraw the amendment in order that we may ascertain the facts and know what the situation is. I particularly so urge since these funds have to be matched by the States, local communities, and school districts, and they are very much affected by this situation.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I hope the able Senator from New Hampshire will yield to the entreaties of his colleagues. Admittedly, there is an economic phase in the cold war, but I submit we cannot adequately cope with that challenge by attaching riders to appropriation bills as they come before Congress. If we attach the proposed rider to this bill, then must we not follow through when Congress appropriates money for Hill-Burton purposes, and provide that no item used in that program can be made in Czechoslovakia? I doubt that is a precedent which the able Senator from New Hampshire would wish to establish.

I believe the Senator from Massachusetts stated he had talked to the Commissioner of Education, and the latter had raised the question that this would be Federal interference with local administration of our educational system. The administration of schools in accordance with the laws and the Constitution has, by tradition in America, been vested in the States, counties, and municipalities.

When Congress appropriates money for the highway program, it does not attach riders providing that States may not use the funds, of which they provide a part, to buy machinery from whatever source. We have not provided such restrictions relating to Hill-Burton hospital construction funds; which is a public health program; we have not provided that the State agencies cannot use Hill-Burton funds, of which they contribute a part, for the purchase of medical and surgical instruments made in a particular country.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am sure the Senator realizes the difference here involved. We are dealing with young and impressionable minds.

Mr. GORE. I am willing to believe that this subject embraces an economic problem, and I am willing to try to meet the challenge we face in that light; but I must say I do not share the Senator's view that the children of America are going to be subverted because they use a test tube or a microscope made in a particular foreign country. I do not believe our children are that impressionable. I believe their patriotism, which stems from home, schools, and churches, is sufficiently strong not to be influenced by the use of such instruments.

Mr. BRIDGES. I believe they are impressionable, and my fear of their impressionability is one of the reasons why I offer the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York withhold his request?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to add just a few words to the discussion which has taken place, which I believe has been most informative. It seems to me the discussion points up that there cannot be a piecemeal approach to the problem of the potential economic competition of the Soviet Union. As the Senator from Tennessee has noted, the discussion points up the importance of our entire Government, the executive branch and the legislative branch, settling down to the difficult task of preparing our country for the kind of competition we are going to have on the economic front. It is hoped that from the discussion of an amendment such as this, we might receive the inspiration to see that something is done at the national level, in the appropriate committee, so that there can be made an analysis and a reevaluation of the economic and political tools which we have available to meet the kind of unfair economic competition which is going to be heaped upon us.

With the Senator from New Hampshire, I, for one, as is true of every other Senator, am keenly concerned about this problem. Possibly in the next few days we can formulate a resolution or petition which will indicate our desire in this matter to have the Congress, as well as the executive branch, conduct an appropriate study.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Health, Education, and Welfare, if the amendment were not pushed to a vote at this time, if he would be willing to take the amendment up in the regular hearings on the 1960 HEW appropriations and give an opportunity to those who want to be heard to testify on the matter? Such an assurance would have great influence with me. I would be influenced by what the Commissioner of Education might say. At the same time, I have been very much influenced by several responsible sources, one in Massachusetts, which states that precision instruments are being dumped into this country to such an extent that tariffs are of no help at all. It creates a pretty difficult economic problem. If the Senator will give such assurance, I know it will have great influence with me.

Mr. HILL. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, that I should be glad to arrange a hearing and to let anyone who is interested appear and testify. As I said earlier, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is a member of the subcommittee. The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] is a member of the subcommittee. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] who was with us a few moments ago, is a member of the subcommittee. I should be very happy to arrange a hearing on this matter before the subcommittee.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Chairman of the subcommittee that the Senator from New Hampshire, after conferring with some of his colleagues, will agree to withdraw the amendment on the condition expressed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, that he will have hearings held on the proposal.

I simply want to serve notice now that if, after the hearings, no action is taken by the committee, I certainly reserve the right subsequently to bring the matter up on the floor by way of a similar amendment.

Mr. HILL. The Senator is a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will be at the hearing. The Senator will be present when we have the subcommittee meeting to mark up the bill, and the Senator will be present as a member of the full committee.

Mr. BRIDGES. Certainly. But if I cannot in my own good conscience agree with the committee action. I feel so strongly on the subject I reserve my right to independent action on the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I, for one, appreciate the willingness of the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his amendment on the basis of the understanding given, but there are other problems. One of the large companies on the eastern seaboard, the Dow Chemical Co., made a fantastic deal with the Soviet Union on benzene, at a price no other country can compete with, which is 6 cents under the world price. We had, not long ago, the problem of dumping of aluminum. The problems of Bolivia are no accident. I think we have to go into this thing in depth, and not merely with regard to a few educational instruments or facilities. We need to study the entire problem. This is a question I have felt for a long time we have not properly studied.

The Soviet Union has declared economic war on us. The Soviets have their troops in the field, and we have not started to mobilize yet.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think we should survey the whole problem, as has been indicated, because it is a growing economic problem. The particular aspect of the problem referred to in my limitation on expenditure is an educational aspect. That is why I sought to obtain the commitment from the distinguished Senator from Alabama, who is chairman of the Labor, Health, Education, and Welfare Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am simply expressing the hope that the Senator will drive a harder bargain in terms of the general survey.

Mr. BRIDGES. I will now drive a harder bargain by asking the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] who is the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if it is his intention to go into the other aspects of the problem. I think it is.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Exactly. From the point of view we mentioned, about propaganda and otherwise, as well as the Battle Act, we intend to conduct an investigation. I also think the Senator should use his influence—and I will join with him—to inspire the Committee on Finance to go into the whole economic impact of dumping of all the things mentioned.

It is perfectly proper, of course, to handle the matter the way the agreement has been reached, but I should like to join with the Senator in seeking to get the administration in connection with the Congress to develop a legislative program to deal with the whole problem of what we call dumping.

The Committee on Foreign Relations is interested in a part of the problem, but it is not the primary committee having jurisdiction over legislation with regard to tariffs. That would be only a part of the problem.

Mr. BRIDGES. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives held some hearings last fall, which were very brief. I have not heard more about them.

Mr. BRIDGES. I remember those hearings.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have not heard anything further about that matter.

Mr. BRIDGES. I hope that as a result of this consideration in addition to immediate action on the educational phase of the matter we shall be able to approach the over-all problem, which I think the Senator from Arkansas has ably stated.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. I will say to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire that I wholeheartedly agree with his spirit and objective. Possibly an appropriate procedure would be to submit a resolution pointing up these broad problems with all their ramifications. This could be referred to the appropriate committee. Then we would have some tangible base from which to work.

Mr. BRIDGES. I thank the Senator for his excellent suggestion of a course of action which I had in mind in view of the illuminating discussion we have had.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM AND ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed that a number of Senators have dinner engagements with the chambers of commerce of their various States, which are meeting in Washington, D.C., at this time.

I have made inquiry of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], and he informs me he desires to make a brief statement. I should like to inform other Senators that at the conclusion of the statement of the Senator from Illinois we do not expect to have any yea-and-nay votes this evening, and we will soon thereafter conclude the session of the Senate for today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand adjourned until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5716), making supplemetal appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BRIDGES. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I had intended to offer tonight three amendments to the second supplemental appropriation bill, but in view of the lateness of the hour I shall not do so. I shall merely make a brief general statement. I hope I will be recognized at the conclusion of morning business tomorrow to present these amendments and discuss them.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized at the conclusion of morning business tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is a very important measure, which now carries with it appropriations of $2.8 billion. I think it is deserving of consideration by this Congress, particularly in view of the charges which the President of the United States has made that this is a Congress of wild spenders.

Before I begin a general discussion of the bill I wish to pay tribute to the members of the Committee on Appropriations and particularly to the distinguished chairman of the committee and the President pro tempore of the Senate, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. I think there are few in the Senate who fully appreciate the tremendous amount of work which is thrown upon the shoulders of members of the Committee on Appropriations. It is work which is not observed by the public, and it is commonly not appreciated, but it is vitally essential work.

I regard the Committee on Appropriations as perhaps one of the two or three most important committees of the Congress.

In this particular case the committee sat for many days and took, 1,187 pages of testimony. I notice that the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. HAYDEN] was present at virtually every meeting of the committee and questioned the witnesses in detail and with great ability. I want to pay my personal tribute to the chairman of the committee. I know it is not necessary to do so, because we all hold him in high esteem. His long record of service, both in the House and Senate, is almost unparalleled in the history of the American Republic. We all admire his energy, his public spirit and his devotion to duty, and we also admire the fact that he never seems to hold any grudges. Even though one may oppose certain items in appropriation bills, the Senator does not take any vengeance upon those who wish to knock items out of the appropriation bills. The course of true love between the Senator from Illinois and these various appropriation bills has not always run smoothly in the past, but I want to testify to the fact that if the Senator from Arizona has felt irritated he has never shown the slightest indication of that fact, and he has been most generous to and cooperative with the Senator from Illinois. I wish publicly to thank the Senator from Arizona for his personal courtesy, as well as to congratulate him upon his public service.

MONEY REPRESENTS ADMINISTRATION REQUESTS

Mr. President, this bill has various features in it which I think should be noticed. One feature is the fact that virtually every item of additional appropriations has been proposed by the administration. There were very few items which the committees of the House and Senate inserted on their own initiative. If one reads the testimony before the House committee—which, incidentally, runs to 987 pages—he will find how the bureaucrats of the present administration came down and pleaded for $2.9 billion of additional money. They did not say then that Congress consisted of "wild spenders." No. They came with their hats in their hands, begging the Congress to make additional appropriations, above and beyond those which Congress made last year. I think it should be made perfectly clear that this is an additional administration budget request which the President and the Bureau of the Budget have sent down to us; and if there is wild spending in it—and I think there is some—it comes from the administration, and not from the Congress.

ADMINISTRATION REQUESTED HOUSE CUTS BE RESTORED

I wish to thank the Committees on Appropriations of both the House and Senate for the way they tried to cure the wild spending of the administration. The House committee cut the President's budget, as submitted, by $243 million. Then the bureaucrats of this administration descended on the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and, for 1,187 pages, they demanded that the cuts made by the House should be restored, with only one or two exceptions. So here we have almost 2,200 pages of testimony from the Eisenhower administration, demanding $2.9 billion.

As is the custom of the Senate committee, the committee increased the appropriations of the House. Some wag has said that that is why the Senate is called the upper body—because it always "ups" the House appropriation. The kind hearts of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and his colleagues are such that at the request of the administration they restored about two-thirds of the cuts. About $163 million of the cuts was restored, and recently, on the floor of the Senate, we restored $23 million more, without, I may add, the affirmative vote of the Senator from Illinois.

CONGRESS CUT FUNDS

But even so, the Senate committee had recommended a total cut of a little more than $80 million, up until a few minutes ago. Now the restoration of $23 million for the Philippines on the floor of the Senate reduces the total cut to $57 million. But even so, this is a $57 million cut which Congress has made in the President's budget. We are not the wild spenders. We are trying to introduce economy in the estimates of the President. I hope before we are through we may make more cuts.

It is not the purpose of the Senator from Illinois to make war upon the Appropriations Committee. This is not a question of the Members of the Senate versus the Appropriations Committee. This is rather a case of the people of the United States versus the bureaucrats of the Eisenhower administration. I believe our good friends on the Appropriations Committee would be helped in the future if they could tell the bureaucrats that they are likely to run into opposition on the floor of the Senate if the bureaucrats make excessive demands. They can say, "We would like to do this, but there are those who will question your requests on the floor of the Senate. Therefore we think you should scale them down."

So what we are really trying to do is to bring reinforcements to the great chairman of the Senate Committee on Appropriations—to bring battalions in behind him, so that he and his colleagues will not be the sole persons standing between the taxeaters and the American public.

EXTRA MONEY IN 1959 IN ORDER FOR 1960 BUDGET TO SHOW A PAPER SURPLUS

There are certain specific features of the bill which, to my mind, are subject to very serious question. In the first place, there is in certain instances an attempt on the part of the administration to charge to the 1958–59 budget items which should be transferred to the 1959–60 budget. This, I think, is a part of the general budget policy of the Eisenhower administration—to make the deficit for 1958–59 as big as possible, and then blame this on the Democratic Congress, in order that the deficit for 1959–60 may be as little as possible, or even nonexistent, and then take credit for the Eisenhower administration for the apparent improvement in the fiscal solvency of the Government. There are traces of that tendency in this budget, upon which I shall elaborate tomorrow.

ADMINISTRATION ASKS FOR BACK-DOOR FINANCING

There is also another tendency, namely, to indulge in back-door financing, which the administration has attacked and has said is a characteristic of the Democratic Congress. And by back-door financing I mean both the authorization of direct expenditures by the Treasury without an appropriation and the authorization of spending from funds which were originally appropriated for other purposes or which the Government has received from the sale of such things as surplus property and which would otherwise be treated as receipts to the Treasury.

For example, various Department of Agriculture funds listed on page 41 of the report seem to be clearly cases of back-door financing; also of a similar nature is the increase in the limitation for ship construction subsidies; various funds for the District of Columbia; requests for civil defense; funds for social security; funds for the Railroad Retirement Board, the judiciary, the Post Office Department, and other agencies.

Is it not somewhat inconsistent for the administration to complain about backdoor financing when, at the same time, in many cases in this budget, they have themselves requested such backdoor financing?

Passing to specific items in the budget, there are three or four items with respect to which I am tempted to offer amendments. If I have success with the first one or two, we can then venture farther out on the ice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Has the Senator sent his amendments to the desk?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will send them to the desk and ask that they be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator be prepared to pursue those amendments at the conclusion of the morning hour tomorrow?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I will finish shortly for I do not want to hold any Senator back from his dinner.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is the Senator aware that the Senate is to meet at 11 a.m. tomorrow?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Morning business should be concluded about 11:30 or a quarter of 12.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be prepared.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How long does the Senator expect to speak this afternoon?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Illinois thinks he can conclude in about 5 or 6 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator.

FUNDS FOR SURPLUS DISPOSAL

Mr. DOUGLAS. One item which I think we should scrutinize very carefully is the release of $5 million for the Department of Defense.

One of the great sources of waste is the way in which the Department of Defense handles its waste disposal. Last year it sold about $6 billion worth of property for only about $200 million. The cost of selling this property amounted to about $50 million. So the net was only $150 million, on property originally costing $6 billion. In other words, the Department of Defense realized only 2½ cents on every dollar. At the same time, in many instances, either identical articles or substantially similar articles were being purchased for the military services at 100 cents on the dollar. This is one of the big sources of waste, and one of the most fertile fields for practicing economy. It needs thorough probing.

The Department of Defense is asking that, in addition to the $49 million which it is allowed to withhold from the proceeds of these sales, it be given an additional $5 million; in other words, that additional expenses of the sales be met out of the proceeds of the scrap.

I think this is a bad policy. It is another form of backdoor financing. Furthermore, in the case of surplus property, there is always the danger that the agency will sell additional property, property which should not be sold as surplus, merely for the purpose of enlarging their own funds and building a greater bureaucracy and for their own aggrandizement.

Finally, I believe we shoud carry out the original intent of Public Law 152 of the 81st Congress—the General Services Act—and have surplus property of the Defense Department sold, not by the Defense Department, but by the General Services Administration.

NEW SENATE OFFICE BUILDING

I should like to come closer to home on two items approved in connection with the New Senate Office Building, a project which I opposed when it was originally introduced, and which I believe needs close scrutiny. I wish to commend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] for the very thorough cross-examination he gave the Architect of the Capitol in the Committee on Appropriations. I invite every Senator to read the testimony of Mr. Stewart and the questions asked by Senator ELLENDER, beginning on page 1161 of the hearings and going through to page 1186.

INCREASE OF $10 MILLION

When the new building was authorized, the promise was made that the cost would be only $20,600,000. We have, however, now authorized for building and equipment $23,446,000. Thus we have authorized already over $2,800,000 more than the original estimate. The result has been a building which, to put it mildly, is not distinguished either for beauty or for convenience.

In addition to that, we have spent on the cost of the land for the building $1,011,000. We have also authorized an expenditure of a million dollars for furniture. We have made that appropriation. So that the building to date has cost $25,500,000.

Now the Architect of the Capitol is asking, and the Senate committee has granted, additional requests of approximately as follows:

Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for changes in the building itself. That would raise the total cost of the building to $24,196,000.

The Architect has asked for $293,000 for additional furniture. The committee has granted $283,000. This, if approved, would bring the total cost of furniture to almost $1,300,000.

The Architect has asked for $4 million for an additional subway terminal and to dismantle and replace the steps of the Senate wing of the Capitol. The cost of this additive subway to date has been at least $2.1 million and apparently another $246,000 on top of that, so the Architect is really asking us to pay $6,346,000 for the new subway and its fixings. If all these items are approved, the cost will be $30,500,000 for the new office building, whereas the original estimate and promise were $20,600,000.

I wish to argue these points in detail, but before I do so I wish to say that I do not believe the slightest blame is attached to the members of the Committee on Appropriations for this situation. They are burdened with many tasks and commonly are confronted with accomplished facts.

ARCHITECT APPOINTED BY PRESIDENT

The Architect of the Capitol, is appointed by the President, and is not chosen by Congress or by an agent of Congress, but rather appointed by the President without the confirmation of the House and Senate. The present occupant of that position was appointed by President Eisenhower in 1954, and he is outside the control of Congress. He is trying to get us to embark on a vast and costly building program.

We see the results of his building all about us: A third House Office Building across the way; the tasteless extension of the east front of the Capitol for $17 million; the New Senate Office Building, to cost $30½ million to date; and with great plans for the future, such as the extension of the House wing of the Capitol, and an underground garage.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] was correct when he said to the Architect of the Capitol, "I have never seen an architect who found more things to do than Mr. Stewart. It is unending."

That is the situation we find.

The other day I was reading the poetry of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, that celebrated Maine and national poet, and as I read some lines suggested themselves to me. They are not very great poetry. Probably I am as poor in the field of poetry as the new office building is in the field of architecture. However, I shall recite it:

Architect, spare our Capitol,
Touch not another stone.
In youth it shielded our Republic.
Oh, please, let it alone.

[Laughter.]

USE OLD FURNITURE

There is one item in particular which I wish to discuss; namely, the furniture The request is for $283,000 for new furniture; $113,000 of that is for desks, chairs, and tables, and so forth, for 40 offices. We have already appropriated a million. But now they want $283,000 more.

As we come over to the Capitol we go through corridors in the Old Senate Office Building filled with furniture which has been discarded from offices in the old building. It is piled out in the corridors. Yet it is proposed to equip with new furniture 40 offices in the new building. I had a census taken. I sent a member of my staff through all the floors, on all four sides and on all four floors, and even up into the attic, of the Old Senate Office Building, and this is the count: There are, in the Old Senate Office Building, old desks ready to be used, to the number of 375, 215 steel filing cabinets, 400 chairs, and lots of bookcases.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator missed one chair, because I got it. I had it brought into my office. That is one of the discarded chairs the Senator has referred to. I got that for my own personal use. I have never had such a comfortable chair in the 15 years I have been in the Senate. It is a wonderful chair. Therefore, the Senator from Illinois does not have that chair included in his figures.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish the Architect of the Capitol would follow the example of the senior Senator from Oregon and move into those 40 offices some of the old furniture—comfortable, costless furniture—instead of spending $113,000 for new furniture.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. When I was in the Old Office Building——

Mr. MORSE. Did the Senator move?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; I moved. When I was in the Old Office Building my chair was one of those rickety chairs which would not work. While I was at Bethesda with an ailing back, the doctor told me I had to get a different chair. So I bought a chair for myself. I hope I will not be charged rent for using that chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator from Minnesota will go through the corridors and pick out a good chair and take it into his office.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to remark that this is the first time I heard that the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota has ever sat down. [Laughter.]

CARPETS NOT NEEDED

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is another appropriation of $150,000 for carpets in 207 offices. At present, each Senator's own room in the New Senate Office Building is carpeted. But the Architect of the Capitol laid rubber tiling in the other offices in each Senator's suite. Now the Architect wants to place carpeting over those tiles at a cost of $750 a room.

If we read the testimony, we learn why he wants to lay carpets. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] put him over the hurdles. On page 1172 of the hearings, Senators will find the Architect's reasons for wanting the carpets.

First, he said the electric typewriters make so much noise it is necessary to lay carpets to deaden the sound, despite the fact that there is already good insulation in the ceilings and walls. Second, he said it was dangerous for the clerks to walk on rubber tiles; that they might slip and break their legs; therefore, we must spend $150,000 for carpeting.

Mr. President, I have walked on the equivalent of rubber tiles. It never struck me as a dangerous occupational hazard. I am ready, however, to make this offer. I do not have much money, but I am ready to buy rubber heels for every clerk in every senatorial office in the New Senate Office Building. If Senators will give me the foot measurements of their employees, I will see to it that they get rubber heels, for men and women alike. If I can buy them at wholesale price, it will not be too expensive. This, I think, will save $150,000 for carpeting.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. How many girls does the Senator from Illinois think he can get to wear rubber heels, either in the New Senate Office Building or the Old Senate Office Building?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Well, if it is a case of preventing legs from being broken, I feel certain they would wear rubber heels at least during working hours. In any event, this is a good way to save $150,000. There is in fact no real danger to justify such an expenditure.

EXCESSIVE COSTS FOR SUBWAY TERMINAL

The final item is the subway. Already, $2,100,000 plus $246,000 has been spent on the subway—see hearings, page 1163. I walked through it this morning. Now it is proposed to spend $4 million more. This will be almost the most expensive subway in the history of the United States. The catacombs of Rome, in which the Christians sought refuge, will not compare with this subway.

I shall discuss the architecture of the subway later. I shall make this comment now, and I ask Senators to read it in the RECORD tomorrow morning. I had assumed that the new subway would run into the present subway, and that the two would have a joint terminal together. But on my walk through the subway this morning, I found that that is not the case. The new subway is to be completely separate. A new spur from the rotunda is to run into it or vice versa. I do not know what will happen to the old subway, but the rumor is that it is to be closed and possibly used as a storage space. I do not know how much that subway cost originally.

It seems to me that a tremendous architectural blunder has been made by the Architect of the Capitol in virtually confronting us with an architectural accomplished fact, in which the end of the new subway is directly opposite the Senate steps and does not connect at its terminus with the old subway. I think the basis is being laid for tearing down—in fact, this is a part of the plan—the Senate steps and stairs and building the terminal almost directly by the elevator. For what purpose? I do not know for what purpose.

One argument, though, is that it will save steps for Senators which they otherwise would have to take in coming from the terminus of the present subway to the elevator. I took note of the number of steps and counted them. They came to 50. At a cost of $4 million, that is $80,000 a step. That is too costly.

One great trouble with being a Senator is that we do not get enough exercise anyway. I think walking 50 steps, going and coming, would be excellent for us. I would value the exercise very highly. But we are to spend $80,000 to save a Senator a step.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am in so complete agreement with the Senator from Illinois that I would not want to put in a dissident note about the matter of Senators not getting enough exercise. If the Senator is looking for exercise, I am looking for free labor on my farm.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not a very good farm laborer, although I worked on a farm years ago.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I will try to knock out the $283,000 appropriation for furniture. I will try to knock out the $4 million appropriation for a subway. I will try to knock out the $5 million for the sale of surplus stock. This is a chance to save the taxpayers between $9 and $10 million and to back up the Committee on Appropriations, which has done heroic work in resisting the efforts of bureaucrats.

While I have nothing against Mr. Stewart, again I wish to remind the Senate that he is not a creature of Congress; he is an appointee of the President and is not confirmed by the Congress. The present incumbent of that office was appointed by President Eisenhower and holds his position at the pleasure of the President. The responsibility is the President's.

So on this bill I think we should show our confidence in the Committee on Appropriations by giving them sufficient force and moral reinforcement so that they can resist more effectively the blandishments of the administration's bureaucracy.

I shall return to this subject tomorrow morning in greater detail, but what I have said so far is enough to lay the basis for the argument.

FEDERAL GRANTS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF SEWAGE-TREATMENT WORKS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have received from the Governor of my State a letter which I wish to read and then comment upon it. It is dated April 22, 1959:

STATE OF OREGON,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Salem, Oreg., April 22, 1959.

The Honorable WAYNE L. MORSE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MORSE: I am sincerely concerned over the proposed reduction in appropriations for Federal grants for the construction of sewage-treatment works during the 1959–60 fiscal year. Funds authorized under the provisions of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act have proven most helpful to the stream-purification program in Oregon by providing an incentive for many communities to undertake the construction of remedial works needed to abate pollution of public waters. A number of these communities such as Cannon Beach, Drain, Fairview, Government Camp, Pilot Rock, Rainier, Tigard, and Weston would have found it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to finance their sewerage projects without the assistance of a Federal grant.

During the 3 fiscal years (1957–59) that funds have been available for construction grants in Oregon, 23 projects have been undertaken at a total cost of approximately $7,700,000; the Federal share of this cost was approximately $1,400,000. Awaiting to be allocated is an additional $560,000 for projects estimated to cost $4,900,000.

Our needs for the next 3 fiscal years beginning with 1960 are for 48 projects having a total cost of over $14 million with the Federal share being approximately $3 million. This matter was discussed at the last meeting of the committee on natural resources on April 16, and that committee recommended the continuation of Federal grants for the construction of sewage-treatment works with the full amount of appropriations authorized under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act.

I urge you to take such measures as you may deem appropriate to assure that appropriations are made to the full extent authorized by law so that the construction grant program can be continued and the backlog of needed sewage-treatment-work projects can be reduced.

Sincerely,

MARK O. HATFIELD,
Governor.

Mr. President, that letter was dated April 22, 1959. On April 16, 1959, I broadcast in the State of Oregon my weekly radio address. My guest on that broadcast was the Honorable JOHN BLATNIK, a distinguished Representative from Minnesota, the State of the present Presiding Officer of the Senate [Mr. MCCARTHY]. Representative BLATNIK really must be recognized, I believe, as probably the leader in the entire Congress in the great work he is doing in trying to develop a program which will save, for future generations, water resources of the country from the stream pollution caused by this generation. In that broadcast on April 16 to the State of Oregon, Representative BLATNIK and I discussed the failure of the Eisenhower administration in its budget proposals this year to recommend a reasonable amount of money—only a reasonable amount, Mr. President—to continue the great pollution control program, of which Representative BLATNIK, on the House side, has been such an outstanding leader; and on this side the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] and others of us have, over the years, tried to have an adequate pollution control program carried out.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD our radio broadcast of April 16, which was written 6 days before the Governor of Oregon wrote to me the letter in which he urged some of the very things which Representative BLATNIK and I proposed in our radio broadcast.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIO BROADCAST, APRIL 16, 1959—SENATOR WAYNE MORSE AND CONGRESSMAN JOHN BLATNIK

POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. MORSE. Fellow Oregonians, today I'm going to devote this broadcast to a subject that means a great deal to our State of Oregon, the subject of controlling the pollution of our invaluable water resource. I have invited as my guest the man who is the unquestioned leader in the entire Congress in the development of a national program for control of water pollution. He's a great liberal. He is Congressman JOHN BLATNIK, a Democrat from Minnesota. Congressman BLATNIK represents the so-called arrowhead district of Minnesota. In it are located the famous Iron Range of Minnesota and the beautiful and rugged northern shoreline of Lake Superior, a coast which I think is exceeded in beauty only by Oregon's seacoast but, of course, I'm sure that JOHN will not even completely agree with me on that out of Minnesota pride. JOHN, the people in your region have a similar interest in controlling pollution of water as the people of Oregon have, I'm sure, and I want you to know that I'm delighted to have you as my guest and close personal friend to talk to the people of Oregon on this program about our water pollution problems.

Mr. BLATNIK. Well, Senator, believe me, it's certainly a privilege to be with you on a program speaking to the citizens and your friends in your great State of Oregon but personally it's a real pleasure. Believe me, we always have quite a substantial claim on you back in Minnesota. We haven't relinquished all claim or title to you, Senator.

Mr. MORSE. Well, JOHN, my 4 years in Minnesota from 1924 to 1928 were a great pleasure when I taught at the University of Minnesota.

Mr. BLATNIK. And just as you know our State well and I appreciate the very generous, and I know, sincere comments you made about our great northeastern part of Minnesota, the arrowhead district—my district where I was born and raised—likewise I've had occasion, as have many of our folks from Minnesota, not only to visit Oregon but many of our earlier people moved there and are now your citizens. My sister, for example, has been living in Portland for about the last 18 years and I have been in your State several times.

On conservation, and, in this particular case, on water preservation and utilization, of course, we're very conscious of the importance of it coming from the land of 10,000 lakes. What startled us in Minnesota was that we, as I'm sure most of the people of America, because of the abundance we had, just took it for granted. We thought it would be here forever. It's one of the simplest, most abundant, easiest of commodities to get. And what has happened with this rapid population increase throughout the country, especially in just the last 50 years, we find that not only are there more people in this country who use the water, but more people are using more water per person. For example, in just the last few years from 1950 until now, the population increased by around 12 percent, but the water used increased by over 57 percent. In short, the use of the water is increasing five times faster than the population itself so the result is that in the entire history of America, we are dumping more dirty water back into the streams and rivers and the water is becoming more polluted and filthier and we are now headed for a crisis where it's just going to be a problem where we can't get enough adequate clear water both for our human consumption and for the nominal demand in the industrial area.

Mr. MORSE. JOHN, the bill that you have authored that is now the law has made a very great contribution, I think, to the health welfare of the American people and to the welfare of the American people in connection with other uses of water as well, and in Oregon we're very much interested in the principle of multiple use of our water. That implies, of course, reuse of water and pollution control as set forth in your bill is vital to water reuse. No State has a greater interest I think than Oregon in the proper treatment of waste. Without it, our recreation and fishing industries cannot be maintained, much less be expanded. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the work that you are doing in the Congress. I would like to give this Oregon audience some specific details about our State need for sewage treatment facilities provided for in the law that you have authored. Under your law, Public Law 660, the Water Pollution Act of 1956, the Federal Government is authorized to extend grants of money up to 30 percent of the cost of a given project for construction of sewage disposal plants by cities. Fifty million dollars is authorized in this law. The State sanitary agencies determine which localities in their respective States are in the greatest need for this Federal help. Is that a pretty fair summary of what you had in mind and what you put in your law when you authored it, JOHN?

Mr. BLATNIK. Yes, that's a very correct summary. Again, while I appreciate the very generous comments you made on my part in this act, Senator, I want your people to know, and not only in your State but all over America, as I told them back in our great midwest part of the country, that you have been not only the pillar of support, but the spearhead of the drive for an adequate water pollution control measure and few people realize that we barely got it through 3 years ago by the skin of the teeth and this is the first time in the history of the country that an all-out effort, of a joint effort—Federal, State, and local participation—in a combined effort to handle this pollution abatement program got under way. I thank you for the splendid and active support and help you have given us.

Mr. MORSE. All I did, JOHN, was follow your lead in the Senate. You laid out the facts in the House and I was glad to sponsor your point of view in the Senate. Well, unfortunately, the President has recommended in his budget the appropriation of only $20 million instead of the full $50 million for water pollution control. Now Oregon's share of the $50 million would be $650,000 if we got the full amount. Our share of Ike's $20 million is only $265,000. Yet our sanitary authority which supplied me with the figures I am using on this broadcast lists projects in 12 Oregon communities that need this Federal assistance for which the Federal share, if it were available in full, would be over $1 million. So what the President is recommending is only about a quarter of what our Oregon State Sanitary Authority finds is needed for Oregon in this next year. Only a quarter of these approved applications from such Oregon communities as Ashland, Brookings, Estacada, Eugene, Hood River, LaGrande, Lakeview, Oak Lodge, Ontario, Portland, Prineville, and The Dalles could be built. And, of course, JOHN, I'm fighting here in the Senate for the full amount. The rest would have to be postponed under the administration's proposal although the sanitary authority finds 12 more projects on its list for the following year and expects 24 applications for the year after that. Now that's what we're up against as far as the budgetary problem is concerned and I wondered if that was similar in other parts of the country.

Mr. BLATNIK. That is just exactly what is happening throughout the country, Senator. When we first proposed the Water Pollution Act in 1956, we, at that time on the basis of estimates worked up by the water resources people, the conservation offices of all the States and the health offices estimated that it would take about $100 million a year of Federal funds combined with local funds in a ratio of almost 4½ to 1 to spend on an average of $500 million and $600 million a year. That was our original estimate. That was my original bill but in the House, with almost unanimous Republican opposition to it and the relentless opposition of the administration to the program, they cut it in one-half so we got $50 million. But we settled for a half and we walked and hopped on one leg for the last 2½ years and we showed that for the first time in the history of America, we have spent more for water pollution control facilities than ever before but the job is only being half done. Your State of Oregon getting $625,000 should be getting $1,250,000 a year to do the job and to catch up on the backlog you have now on the books.

Mr. MORSE. You see, JOHN, what I tried to get across to the Senate is to get my colleagues to see that you are not saving money under this so-called balanced budget propaganda that is going on now if you save pennies at the expense of pound value because one epidemic, one great sickness hitting a community as the result of water pollution, of course, would cost much more, if it only cost us the lives of a few children, than the few hundreds of thousands of dollars that you and I are fighting for in water pollution control. May I say that in Oregon, the State sanitary authority has estimated that over 100 communities in my State will need new or improved sewage treatment facilities in the next 10 years. The total cost will run from $30 million to $50 million. Half of these communities do not now have either sewage collection or sewage disposal facilities. That's just in my State. You are working on a new bill to expand the existing program, a bill which I very much favor and I wish you would tell the Oregon audience something about your new bill and you have my assurance, JOHN, that I will fight shoulder to shoulder with you again in support of that bill.

Mr. BLATNIK. Well, we certainly appreciate that because that is not only an assurance, because knowing you as we do from past experience in working together, your assurance means real active participation which means an all-out fight which you always wage so effectively. As you said, there is no economy in saving on water. There is no way under God's thumb, in which you can avoid the pollution problem or you can delay it; hold back and it piles up and piles up and sooner or later the day of reckoning comes where not only the great expense and the cost of the polluted water, but you have to come through with a so-called crash program. It seems like so many votes in Washington wait and wait until an emergency is on them and then there is a crash program. We know precisely what we have been doing with $50 million a year and we know it will take $100 million of Federal funds joined by about approximately $400 million of local funds. The local municipalities are bearing the major share of the job.

Mr. MORSE. 70 percent of it.

Mr. BLATNIK. The Federal Government is already working with them and stimulating and aggravating them in this whole program so our bill will raise the amount, it will double all the amounts for the States. It will catch up on most of the backlog. It is the minimum to provide and build a sound foundation for an all-out water pollution control program that will finally keep us abreast of this ever-growing problem—getting an adequate source of pure and clean water.

Mr. MORSE. Well, JOHN, I want to thank you very much for appearing on this program with me. I want to say to the people of Oregon, you have heard on the program with me Congressman JOHN BLATNIK, of Minnesota, the author of the water pollution law as it is now in the books and the proposer of a new law that will double the amount for the cleaning of the streams of America and how sorely we need this program. Right here in the Capitol of the Nation, we have the Potomac River and the Potomac River running through your National Capitol is the filthiest river in the world for a river of its size—12 feet of sewage sludge in some parts of that river. The result is there can be no swimming in the river, signs all over "Wading Forbidden" in the Capital City of the United States and likewise let me say you don't even dare go out on a boat in the Potomac without running the risk to your health because even the spray from the water may result in your picking up some infection. And JOHN BLATNIK is our leader in trying to bring to an end this sorry condition of a great democracy having within it many polluted rivers and I'm proud, JOHN, to have you on the program with me.

This is WAYNE MORSE reporting from Washington, D.C. Until next week, same time, same station, I bid you goodby. Thank you very much, JOHN.

Mr. BLATNIK. Thank you, Senator MORSE.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am answering the Governor of Oregon; and in that answer I shall assure him that on this one issue we stand shoulder to shoulder. I will do all I can, here in the Congress, to help him; and, in reciprocity, I want him to do all he can to help me with the White House. So in my letter I shall suggest to him that—appreciative as I am that he has called my attention to this matter—I have been way ahead of him and for some time have been calling it to the attention of the Congress. Now if the Governor will just help call it to the attention of the President—because, Mr. President, in our service in the Senate we develop intuitive hunches, and I have a feeling that he will have more influence with President Eisenhower than I do—and if the Governor will cooperate with me, as I shall cooperate with him, here in the Congress, by getting in touch with the White House and by pointing out to the White House as clearly as he pointed out to me, in his letter, what a shortsighted policy the White House is following in regard to pollution control, then the Governor of Oregon and I will be a team working together for the benefit of our State.

NATIONAL FUELS POLICY: COAL IS NEEDED

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, last night a most significant event was held in Washington. It was a dinner given by the National Coal Policy Conference, an organization formed to advance the interests of the bituminous coal industry. The conference includes coal producers, the United Mine Workers of America, the coal-carrying railroads, coal equipment manufacturers, and utility companies which burn coal.

This dinner, attended by many Senators and Representatives, had as its theme the need for a national fuels policy. The chairman, George H. Love, of Pittsburgh, said that such a policy should be arrived at after a congressional study. The reasons advanced for a national fuels policy which would deal with our energy resources as a whole were impressive.

Among the speakers was John L. Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers of America, a distinguished American and a dedicated labor leader. Not long ago, Mr. Lewis was reported to be seriously ill. But last night he showed all his old-time vigor. He declared there is imperative need for a comprehensive and constructive fuels policy, and he said with emphasis.

The logic with which Mr. Love, who is chairman of the board of the Consolidation Coal Co., presented his arguments was splendid. Increasing use of energy, he said, is a key to progress and, in the end, is the one way to win the world race against Communism.

Then he said:

> That being true, every country with which I am familiar feels it is almost the prime purpose of Government to have a national policy toward energy and toward the sources of such energy.
> This, fundamentally, is the reason for this meeting tonight. We believe that this Nation must establish a national fuels policy and do it at the earliest date. We are fortunate enough to have in varying amounts all the major sources of such energy. Therefore, we need a national policy more than any other nation does, because we must balance the use of these fuels with their varying reserves, so that each makes the greatest possible contribution to the national welfare.

Mr. Love discussed quite frankly the unfair competition which bituminous coal has had from residual oil. He pointed out how ridiculous it is to say that the ban recently promulgated on imports of residual oil injures the homeowner along the Eastern seaboard. Residual oil, he explained, is not used for home heating.

He said that when natural gas is available on an economic basis, it is a perfect household fuel. He indicated the belief that natural gas reserves are limited.

The interest of the railroads in a national fuels policy was clearly stated by Howard E. Simpson, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. He said:

> The failure to establish a well-reasoned, all-inclusive fuels policy will seriously affect the ability of the railroads to serve all segments of the economy. The Nation's railroads have available for coal traffic a fleet of over 500,000 hopper cars, and an investment of over $3 billion in equipment and facilities used primarily for the movement of coal. Beyond this, practically every portion of the rest of the overall plant is used in part for coal handling.
> As an example, the Baltimore & Ohio owns 48,000 hopper cars, and has invested more than $300 million in cars, locomotives, and fixed plant used almost exclusively for coal traffic, which contributes 30 percent of our freight revenues. On some roads the relative importance of revenues from coal is even greater—as much as 70 percent.
>
> It is clear that a progressive drying up of coal's share of the fuel market will seriously affect railroad plant. Cars, locomotives, and tracks supported primarily by coal traffic don't stand idle indefinitely until they are suddenly needed again. Lost also would be a substantial portion of more than 800,000 skilled railroaders now at your service. Business concerns like railroads are forced to scrap excess facilities. No self-supporting enterprise can afford to maintain standby service.
> The fuels issue is not a simple fact of open competition for a market. If it were, we wouldn't be here tonight. The issue, as I see it, is this: Is the present policy assuring this country a steady supply of fuels and transportation service susceptible of rapid growth and expansion and able to serve without interruption in a time of national emergency?
> Certainly, the coal industry adequately passes these tests. It is a stable domestic enterprise, and is capable of immense expansion in time of need, provided it does not have to contend with further shrinking of its market. The railroads pass the same tests with a wide margin. Like coal, they are a reliable domestic industry. Furthermore, railroad charges are regulated by public authority. Granted fair and equitable government policies for transportation, the railroads can absorb striking increases in traffic volume.
> Continued shrinking in the market for solid fuels will seriously affect the ability of the railroads to move coal, and it will also force a contraction of the overall plant, thereby making the rail industry less able to serve the entire traffic needs of the country.

Another thoughtful and stimulating speech was made by Philip Sporn, of New York, president of the American Electric Power Co. Mr. Sporn is one of the best informed men on energy and energy uses in this country.

He pointed out the difficulties which the bituminous coal industry has had in recent years. He stated that as recently as 1947, coal still provided about 50 percent of the country's energy supply. In 1958, however, coal supplied less than 25 percent of the Nation's energy, while oil and gas supplied over 70 percent. Coal production, he added, last year was more than 200 million tons below the record production in the year 1947.

Mr. Sporn emphasized the point that some persons were prepared to write off the bituminous coal industry; but he predicted that the rapidly rising demand for energy in the years ahead would also be marked by increases in coal consumption.

Mr. Sporn then said:

> There are those who mistakenly believe that the future increases in total energy utilization, and even more rapid increases in electric energy use will be met by nuclear power. I have studied this question very carefully, and have come to the conclusion that on the whole this is a mistaken oversimplification. Specifically, it fails to recognize coal's important position in the period of the next 20 years, and even as far ahead as the year 2000.
>
> In my judgment, nuclear power will, by the year 1975, provide no more than the equivalent of 50 million tons of coal for electric power generation. Further, this will constitute virtually the entire nuclear contribution to our energy supply. Coal, on the other hand, will have to supply 475 million tons for electric generation alone, and as much as another 425 million tons for metallurgical and other uses. This represents well over a doubling of present coal production, and 50 percent more coal than the peak production achieved by the coal industry in 1947.
> This optimistic picture of the potential growth and prosperity of the coal industry has led some people to look upon the coal industry's present problems with some complacency. They forget that if the coal industry is to be the strong, vital, efficient supplier of one-third of this country's growing energy requirements 40 years from now, it must first solve its present problems of growing up and living, so as to survive what currently is a near crisis in its economic condition. If coal is to successfully play its indispensable role in the future—a role without which the welfare and even the defense of this country cannot be assured—then coal must have markets, production, earnings, and employment for its skilled work force in the present—right now.
> But this requires a reorientation of policy vis-a-vis coal and the coal industry. This requires that everyone—not just the people in the coal industry itself, and even Government, but also the major users, including the utility industry, for example, which has such a large stake in the continued availability of adequate and economical sources of raw energy to be utilized for conversion into electrical energy, and including literally everyone else interested in the welfare and safety of the United States—must be concerned with the present state of the coal industry's health and with finding the means necessary to assure its vigorous survival.

Mr. Lewis, in speaking for the United Mine Workers of America, declared that he was in complete agreement with the statements made by the three speakers who preceded him—Mr. Love, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. Sporn.

The problems of bituminous coal and related industries, said Mr. Lewis, involve the very stability of our entire national economy and security; and he added that the growth of coal and related industries represents the development of the private enterprise system.

I agree with Mr. Lewis in his further statement that our system—the free enterprise system, capitalism, investment for profit, and reward for incentive—is on trial throughout the whole world. As Mr. Lewis pointed out, coal is a private enterprise industry which wants no Federal subsidies, but does want fair treatment. His additional remark in this connection—namely, that he was sorry to say that our Government has failed to provide coal with an opportunity equal to that provided the competing extracted minerals—is one which has considerable substance. And I know that the president of the United Mine Workers of America was speaking with authority and meaningfulness when he closed with the comment that he was happy to have been given the opportunity to direct public attention to consideration of the weighty problem of the overall coal industry and related industries.

Mr. President, I believe all will agree that at present there is no national fuels policy which takes into account all energy sources and attempts to deal with them on a fair and equitable basis.

It seems to me that we should agree there is need for such a policy. Many hearings and studies in the past have arrived at this conclusion. The distinguished senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], conducted one such inquiry in the early 1950's. Yet, today we are far from an adequate and equitable fuels policy; and I believe the able Senator from Wyoming and other Senators will agree with this observation.

The bituminous coal industry, upon which the Nation must depend so much for energy, has languished as a result.

There is too much unemployment in the coal areas of the State I am privileged to represent, as well as in other States.

It is time we end the discrimination which has been harmful to the coal industry. It is necessary to treat this vital industry more fairly. It is imperative that the Congress turn its attention to the need to arrive at a national fuels policy which will be in the interest of the country as a whole.

INFLATION SHOULD NOT BE ATTRIBUTED TO ADMINISTERED PRICES

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the repeated efforts by some economists to identify monopoly prices with so-called administered prices are a disservice to those who seek to determine the true causes of inflation in our economy.

Administered prices, as defined by Dr. Gardiner C. Means, the originator of this term, are merely prices which are announced by someone and maintained for a period of time.

They are described in the "Dictionary of Economics," by Sloan and Zurcher, as a predetermined price.

While Dr. Means has taken great pains to state that administered prices should not be confused with monopoly prices, there is a continued tendency on the part of some economists to make these terms synonymous.

The April 13 issue of Barron's contained an excellent discussion of this problem in a letter to the editor by Dr. Reuben E. Slesinger, professor of economics at the University of Pittsburgh. I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Slesinger's letter, supporting a statement I made on this subject on March 23, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADMINISTERED PRICES

To the EDITOR:

Considerable attention has been given recently to the distinction between market and administered prices. The term, administered price, has been misused and frequently misinterpreted. To begin with, an unfortunate connotation arises that administered prices are not the result of a market determination. This is an impossibility. No price can exist unless various market forces of demand and supply interact. Hence, all prices are market prices.

But it is well known that in the price-determining processes the forces of demand and supply are not always of equal import. Whenever either buyer or seller can exert an influence out of proportion to the other, an administered price results. Thus, all prices are market prices, but some represent more administered influence than others.

Just what is an "administered price"? The "Dictionary of Economics" by Sloan & Zurcher, refers to it as a "predetermined price," arrived at from a calculation of costs and desired profits, from a fairly accurate knowledge of the total quantity of goods likely to be offered, and from an estimate of the probable sales volume at the predetermined price. The process of establishing a price does not fall within the realm of either pure competition or monopoly, but combines elements derived from both. The administered price lies between the automatic price, which is arrived at by the free interplay of supply and demand, and the authoritarian price, which is set by a central authority with no regard to market forces.

The automatic price is found in purely competitive markets. It is found in the U.S. economy only rarely and only approximately. The authoritarian price exists in a planned society, such as strict state socialism or communism. It also exists in the American economy to a certain extent and generally is incompatible with the free enterprise system, except in a few special cases, such as regulated industries. The area between these two extremes, the area of administered prices, is a very broad one. Professor Backman's study of the wholesale price index compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics has disclosed that over 89 percent of the prices represented therein fall into the administered category.

Administered prices may be set in numerout ways—by management as an announced price for a ton of steel, by government as the price for carrying a letter, by public utilities, or by direct control of government over private industry prices.

Administered pricing is not characteristic of industrial markets only. Most retail prices move little; many are administered. Wages, interest, and rents are typical examples of administered prices, and they show a minimum of change for long periods of time.

It now becomes obvious that almost all of American enterprises have some sort of administered prices. The crux of the matter lies in the degree to which the market forces are considered and the degree of power that can be exerted by the administrator. Of particular importance is demand, which will determine the volume of goods sold at the administered price. If the demand for the particular goods is relatively elastic, or sensitive to price, then the administrator's power to determine total revenue will be smaller. If demand is relatively inelastic, then his power becomes significantly greater and may conflict with numerous regulations, such as the antitrust statutes. Thus, it is not the administered price, per se, that is in violation, but only that area of administered prices that tends toward the authoritarian.

The question of the flexibility of administered prices arises. This is measured by the degree to which they respond to market forces that are responsible for price changes. Certainly we have both flexible and inflexible administered prices, but only the inflexible tend to exert restrictive repercussions. An inflexible price generally indicates a high degree of power on the part of the price administrator and a relatively inelastic demand for the product.

A recent study of the Bureau of Labor Statistics throws further light on the degree of inflexibility of prices, especially the components of the wholesale price index. Of 1,789 commodities studied, 95 remained unchanged in price during a 36-month period. About two-thirds of the items showed price changes in less than one-fourth of the monthly comparisons. Only 50 items changed in price each month.

At this point, it becomes clear that the term "administered price" is not so much a description as it is an explanation of the principal method of pricing in the American economy.

It is fair now to ask the question: "Does administrative pricing lessen competition?" Overall, it does not do so significantly, if at all. To be sure, administered prices signify the absence of pure competition; but the latter is not common, being only a framework within which existing competition can be studied. The pursuit of pure competition is very unrealistic. The goal of American society is effective competition, in which a single buyer or seller cannot significantly affect the market and in which market forces impinge on managerial pricing decisions.

Who creates these administered prices? Contrary to popular belief, it is not just the big corporations. Smaller businesses, doctors, lawyers, government, union leaders, and countless others also administer prices.

Next, we may ask just what socially acceptable ends do administered prices serve? In a complex commercial and industrial society like ours, sound, tactical considerations must be given weight in determining prices. The administered price is necessary for many concerns, to enable them to carry out long-range price and production policies. However, this must be accompanied by "social or executive responsibility," which considers the welfare of the economy as well as the interests of the individual companies.

In summary, it is well to point out that administrative pricing is an integral part of our society. It is a well-established practice and generates undesirable repercussions only when it is abused. The question is not whether a price is administered or not. There are more important questions: how was it decided? Is it flexible? To whose benefit does it work? In considering the repercussions of a particular administered price, the following question should be asked: Is the degree of inelasticity of demand and the degree of control by the price administrator such that the two when combined exert an unfair monopoly power, resulting in an impeding of market forces which contributes significantly to the instability of the economy?

IMAGINATIVE MANAGEMENT AND NEW CAPITAL INVESTMENT WILL LOWER PRICES

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, as a member of the Joint Economic Committee, I am greatly concerned in determining the true causes of inflation. This is admittedly our most serious domestic economic problem.

On March 23 I included in my remarks a statement issued by the American Can Co. last November announcing price reductions on its products. Mr. William C. Stolk, the president of that company, estimated that the savings to consumers by that reduction would exceed more than $9 million.

On April 3 the American Can Co. announced a further reduction in its prices. These apply to the major group of cans used for packing the fruits and vegetables constituting a major portion of the average family's food budget. Price reductions such as these are stimulated by competition. The Wall Street Journal on April 8 commented on this latest reduction as follows:

Food firms are estimated to have increased their output of cans last year at almost double the rate recorded by can manufacturers. Far from content, they've made plans for a further sizable boost in can making in the next few years.

Libby, McNeill & Libby, which now buys all the vegetable, fruit and meat cans it uses, will break ground Friday on a big can plant; San Francisco-based Calpak is completing its fifth. Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis; Green Giant Co., Le Sueur, Minn.; and the Borden Co., New York-headquartered milk products maker, are all considering plans for expansion of their can manufacturing facilities.

Such activity is spurring can makers to cut prices in efforts to retain the food companies' business. Can prices have been cut twice in the past 3 months, with the latest reduction coming only last week. When New York's big American Can Co. announced its cut just before the weekend, President William C. Stolk said the step would make "our can prices competitive for those customers who want to buy containers from expert can makers rather than hazard the manufacture of their own cans." He said the latest cuts ranged from $1.40 to $2.58 per 1,000 cans, depending on the type of can. * * *

The cost of cans is important to consumers because the container often adds more than 15 percent to the retail price of canned food; included in the price of a 20-cent can of peas, for instance, is 3.3 cents for the can. Last year the average family used 940 cans, adding around $30 to its shopping bills.

Price reductions must be accompanied by cost reductions if solvency is to be maintained. They are achieved by a forward-looking, aggressive, and imaginative management, who are willing to pioneer, and most importantly, by the investment of additional capital in facilities which make improved processing possible.

In view of the Senate's continued concern with the problem of prices, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I received from Mr. William C. Stolk, president of the American Can Co., referring to this additional reduction, and the text of an advertisement announcing it, which was published in the Nation's leading newspapers on April 3, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and advertisement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN CAN CO.,
New York, N.Y., April 2, 1959.

DEAR SIR: I know you have followed with interest the comments by President Eisenhower and other Government leaders on the necessity of a voluntary price rollback by business leadership if runaway inflation and its attendant evils are to be avoided. The alternative quite apparently is the likelihood of a system of selective price controls instituted by government—an eventuality that will produce even greater hardships for both management and labor.

We at the American Can Co. have tried to give tangible support to these convictions through two important reductions in our can prices in the past 3 months. We have been able to do this by taking the utmost advantage of the fruits of technological development and by bringing all practical efficiencies to all our operations. These, we believe, are time-honored practices available to all in the business and industrial world.

I am enclosing with this letter for your information and possible interest a preprint of an advertisement that we are running April 3 to announce our latest price reductions. This preprint describes our program in some detail. I am sending you this material because I know you are deeply interested in the broad problem of how the crushing effects of all-out inflation can be avoided in this country.

We in American Can Co. regard this as one of the fundamental problems of our times. We believe that immediate action is needed. We also feel that an exchange of views is a helpful prelude to action. We hope, therefore, you will be interested in knowing of our program. Needless to say, we would be most interested in your opinions on this fundamental problem.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM C. STOLK,
President.

OK, AMERICA—HERE'S ACTION ON PRICES

The American Can Co., has announced to customers another important reduction in can prices. These new prices apply to the major group of cans used for packing the fruits and vegetables which constitute a major part of your family food budget.

This dramatic action follows by less than 3 months the can price reductions we put into effect in January for most of our customers. The January cuts alone will save our customers more than $9 million in 1959. The new action will mean additional millions in savings.

These reductions have been made in the face of constantly rising costs of goods and services. They have been made in spite of the threat of more inflation to come.

HOW HAVE WE BEEN ABLE TO DO IT?

The lower prices have come as the result of hardheaded action to cut costs in every area of the company's operations. They represent action by a company on the move, one that is conditioned to ride with the problems of doing business in this day and age, one that faces up to present and future conditions with realism and with imagination.

They have come because the American Can Co., is alert to every opportunity to improve its products and services to customers, to protect the long range positions of its employees and its stockholders, and to serve the public interest.

They are the direct result of many years of study and millions of dollars spent for technological advancement and other improvements in our canmaking operations.

We have taken these steps:

1. Completion of the tinplate processing program, pioneered by the American Can Co. at a cost of $32 million, in which we convert plate purchased in coil form from the steel mills into canmaking size sheets.

2. Establishment of the individual pricing of each can to more closely reflect the varying costs and processes that go into its manufacture.

3. Establishment of f.o.b. pricing of each type and style of can at each of our factories. This eliminated the traditional averaging of tinplate transportation costs, a practice which was no longer in the best interests of all customers.

4. Protecting our customers and ourselves by making our can prices competitive for those customers who want to buy containers from expert canmakers rather than hazard the manufacture of their own cans.

WHY ARE WE TAKING THIS ACTION?

Why are we again cutting can prices at this time? Why not wait a while to see what Congress does about inflation? Or until we see what kind of demands the unions are going to make in the major contract negotiations (including our own) that will soon begin?

First, we are a company of people in business to succeed, profit, and grow. We believe it is the soundest kind of business practice to produce as efficiently and as economically as possible—and then price our products so that our customers and the public share the benefits. Our price reductions will not impair our earnings ability. Instead, we believe that they will measurably contribute to a future of sustained sound and profitable growth for our company.

Second, we are deeply concerned about the clear and present danger of inflation. We have decided that we shouldn't sit back and wait for somebody else to act. We endorse 100 percent President Eisenhower's conviction that inflation must be curbed and that it is everyone's responsibility to help curb it—business and the unions, as well as government.

In our view, the voluntary reductions we have made in our can prices stand as a further example of the American Can Co.'s traditional policy of service—to our customers and to the general public. We intend to continue this policy.

AMERICAN CAN CO.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES G. POLK, OF OHIO

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate a message which has been received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which was read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
April 28, 1959.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. JAMES G. POLK, a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That a committee of 22 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, at this time I yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, this morning I was grieved to learn of the death of Representative JAMES G. POLK, who, for a period of 21 years, served the Sixth Congressional District of Ohio.

My contact with Representative POLK began in 1944. He represented what is known as the Scioto River Valley section. The Scioto River empties into the Ohio River.

Representative POLK was a farmer. His entire life was devoted to the land. I am sure that the people of my State would want me to express condolences to the members of Representative POLK's family and to those who have ben associated with him during his long service to the State and to the Nation.

Representative POLK was a humble, unostentatious person. He was devoted to the people he represented. Though he was a farmer, as a Member of Congress he did not lose sight of the fact that his services had to be rendered to diverse segments of the economy and of society.

He was a dedicated American. He was devoted to his family.

The best tribute I can pay to him is to state the fact that he was beloved, not only by those who believed in his political philosophy, but also by those who disagreed with him.

He was a good man. In his passing, Ohio has lost a fine public servant. I am sure that all of Ohio mourns the passing of this good man.

Mr. President, out of respect to the memory of Representative JAMES G. POLK, I now submit, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG], the resolution which I send to the desk, and for which I request immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 112) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JAMES G. POLK, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TOMORROW, AT 11 A.M.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative POLK, and as a further indication of our mourning at his passing, I move that the Senate do now adjourn until tomorrow, at 11 a.m.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, in accordance with the order previously entered until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 29, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 28 (legislative day of April 27), 1959:

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Brazil.

ADDITIONAL CONFIRMATIONS

Certain groups of nominations, in the Army, in the Navy, and Marine Corps, and in the Regular Air Force, which were confirmed today, were received by the Senate on April 15, 1959, appear in the Senate proceedings of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date, as follows:

IN THE ARMY

The nominations of Jerry M. Abbott, and 1,755 other officers, which appear under the caption "Nominations," beginning with the name of Jerry M. Abbott, which is shown on page 5995, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and ending with the name of Burl A. Zorn, which appears on page 6000.

IN THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS

The nominations of Peter G. Abdalla, and 874 other officers which appear under the caption "Nominations," beginning with the name of Peter G. Abdalla, which is shown on page 6000 and ending with the name Raoul Soomre occurring on page 6002.

IN THE REGULAR AIR CORPS

The nominations of LeRoy Henry and 954 other officers, which appear under the caption "Nominations," beginning with the name of LeRoy Henry, which appears on page 5379 and ending with the name of Robert M. Young, which is shown on page 5382 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 28, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend James Pickett Wesberry, D.D., LL.D., pastor of the Morningside Baptist Church, Atlanta, Ga., offered the following prayer:

Thou wilt shew me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. Psalm 16:11.

Almighty and Everlasting God, Supreme Ruler of the universe, by whom our Nation has been established in freedom and preserved in union, we come to Thee with thanksgiving in our hearts and praise upon our lips. Put Thou away from us anything that would hide us from Thy blessed face.

Let the knowledge of Thy presence inspire us to do Thy holy will. Quicken our hearts. Deepen our understanding. Purify our motives. Help us to distinguish between policy and principle. Show us the vast difference between expediency and conviction. Empty us of all that is selfish and ignoble. Make clear to us that goodness is greatness. May everything we do be permeated by the love of God and filled with the spirit of Him who won His crown by the Way of the Cross. May we love our country better than we love ourselves. Soothed and sustained by an unfaltering trust in Thine eternal goodness and nourished by Thine infinite love and everlasting mercy may we breast the streams of the future unafraid.

Once more, O God, the mysterious hand of death has removed from us one of the honored and beloved Members of the House. Our hearts are deeply saddened over his passing and we pause to humbly and reverently express our gratitude for his outstanding record of service in Congress and to our Nation. Wrap Thine arms of love around each member of his family and grant to them the peace which passeth all understanding.

In the name of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, without this being considered a precedent, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who may desire to do so may extend their remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in one or more instances and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES v. BERNARD GOLDFINE

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read the communication as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 27, 1959.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

SIR: Mr. Herman Clay Beasley, an employee of the House, while serving at my direction as Clerk, Special Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, received a subpena directing him to appear as a witness before the U.S. Court for the District of Columbia in the case of U. S. v. Bernard Goldfine (No. 1158–58), the return date of the subpena being April 28, 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m.

The subpena further directs that Mr. Beasley bring with him "all minutes and transcript of the meeting of the Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for July 7 and 8, 1958."

The subpena in question is transmitted herewith, and the matter is presented for such action as the House, in its wisdom, may see fit to take.

Respectfully yours,

OREN HARRIS,
Member of Congress, Chairman.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the subpena.

The Clerk read the subpena as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. BERNARD GOLDFINE, DEFENDANT—No. 1158–58

To Mr. HERMAN CLAY BEASLEY,
Clerk, Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, 315 George Washington Inn, New Jersey Avenue and C Streets SE., Washington, D.C.:

You are hereby commanded to appear in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia at 3d and Constitution Avenue NW., 4th floor, courtroom 8, in the city of Washington, on the 28th day of April 1959, at 10 o'clock a.m., to testify in the case of United States v. Goldfine and bring with you all minutes and transcripts of the meeting of the Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for July 7 and 8, 1958.

This subpena is issued upon application of Edward Bennett Williams, the attorney for defendant, 1000 Hill Building.

HARRY M. HULL,
Clerk.
By LAWRENCE PROCTOR,
Deputy Clerk.

APRIL 27, 1959.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 254) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the case of United States v. Bernard Goldfine (Criminal Case No. 1158–58), pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, a subpena duces tecum was issued by the said court and addressed to Herman Clay Beasley, Clerk, Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before said court at 10:00 antemeridian on the 28th day of April, 1959, and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Herman Clay Beasley, Clerk, Subcommittee on Legislative Oversight, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before-mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in possession of the House of Representatives; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers and the Clerk of the House is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of the House of Representatives that the court has found to be material and relevant (except that under no circumstances shall any minutes or transcripts of executive sessions, or any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto, be disclosed or copied) and which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said papers, documents, and records by the House of Representatives shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under any Member, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena aforementioned.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow at 11 o'clock a.m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BURLESON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 2589. A bill for the relief of Elizabeth Lucie Leon (also known as Lucie Noel).

THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES G. POLK

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN].

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House the death of our beloved colleague, JAMES G. POLK, of the Sixth District of Ohio.

JIM, as he was familiarly known to all of us, was a fine man. Quiet and reserved, I do not believe he ever said an unkind word in his life about another human being. He was a man who was born for his job. He graduated from the agricultural college of Ohio State University. He taught school and was principal of the high school at New Vienna, Ohio. Then he went back to college and graduated from Whittenberg, later becoming superintendent of all the schools in Hillsboro. He became a candidate for Congress in 1930 and was seated on the 4th of March, 1931. He was elected to each succeeding Congress until 1940 when he chose not to run for office again. He went into the Department of Agriculture as a special assistant where he served 4 years. Then in 1948 he decided to come back to Congress.

The people of the Sixth Ohio District loved and trusted JIM POLK, and held him in the highest esteem. He never raised his voice in anger and distinguished himself as an able, conscientious representative of his people. They understood and respected him. It was my good fortune to know JIM POLK for more than 20 years. I do not believe that I ever met a finer person. To his gracious wife and children I extend deepest heartfelt sympathy in their great loss.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN], in profound sorrow in the untimely passing of our good friend, JIM POLK of the Sixth District of Ohio.

I have known Congressman POLK for over 12 years. From the very first time I came to this body, he was an inspiration and of great counsel. His was the art of gentle persausion. He was a gentle man. He was a man of courage and firm convictions.

Ohio has lost a very able and devoted spokesman. His district has lost a faithful and honorable servant.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I join with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN], and others, in paying tribute to the memory of our good friend and colleague, JIM POLK, who passed away this morning. JIM was a personal friend of mine for more than 30 years. His home was only 20 miles from my home, although in another congressional district. He started his teaching career in my district, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN] has said, and he had been a neighboring Member of Congress—our districts adjoin—for more than 20 years.

While we did not always agree politically, JIM and I were always close personal friends. He was a true gentleman, a man of great character and ability. JIM was a kindly man; a Christian gentleman, if ever there was a Christian gentleman on this earth of ours.

For a long time he suffered from a painful illness, yet he never complained. He was always cheerful. He loved this House. He has been here many times, attending to his official duties, when perhaps he should have stayed at home to preserve his strength and lengthened his life.

JIM POLK served, with outstanding ability, as the Ohio member of the Committee on Agriculture. He took great interest in the problems of all the farmers of the Nation, and especially in those of the farmers of Ohio. All of us on this side of the aisle regret his passing; and we join in extending to his wonderful wife, and to his children, our deepest and most sincere sympathy in the great loss which has been theirs.

JIM POLK left behind him a good name, and many, many friends who will miss him in the years ahead.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I join with the Members from Ohio and others in expressing my deep sorrow at the passing of our colleague who came back for his second decade of service in Congress when I came here first, in the election of 1948, and was sworn in in January of 1949.

JIM POLK was the kind of man who never thrust his advice upon anyone. He certainly was a kindly person. Coming here as a new Member I turned to him frequently when I wanted to know something. I was impressed with his ability. He always gave you alternatives and never told you you had to do anything; he simply pointed out the facts.

As has been said, he was a kindly man. I have never known a person more kindly than JIM POLK. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN] said he never heard him say and believes he never said an unkind word about anybody. I think we can all bear evidence to that. He was the kind of man that I think all of us would like to be. We will miss him, his people will miss him, and his family will miss him. My sympathy goes out to all of them.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I, too, was saddened to learn of the passing of our colleague, and my long-time friend from Ohio, JIM POLK. I completely agree with my distinguished colleague from Ohio [Mr. KIRWAN] in what he said about JIM POLK. JIM POLK was a good man, he was a kind man. Moreover, in his early days he was a great schoolmaster, and then an outstanding school administrator. His imprint upon the youth of his community in southern Ohio remains there now, and the results of his good influence on the youth of Ohio will remain long after he has gone.

I join with my colleagues from Ohio in extending my very deepest sympathy to his devoted wife and fine family.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound regret that I learned a few hours ago of the death of one of our most beloved Members, JIM POLK. It has been said that JIM was a kind, a gentle man. And, indeed, these were his virtues. But he was endowed, too, with a rare courage, Mr. Speaker. I recall a few years ago in a contest in Ohio where the situation was practically impossible for a certain gubernatorial candidate. But he was JIM POLK'S candidate, and at a time in JIM'S own election, a very close affair, he took to the stump. He spoke on the street corners and in the far reaches of his district for a man in whom he believed, but one he knew, as many of us did, would not be elected. This was the kind of political courage that typified and distinguished JIM POLK.

As my colleague [Mr. VANIK] pointed out, JIM POLK was always ready to give freely of his advice and he did so with real humility. There are few Members who will be remembered with greater love by the younger Members of this House for his kindness and for his help. There will be few who will be remembered with greater love than JIM POLK for the wisdom and for all that he gave.

I join others who have spoken here this morning in expressing my sympathy to his wife and children. We grieve with them in this hour of their sorrow.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, all of us feel a certain sweetness has gone out of the House with the passing of JIM POLK. All of us have known him as a quiet, unassuming Member. Some of us have not known him as well as we would like to have known him, but we shall miss him very much.

I join with my Ohio colleagues particularly, and with all the rest of the membership of this House, in paying respect to his memory, but more than that, to express something of the feeling that we have that his spirit will continue to live on with us.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to say more, if I may. I am the only woman Member of the Congress from Ohio. I should like to send a particular word of sympathy and understanding to Mrs. Polk, not only on behalf of myself but on behalf of the wives of all the Ohio Members. Mrs. Polk has been a delightful member of our Ohio group and our hearts go out to her in very real sympathy, some of us with a great deal of understanding of what these hours are to her after the anguished weeks and months that have gone before. May heaven give her comfort and peace. It is my earnest hope, Mr. Speaker, that there may come to her the certainty that—

Never the spirit was born; the spirit shall cease to be never;
Never was time it was not; end and beginning are dreams;
Birthless and deathless and changeless remaineth the spirit forever;
Death hath not touched it at all, dead
though the house of it seems.
Nay, but as one who layeth
His wornout robes away,
And taking new ones, sayeth
"These will I wear today."
So putteth by the spirit
Lightly its robes of flesh,
And passeth to inherit
A residence afresh.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOELLER].

Mr. MOELLER. Mr. Speaker, I, too, join my colleagues from Ohio in paying a few words of tribute to a man whom I have learned to know but a brief time, but a man whom I have learned to know to be a very great man. As a freshman Congressman, I called at his office shortly after my arrival here to have a brief chat with him. The kindly counsel and advice that he gave was the kind that a freshman will want to carry with him and which he so sorely needs. Not only the advice that he had given me caused me to have such great admiration for JIM POLK, but likewise the comments that one would hear from people within his district, which is a neighboring district to mine. People of both Democratic and Republican persuasion would speak words of highest praise of JIM POLK, and primarily because they felt in him they had a man whom they could fully trust. What a wonderful thing it is to hear such fine tributes being paid here on the floor by Members speaking about this man in the vein they do. He was an honorable man, a dedicated man, and I am sure his widow and his survivors will well understand our admiration for him, and to them go our most profound sympathies.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BETTS].

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my sorrow and sadness at the passing of JIM POLK. In every sense of the word JIM POLK was a true gentleman. I do not think there was a Member of this body that took his job, his position here in Congress more seriously than he did. He will be missed not only by our delegation but by the whole House, particularly the Committee on Agriculture, where he did such valiant work. I want to join my colleagues from Ohio as well as the other Members of the House in expressing my sympathy at his untimely passing. He had a charming personality and I was proud to consider him a close friend. My personal sympathies go to his wife and his family in this hour of sorrow.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOK].

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to join with the other members of the Ohio delegation and the membership of the House in expressing my personal deep-felt sorrow at the passing of JIM POLK. I, too, am a freshman Member of this House, and as such I have not had the opportunity that many of the other Members have had to have worked with JIM POLK over the years. On the other hand, as a new Member meeting Mr. POLK for the first time, I believe that I really found one of his true qualities, and that was that it was so easy to know JIM POLK. JIM was the type of man that you could meet the first time and feel that you had made at the very beginning a true and trusted friend. Certainly, I shall personally always look back upon the past 3½ months in the sense of a true friendship with a wonderful man. I am sure that the people of his district have lost a great Representative; this House has lost a valuable Member, and each of us has lost a trusted friend. I also extend my deep sympathy to his wife and family.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK].

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to join our colleagues here in the House in expressing my very deep regret at the untimely passing of JIM POLK. JIM POLK was an unusual type of person. He not only had a great deal of ability and represented his district and the Nation as a whole with distinction, but he had a great deal of personal courage that enabled him to meet the many situations with which he was faced, particularly in these last few months as he suffered great pain. And even though he had been suffering great pain he remained on the job here in the House and in behalf of his constituents at a time when many lesser men would have taken a much needed rest.

So, Mr. Speaker, I should like to extend to Mrs. Polk and their children the very sincere and heartfelt sympathy that all of us feel. Mrs. Polk has endeared herself to all of the wives of the Members of the Ohio delegation, met with them frequently, and is highly respected.

Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in the House in this tribute to a really great man.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have cherished JIM POLK'S friendship for many, many years. He was an honorable, humble, modest, and magnificent man. He was a devoted and dedicated public servant. I served with him on the Committee on Agriculture during the entire time that he has served in Congress. I, too, want to extend my very sincere and warm sympathy to his wife and to the members of his family and on behalf of the Committee on Agriculture to present a very brief resolution which was adopted by the committee this morning.

Whereas JAMES G. POLK, for 21 years representative of the Sixth District of Ohio in the Congress, devoted the full measure of his talents and his energy to the improvement of agriculture, especially for the betterment of the living standards of the farm families of America; and

Whereas the ultimate achievement of a parity position of agriculture, with the other great segments of the Nation's economy and society, will be a monument to his memory; and

Whereas serving with the House Committee on Agriculture and having progressed to a high rank and position he won respect for his ability and was held in esteem by his colleagues: Now, therefore, be it.

Resolved, That the committee has learned with profound sorrow and a sense of deep loss of the untimely death of JAMES G. POLK; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee express its very sincere sympathy to members of his family; and be it further

Resolved, That the committee clerk communicate this resolution to the family of the deceased.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. BOW].

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues from Ohio and from the House in an expression of sympathy to the family of JAMES POLK at his untimely passing. Those of us who have served with him here have learned to love JIM POLK. There was no division of an aisle in the matter of the friendship and affection that we felt for him. We shall miss him. It will be hard to replace so gentle a character with anyone for whom we could have greater respect than JAMES POLK.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ALBERT].

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I join the distinguished gentleman from Ohio and his colleagues in the House in this expression of personal sorrow over the loss of my good friend and colleague on the Committee on Agriculture, JIM POLK. I have served with JIM on that committee for many years. He was a very skilled member of the Committee on Agriculture as he was a very skilled Member of the House. He was a person who used quiet persuasion, but in a most telling and effective manner.

He could get things done. He was always on top of his work, always on top of his job. He served his constituency in their personal and in their broader interests with great success and great distinction. He was a forceful and able student of agriculture. He knew the problems before our committee, I believe, as well as any member of the committe. He always gave the other fellow the benefit of the doubt. He was tolerant, he was kind, he was considerate, he was courageous. As an example of his great courage, he was frequently on the job and appeared at our committee this year when he was physically unable to be there.

I shall miss him. We have lost a distinguished, capable, and effective Member of the House. I extend to his wife and children my deepest and sincere personal sympathy.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, JIM POLK was a kind, sympathetic, and understanding man. He was not only nice to work with, but, having known some of his employees, he was good to work for. This body will miss JIM POLK. His friendship crossed party lines. I know all of our hearts go out to Mrs. Polk, his children, their wives and husbands, and all of those who were closely associated with him. In the future many of us can take a lesson from JIM POLK'S attitude in this body. He was loyal to his friends and understanding of those who opposed him politically.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BREEDING].

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, I join the Ohio delegation and other colleagues in the House in extending my sympathy at the loss of JIM POLK. When I came here as a new Member of Congress his office was just across from mine in the Old House Office Building. I went to him many times for advice and consulted with him about the operations of the House. Certainly I feel that I have lost a true and trusted friend. I also want to extend my condolences and sympathy to the members of his family.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, we feel a sense of profound sorrow in the passing of JIM POLK. The membership of this House has suffered a loss. JIM POLK was an able statesman, representing the interests of his people. Service was his theme, and devotion to duty was ever uppermost in his mind. He performed his work admirably and was an example to all of us. We will miss him. The people of this Nation, his State, and his district will also miss him. To his wife and children we extend our deepest sympathy.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I join with others in paying my respects to the memory of our late colleague, Mr. POLK, of Ohio. To me he was one of the most efficient and effective Congressmen in this House, a modest man who effaced himself. He never sought recognition to take the floor on superficial matters or to discuss subjects in which he was not well grounded and prepared. He was always courteous, considerate, and tolerant in his relations with other Members. He was a gentleman and the highest type of public official. I join with my colleagues in extending my deepest sympathy to his family on this sad occasion.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, like one of our beautiful mountain sunsets in the summer, the passing of Representative JIM POLK leaves an afterglow of love and warmth in our hearts and a feeling of a rather sweet sorrow today. The years of association with this man have greatly increased my respect and affection for him. He was a dedicated teacher and a great statesman who in kindliness, and rather silently, was extremely powerful in furthering the cause of our Government and in furthering good wherever he found the opportunity to do so. Many of us feel today to call him blessed and to thank our Maker for the privilege of having allowed us to associate with him in this great legislative body.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues on this sad occasion to pay tribute to the memory of our beloved colleague, JAMES POLK, of the Sixth District of Ohio. Being a new Member of Congress, I did not have the pleasure of knowing JIM POLK over the years. That pleasure was not to be mine until I came to the Congress in January of this year. I shall never forget the warmth of his welcome when I met him for the first time in the Committee on Agriculture. It was fitting that I, a newcomer to Congress, should meet JIM POLK in the committee room of the committee he loved so well and on which he labored so tirelessly and effectively. Mr. Speaker, I have been greeted many, many times in my life, but never have I been welcomed more warmly than by JIM POLK on that day. It was a friendly, gentle, and fatherly greeting that I am sure every new Congressman would have cherished for a lifetime. I know that I shall never forget it so long as I live. I would very much have like to have had the opportunity of serving longer with JIM POLK on this important committee, but the Supreme Creator has ruled otherwise. JIM POLK'S many years of experience in the field of agriculture would have been invaluable to me. His wise counsel in this field will surely be missed by the entire Congress. I shall miss him personally, and I am deeply sorrowed by his passing.

I extend my deepest sympathy to his beloved wife and children for they shall miss him most of all.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues this morning in paying tribute to the memory of JIM POLK. I was deeply shocked, Mr. Speaker, on hearing of the death of our colleague. When I first came to the Congress 7 years ago, I was fortunate enough to be assigned an office next to the office of JIM POLK and through the years we became very, very friendly. He was quiet and unassuming, yet of a gentle nature. He was truly a lovable man and to know him made one's day a brighter day. I have never in my 7 years in Congress seen a more prodigious worker than JIM POLK. I join with the Members of the House of Representatives in condolences to his family.

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, unlike many of my colleagues, I did not have the pleasure of knowing Congressman POLK for a long period of time. He made himself known to me at one of the banquets here of the Veterans of Foreign Wars after the beginning of this term of the Congress. He offered his assistance to me as a new Member of Congress notwithstanding the fact that I was across the political aisle from him. He was a very kind and friendly man. The fact is, just a day or so before he went to the hospital, he invited me to his office to discuss a mutual problem of flood-disaster relief. He had a group of people there and representatives from the Corps of Army Engineers. I think the State of Ohio has sustained a great loss. I join my colleagues in extending deepest sympathy to the family and to the people in Circleville, Washington Court House, Portsmouth, Chillicothe, Hillsboro, and in the rest of his district who have sustained a great loss in the passing of Congressman JAMES POLK.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to the memory of our departed colleague, JAMES G. POLK. His death is a very real shock to me and I am deeply saddened by his passing. His office was near mine in the House Office Building, and I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that he was of immeasurable assistance to me as a new Member of the House of Representatives.

As you know, he was one of the few real down-to-earth farmers in this august body. JIM loved the land. He took genuine pride in listing himself in the Congressional Directory as "one of the few Members of Congress whose sole occupation is farming. Our departed friend was a statesman, a loving husband and father, and a true American. I shall always remember JIM POLK for his gentleness of character, although at the same time I know, and the record shows, he was a man of deep conviction—a great fighter, a great source of strength for the good of his country. His district, our State of Ohio, and our Nation has sustained a great loss in the passing of this dedicated servant of the people. I shall miss him more than I can say.

I wish to extend my sympathy to Mrs. Polk and other members of the family in this hour of bereavement.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, I am grieved to learn of the sudden passing of my friend, JAMES G. POLK. It has been a real privilege for me to have served in this House with JIM POLK many years. During most of that time we served together on the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives. JIM POLK was a gentle man, a kind man, a considerate and a lovable, character. I always found him with a smile in spite of the ill health he endured for the past few years. Summing it all up, JIM POLK was a fine Christian gentleman.

In the passing of this great American, the Committee on Agriculture has lost a devoted member. The House of Representatives has lost a loyal and devoted public servant and his district and his State have lost a great Representative.

My deepest sympathy goes out to Mrs. Polk and all members of the family.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KIRWAN. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, JIM POLK was one of the most esteemed Members of the House of Representatives. He occupied a unique position in the minds of his colleagues during the many years he served in this body. He occupied that position because of the respect that his colleagues had for him by reason of those fine qualities that he possessed and which so many Members today have stated, in one form or another.

JIM POLK was a man of unusual character. He truly possessed nobility of character in about as broad and profound a manner as anyone could be. He was a man of deep faith and he evidenced it in his human ways, in his contact with his fellow man, in showing by action as well as by words his love of God and love of neighbor. JIM POLK exercised a powerful influence in the House of Representatives as a result of the recognition of his unusual ability, his logical mind, and his sound advice. As Member after Member has properly mentioned, he was unassuming, kind and good. It is because of those qualities, coupled with his unsual ability, that he was so effective as a Member of the House of Representatives.

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HAYS] said, in giving advice he would give both sides of a question so that the Member could analyze and consider both sides and make up his own mind. That is the type of gentleman JIM POLK was.

During his years of service in this body, in that quiet and unassuming way of his he has made his contributions to the legislative history of our country. You and I, who knew JIM POLK and served with him and number him among our friends, have been enriched in our own lives as a result of our association with him and the friendship that existed between us. In his passing I have sustained a personal loss, the House of Representatives has sustained a great loss. I extend to Mrs. Polk and her loved ones my deep sympathy, and to the Ohio delegation and to the people of his district likewise I extend my profound sympathy.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, JAMES POLK was a fine man, of splendid ability, of the highest character. He served his district and his country well. In his passing his family and a host of devoted friends have my deepest sympathy.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to join with my colleagues from Ohio and others in paying a brief but sincere tribute to the memory of our late friend and able colleague, the Honorable JAMES G. POLK, who passed away this morning.

I came to know JIM POLK well during our years of service. I liked him as a friend and admired his work and sincerity as the Representative of his district in the Congress. Although his primary interest was farming and agriculture, JIM POLK approached the problems of our Nation with a broad perspective without provincialism. He was a gentle and kindly man who bore the name of one of our great Presidents, James K. Polk, of Tennessee. We shall miss him. May I extend to the members of his family my sincerest sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it was with great sorrow that I learned of the death of my colleague, JAMES G. POLK, of the Sixth District of Ohio.

I have known JIM intimately ever since I have been a member of the House Agriculture Committee. He and I served together on both the Dairy and the Poultry Subcommittees, and I found his interest was always with the farm people of the United States. He was a kindly gentleman, quiet but very firm in his beliefs, and we in the committee will miss him greatly.

I want to extend my condolences to his wife and family.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, today we were saddened to learn of the passing of our esteemed colleague, JIM POLK. JIM had a very long and distinguished career as a Member of Congress.

He was a farmer by profession and a farmer at heart. He was a true son of the soil of Ohio. JIM not only had a thorough knowledge and understanding of the problems of the tillers of the soil, but he had a thorough knowledge and a sympathetic understanding of the problems of the city dwellers and those who earned their livelihood in endeavors other than farming.

JIM was indeed a kindhearted soul whose personality ingratiated him with everyone with whom he came in contact. He was a conscientious man of unusual wisdom and deep spiritual strength. He was a humble man who had the highest concept of his responsibility to his constituents. His devotion to his official duties was stimulated by his love for his State and his Nation. He has a record that has won for him the great commendation and respect of all of his colleagues. He was a firm believer in the American way of life. His great faith in the principles and ideals of our government was evidenced in his record of service. He was a great and true American. It was his ambition to pass on to posterity and to tomorrow's generation a stronger and greater America. JIM was living the fruitful years of his life and in his passing our Nation has lost a great and courageous legislator, and I have lost a true friend.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, the passing of JAMES G. POLK, Representative of the Sixth District of Ohio, takes from among us a fine gentleman and a true friend. His passing is a personal loss to me.

It has been my privilege to serve with JIM on the Committee on Agriculture of the House for 7 years. We have served on subcommittees together. He was a farmer by training and business association. With this background he was a most valued member of the committee and we valued his kind, sound device. He was indeed a gentleman, kindly in his relationship with all men, an able, devoted servant of the people.

Mrs. McIntire joins with me in extending our deepest sympathy to Mrs. Polk and family.

Our lives have been enriched by the personal acquaintanceship we have had with Congressman and Mrs. Polk.

Mr. ASPINALL. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sad and heavy heart that I pay my tribute today to our late colleague from Ohio's Sixth Congressional District. JAMES G. POLK was not only a colleague, he was a good friend and neighbor. When I first came to Congress, I was assigned office space but a few doors away from the office suite which he has occupied for so many years. Consequently, he was among the first individuals whom I had the pleasure of meeting upon arriving in Washington. From the start, he was most helpful in assisting me and my staff in getting ourselves oriented. On numerous occasions, especially in those early days of my congressional service, he gave me helpful hints on the procedures and operations of the House.

JIM POLK served on the Committee on Agriculture and I frequently sought him out to obtain the benefit of his judgment on problems and legislative proposals pending before that great committee. He was never too busy to take a moment or two to consult with his colleagues and to offer to them his views on problems of the agriculture industry.

Our so recently departed friend and fellow worker was a quiet, effective, and dedicated public servant. His loss to the people of his district, to the State of Ohio, to the Nation, and particularly to this House which he loved so dearly is immeasurable. Mrs. Aspinall joins with me in extending to his widow and to his family our heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, when men sit side by side in committee through the years they come to know each other especially well, and in a way that is peculiar to our particular phase of public service. I enjoyed that close relationship with JIM POLK for years. I came to know his thinking and his approach to the complex problems of agriculture. I know of his devotion to the people whom he represented.

The past months, when JIM'S health has been so obviously failing, pained me, as they did all of his friends, particularly those of us who were close enough to him to see the struggle that he was making against the dread disease which finally took him from us. He never gave up in his efforts to do things for people, until he finally went into a coma just a few days ago. It has been only about a week since he had his office call me to ask if I would preside over his subcommittee at some hearings which he had scheduled.

It will always be an inspiration to me to recall how JIM served right up to the last. I will never know a braver man nor one who set a finer example of devotion to duty. My profound sympathy goes to his family and to all those who were near and dear to him.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, one of the first men that I was privileged to become acquainted with when elected to Congress was JIM POLK. He was always courteous, helpful and friendly. We visited on numerous occasions. While his health was bad he was uncomplaining, always lending a cheery smile and a fine philosophy of life. We will always profit by the existence of men like JIM POLK. Mrs. Marshall joins in expressing our sympathy to Mrs. Polk and Mrs. Taylor, his daughter.

His district has lost a fine Representative, our country a fine citizen, and we have lost a real true friend.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, a true friend has gone from our midst. I was shocked and grieved to learn of the passing of JIM POLK.

When I became a Member of this great body 5 years ago one of the first to shake my hand in warm friendship was the gentleman from Ohio whom we are eulogizing here today. He was quiet turned but truly represented the old saying "still water runs deep." He was always willing to give advice to those who sought it. He was always ready to extend a glad hand of friendship, yes, Mr. Speaker we will miss him very much. His kindness, his service to his fellow man speak far more eloquently than any words I might utter here today.

Words will not really ease the grief that is placed upon the members of his family; however, I want to extend my sympathy in the deepest of sincerity.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply grieved this morning to learn of the passing of my friend and distinguished colleague, the Honorable JAMES G. POLK, who represented the Sixth Congressional District of the State of Ohio.

Through the many years of my association with JIM POLK I learned to deeply admire him for his fine qualities and gentleness of spirit. He served as a member of the Agriculture Committee for which he was preeminently qualified as his life was devoted to farming.

I wish to extend to his wife and daughters my deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. MINSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked and saddened to learn this morning of the death of our colleague, JAMES G. POLK.

JIM POLK always liked to point out that running a farm was no mere sideline for him. He was no city slicker farmer. He made up his mind to enter politics on a hot fall day when riding his sulky plow behind a three-horse team. All of his life he stayed close to his own farm and to the farmers of the Sixth District of Ohio. His biography in the Congressional Directory became noted for its brevity, being limited to his tenure of service and the one proud line: "One of the few Members of Congress whose sole occupation is farming."

When a session was over, JIM POLK would head back to his beloved green fields in Ohio. Two times he left public service in Washington in the hope of spending the rest of his life on his farm. Both times he was called back to Washington.

Once he remarked: "I'm one of those who thinks a man must have a calling for the farm, just as some men are called to the ministry or medicine." JIM POLK had that calling, and he gave his life to it. He served long and ably on the House Agriculture Committee. I cannot recall JIM POLK raising his voice in anger, but he was firm and swift when he thought an injustice might be done to the farmers of this Nation.

His colleagues on both sides of the aisle admired and respected him. I would like to express my heartfelt sympathy to his family. We will all miss JIM POLK.

Mr. BOYLE. Mr. Speaker, it is with personal sadness that I take the floor today in tribute to a man who climbed down from a sulky plow to become a dedicated and respected Member of the House of Representatives. The Honorable JAMES G. POLK had served as a member of the Agricultural Committee since first coming to Congress in 1931 to represent the people of the Sixth District of Ohio.

Around Capitol Hill he was referred to as a political phenomenon, who retired after serving in Congress for 10 years to return to his farm, only to be called back 8 years later by his people to again serve them in Congress.

His untimely death is a personal loss as well as a loss to his State and to the Congress. Fate has written a finis to a fine congressional career.

To his family and loved ones I extend my heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, "kindliness," "tolerance," "friendliness" are words that have been used over and over again in tribute after tribute to JIM POLK. This man, conscientious, hardworking, a dedicated and determined fighter for his principles, yet found time to be helpful to all around him and to bring a spirit to his activities in committee and on the floor that left all of us feeling a little better toward each other. The United States has lost an able lawmaker, Ohio a fine advocate, and each Member of Congress has a personal loss in the death of a true friend. I join my colleagues in extending my heartfelt sympathy to Mrs. Polk and his family.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, the passing of our friend and colleague, JAMES G. POLK, leaves us in a state of profound sadness.

JIM POLK was one of the most beloved Members of this body. He was possessed of an unusually sweet disposition. He was a man of tenderness. He was kind, courteous, and good. In the many years I have been privileged to serve here with JIM POLK, I never once heard him make an unkind or uncomplimentary remark of anyone; nor was such made of him. He was loved and respected by all on both sides of the aisle.

It was my good fortune to have been quite close to JIM. For years we served together on the same committee, the Committee on Agriculture. We also worked together on several subcommittees. To have been so closely associated with this fine man was a rewarding experience, one I shall always cherish and remember.

JIM POLK was a good Congressman. He was unbiased. He was loyal and conscientious. In his daily living he was always mindful of his duty as a public servant. He put the people first, himself second. In this connection I am reminded of something which happened about 10 days ago. Although a very sick man, something which he undoubtedly knew, he called from his hospital bed of pain and discussed with me a matter pending in our committee. He was thinking of a commitment he had made to some people about committee hearings on a pending legislation. He wanted us to know of his commitment and expressed the hope that some of us could pick up where he had been forced to leave off. Although the very sick man that he was, he was still thinking of his duties as a servant of man. As was typical of JIM, he was putting the people first, himself second.

This incident so clearly illustrates his devotion to duty and the way he lived. Yes, indeed, JIM POLK lived a good life, one that all who follow would do well to emulate.

I join with the distinguished delegation from the great State of Ohio in mourning the passing of our friend and colleague, JAMES G. POLK. And to his bereaved widow and family, I extend my profound sympathy.

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, it is with a heavy heart that I join with my colleagues in this testimonial to the fine character of our late friend JAMES G. POLK who has been taken from us after a life that was lived to the fullest in the public service.

It was my privilege to serve with JIM POLK in the Committee on Agriculture and while he was undoubtedly among the best qualified to speak on agricultural subjects by reason of his farming experience he rarely raised his voice to criticize the proposals of his less-informed associates. In the 12 years of our association together I came to appreciate his even temperament and sunny disposition, and the highest accolade I can bestow upon him is to state that I never saw him angry nor do I recall ever meeting him when he did not greet me with a smile.

In my opinion we are too prone to judge a man by his eloquence or his involvement with public matters. The real test, as I see it, is how we handle ourselves in our relationships with those we meet along life's way, and whether we accept the divine suggestion that we are our brother's keeper. A great publice servant, a stanch party man, our late lamented colleague was also a Christian gentleman and our faith tells us that he rests from his labors in scenes serene beyond the river. To his bereaved family go our heart-felt condolences and our prayerful solicitation that the Master will have them in His care and keeping.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, it was certainly a loss to the entire Nation to lose our colleague JAMES POLK, of Ohio, in death. It was my pleasure to know JIM through our many conversations together and the mutual projects on which we worked. I not only liked JIM POLK but I respected his knowledge. He was possessed with a sense of understanding and courage.

I wish to take this opportunity to express my deep sympathy to the members of Mr. POLK's family in this time of sorrow.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, friends may visit Gawler's Funeral Home in Washington, where Mr. POLK's body will lie, on Thursday from 1 to 8 p.m. and on Friday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. Burial will be in Highland, Ohio.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to revise and extend their remarks on the life and character of our late colleague, JAMES G. POLK.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 255).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Honorable JAMES G. POLK, a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That a committee of 22 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

FUNERAL COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following Members of the House to attend the funeral:

Mr. KIRWAN, Mr. BROWN of Ohio, Mrs. BOLTON, Mr. FEIGHAN, Mr. MCCULLOCH, Mr. HAYS, Mr. HESS, Mr. AYRES, Mr. BETTS, Mr. BOW, Mr. SCHENCK, Mr. SCHERER, Mr. BAUMHART, Mr. ASHLEY, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. MINSHALL, Mr. VANIK, Mr. COOK, Mr. DEVINE, Mr. LATTA, Mr. LEVERING, and Mr. MOELLER.

The Clerk will report the remainder of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 47 minutes p.m.) the House, pursuant to its previous order, adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 29, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

New British Air Route Threatens U.S. Taxpayer and U.S. Airlines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEVEN B. DEROUNIAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. DEROUNIAN. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the gentleman for his comments regarding the economic impact which the award of this new route to BOAC would have upon the competing U.S.-flag carriers.

As I have pointed out previously, the award of a Tokyo-New York route to the United Kingdom was never contemplated in the Bermuda agreement. Tokyo has been added to that agreement without negotiations, and no equivalent rights were obtained for the U.S. carriers in return.

In addition, however, the traffic on the route would be largely "fifth freedom," or third country, traffic to which a British air carrier has no claim. The examiner in the case refers to the fact that an estimated 99 percent of the passengers diverted from the U.S. carriers by BOAC would not be British subjects, or passengers traveling between points in British territory. The vast majority would be American citizens.

This fact makes the diversion to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has referred of even greater significance, since the passengers diverted would be largely passengers who properly should be carried by airlines of the United States or Japan.

This increasing diversion of American traffic to foreign-flag airlines is of growing concern, not only to the U.S. airline industry but the U.S. airline employees.

Pan American Airways pilots have pointed out, in a document circulated recently to many Members of the Congress, the extent to which foreign carriers are increasing their position in the international air transport market.

They point out that in 1948, 74 percent of the air traffic across the North Atlantic was handled by American carriers. In 1957, TWA and Pan American carried less than 43 percent of the total—this despite the fact that approximately 70 percent of the passengers were U.S. citizens.

The award of a Tokyo-New York route to BOAC will hasten the day when the same situation will prevail in the Pacific, to the great detriment of the U.S. air transport industry and its employees.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his support of my suggestion that a committee of the Congress undertake an investigation of this problem, and I hope that this will be done.

Congress Should Override the Veto of the REA Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE S. McGOVERN
OF SOUTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, as one of the sponsors of the legislation which Congress recently passed by a large margin restoring full loanmaking authority to the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, I was keenly disappointed that the President saw fit to veto such a logical proposal.

I cannot understand why anyone would think it is sound policy to ask the Rural Electrification Administration to examine a loan application from one of our rural electric cooperatives, make a careful appraisal of that loan based on the criteria laid down by Congress, and then have the whole evaluation reversed by an arbitrary decision made by Secretary Benson or some future Secretary of Agriculture.

Why do we bother to establish an REA administrator and furnish him with a competent technical staff to examine loan applications if we are then going to permit a politically appointed Cabinet officer to use some kind of a political test or his own personal whims to decide whether or not a loan should be approved or disapproved?

Mr. Speaker, I am getting weary of government by veto. It seems that every time we are successful in passing legislation through the Congress to help farm people, Mr. Benson speaks to the President and all our hard work is lost with one stroke of the veto pen.

In 1956, after great effort and long hours of hearings and debate, the Congress passed a 90 percent of parity bill for agriculture to help give our farmers a fair return on their labor and investments. That much-needed bill was quickly vetoed by the President at Mr. Benson's insistence.

Last year, Congress passed legislation simply to hold the line against further price drops. Even this modest legislation was killed with a Presidential veto after it drew the opposition of Secretary Benson.

Now once again, after Congress has passed a measure necessary for the protection of our rural electric associations, the President has used the veto weapon.

I urge my colleagues in the Congress to reverse this ill-advised veto. It is in the best interest of rural America and sound administration that we do so.

Fire Prevention Award

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMILIO Q. DADDARIO
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, on Monday night, the U.S. Chamber of Commerce presented awards for its annual interchamber fire safety contest. For the 14th time, the city of Hartford, capital of Connecticut and principal community in my district, received first award in its population class. Moreover, in 1940, 1943, and 1953, Hartford achieved the distinction of being chosen as the grand award winner and is now in permanent possession of the trophy. These awards recognize the outstanding effort made by the community and the distinguished record of the Hartford Fire Department, headed by Chief Henry G. Thomas. Chief Thomas is retiring this week and I think this latest chamber of commerce award is fittingly timed to call attention to the splendid record he has achieved. In addition, I should like to mention the work done by Fire Marshal George Kennedy in organizing the activity that is the basis for the award.

Hartford has had some destructive and tragic fires in its history. In all of them, the Hartford Fire Department has battled with remarkable speed, order and effectiveness to control this tragic force. Many Hartford firemen have demonstrated exemplary bravery in action and all have shown the courage and resourcefulness that has inspired gratitude in adults and admiration in children. But the department realizes that firefighting is only part of its job. It turns to the fire prevention effort with vigorous steps because it knows that here is the most rewarding part of the problem—the public education that can stem losses.

Untold property damage and countless lives have been saved by the progressive program of fire safety that Hartford has carried out. Three times Hartford has been singled out for the grand award of the U.S. Chamber, retiring the trophy. Among the highlights of this program has been the naming of junior fire marshal, grammar school students trained in habits of fire safety.

The Hartford Fire Department and the city of Hartford deserve acclamation for their efforts. I am proud to salute Hartford as the Fire Prevention City.

New British Air Route Threatens U.S. Taxpayer and U.S. Airlines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN R. LAIRD
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, prior to the Easter recess, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEROUNIAN] brought to the attention of the House a current proceeding of the Civil Aeronautics Board involving the application of British Overseas Airways Corp. for a foreign air carrier permit to begin service on a route extending from Hong Kong to Tokyo, Honolulu, San Francisco, and New York.

The gentleman's remarks interested me greatly, because the circumstances which he described appear to indicate that this is another instance in which this Government has conceded valuable air rights to another nation which will have an adverse economic effect on the U.S.-flag air carriers.

The extent of this economic damage to U.S. carriers is apparent from a report made last week to the Civil Aeronautics Board by Examiner Ferdinand Moran. This report recommended that the CAB deny BOAC's application to serve Tokyo on its trans-Pacific route in the public interest, because, among other things, BOAC would divert $13 million a year in revenue from the two U.S. trans-Pacific carriers, Pan American and Northwest.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I have been familiar with the costs involved in subsidizing the development of international air routes, and I am gravely concerned with the growing competition of foreign-flag carriers, and the potential effect of this competition on the future economic well-being of U.S. air transport enterprises.

It has been gratifying to observe that, in recent years, most of the domestic trunkline and international air carrier operations have reached a stage in which they can operate profitably without further Government assistance in the form of direct subsidy payments.

In the Pacific area, this status was achieved only after substantial assistance from the Government. During the years 1946 through 1955, the trans-Pacific operations of U.S. airlines required more than $87 million in Federal subsidy. Of this, Northwest received about $24 million and Pan American about $63 million. Additional subsidy, in amounts yet to be determined, is being claimed by Pan American for the years 1956 through 1958, but Northwest has been subsidy-free since 1954 and Pan American will be in the future.

None of the U.S. international carriers will be able to maintain a subsidy-free status, however, if this Government continues its past policies giving away valuable air rights without regard to the effect on the U.S. carriers, and without obtaining rights of equal value in return.

It is imperative that every effort be made to give the U.S. carriers the protection required to maintain their subsidy-free status. No further air rights should be relinquished to foreign flag carriers unless compensating U.S. rights are obtained.

In the case under discussion, if BOAC is handed this route between the two largest cities in the world—Tokyo and New York—the initial diversion is estimated, as I have mentioned, at $13 million. But that is not the end.

If this precedent is established, other foreign flag carriers authorized to operate between Tokyo and the west coast will have a powerful argument that they, too, should be given co-terminal status at New York, with further losses in revenue resulting for the U.S. trans-Pacific and transcontinental carriers.

The ultimate effects of this diversion, particularly during a period when the carriers are undergoing a costly transition to the jet age, could well be so serious that the sound economic status which the U.S. carriers have achieved, at great expense to the taxpayers, will be sacrificed and further subsidies may be required.

It does not seem reasonable or logical that this Government should be in the position of diverting revenue to the foreign flag carriers by the award of routes to which they have no legal entitlement under existing international agreements, particularly when the American taxpayer may be called upon to pick up the tab.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the gentleman from New York has made a sound suggestion in proposing an immediate investigation of this case, and I urge that the Transportation Subcommittee of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee undertake such an investigation at once.

Action at Gettysburg

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. QUIGLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, 8 days ago on the floor of the House I urged the Congress to reconsider the appropriation which would enable the Park Service to acquire land at Gettysburg Battlefield. At that time I stated that the problem was one which needed local action in addition to whatever Congress might provide—that Congress could only rectify mistakes of the past and that it was up to the greater Gettysburg community to see to it that no mistakes would be made in the future, namely, that Cumberland township and other interested localities should institute modern zoning practices.

Today I am happy to report to the Members of the Congress that Cumberland township has initiated action in this direction. Within the last 2 days a planning commission of five citizens has been appointed to study the planning and zoning question and to report measures to accomplish that end. The members of that committee are Col. Thomas H. Nixon and Messrs. John D. Teeter, Charles C. Garland, Paul R. Knox, and Frederick Green.

Now that greater Gettysburg has begun its part of the job I can only trust that Congress will get on with its responsibility and restore to the budget the necessary funds to remove from this field of honor the presently existing desecrating structures.

A Program for Developing Our National Forests

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLIFFORD G. McINTIRE
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, the "Program for the National Forests" is a document that sets forth a realistic approach for developing our national forests toward the end of future needs.

This is a splendid effort, one that deserves high praise from all who are interested in the preservation and development of this invaluable national resource.

In conjunction with this program, I submit a statement to the RECORD, and I would like to commend Assistant Secretary Erwin L. Peterson, Forest Service Chief Richard E. McArdle, and all others in the Department of Agriculture who have played a part in drawing up this constructive and forward-looking program.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Agriculture Committee, I have reviewed with interest and enthusiasm the report referred to the Congress just prior to the Easter recess. I refer to the document entitled, "Program for the National Forests."

I predict that this far-reaching conservation plan for the full development of the Nation's national forest system will not only stimulate action in the Congress but also move the public, who owns these forests, to demand accelerated development and more intensive management. This prediction is based on the tremendous benefits that can be expected by implementation of the program.

Forests cover 85 percent of the land area of the State of Maine. The care and wise use of the renewable resources from these forests is essential in an expanding economy. In fact, few people realize that New England has a higher percentage of its land surface covered by commercial forests than any other region in the United States.

Wherever forests occur their resources of water, timber, recreation, forage and wildlife habitat affect the economy. Over one-third of all the people employed in Maine are engaged in activities involving the harvesting and manufacture of forest products. Many communities in America are completely dependent on the resources provided by adjacent forest areas whether in public or private ownership.

My interest, therefore, in the development of the national forest system in America to its full potential is based on a "grassroots" perspective of the true economic and esthetic value of a well managed and wisely used forest resource.

Population in the United States has increased 32 percent in the 13 years following World War II. If estimates for the future hold, there will be some 332 million people by the year 2000. This is just 40 years away, and is more than double the 1950 census. During this same period the gross national product is expected to increase over five times.

My colleagues from the West who have most of the national forests, should be interested in the estimates for population growth in their section of our country. In the 11 Western States the population is expected to triple by the end of this century.

Today an average American has 50 percent more time for leisure than he had 40 years ago. In the next 40 years there may be one-third more time for play and recreation than now.

Our expanding economy demands great amounts of nonrenewable resources not only from America but also from the free countries of the world. At the same time, the impact of our rapid population and economic growth is demanding ever-increasing quantities of renewable resources; the resources covered in this "Program for the National Forests."

The national forests are truly national in character because they affect millions of our people whether they are cutting timber for a living or pitching a tent in the forest for a few days hunting, fishing or recreation. The national forests, particularly those in the West, have only begun to feel the relentless pressures of our space-age economy. The forests are no longer generally inaccessible. Their stores of timber, wildlife, water, and recreational areas are no longer hard to reach. With more people and greater use we have the urgent need for the strong national-forest action program covered in the document now available to the Congress.

The short-term proposals for action in the next 10 to 15 years and the long-range objectives for the year 2000 involve all facets of resource development and management on the national forests. To mention them briefly, they are: More and better timber for the Nation, adequate recreational facilities for added millions of people, increased water supplies of finer quality, better hunting and fishing, improved range resources for better grazing, intensified forest protection from insects, fire and disease, an expanded road system for timber sales, protection and recreational use, accelerated research in many fields of forestry, boundary and ownership adjustments, and finally provision of the structures and equipment needed to keep this resource development program moving.

I refer you to the complete report in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Tuesday, March 24, 1959, for the multiple benefits of this "Program for the National Forests." I do want to mention in closing that the report states for timber alone, "it is estimated that for every dollar of national-forest stumpage sold the end products will be worth $20 by the time they reach the ultimate consumer. This means that the annual sale of 11 billion board feet of sawtimber expected to be reached by the end of the short-term period will have a total consumer value of $3.7 billion."

A program of this magnitude and promise for our national forests merits the serious consideration of every Member of the Congress.

Growth for the Nation and the West

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN A. CARROLL

OF COLORADO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, we Democrats of Colorado are greatly indebted to the able and distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] for the recent thoughtful and inspiring address he delivered at our annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner in Denver.

The Senator from Missouri was received with wide acclaim by the people and press of Colorado, and inspired the unanimous enthusiasm of Democrats.

It is my opinion that his fine speech should be read by all who are interested in an expanding economy in the Nation, and with particular attention by all who seek a blueprint for the full development of the American West.

I ask unanimous consent to have this address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GROWTH FOR THE NATION AND THE WEST

(Address by Senator STUART SYMINGTON, Jefferson-Jackson dinner, Denver, Colo., April 18, 1959)

It is a great privilege to be here in Denver tonight, and see so many old friends, including my colleague, JOHN CARROLL, one of the West's finest representatives in the Senate of the United States, and a fighting Democrat to the tips of his fingers.

Every time I come to Denver, I wonder at the continued growth of your city. You now have over a million people in your metropolitan area. With real progressive leadership, there is no limit to what you can do in this beautiful land.

When I say "progressive leadership," I mean Democratic leadership. The last election showed us that the people of Colorado and the West have pinned their hopes for progress on the Democratic Party.

With 23 Democratic Senators and 7 Democratic Governors, the West is going to have an increasingly strong voice in our national councils. And it is going to be a clear voice, calling for full development of the wealth of this great country.

This Democratic voice will drown out the feeble cries of pessimism and bankruptcy which are coming out of official Washington today.

Perhaps it cannot make itself heard properly between now and 1960 under a Republican administration. But that voice will make it even more certain that we will elect a Democratic President in 1960.

And then watch the progress.

The pattern was set clearly in the last election. The people of Colorado examined the record of their superb Governor, Steve McNichols. They saw his accomplishments as chairman of the Western Governors' conference. They were mighty proud about how he represented to the entire Nation the western views on resource development. So they reelected him by a great majority, and along with him practically the entire Democratic ticket.

The people of Colorado looked at the fine job being done by WAYNE ASPINALL and BYRON ROGERS. So they reelected them, and also BYRON JOHNSON. This gives our party a 3 to 1 margin in the Colorado congressional delegation.

Last fall the pattern of Democratic victory was the same all over the country. If ever there was a mandate, this was it. You would think the Republicans would have learned from this experience. Instead they have taken the result of the election as an invitation to commit political suicide by continuing to pursue the same backward policies they have championed for the last 6 years.

As a result, in 1960, we Democrats will have such a gigantic victory, it will make 1958 look like a draw.

Of course, we're not going to win without a fight, but it's comforting to know the Republicans like to warm up for a national election by first fighting with each other.

In fact, it appears some of them would rather do that than take on the Democrats.

Right now, it looks like the Governor of New York is trying to get a half-Nelson on the Republican nomination for President.

The Vice President noticed how effectively Mr. Rockefeller campaigned in New York when he spoke in Spanish. So this week he is taking Spanish lessons from Fidel Castro.

Seriously, though, my friends, the Democratic party will have to move forward with dynamic responsible leadership if we want to be certain we will be entrusted with the leadership of the Nation in 1960.

We lost the last presidential election by some 10 million votes. Therefore, we have a lot of converts to make.

We will never win the next election if we kick away our chance, with our heavy majority in Congress, to meet the growing needs of a growing Nation.

We will win if we pass the laws we think America needs—veto or no veto.

We will win only if the people are convinced that the Democratic Party is still the party of action and growth, the party always striving to have our country's reach exceed its grasp.

To do this, we must first destroy some misconceptions that have been spread throughout the land in recent months.

The first concerns deficits, and balanced budgets. From 1953 until last year, we did not hear very much from Republicans about deficits. They were ashamed to bring it up because they were piling up a deficit in those years of $20 billion.

At the beginning of this year, the administration realized that the recession had cut down tax revenues, and the deficit for the fiscal year 1959 alone was going to run about $13 billion.

Imagine—$13 billion in 1 year alone—the largest deficit in peacetime history.

This problem was too big for the Republican fiscal experts, so they turned it over to the political managers, who hit on the following ingenious political trick. If the onus of deficit financing could be placed on the Democratic Congress, the administration would be relieved of the blame for the terrible fiscal mess it was developing.

So the word went down from the political to the fiscal managers: Balance the budget.

They balanced it, all right, like the Leaning Tower of Pisa. It was balanced with new revenue that is not going to come in, and new taxes which are not going to be levied. The latest objective estimate is that, even if Congress does not appropriate 1 nickel more than the President recommended, the deficit for next year will still run into many billions of dollars.

Let me tell you tonight that this Congress is not going to play into the hands of the political managers of the next Republican campaign by running away from this issue.

We know that these deficits came about, not because Democrats invested money to make the country grow, but because Republican cutbacks caused our revenues to shrink.

In 3 weeks we are going to celebrate the birthday of a great American President, Harry S. Truman. When Mr. Truman was President, our economy grew at the rate of 5 percent a year. Since he left office, it has grown at the rate of 1 3/10 percent per year.

Is this the way to provide for a population that has reached 176 million people; and by 1975 will be 235 million?

Is this the way to promote the growth of the West? Or is it the way to stunt the growth of the West?

Is this the way to arm ourselves for the protracted conflict we now know we face with the Communist world—a conflict we know is going to be political, economic, psychological, and perhaps physical?

I visited Berlin a couple of weeks ago. Even in East Berlin, which we have been told is a poor and exploited city, the rate of economic growth is 10 percent per year.

And ours is 1.3 percent per year.

What a tragedy to have this lag in the country with the greatest resources, and the greatest productive skill, in the history of the world.

The second misconception we Democrats intend to correct is that, if we invest in those public projects needed to keep up with our growing Nation, we will have inflation.

Now, obviously, no one wants inflation. But there is a difference between inflation and growth. In the first, prices rise because production lags. In the second, a rising price level is absorbed by the rising well-being of the people.

From 1922 to 1928 the price level was quite stable.

But that did not reflect any healthy economy, as was so well proven by the great depression.

And the third misconception we are laboring under is that spending and investment are somehow bad for the country; while only saving is good.

Now, thrift is a great virtue and waste in Government is inexcusable. But the man who put all his money in his mattress did not help build America.

What would there be in the West if people had not spent effort and wealth to get out here; and their Government had not helped them? What would our great industries be like if they had not, and did not, spend for expansion? Would we not be a pygmy country, instead of the giant we are today?

We need saving and what we need to save most is the American economy.

That economy needs to be saved from the terrific waste of manpower and other resources which are now lying idle.

It needs to be saved from more years of economic stagnation.

It needs to be saved from the ultimate peril of neglected national security, neglected education and scientific research, and neglected development of our great natural resources.

My friends, all this talk we hear from the Republicans about balanced budgets, inflation, and spending, is just a smokescreen to conceal their real ideas. The fact is that the Republican Party is afraid of growth. In its scheme of values, money is more important than people, and balancing the books comes before increasing the wealth of the country.

So the Republican Party tries to scare the people with threats of deficits and inflation, just as it used to warn people that if we adopted social security we would all be wearing dog tags.

Let me give you some figures to show what the economic lag under the Republicans has already cost this country.

If we had been able to keep up the Democratic growth rate between 1953 and 1958, it would have meant: $2,800 more income for each family; $31 billion more for our farmers; 10 million more man-years of employment; and $39 billion more private investment.

Every segment of our economy would have been more prosperous than it is today.

It is important that we Democrats set straight the economic record. But if we are to win in 1960, we must do more. We must come forward with a positive program for growth.

We Democrats must plan now to operate as near as possible to full production. Right now, between 15 and 20 percent of the productive capacity of the United States is idle—and unless we recognize this condition, it will only grow worse. Because by 1960, our population will be up over 5 million from 1958; and our labor force up over 2 million. And by 1964, the population will be up 17 million—our labor force 7 million.

This tremendous increase can be either a blessing, or a curse. It can be the cause of more unemployment and suffering; or it can be used as a great engine of increased productivity.

With these additional people at work, we can forge ahead in our standard of living, and at the same time generate more tax revenues to meet the needs of the larger population.

The greatest field of idle resources lies right here in the West. In your mountains and your valleys, your fields and rivers, you have the riches to provide additional wealth for millions.

I believe there are three requisites to the full utilization of the resources of the West.

First, there must be more general appreciation of the vast economic opportunities which lie waiting.

I don't want to knock the television western, which one of our national magazines has called the "great American morality play." But in the minds of many people it has perpetuated the ideal of the West as still a frontier.

Today the West is far from any frontier. It is a prosperous and cosmopolitan part of our Nation. If every American could come to Denver, this illusion of Cripple Creek would soon vanish as he saw the old corner saloon replaced by your mile-high center, and six shooters with NORAD.

Secondly, there must be more willingness on the part of Government to conceive and carry out broad economic plans, instead of responding haphazardly to such crises as droughts, slum areas, and floods.

As we all know, the difference between civilized man and the savage is planning. The difference between men and animals is that men look ahead.

Long-range planning of resource development, therefore, on a multi-State basis, would enable the West to know where it was going, and how fast.

Third, and most important, there must be a new willingness to invest in projects for the development of western resources, resources which our exploding will need critically in the years to come.

The present policy of no new starts in public works is a recipe for stagnation.

No successful corporation ever got started without investing in capital expenditures. It is a fundamental of good business management that sound expenditures repay themselves many times, and with interest.

Investment in natural resource projects is the best way to bring the prosperity of full production to our Western States.

Programs of this sort are in the democratic tradition. They wear the brand of the Louisiana Purchase, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the electrification of our farms through REA, and other democratic programs characteristic of our history.

Such a program can win, because it is right.

With continuing faith in the principles of our party, and the Nation, we can establish for the people a dynamic and progressive leadership, and through that leadership bring about the peace and prosperity they so richly deserve.

Presentation of Portrait of John McRaven Holbrook to the Lowell, N.C., High School

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BASIL L. WHITENER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 27, 1959, I had one of those rare experiences that come to a man only once in his lifetime. On that date it was my honor to participate in the ceremony at which a portrait of Mr. John McRaven Holbrook was presented to Lowell High School, at Lowell, N.C.

I am a graduate of Lowell High School, now John M. Holbrook High School, and Mr. Holbrook was principal of the school at the time I graduated. He is an outstanding educator and has rendered long and faithful years of service to the youth of his community. His sterling character and spirit of helpfulness meant much to me in my youth in formulating those ideals by which my life has been guided.

I am taking the liberty of including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks I made at Lowell on Monday when Mr. Holbrook's portrait was formally presented to the school and community for which he has labored so long.

REMARKS OF HON. BASIL L. WHITENER, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRESENTATION OF THE PORTRAIT OF JOHN MCRAVEN HOLBROOK ON APRIL 27, 1959

It is great joy for me to be here today to participate in this very delightful occasion which does honor to one who has meant much to so many of us—John McRaven Holbrook.

The gentleman whom we honor has made his mark in every phase of worthwhile community life. Since early boyhood in Huntersville and Mecklenburg County, he has evidenced the qualities of leadership which have contributed so much to the wellbeing of the people of his community, county, and State.

His record as a student in the schools of Huntersville and at the University of North Carolina is a brilliant one indeed. His service as a soldier in the U.S. Army during the World War I period was equally lustrous.

While a very young man, he dedicated himself to the field of public-school education and has held positions in the schools of both Mecklenburg and Gaston Counties. It was a fortunate occasion in 1924 when he became affiliated with the public-school system of Lowell. His continuous service here now approximates 35 years.

Mr. Holbrook has not confined his worthwhile efforts to his employment as head of the Lowell school system. He has held a broader view of public service as is evidenced by his participation and leadership in the civic, religious, and economic life of the area.

Always he has been active in the work of the Presbyterian Church. He has served as a deacon and elder and held many other important positions as a lay member in the church of his choice. His devotion to the broad programs of the Presbyterian Church has been a very vital factor in the advancement of the spiritual welfare of his community.

In the field of civic activity he has been an outstanding leader in our community, county, and State. He has served as president of the Lowell Lions Club, president of the Schoolmasters Club of Gaston County, official in the Alumni Association in the University of North Carolina, and as a member of the Board of Trustees of Peace College. He has been an active Mason and Shriner. In all of these, and the many other important positions of honor that have been bestowed upon him, he has always fully measured up to the highest standards in his efforts for the causes of those organizations.

During his career, John McRaven Holbrook has had the assistance and cooperation of his beloved wife, Mrs. Elizabeth McGirt Holbrook. She, too, has for several years been active as a public school teacher and an official in Gaston County. The zeal of this dedicated couple for the cause of public school education has been transmitted to their only daughter, Miss Betty Holbrook, who now occupies an important position in the public schools of the State of New York.

I believe that I can speak of the man whom we honor today with some authority. I know that I can speak of him with a deep sense of personal appreciation for what he has meant to me during my boyhood and manhood. In 1929, I became one of his students at Lowell High School and was then impressed with the personal interest which he took in my welfare.

Throughout the years that I have spent in college, in profession of the law, in military conflict during World War II, and in Government service, he has continued to show a constant interest in my welfare.

I do not mention this personal relationship which I have enjoyed with the man whom we honor today in a sense of vanity. On the contrary, I hasten to point out that he has had the same interest in the welfare of each person who has been privileged to be one of his students.

It is most fitting that the Beta Club of this high school has provided the portrait of our dear friend which will everlastingly hang in this magnificent high school building which was named "John M. Holbrook High School" in 1956 in recognition of the splendid service of our honored friend to this community.

In presenting a portrait of a true gentleman whose career has been so full of inspiration, whose accomplishments are a great credit to the education profession, who has a brilliant future still ahead, we are doing an act which will become even more significant in future years. What finer tribute could be paid to any person than to have the youth of the community who have been in his charge say that he is a gentleman; that he is one who merits their beautiful token of appreciation for his service. Yes, this is a wonderful occasion since it marks a gracious expression of gratitude which generally is done only after the completion of a man's activities.

This portrait is evidence of more than just appreciation of its donors. It is recognition of the zeal of John McRaven Holbrook, his personal sacrifices, his devotion, and his allegiance to the cause of public education and the highest devotion to public service. It is a beautiful attempt of these young people to say that he is a good leader; that he has all of the attributes of leadership including those of courage, loyalty, understanding, initiative, and vision, and a saving sense of humor.

Just as the community of Lowell unanimously approved the naming of its new high school in honor of our friend in 1956, the people of this community will today again unanimously applaud the action of the Beta Club in making this presentation of a handsome portrait. As the future years unfold this portrait will be a reminder of the unselfish service of this outstanding citizen to the school and community which he loved so much.

It is, therefore, a high privilege and a great honor for me, as an alumnus of this outstanding high school, to participate in these proceedings in which the Beta Club presents this excellent portrait of John McRaven Holbrook. In doing so, I express to him the good wishes of every person of this assembly for his future health and happiness. We express the hope that he will continue his outstanding public service for many more years as a leader in our educational, social, and civic life.

Challenge to the American Economy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, April 28, 1959

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SYMINGTON] before the National Press Club today.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Lawrence, distinguished guests, and gentlemen, thank you for the honor of being with you this afternoon.

I'd like to present briefly my opinion about our position in the world today. Every man in this room knows the nature of the basic conflict in which we are engaged.

It reaches around the world, and from outer space to the bottom of the oceans.

It involves our deepest beliefs in God and man.

It involves freedom or slavery for our people and the people of every other nation.

It extends all the way from cultural exchange to nuclear war; and from economic growth at home to economic growth in Ghana and India.

It is a protracted conflict. If we are fortunate enough to avoid nuclear war, it will last without letup through this century, and perhaps into the next. We are in for a long pull.

You have been writing about this for years—explaining the danger and sounding the warning.

You have compared the continued complacency among the American people with the dynamic dedication of the Russians and the Chinese.

You have reported how the Sino-Soviet leaders plan their foreign policies years ahead, while we only react to the crises these policies create.

The history of the last 6 years has been one of long and inglorious retreat by the United States from world influence, world power and world prestige, even from adequate capacity to defend ourselves. It has been a period in which the Communists have been persistently on the offensive, the United States constantly on the defensive.

Most statesmen, and all serious students of world affairs, agree we are losing the protracted conflict—the political, economic, technological, psychological, and physical conflict we are engaged in today. These analysts do not exaggerate and are not hysterical. After much study, they conclude that the Sino-Soviet group is gaining on us in strength—and steadily extending its influence throughout the world.

In an effort to avoid this situation, some of us have been talking for years about the growing missile gap, and other gaps. But the greatest gap of all is that between the precepts of this administration, and its performance.

It is a gap which cannot be written off to weakness, or even carelessness. There is mountainous evidence to support the belief that it is the product of intent; that it is part of a deliberate policy to conceal from the people the weakness of our position, and the ineptness of the administration in correcting that weakness.

Let me present several examples.

For a long time the administration led us to believe that the defenses of this Nation included planes on air alert. Last year, however, the Congress elicited the admission that we did not, and do not, have any such alert.

Another example: For a long time we have known of extensive ballistic missile firings by the Russians. But that fact, plus other information about their tremendous progress in this field, was concealed from the people for years, until the launching of the first sputnik made this particular Soviet progress obvious.

And another example:

When the Berlin situation once more became critical, the administration announced it did not intend to get caught in any ground war, and emphasized that it placed its main deterrent on massive nuclear retaliation.

The administration added that over 90 percent of that capacity for retaliation lies in the Strategic Air Force. Under questioning, however, the administration admitted that three-quarters of the present Strategic Air Force bombers are obsolescent; and that its 3-year plan for replacement of these old bombers will replace only about 5 percent of those now in operation.

And here is one I recently encountered. Last January the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff testified there were intermediate range ballistic missiles in England "which are just as effective or more effective than those ICBM's" and that these American IRBM's were "sitting there and ready to go."

Ten weeks after that statement was made to the Congress, I visited the IRBM base of ours in England which was nearest to completion.

There was nothing "ready to go."

There was nothing which met operational standards.

There was nothing adequately dispersed.

The entire installation was literally a sitting duck for sabotage.

And those naked IRBM's in England are by far the most advanced of anything we have on that score in any foreign country.

This situation in England is known and discussed in the British press.

The only people who don't know about it are the American people.

And this is but typical of other comparable occurrences.

Yet the administration continues to compress the military budget, and continues to allow the Russians to increase their lead in intercontinental ballistic missiles, while at the same time assuring the country that we have a balanced defense capable of deterring attack.

The present period in this country is ominously reminiscent of England under Stanley Baldwin.

The people of England were lulled into a false complacency because they were not given the facts.

Turning now to a different field, I fear that we are no better prepared to meet other forms of Soviet and Chinese attack than we are to meet military attack. Lenin's fondest dream was to overcome capitalism without war. And you will also recall that Stalin shifted the emphasis to economic performance, penetration and domination.

And Khrushchev and Mao Tse-tung likewise proclaim this to be their goal.

It is incredible to note how long it took the administration to recognize the existence of this Soviet economic offensive.

The program was recognized publicly only 2 years ago; and even since then any counteraction has been wholly inadequate.

Consider the mutual security bill before the Congress today.

Responsible officials in the Department of State let it be known last year that there was urgent annual need for a billion to a billion and a half dollars for the Development Loan Fund. They actually had urgent screened applications totaling one and a half billion dollars awaiting action. But as of today, the administration asks for only $700 million for the Development Loan Fund, and has dropped its request for any long-term program.

How can the Congress proceed with any wisdom under Executive leadership of this quality?

Only the President can lead and inspire the people to do the job and make the sacrifices needed to protect the vital interests of this Nation.

He is not doing it.

You here today know the importance of the psychological front in this protracted conflict with communism.

In our country we have, in rich measure, freedom, religious ideals, material abundance, and cultural accomplishment.

The Communists have tyranny, deprivation, and compulsion. Their only gods are state power and economic materialism.

Nevertheless, even though they offer only the hope of material progress, they are steadily gaining adherents or slaves, all over the world. It is true that science and technology have opened up great vistas of opportunity to all peoples.

But are we leading the world toward anything in particular?

Are we communicating effectively with peoples who still dream of a better life in their generation?

We are not. We do not even equip ourselves with the necessary tools.

For want of funds, our information program, our cultural relations program, our educational exchange program—are all kept on short leash.

I realize there is considerable resistance to these programs in Congress. But the administration does not ask for adequate funds, or ever really fight for them.

I have said only enough to suggest that in a wide variety of fields we are not doing what we must do to even begin to win this conflict with the Sino-Soviet Empire. There are glaring needs across the board.

Does this administration point out the needs and ask the Nation to make the necessary sacrifice?

It does not.

Instead, it calls on us to worship at the altar of the budget—and not just any budget, but its own conception of a budget which is balanced by looking backwards.

Does this administration speak the words which move men's souls to the defense of freedom?

It does not.

It uses the great publicity power of the Office of the President to divert our attention from the real needs and rivet it on the account books.

It has appealed to instincts which should be subordinated, and has created an atmosphere in which it is extremely difficult to pierce public complacency.

It labels as "reckless spenders" all those who are willing to make the necessary sacrifices for our national security and well-being.

I am as opposed as anyone to wasteful spending—in business and in government. I have always fought excessive payrolls, duplication, extra committees and commissions, useless programs.

But it is totally unsound to describe what is essential as wasteful spending.

All wise investment is sound.

I would classify, as such, investment in our people, investment in our cities, investment in scientific research; investment in the development of our resources—including the greatest resource—our children.

And investment in our allies and those uncommitted nations who some day will have a major part in determining the destiny of the world.

In business, after making a major decision for plant expansion, a president doesn't present that decision to his board with embarrassment. On the contrary, he discusses the proposed expansion as a potential asset, recommends it as such, and expresses it on the asset side of his balance sheet.

Why is there such pathetic reluctance on the part of this administration to provide, for all the people, such necessary assets as dams, and adequate highways, and adequate defense?

Why do they treat such potential assets as liabilities?

Far from "wasteful spending", these are sound investments in the future of America.

With real leadership in this country, we can meet the Communist challenge, win the conflict and stay solvent and prosperous.

To do this, however, we must have two prerequisites now clearly lacking.

One is vision.

The other is application of good business management to Government.

We have had a lot of constructive advice to this end—from the Rockefeller report, the Gaither report, the Report of the Committee for Economic Development, and many others.

But the prophets of bankruptcy in this country say we cannot afford to do what these reports all recommend that we do, because that would result in a deficit, or a rise in taxes.

So let me list just three areas in which, through the application of sound business practices, we can provide more funds for our needs, without raising taxes and without deficit spending.

First, we can save billions of dollars, and at the same time build a more adequate defense, if we stop preparing ourselves against the way the enemy would have attacked 10 years ago, and start preparing for the way they will attack now, if they attack at all.

This means that we should stop building our defenses on the basis of the traditions and the command structure of World War II, and start building them and operating them in recognition of the nuclear space age in which we now find ourselves.

As an example: This Nation, each year, is now spending over $5½ billion on a continental air defense which is completely ineffective against ICBM's and against missiles launched from submarines.

Most of this gigantic sum of money is being put into protection against long-range bombers, even though for some time our intelligence has told us that the Soviets are building an extremely small number of such bombers, and are pouring a steadily increasing percentage of their resources into long-range missiles.

Also, a large part of this $5½ billion has been spent in an attempt to defend our cities with ground-to-air missiles which, in modern warfare, would not travel far enough to reach those bombers.

Another example:

In this year's budget, we are being asked to spend some $300 million for a new aircraft carrier for limited wars—even though we already have plenty of carriers for that purpose.

And two others:

We are spending too much money on tactical airpower, when its only real role today is in close support of ground troops.

And we are spending far too much on short-range fighters whose usefulness in possible future wars will be negligible.

We are allowing waste and duplication to be compounded in a Military Establishment in which honest participants admit that service friction is increasing instead of being reduced.

We still have no true semblance of service unification.

As one example, the taxpayer is supporting six separate air forces with the enormous expense which results from such duplications.

To the next illustration.

We could raise several billion dollars in new tax revenue at existing rates, if we would enforce the present tax laws as they should be enforced.

Only this month the Commissioner of Internal Revenue testified that between $25 and $26 billion of taxable income is not now being reported for tax purposes.

The Commissioner emphasized that substantial additional revenue could be collected with more enforcement personnel. He further stated that each additional employee used for this purpose would, in 1 year, bring in 10 to 15 times his salary.

Yet again in the name of its false economy, the administration has cut enforcement personnel by thousands.

If this is economy, it is the most short-sighted economy I ever heard of.

And third, if our economy grows as it should, and operates at full production, we could raise far more revenue at current rates.

Right now, over 15 percent of our economic capacity lies idle—and of course one result of unemployment is smaller revenues.

What we need is more national wealth and production—more production every year to accommodate our growing population, our growing needs, and our growing responsibilities.

It has been estimated that if under the present administration our economy had grown as fast as it did under the preceding administration, tens of billions of dollars would have flowed into the Treasury.

Under present world conditions, our nation can no longer tolerate a stagnant and partially idle economy. We must make whatever investments are necessary to assure the high rate of economic growth in turn essential for security and prosperity.

I believe in this country.

I believe in its capacity to grow.

I believe in its ability to snap out of this complacency. I believe that, with leadership, we can mobilize our energies and resources and turn back the Communist challenge, keep the peace, build a better world.

I have faith and confidence we will do so.

Thank you again for having me here today.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, once more in Thy great mercy the white scroll of a new day unfolds before us.

At this altar of prayer, set up so long ago by our fathers, we pause asking that Thy enabling might may undergird our weakness.

Inspire and guide with Thy spirit these servants of the people—the few among the many—lifted to high pedestals of power and responsibility, to the end that they may be found faithful stewards of the Nation's trust.

May they be led to wise decisions that shall help heal the wounds and bridge the gulfs of these embittered days.

We ask it in the Name that is above every name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, April 28, 1959, was dispensed with.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the following subcommittees were authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today:

The Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations; the Subcommittee on Government Organization for Space Activities; the Antitrust and Monopoly Legislation Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour; and I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the morning hour, the call of the calendar be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consider executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports of committees, the nominations on the calendar will be stated.

U.S. CIRCUIT JUDGE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Latham Castle, of Illinois, to be U.S. circuit judge for the seventh circuit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

U.S. COURT OF CUSTOMS AND PATENT APPEALS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Eugene Worley, of Texas, to be chief judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, for many years I served with Judge Worley as a Member of Congress from my State. He is a judicious man; he is an able man; he is consecrated and dedicated, and he has spent his life in the public service—as a member of the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature and as a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States. I know of no more worthy appointment that has been made than the elevation of Judge Worley to be chief judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Arthur M. Smith, of Michigan, to be associate judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Edwin A. Robson, of Illinois, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CALL OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the aids of the Senate, on both sides, please notify the legislative review committees that we shall take 10 or 15 minutes, or whatever time is necessary, for the morning hour; and then we shall have a call of the calendar. I ask that they arrange with the clerks at the desk for the call of the calendar as soon as the morning hour is concluded and as soon as a quorum call is had thereafter.

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, under the 3-minute rule, I wish to make a statement in regard to the nomination of Mrs. Luce.

I am advised that since yesterday afternoon some of my colleagues have received telephone calls in which it has been charged that I followed some improper course of action as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, in investigating the qualifications of Mrs. Luce.

Mr. President, I never follow any course of action that I am not always willing to have placed on the top of the table. But when a nomination in the diplomatic and Foreign Service is before this body, it is my duty as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee to follow whatever reliable information is given to me in respect to the qualifications of the nominee.

In my long speech in opposition to the nomination of Mrs. Luce, I stated for the RECORD the four criteria which historically have been followed by the Senate in respect to passing judgment, under the advice and consent clause of the Constitution, on a nomination. I made very clear that I was basing my objection to the nomination of Mrs. Luce on the question of competency. I raised no other criterion at that time.

Mr. President, a very reliable newspaperman came to my office and said he thought I should call a certain individual in respect to the issue as to whether Mrs. Luce was lacking in respect of one of the other criteria; and of course I made the call. I shall not go into the details of that call because I think it involves matters of privacy. But in the course of it I said, "I only want an answer to this question"; and I put the question, and got the answer. The record will show that I carried the matter no farther in raising any objection.

I understand that on the radio and in the press, charges are being made that I followed some improper course of action. Let me make very clear that so long as I am a member of any Senate committee, whenever a nomination within the jurisdiction of that committee is before the Senate, and whenever a question from a reliable source is raised as to the mental competency of the nominee, I intend to make inquiry, and to find as best I can what the facts are.

I will say no more about the matter. I have refused to discuss it with the press in any detail. But I want the record to show that I followed a course of action which, so far as I am concerned, is an open book, and I was carrying out my solemn duty as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

DISTRIBUTION OF CERTAIN FUNDS TO QUAPAW TRIBE OF INDIANS

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize a per capita distribution of funds arising from a judgment in favor of the Quapaw Tribe, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS, RELATING TO POTAWATOMI INDIANS, OKLAHOMA AND KANSAS

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the use of funds arising from a judgment in favor of the Citizen Band of Potawatomi Indians of Oklahoma, and the Prairie Band of Potawatomi Indians of Kansas, and for other purposes (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CERTIFICATION OF ADEQUATE SOIL SURVEY AND LAND CLASSIFICATION, MERCEDES DIVISION, LOWER RIO GRANDE REHABILITATION PROJECT, TEXAS

A letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, that an adequate soil survey and land classification has been made of the lands in the Mercedes Division, lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project, Texas, and that the lands to be irrigated are susceptible to the production of agricultural crops by means of irrigation (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORT ON PROVISION OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE AND CERTAIN MARINE AND LIABILITY INSURANCE

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the provision of war-risk insurance and certain marine and liability insurance for the American public, as of March 31, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the PRESIDENT pro tempore:

The petition of James M. Kurtz, of Fort Chaffee, Ark., praying for the enactment of House bill 6269, relating to the readjustment pay of certain warrant officers; to the Committee on Armed Services.

A resolution adopted by the Junior Chamber of Commerce, of Mount Carmel, Ill., favoring the repeal of the excise tax on telephone service; to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 23. Concurrent resolution authorizing participation in the Strasbourg Conference (Rept. No. 233); and

H. Con. Res. 95. Concurrent resolution authorizing reprinting of House Document No. 451 of the 84th Congress.

By Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, with an amendment:

S. Res. 91. Resolution authorizing a study of the Federal judicial system (Rept. No. 234); and

S. Res. 110. Resolution to print, with additional copies, a report by Senators MANSFIELD and HICKENLOOPER on their observations of the United Nations.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL LABORERS BY SENATE SERGEANT AT ARMS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, I report an original resolution, authorizing the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to employ not to exceed six additional laborers, and I submit a report (No. 235) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, and the resolution will be placed on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 113) was placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That during the period ending on June 30, 1959, or the date of enactment of the Legislative Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1960, whichever is later, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is authorized to employ not to exceed 6 additional laborers at a rate of basic compensation of $1,740 per annum each payable from the contingent fund of the Senate.

REPORT ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Papers in the Executive Departments, to which was referred for examination and recommendation a list of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted a report thereon, pursuant to law.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RANDOLPH (for himself and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia):

S. 1826. A bill to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 by extending the approval of the estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System for an additional year, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

(See the remarks of Mr. RANDOLPH when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HUMPHREY:

S. 1827. A bill to amend the International Cultural Exchange and Trade Fair Participation Act of 1956 to authorize the President to provide for participation by foreign governments and citizens of other countries in artistic and cultural activities in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. EASTLAND:

S. 1829. A bill for the relief of Herman Luchner; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GOLDWATER:

S. 1830. A bill to amend section 164(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CAPEHART:

S. 1831. A bill for the relief of Nicholaos Stamatios Rellias; and

S. 1832. A bill for the relief of Milorad Jovanovic; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ALLOTT:

S. 1833. A bill authorizing the establishment of a national historic site at Bent's Old Fort near La Junta, Colo.; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

S. 1834. A bill to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 to provide assistance for strengthening the teaching of English in Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(See the remarks of Mr. ALLOTT when he introduced the above bills, which appear under separate headings.)

RESOLUTION

Mr. HENNINGS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 113) authorizing the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate to employ not to exceed six additional laborers, which was placed on the calendar.

(See the above resolution printed in full when reported by Mr. HENNINGS, which appears under the heading "Reports of Committees.")

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL-AID HIGHWAY ACTS OF 1956 AND 1958

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the able junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 by extending the approval of the estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System for an additional year and for other purposes.

This bill proposes to amend the Federal-Aid Highway Acts in three respects:

First. It extends the approval of the estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System for an additional year or through fiscal year 1962.

Second. It increases the authorization for appropriations for fiscal year 1962 for the Interstate System from $2.2 billion to $2.5 billion.

Third. It suspends the operation of section 209(g) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 to permit apportionment of funds to the States for fiscal years 1961 and 1962, and authorizes the use of funds advanced to the highway trust fund under the provisions of section 209(d) to cover any deficits in the trust fund through fiscal year 1962.

During the past few months, many people all over our country have become alarmed over the possible deficit that may occur in the highway trust fund at the end of fiscal year 1960. The entire future of the national highway program is imperiled. Curtailment of the highway program will have a very serious impact on many segments of our economy. This is true in the State of West Virginia, where a substantial road program will create needed employment.

Highway departments in many States will have to reduce their personnel. Contractors, suppliers of equipment and materials, and their employees will be seriously affected if this program is interrupted or delayed.

The Subcommittee on Public Roads of the Committee on Public Works, of which I am a member, has held hearings for 2 days during this session of Congress on the status of the Federal-aid highway program, the highway trust fund, and the problems encountered. Additional hearings are anticipated in the near future.

On December 31, 1958, there was a balance of $526 million in the highway trust fund. Expenditures are expected to exceed revenues during each of the fiscal years 1959 and 1960, which will use up the surplus and create a deficit of $241 million in the trust fund by the end of fiscal year 1960 unless additional revenues are provided. The deficit would reach $1,059 million at the end of fiscal year 1961, and $2,166 million by the end of 1962, assuming the authorized apportionments are made.

The Federal Highway Administrator advised the committee that because of the provisions of section 209(g) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956, it will be necessary to forego completely any apportionment of interstate funds during calendar year 1959 for the fiscal year 1961, and the apportionment during calendar year 1960 for fiscal year 1962 would only amount to about $500 million. The authorization for 1961 is $2.5 billion, and for 1962 it is $2.2 billion. After fiscal year 1962, interstate apportionments would amount to about $1.7 billion or $1.8 billion annually. Apportionment of funds for the regular Federal-aid systems would not be affected as they get first call on the funds in the highway trust fund.

To provide additional funds for financing the highway program without waiving the provisions of section 209(g), the President recommended in his budget message for 1960, that motor fuel taxes be temporarily increased by 1.5 cents per gallon effective July 1, 1959, and remain in effect through fiscal year 1964. He also recommended that funds for the forest and public lands highways be obtained from the trust fund instead of from the general fund, a new tax on jet fuel, and that the tax on aviation gasoline now going into the trust fund, go into the general fund. The Secretary of the Treasury transmitted proposed legislation to Congress on April 3, 1959, to carry out the President's recommendations.

There has been general widespread opposition to any increase in the Federal gasoline tax at this time. The committee has been advised that 34 State Governors have gone on record as opposing any increase in the Federal gasoline tax. Resolutions opposing such an increase were offered in 16 States and have been adopted in 10, Alaska, Arkansas, Delaware, Maryland, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, and Texas.

Two States have increased gasoline taxes—New York from 4 to 6 cents per gallon, and West Virginia from 6 to 7 cents. Still pending are proposed increases in 7 States.

I have considered the various alternatives that are possible to solve the difficult problem we are now facing.

I do not believe that this is the proper time to increase the taxes, to provide for bond financing, or to allocate additional Federal excise taxes to the highway trust fund.

In January 1961, the Secretary of Commerce is to submit to Congress a report on a study of the cost of highways to various classes of users, and the benefits to be derived from the highway systems by both users and nonusers. At the same time a second detailed estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System will be available, and also some of the results of the Illinois road test now being made. When these reports are available, we will be in a much better position to reach a satisfactory solution that would permit the highway program to proceed on a more permanent basis.

The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 approved the estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System in each State, published in House Document No. 300, 85th Congress, as a basis for making the apportionment of the funds authorized for the Interstate System for fiscal year 1960. Public Law 899, 85th Congress extended the approval to cover fiscal year 1961.

The bill I have introduced would extend the approval of the estimate of cost to cover fiscal year 1962. I believe this is essential as no apportionment can be made for 1962 until there is a basis for such apportionment. That apportionment would normally be made in July 1960. The next cost estimate will be submitted in January 1961, so we will not have a revised cost estimate available when the time for making the 1962 apportionment arrives.

The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 increased the authorizations for appropriations for fiscal years 1960 and 1961 from $2.2 to $2.5 billion, but authorized no increases beyond 1961. I believe that the appropriations for 1962 should be at least equal to those of 1960 and 1961. This increased authorization would prevent any dropoff, or curtailment of the highway program after fiscal year 1961, and permit States to continue their planning on an even schedule.

The Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 authorized the apportionment of all funds authorized for fiscal years 1959 and 1960 to the States, notwithstanding the provisions of section 209(g) of the 1956 act.

A similar procedure appears to be the most desirable course to follow at this time, with an added provision that would permit the use of appropriation of repayable advances to the highway trust fund under the provisions of section 209(d) to defray expenditures made by the reason of such apportionment.

This procedure would permit the apportionment of $2.5 billion for each of fiscal years 1961 and 1962 and prevent curtailment of the program.

There are now 7 States using 1958 interstate funds which would not be in any trouble if no apportionments are made for fiscal years 1961 and 1962; 33 States including West Virginia are now using 1959 funds, most of which will be used up by the end of the fiscal year; and 9 States are now utilizing fiscal year 1960 funds. These nine States are the ones that would be seriously affected if apportionments for succeeding years are not made. Several States are in a position to use interstate funds at a faster rate than now provided. One State is now expediting improvement of the Interstate System by means of advance construction projects prior to apportionment of funds, and several other States are considering similar action.

We have embarked on a vast program of improving the highways of our Nation. We have made commitments to the States which we are under obligation to carry out. Many thousands of employees of contractors and suppliers of equipment and material are depending on this program for their livelihood. Large amounts of highway rights-of-way have been purchased and people moved from their homes to make way for new highways. To curtail the program at this time would be uneconomical and a serious setback to the ultimate completion of our highway systems in which every citizen of our country has a high stake.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the desk until the close of business May 5, 1959, for further cosponsorship.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1826) to amend the Federal Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 by extending the approval of the estimate of cost of completing the Interstate System for an additional year, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. RANDOLPH (for himself and Mr. BYRD of West Virginia), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Works, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 8 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1958 (72 Stat. 94), as amended, is hereby further amended by striking out "the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, June 30, 1961, and June 30, 1962."

SEC. 2. That section 108(b) of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 is amended by striking out "the additional sum of $2,200,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962", and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "the additional sum of $2,500,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962."

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 209(g) of the Act approved June 29, 1956 (70 Stat. 400), the Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to apportion among the several States in the manner provided by law, all of the funds authorized for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1961, and June 30, 1962, for the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways and the Federal-aid primary and secondary highway systems, including extensions thereof within urban areas. To the extent that amounts in the Highway Trust Fund are insufficient for such purposes, additional funds appropriated to such Trust Fund as repayable advances, pursuant to the provisions of section 209(d) of the Highway Revenue Act of 1956 (70 Stat. 399), may be used to defray expenditures resulting from apportionment to the States of the amount authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1961, and June 30, 1962, and prior fiscal years, for the Interstate System and the Federal-aid primary and secondary highway systems, including extensions thereof within urban areas.

NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE AT BENT'S OLD FORT NEAR LA JUNTA, COLO.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the exciting real-life saga that was the winning of the West is punctuated vividly by various sites and locations of historic importance. Indeed, the excitement of those days is being portrayed right now in a series of articles in Life magazine which I commend to my colleagues.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the ravages of time and the shift of population has desolated many of these spots, some beyond reconstruction. It is all too infrequent that a part of the old West—so much a part of those who live in my State—can be reclaimed from the past; be refurbished and maintained for those of every age to see, study, and enjoy.

Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which provides that such a site be protected from disappearing. I refer to Bent's Old Fort site near La Junta, Colo. This old fort played a dramatic role in our American history as part of the old Santa Fe Trail. It stands today in ruins, unprotected from the pounding of time unless we act.

Recently, the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments, in a report to the Secretary, recommended that this site be classified as having exceptional value in illustrating and commemorating this important part of our historical heritage.

Bent's Old Fort was the site of the first trading post established in that part of the country. Built by Charles and William Bent in 1832, it served as an important stopping point for trappers and traders between the Missouri River and Santa Fe. It served as an information center and a rallying point for the surrounding settlers in times of trouble.

The bill would establish Bent's Old Fort as a national historic site to be set aside as a public national memorial to commemorate its significant part in the opening of the West.

The bill would further authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire, in behalf of the United States, the site and buildings as he sees necessary for the restoration of the old fort.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1833) authorizing the establishment of a national historic site at Bent's Old Fort near La Junta, Colo., introduced by Mr. ALLOTT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

TEACHING OF ENGLISH IN PUERTO RICO

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, last year when we enacted into law the National Defense Education Act, we included two major programs to strengthen our efforts in the public educational system for the instruction of foreign languages. For exactly the same reasons that the teaching of other foreign languages is important here in this country, instruction in the English language is critically important in Puerto Rico.

The native language of Puerto Rico is Spanish. The majority of the students who enter the public schools know no English. They will have to learn English in the English classes. The language of instruction for all subjects, except English, is Spanish. English is taught as a special subject from the first grade to the twelfth. The teaching of English is done almost entirely by Puerto Ricans, who are nonnative speakers of English. The training they need is in the teaching of English as a foreign, not a native, language. The methodology employed in teaching is also that of teaching a foreign, rather than a native, language. All the foregoing justifies the inclusion of English in Puerto Rico among the "foreign languages" provided for by the act.

It is of utmost importance to national defense that Puerto Ricans be able to speak, understand, read, and write the English language. Puerto Rican young men are all subject to the draft and serve in the U.S. Armed Forces. Puerto Ricans already know natively one of the world's most important languages, Spanish. Making them competent in English would be of tremendous strategic value. Puerto Rico is in a key position with reference to Latin America, with its linguistic and cultural link to the vast majority of the nations of the Western Hemisphere, as well as to Spain on the other side of the Atlantic.

The main purpose of title III is to strengthen instruction, and three-fourths of the English teachers in the elementary and secondary schools in Puerto Rico are inadequately prepared, both in academic preparation and in the English language itself. Auditory aids for the classroom to train students' ears and to be a model for their tongues is a vital need, particularly since the teachers are not native speakers of English. The problem of supervision of such teachers is a tremendous one. Title III of the act thus offers just the kind of help that the teaching of English in Puerto Rico needs.

Title VI, part B, is also designed to help Puerto Rico's situation, as it attacks the problem at its roots, viz, the shortage of good language teachers. Through the setting up of language institutes, it seeks better teachers for the elementary and secondary student. Our basic problem is to train the teachers who are now teaching in the new teaching methods and the new instructional materials for the teaching of English as a second language, and to increase their command of the English language. This title makes it possible for institutes for such training to be set up and gives tremendous incentive for both present and prospective teachers to attend.

Mr. President, this is not the only problem which has developed in the early operation of the National Defense Education Act programs. There are a number of others which have come to my attention. For the most part I believe corrections of this law should await a complete trial so that in revising the law, we can eliminate as many problems as possible without creating new ones. However, it is clear that if Puerto Rico is to gain any advantage from titles 3 and 6 of the National Defense Education Act, we must, as soon as possible, correct this oversight.

I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958, which, if enacted, will clear up this matter. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1834) to amend the National Defense Education Act of 1958 to provide assistance for strengthening the teaching of English in Puerto Rico, introduced by Mr. ALLOTT, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, effective July 1, 1959, section 103 of the National Defense Education Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-864) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(2) For purposes of title III and for purposes of training, under part B of title VI, individuals engaged or preparing to engage in teaching, or supervising or training teachers, in Puerto Rico, the English language shall be regarded as a modern foreign language in Puerto Rico."

REPRESENTATION OF INDIGENT DEFENDANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES—AMENDMENTS

Mr. JAVITS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill (S. 895) to provide for the representation of indigent defendants in criminal cases in the district courts of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, on April 21, 1959, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], I introduced the bill (S. 1760) to provide that the United States shall return to the former owners oil and gas rights in certain lands acquired for the Garrison Dam and Reservoir project, North Dakota, and it was referred to the Committee on Public Works. A similar bill, introduced last year, was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Public Works, the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and he is agreeable to having the bill referred now to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE FREEDOM COMMISSION AND FREEDOM ACADEMY—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my name may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 1689) to create the Freedom Commission for the development of the science of counteraction to the world Communist conspiracy and for the training and development of leaders in a total political war, introduced by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] on behalf of himself and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], on April 15, 1959, at the next printing of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATES FOR CERTAIN FREE AND TOLL ROADS IN NATIONAL SYSTEM OF INTERSTATE AND DEFENSE HIGHWAYS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on April 17, 1959, on behalf of myself and other Senators, I introduced the bill (S. 1714) to provide equitable reimbursement to States for mileage taken into the national system of defense and interstate highways. My colleague, the able junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], has advised me he desires to be a cosponsor of that bill. I ask unanimous consent that his name may appear as a cosponsor when the bill is next printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON EXECUTIVE PRIVILEGE BY CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I wish to announce, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the subcommittee has scheduled a public hearing on the subject of executive privilege on Tuesday, May 5, 1959, at 10:30 a.m., in room 318—the caucus room—of the Old Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

The subcommittee will hear representatives of the International Cooperation Administration, who will testify regarding the citation of the so-called executive privilege by officials of the International Cooperation Administration as authority for withholding certain types of information from the General Accounting Office. Previously the subcommittee heard testimony from Mr. Robert Keller, General Counsel of the General Accounting Office, regarding this subject, and now is affording the Director of the International Cooperation Administration the opportunity to present his views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

FISH SANCTUARY PROPOSED FOR IDAHO'S SALMON RIVER

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, some of the leading conservationists in the Pacific Northwest have urged upon some of us in the Senate the introduction of legislation to create a fish sanctuary in the Salmon River watershed, where over 60 percent of the spring Chinook salmon runs of the Columbia Basin are spawned.

Mr. Rollin E. Bowles, leader in the Izaak Walton League and member of the Oregon State Game Commission, is the most recent to visit me on such a mission.

I favor wholeheartedly the protection of Columbia River migratory fish. I have opposed the Nez Perce Dam because it would blockade the Salmon to fish passage. I fear that our salmon industry and sports fishing could be destroyed if the Salmon River is lost as a spawning area.

But, Mr. President, the Salmon River watershed is wholly within the State of Idaho—100 percent of it. Therefore, I think it only proper that the establishment of a fish sanctuary on the Salmon River be sponsored by one of the distinguished Senators from Idaho, Mr. DWORSHAK or Mr. CHURCH. I would be glad to serve as a cosponsor under their able guidance.

But when a river is entirely within the boundaries of one particular State, I do not think that legislation as sweeping and as drastic as establishing a fish sanctuary on that river's watershed should be sponsored in chief by any Senator except one helping to represent that State.

Should either Senator CHURCH or Senator DWORSHAK decide to offer a resolution creating a salmon sanctuary on the Salmon River, I would consider it a privilege to act as one of the cosponsors of the measure.

FORT BOWIE, ARIZ.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, early in this session I introduced a bill, S. 939, which would establish Fort Bowie in Arizona as a national historic site. The interest in maintaining this nearly 100-year-old fort as a monument to our western growth was evident long before this bill was introduced. However, recently much has been written about the fort and its history, and one of the best and most colorful articles was written by Mrs. Opie Rundle Burgess, of Warren, Ariz., and published in the March 10 and 11 issues of the Bisbee Daily Review. Because of the historical value of this two-part article, I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT BOWIE'S COLORFUL PAST
(By Opie Rundle Burgess)

Recently several questions have been asked pertaining to Fort Bowie. Where is the old fort? Why should it be made a national monument? I have visited Fort Bowie, read its history, knew the late Neil Erickson, who was a soldier at the fort, under the command of Gen. George Crook, also heard stories from Mrs. Wickham, who lived there during Geronimo's days and heard stories from George Dunn, whose father was a soldier at the fort, and while scouting for Indians found ore in the Bisbee Canyon.

I have tried to answer these two questions in story form.

Peace, silence, and legend hovers over old Fort Bowie, where long ago war clouds blemished the blueness of the sky, the whir of arrows shattered the gentle evening breeze, and the solitude of mountain and valley broken by smothered screams of travelers, journeying through Apacheland.

Out in southeastern Arizona, nestled in one of nature's cradles in the extreme northern range of the Chiricahua Mountains, lie the ruins of Fort Bowie in its solitary surroundings.

When the Gadsden Purchase was ratified in 1854, the U.S. Government received not only miles upon miles of worthless land, as it seemed in those days, but with the land went a band of warring Chiricahua Apaches, that the Government didn't know how to handle.

Down through the years without the protecting arm of the Government, this most historical landmark has been vandalized by man, scorched by the desert sun, and beaten by wind and storm while waiting for recognition of its colorful role of 20 years' warring against the Apaches, and the 4 tragic years of the Civil War, when our Government fought for its destiny, trying to hold the Union as one, and not as a house divided.

In July 1862, while the heat of the desert became unbearable, and the ravaging of Apache warfare sizzled with extreme violence, the first troop from California, under the command of Capt. Thomas Roberts, on their way to the Rio Grande during the beginning of the Civil War, was viciously attacked by a large band of Indians at Apache Pass. After that fight, the fort was established, and named after the colonel of the 5th Infantry, George W. Bowie.

No more lonely location could have been chosen for the fort, but the reasons were threefold. First, it served as a key outpost to the U.S. Army's grueling campaign against the Chiricahua Apache Indians.

Second, the fort would guard the springs, that lifesaving fluid so precious to travelers, military, and their animals. The soldiers would also escort mail carriers, stagecoaches, and wagon supplies through Apache Pass. Third, the fort's geographical position during the Civil War served as a vital, shorter route from California to the Rio Grande. Without this fort, all communications and troop movement would have been jeopardized as long as the Apache Indians held undisputed possession of Apache Pass.

The fort was built in 2½ weeks by the soldiers of the 5th Infantry, California volunteers. At first, most of the men lived in tents, others sought refuge in caves, and when it rained the water poured through the ground like a sieve. The fort was isolated. The food bad, and sickness prevailed. Under such conditions, officers and men were transferred frequently, as a nerve-wracking vigilance was always necessary, for their enemy was a band of sly savages. There were rarely more than 100 men at the fort, and often as few as 50, while the Apaches, under the leadership of Cochise, and Mangas Coloradas, numbered close to 500. With such a small force at the fort they could do little more than to protect the springs and send escort with supply trains and travelers through Apache Pass.

Shortly after the first detachment of cavalry was sent to the fort, Apaches, with their master tactics and slyness, managed to divert the attention of the herd guard and made off with the entire herd of cavalry horses.

Complaints of the conditions of the fort were sent to Colonel Carleton, who authorized the construction of a new fort. This fort was laid out on the general plan of all military posts. All buildings were built forming a large square facing the parade ground where each morning reveille broke the stillness of the hills. Later, the clear call of a bugle brought all to attention around the flagpole, where the Stars and Stripes, the symbolic life of the fort and the Union, proudly waved in that far removed lonely spot, but it gave assurance to those soldiers that they, too, were fighting for a cause. It's here today that we can see the remnants of a tragic American drama.

We, who are so proud of Arizona realize that this enchanted land is crammed with the marvels of God's handiwork. There are castles built in the fastness of stone cliffs that lure historians to try and knit together the broken threads of a lost people. Sunken villages of prehistoric Indians have become a playground for archeologists. The Colorado River still gnaws at the earth's sandy sides fashioning deeper and more fantastic canyons, and on mountain tops, eerie, peculiar turrets and domes left by force of volcanism and erosion. All these attract tourists to our State. Yet, solemn and still, Fort Bowie remains an orphaned child.

After the Civil War, and years of a gruelling campaign against the warring Apaches, it was no longer necessary to maintain troops at Arizona's frontier. It was then when Fort Bowie was abandoned.

So on down through the years, the silent tenantless barracks have fallen to ruins. The face of the parade ground bearded with cactus, and tumble weed. The clear call of a bugle no longer breaks the silence of a new-dawning day, but in its place, the sweet trill of a mocking bird, and the buzz of insects accentuate the fort's loneliness. All day long the sun and shadows play among the ruins, until twilight takes over after the sun slips silently behind the hills, throwing its gay colors of farewell to the friendly clouds. Then night closes over the land and hangs its tiny lanterns, the stars, to keep watch over the old fort, while the cool mountain breeze caresses the silent, adobe walls and softly hums—your work is done; your rest well earned; slumber on.

But recently progressive Arizona is not willing that this historic landmark should be entirely reclaimed by the desert. A bill to establish Fort Bowie as a National Monument was introduced to Congress by our U.S. Senator. Citizens and the National Advisory Board have awakened to the urgent necessity of the protection for this outstanding military post, for probably no outfit in the Army of frontier days can boast of a history more valuable, or typical of the American soldier's varied career, than that of Fort Bowie.

The reasons for making this fort a National Monument are many. Fort Bowie is like a priceless history book, old, yet each faded and crumpled page tells the story of the tenacity and courage of both officers and men who were not afraid to face danger and untold hardship, to fight a cruel, crafty enemy, so others to follow, might find Arizona a land of freedom and plenty.

The most outstanding corps of military officers in the annals of American history, and their heroic deeds are found throughout the story, such men as Lt. Gen. Phil Sheridan, who came from Washington, D.C., to inspect the soldiers at Fort Bowie before starting their gruelling campaign against Geronimo and his renegades, Gen. Leonard Wood, Assistant Surgeon of the U.S. Army, Gen. George Crook, Gen. Nelson Miles, Gen. O. O. Howard, all checked in and out of the famous fort. Others under their command were Captain Crawford, who led the first campaign, trailing the Apaches far into Mexico, and who was killed by Mexican troopers while doing all in his power to help them against the Apaches. Captain Crawford's body was brought back to Fort Bowie and given full military honors for his heroic sacrifice. General Crook, with military escort, then took the body back to Crawford's home in Nebraska. Capt. H. W. Lawton was chosen as leader of the second campaign under General Miles. He and General Wood were the only 2 out of 90 picked men who finished the 1,500-mile trek. Climbing the highest peaks, then descending to the deepest canyons through the heat of a desert's sun in June and July. Going days without water or cooked food, enduring hardships that most men could not take. And after this endurance trip, and finding Geronimo's camp in the Sierra Madres in Mexico, Lieutenant Gatewood alone, and without firearms, entered Geronimo's camp to ask the Apaches to surrender, which was recorded as one of the greatest of heroic feats.

And as the pages of this great history book are turned we read such names as Cochise, Mangas Coloradas, Geronimo, Natchez, Nana, and Chato. True, they were the enemy, yet they were leaders, every one of them, and played an important role in the fort's great drama. We also read of Lieutenant Rucker and Sgt. Jack Dunn while chasing Apaches, and looking for fresh drinking water entered a canyon and by accident, Jack Dunn found what most men would desert home and country for, earth's greatest treasures, her precious metals. But for love of their flag and loyalty to their country, the two men turned away from the beckoning hand of Midas and returned to Fort Bowie. The two soldiers in time intended to return to their secret canyon, but death cheated Lieutenant Rucker from his share of riches while trying to save one of his men in a flash flood. Both men were drowned. Jack Dunn was cheated of his bonanza by the betrayal of a prospector. Years later this canyon was named Bisbee, and for 78 years has ranked as one of the richest copper camps in the world. Fort Bowie's register bears the name of a great photographer, C. S. Fly, whose Indian pictures are well guarded in the archives of our National Capital.

These men left a heritage that Arizona is proud of today, and to have future generations know their story, and see the place where the story was made, and to show our appreciation and gratitude toward these heroic men, the flag they so valiantly fought for should wave over Fort Bowie, and over the graves of the men who gave their lives, to clear the trail for the Union's last frontier, Arizona.

Ironical as it may seem, the ruins of Fort Bowie stand as a monument to the warring Apache Indians. The Chiricahua Mountains was their home. The vast expanse of valley their hunting ground. For several generations they successfully defended their beloved land from the Spaniards, the Mexicans, and the Americans, but finally succumbed, only when their own kindred joined forces against them. In less than 75 years, the descendants of those warring Apaches have become a peaceful, capable, trustworthy, and intelligent race of people, and who are recognized as among the best cattlemen, raising the finest Hereford range beef in the West. And cattlemen from Western States make a yearly trip at roundup time, to buy Apache cattle.

In thinking of Fort Bowie's colorful day we can close our eyes and visualize a great stage set alternately with high rugged mountains wooded with lofty pines, and see the valley below dotted with cactus, mesquite, and catclaw, and the silent drawn curtain reveals the old fort and the part it played in Arizona's history. On this stage was enacted a pageant of deep drama, as colorful, and as thrilling as that produced by any State, for that campaign against the vicious Apaches ranks as the most arduous of frontier military history, and for the brilliant work of her officers and the courage of her men, Fort Bowie once received the spotlight, but the Nation's applause soon faded with the shadows of the night.

FORT BOWIE'S COLORFUL PAST

(By Opie Rundle Burgess)

The opening scene of Fort Bowie's great drama shows that darkness had settled over a tranquil wilderness of desert beauty. Brilliant stars studded the dark sky and blinked down upon a lonely Sibly tent, glowing from the light of a hanging lantern. Two great actors, leaders both of them, made their appearance upon the stage. Lieutenant Bascom from West Point, a stranger in a strange land made his appearance from the east, followed by 60 men clad in neat well-fittted uniforms of blue, representing men of a mighty nation. Cochise, the greatest of Apache chiefs made his appearance from the west, followed by a ragged group in their native garb. Their frowsy hair hung to their shoulders, and bound back from their foreheads with a soiled bandanna. They too, represented a mighty tribe. The two leaders met with no cordial or friendly handshake. Lieutenant Bascom under a white flag of truce, had summoned Cochise and his men for council. Bascom eyed Cochise with disdain and distrust. The great chief felt the chill of the white man's cold gray eyes, but being an Apache, managed to conceal the suspicion in his own eyes, as he did not want trouble with the white man. Lieutenant Bascom beckoned Cochise and his men to enter the tent.

The issue of that conference was a small one. A boy and some cattle had been stolen, and Cochise repeated their innocence, and even offered to help find the child. Lieutenant Bascom looked upon that ragged group with intolerance and impatience, and snapped out two words, "Arrest them."

Those two words spoken in that Sibly tent out on a lonely Arizona desert burst like a bomb and touched off a fiendish war that lasted 24 years. Cochise heard the words of the white man, and aflame with hatred, and outraged by the violation of the sacred custom of council slipped to the rear of the tent, whipped out his knife and slashed the canvas side of the tent while his warriors struggled against the soldiers. The great chief, and all but three of his men escaped.

The stillness of that Arizona night was shattered by blood curdling savage outcries. And the thud, thud of Apache ponies making their flight across the great stage as night's blackest curtain fell on a terrified land. In the distance, a lone coyote emitted a mournful wail, an omen of tragedy and death.

A curtain of misty rays of a new-risen sun lightened the scene of the second act, and shows a lone Apache high on a rock facing the great Chiricahua Mountains sending up a smoke signal. Mangas Coloradas and his warriors, like eagles resting on a rocky peak read the signal. It was a message that Cochise was on the warpath. A message that meant torture and death to all who crossed the Apache trail.

The time was 1861, and on the other side of the great stage a troop of California volunteers were on a march to the Rio Grande. They had traveled days without water, but as they neared the only place where water was found, Cochise, Managas Coloradas and 300 warriors awaited the unsuspecting soldiers. The Apaches held their fire until the troops were well into the perpendicular cliffs of Apache Pass before they opened fire with bullets and arrows. The soldiers fought bravely, but of no avail. They withdrew and Captain Roberts reformed his command. Again they advanced, but the Apaches on the hills above the pass, hiding behind rocks, trees, and clumps of bear grass drove the soldiers back. It was then when Captain Roberts played his trump card. He mounted two howitzers on wagons and advanced. Bursting artillery shells, soon scattered the bewildered, yelling Apaches into the hills, and the soldiers took possession of the springs. Many years later an Apache told Captain Roberts they never would have gotten through the pass, if the soldiers hadn't fired wagons at them.

The last part of the scene shows the building of Fort Bowie, which was built by the 5th Infantry California volunteers, and it was their lot to remain at the fort to guard the springs, to escort travelers, and wagon trains through the pass. The building of the fort was an essential factor during the Civil War, as all Government soldiers were withdrawn, leaving the Arizona frontier without military protection.

Twelve years had elapsed since the Apache fight. Cochise was now an old man, and had made peace with the white man, but Natchez, his son, and Geronimo fought on. For 2 years Cochise kept his peace, and as the curtain lowers, the soldiers at Fort Bowie looked toward the west as the setting sun placed a golden halo above the mountain tops, and far off in the distance they watched a tenuous ribbon of black smoke unfurl above a jutting cliff of Cochise Stronghold. A silent, strange requiem of savages. Cochise, their great chief was dead.

Only a faint light streak on the eastern sky signaled the approaching day of the last act of Arizona's deep historical drama. A time of coming events that would sprinkle golden glowing blessings over the land.

A dust cloud far down the eastern corner of the great stage announced the coming of homeseekers, farmers, cattlemen, and prospectors. All following the beckoning rays of a promised land, Arizona, but when the emigrants reached the border, they found it blocked by a band of merciless, warring Apaches.

It was then, in 1885, when the eyes of the Government, and all eyes of the Union were focused on Fort Bowie, which became the strategic focal point of this great drama. The soldiers of Fort Bowie fought strange and weird battles against savages who did not come out in the open and fight, but ambushed, and secreted themselves high on the mountains with improved guns and plenty of ammunition. The hardships and physical sufferings of both officers and men of this western campaign to free Arizona from a dreaded menace is unbelievable, yet the soldiers of Fort Bowie knew their paramount duty was to get Geronimo, leader of the hostiles, to surrender unconditionally.

General Crook took the leading role of the first campaign. Six months the soldiers under Captain Crawford trailed the Apaches. Their days were padded with hardships, tragedy, discouragement, and later the pressed resignation of their beloved leader, General Crook, brought on by disgrunted officers in Washington, D.C., when the fulfillment of their mission was successful to the point of having Geronimo surrender, but on the night before they reached Fort Bowie, Geronimo obtained "Tiswin," a fiery corn drink, and breaking his promise to General Crook, fled back to the hills, taking a small band of Apaches with him.

The scene does not change, but rage and the tempo of decision, "Get Geronimo, dead or alive," became the urgent demand of the Government. General Nelson Miles then takes the leading part of this final, and most important, campaign that brought an end to Apache warfare.

The clear call of Boots and Saddles resounded over the parade ground and echoed back from the hills. The jingling of spurs and the creaking of leather were heard as 90 picked men and their officers mounted, and waited for the command to march, while over their heads the American flag snapped a salute of Godspeed, and good luck.

The Government sent the best they had in men and supplies. An added 5,000 soldiers patrolled the desert from Arizona to Mexico. General Wood, Assistant Surgeon of the United States Army, and Captain Lawton with their men, trailed Geronimo's bloody trail. Words have failed historians in describing the torture and other hardships the men endured while marching 1,500 miles through the heat of the summer, over precipitous mountains, down deep canyons, and over a desert filled with cactus and rattlesnakes.

After 5 months of marching to the point of exhaustion, Geronimo's camp was reached in the Sierra Madre Mountains in Mexico. This time he saw that there was no escape for him, so surrendered to Lieutenant Gatewood, who was ordered by Geronimo to come to his camp alone and unarmed. Which he did. Geronimo greeted Gatewood as a long-lost friend and begged for his life, also the lives of his followers. Geronimo, who had never had mercy on anyone, now begged for mercy.

On September 8, 1886, the soul-stirring scene of Arizona's great pageant for freedom, peace, and prosperity was ushered in by the brilliant rays of sunshine, touching not only the mountains and valleys, but sending rays of hope and happiness into the hearts of loved ones left behind at Fort Bowie, when a courier arrived at the fort with a message that General Miles, officers, soldiers, and their booty of war, the hostile Apaches, would arrive later that day.

The sun had slipped far toward the western hills when the roll of drums and the sweet call of a bugle announced the arrival of the returning soldiers. That arrival was spectacular, dramatic, and breathtaking. Geronimo sat erect on his horse and rode beside General Miles, who had met them at Skeleton Canyon. A strange, pitiful, dirty group of Apaches, most of them women and children, trailed behind them. Then came General Wood and Captain Lawton, the only 2 of the original 90 picked men who trailed Geronimo and his small band from Fort Bowie back to Fort Bowie. When these two men started on that campaign they were sturdy in muscle, stalwart in body, and vibrant with the prime of life. They returned bent, thin, weary, and worn, but their haggard faces lightened with a sparkle of joy as they were cheered by the spectators, for they knew they had fulfilled their mission.

"Attention," came the command. Everything stopped. For a moment on that great stage not a sound broke the silence until the soiled blanket about Geronimo's shoulders fell to the ground as he rose in his stirrups, and gazed across the valley toward Bonita Canyon, his stronghold. All eyes were upon him. The clicking of triggers from every soldier's gun broke the deathly silence. Geronimo then dismounted and walked slowly toward General Miles, and like a blade of a sharp sword, General Miles slashed cutting words of Geronimo's deceit a treachery. "Geronimo, you have lied. You have murdered. You have stolen cattle from the Americans and the Mexicans, and you have broken every promise that Cochise made to the white man." Those words severed the hostiles from Arizona forever.

Geronimo stood before the white man, a defeated warrior. His reign was over. The minutes that followed were filled with strained tension until the wagons rolled onto the parade ground, and soon were filled with Apaches. As they left, the 4th Cavalry Band played "Auld Lang Syne, Should auld acquaintance be forgot." The loud jeering and laughing from the soldiers and spectators was not appreciated by Geronimo.

The long memorable day signed off with a gorgeous sunset, splashing the sky with blazing colors of gold, red, and orange, and against that glorious background, the Apaches rode away to their new home in Florida.

The twilight soon erased the color from the sky, and slowly night drew her curtain over a happy land as the evening breeze whispered, "We salute you, brave soldiers of Fort Bowie."

PARK SERVICE ADVISORY BOARD APPROVES EARLY ACTION ON OREGON DUNES SEASHORE AREA

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, announcement was made yesterday of action by the Advisory Board on National Parks for inclusion of eight new areas in the National Park System. One of these, happily, is the Oregon Dunes National Seashore Area. I am extremely pleased and heartened by the decision of the National Park Advisory Board, because I have introduced a bill—S. 1526—to accomplish that purpose.

The Board's decision affirms the recreation value of the unique Oregon coastal dunes. This should demonstrate to the people of my State the widespread support in the Nation for establishment of this great seacoast recreation area under our National Park Service. Their decision makes more evident than ever that those working for the proposed national seashore area are acting in the best interests of Oregon as a tourist center. It is my hope that we can enact this legislation into law during the 86th Congress. Oregon's seacoast would benefit vastly in travel potential by its passage.

Also, I am pleased by the statements in support of the Oregon dunes seashore area by the distinguished Oregon editor, Mr. William M. Tugman, who publishes the Port Umpqua Courier at Reedsport. Mr. Tugman was editor of the Eugene Register-Guard for 25 years, and has received numerous awards and widespread recognition for his newspaper work. Mr. Tugman is an effective spokesman for establishment of the Oregon Dunes National Seashore Area, and I ask consent to include in the RECORD with my remarks, a news story from the Eugene Register-Guard of April 25, 1959, with his views and comments on the valuable park development proposal. I also ask consent to include an Associated Press news story about action of the Park Service's Advisory Board, and a Department of Interior press release on the same subject.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COAST PUBLISHER BACKS DUNE PARK

(From the Eugene, (Oreg.) Register-Guard)

William M. Tugman, publisher of the Reedsport newspaper, Port Umpqua Courier, told the Eugene Chamber of Commerce Forum Friday noon here that he favors the proposed establishment of a National Seashore Recreation Area in the sand dunes between Reedsport and Florence.

Tugman was one of nine Douglas County citizens who were guests of the chamber at a regular meeting in the Eugene Hotel. The visitors told about recreation and scenic attractions of the Reedsport area, and called for mutual promotion of Lane and Douglas Counties' recreation and economic potentials by citizens of both counties.

The newspaper publisher, who was editor of the Eugene Register-Guard for 25 years prior to becoming his own publisher, was introduced by Eugene Chamber President Arthur P. Martini. Martini described Tugman as, "a man who does more on slow bell than most of us can do on full speed ahead."

Tugman said that Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER'S proposal to establish the recreation area is well founded. National Park Service officials from San Francisco and Washington, D.C., visited with Reedsport area citizens and "answered all of our questions satisfactorily," Tugman said.

Industry could continue to run its industrial waste disposal lines through the dunes to the ocean if the Federal Government took over the proposed area, the editor-publisher said.

Tugman is chairman of the advisory committee on the Oregon State park system. He said that Oregon had 10 million visitors last year and that State recreation facilities are rapidly becoming utilized to capacity.

The proposed national park, he said, would be "an integrated, cooperative program for development of that wonderful natural area." The Boy Scout and Girl Scout facilities and the State's Honeymoon Park south of Florence, he said, would "not be impaired in the least."

In addition, he observed, "For every tax assessment dollar that is taken away by the project, we'll have many dollars created (by tourist trade and Federal Government expenditures in the park)."

In conclusion he said, "In light of the entirely reasonable policy of park officials, we have much more to gain than to lose by having the Government in there.

"In spite of all the uproar to the north of us (from Florence area citizens who protest the plan) I've had letters from resort owners from Florence who think very much as we do in favor of the proposal," he added.

Additional speakers representing Douglas County's Salmon Harbor at Reedsport; the U.S. Coast Guard station at Winchester Bay; the Douglas County parks department; and other groups attended. A motion picture showing salmon fishing facilities at Salmon Harbor was also shown.

WASHINGTON.—The Advisory Board on National Parks today recommended including eight new areas in the National Park System.

The Board's report, submitted to Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton, proposed that he seek congressional approval of bills to establish as national shoreline areas:

1. Portions of Cape Cod, Mass.
2. Padre Island, Tex., near Corpus Christi.
3. Indiana Dunes, Ind.
4. Oregon Dunes, Oreg.

It recommended for inclusion in the National Park System:

1. The Wheeler Peak-Lehman Caves region of the Snake River in Nevada.
2. The Hubbell Trading Post, Ganada, Ariz.
3. A 34,000-acre area near Manhattan, Kans., which has particular significance as a tall grass prairie to be set aside as a national park.
4. A short grass area, the site still to be selected.

NATIONAL PARKS ADVISORY BOARD SUBMITS RECOMMENDATIONS TO SECRETARY SEATON

Nine recommendations from the Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments were submitted today to Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton.

Pointing out that it has consistently supported efforts to salvage and protect the Nation's outstanding natural shoreline areas, the Board recommended that the Secretary report favorably on bills now pending in Congress intended to establish as national shoreline areas portions of Cape Cod, Mass.; Padre Island, Tex.; Indiana Dunes, Ind.; and Oregon Dunes, Oreg. The Board recommended that steps be taken to eliminate adverse uses in any of those areas as quickly as possible.

The Board further expressed its hope that the Secretary will view with favor and lend his support to the principle of establishing, in the other relatively few remaining suitable areas, shoreline reservations as entities different in standards and administration from national parks, monuments, or historic sites.

Amplifying on recommendations for approval of congressional bills for setting aside Padre Island as a shoreline area, the Board advised that this approval be contingent upon steps being taken, immediately upon passage of the enabling legislation, to eliminate all prospecting, drilling, and production of oil, gas, or other minerals. Such hostile use, the Board stated, renders Padre Island inappropriate for preservation as a unit of the National Park System.

During its 3-day meeting, just concluded in Shenandoah National Park, Va., the Board elected Frank E. Masland, Jr., of Carlisle, Pa., as its new chairman; Dr. Edward B. Danson, director, Museum of Northern Arizona, Flagstaff, as secretary, and Harold P. Fabian, Salt Lake City, chairman of the Utah State Park and Recreation Commission, as vice chairman.

Other recommendations presented to Secretary Seaton, in the Board's capacity as his adviser on National Park Service matters, favored three additional areas for inclusion in the National Park System. They are: the Wheeler Peak-Lehman Caves region of the Snake River, Nevada; the Hubbell trading post, Ganada, Ariz., and a 34,000-acre area near Manhattan, Kans., which has particular significance as a tall-grass prairie to be set aside as a national park. The Board also recommended selection of a short-grass area for inclusion in the park system.

The Wheeler Peak-Lehman Caves region was recommended because of its recognized scientific values and because of findings that have determined it to be representative of the numerous Great Basin mountain ranges and as such of national significance, the Board indicated.

The Hubbell trading post was recommended for classification "as of exceptional value under the terms of the Historic Sites Act." The Secretary was advised that the trading post, founded in 1876, illustrates in an exceptional way a nationally important phase of the history of the United States and the part played by reservation traders in the settling of the West and bringing about an understanding by American Indians of the white man's way of life. It was pointed out that the post is now available for preservation and that "its loss would forever impoverish our understanding of a major phase of our heritage."

The Board further advised the Secretary of its conclusions that the Dodge City ruts of the Santa Fe Trail in Kansas, and the grave and monument at Sioux City, Ia., of Sergeant Floyd, who was associated with the Lewis and Clark Expedition, are not of exceptional value under terms of the Historic Sites Act. It did, however, recommend that the Floyd grave and monument be preserved and administered by the State of Iowa or other suitable agency. The Board pointed out that, by appropriating funds for the erection of the memorial, the Federal Government had already recognized the contribution of Sergeant Floyd commensurate with his accomplishments toward the success of the Lewis and Clark Expedition.

In another recommendation, the Board urged that the funds for the acquisition of park lands recommended by President Eisenhower in the 1959 budget message to Congress be restored as originally presented and emphasized the urgent importance of acquiring lands of scenic as well as historic value recommended by the President.

In urging restoration of the funds included in the budget message and which have been cut by action of the House of Representatives, the Board said that each year's delay in land acquisition sees many sites of national scenic or historic importance destroyed or so mutilated that their value is forever lost to the people of America.

It further stated that each year's delay sees developments on inholdings within park boundaries that will make future acquisition more costly or prohibitive; will result in greater difficulty in meeting the needs and demands of an exploding rate of population increase; and that, due to lack of necessary funds, would eventually cost the Government far more each year than present costs.

The Board also recommended certain new guidelines concerning the preservation of historic sites and buildings under the National Survey of Historic Sites and Buildings.

This recommendation emphasized that historical preservation in the United States should be a cooperative effort of Federal, State and local governments, patriotic organizations, and civic-minded groups, and that the Federal Government should not attempt to administer all significant historic sites throughout the Nation.

The Board said that the Federal Government should not seek ownership of exceptional historical and archeological sites already held in public or semipublic ownership, but instead should give encouragement to the State, municipality, or organization in their preservation efforts.

The Board said sites of exceptional value in nonpublic ownership, suitable for and needed by the National Park System to round out its interpretation of American history, should be included in the long-range National Park System plan.

Prior to the 3-day meeting which opened April 20, the Board visited Manassas National Military Park, Va., site of the opening battle of the Civil War, and inspected the park.

POOR ACOUSTIC QUALITIES OF THE SENATE CHAMBER—NEED FOR FISCAL LEGISLATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, there is a line in the great poem by Rudyard Kipling which refers to the time when "The tumult and the shouting dies."

Mr. President, I attended the memorial service for the late Senator Taft. It was beautifully conducted. What impressed me particularly was the fact that one could hear everything said. When the Chaplain of the Senate uttered his very remarkable prayer it was heard with distinctness all over the enclosure and out into the streets.

I did not pay so much attention to the matter at the time, but when I left the grounds one of my constituents said, "Senator, why can we not hear what is going on in the Senate like we heard out here today? What is the trouble? Many of you Senators—and I do not mean you, Senator, because your voice carries—do not speak very loud. The majority leader and the minority leader, when they address the Presiding Officer, cannot even be heard in the back seats of the Senate Chamber, to say nothing about the galleries. We represent the American public. We would like to know what is going on."

That was a challenging statement, but it confirmed the position which I had taken on a previous occasion. If the prayers of the Chaplain of the Senate could be heard in the Senate in the same way they were heard at the time of the dedication of the memorial, they would have a great effect, because they are beautiful, inspirational prayers.

What is the answer? I say the answer is that the Presiding Officer of the Senate should have the proper instrument in front of him so that his voice could be heard. There are Senators whose voices are of a low, guttural nature, and we cannot understand what they say.

I insisted once—and a few other Senators joined me—that it was important for the Senators as well as the people to know what is going on in the Senate. Much of the business transacted in this Chamber is transacted in subdued voices. I say definitely that the voice of the Vice President and the voice of the Presiding Officer, when they are engaged in answering those who represent the majority or the minority, should be heard, and many times they cannot be heard beyond my seat.

In view of this situation, I feel it is very important, in the days ahead, since we face really challenging problems, to consider this matter. While we have had matters under discussion such as those of yesterday, which are important, there are other things which are more important.

Some of the important things are: What are we doing about the budget? What are we doing about the taxes? What are we doing about Government spending? What are we doing about facing the responsibilities not only of today but of tomorrow?

I repeat, there are 40 million American bondholders who are finding their bonds being depreciated each day. Why is that true? It is true because we are not meeting the problem of looking for increased taxes, or stopping loopholes whereby certain taxes are escaping.

There are 120 million insurance policy holders, who paid for their policies in 100-cent dollars and whose 50-cent dollars are now going down further in value. What are we doing about that?

The policyholders say, "Senator, what should we do?" I will answer them. We should face up to the economic facts of life. We should see the facts as they are and have the unmitigated fortitude to face them. When we face them, we can supply the answer. I say the answer is to be found in a very simple and constructive manner.

Mr. Rockefeller, of New York, answered the challenge, in spite of his friends and in spite of those who were supposed to be his most close associates. Mr. Rockefeller said the State budget had to be balanced, and he went to work. He got the economists to say what should be done with relation to increased taxes, and taxes were increased. Of course, that is something we must face up to.

I am thinking in terms of the 40 million bondholders—the people who have saved their money, the people who put up the money with which to conduct the affairs of the country when the money was needed. I am thinking of the insurance policyholders who have paid in their money on premiums. I am also thinking of the children of tomorrow. What kind of inflationary challenge will they have to meet? I am thinking of folks living on pensions, on social security.

Yes, do nothing—knock a bigger hole in the dollar and look out for breakers up ahead.

Or face the challenge without fear and put a stop to the threat of inflation.

There are two things we must do. We must let the public hear what is going on. We must let the words spoken from the chair of the Vice President and from this floor be heard. We must let each Senator take a stand on the questions I have raised.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

UNITED STATES-INDIA CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC COOPERATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on May 4 and 5 more than 60 United States and Indian political figures, industrialists and scholars will meet here in Washington to participate in a 15-session, 2-day conference on opportunities for public and private cooperation by the free world in India's economic development. Representatives of more than 300 companies, organizations, and governmental agencies of the United States and India will attend the sessions.

The conference will be concerned not merely with generalizing and theorizing about economic development; rather, it will deal with the specific problems of one country—India. The aim, too, is to determine how nations that feel a responsibility for economic progress beyond their own borders can assist with the developmental problems of another country.

According to Mr. Eric Johnston, chairman of the Committee for International Economic Growth, and of the conference, leadership to a large extent is drawn from the business community of our Nation and other endeavors. Its purpose will be twofold: First, to help define and illuminate the urgent problems of economic and social development confronting the people of India today; and, second, to seek more effective methods of international economic cooperation to be applied in the economic assistance program.

Mr. Johnston has invited all of the Members of the Congress and their staffs to attend any of the 15 sessions which the Committee for International Economic Growth will hold during its 2-day meeting. For all of us, no matter what may be our opinions of the problems and processes of international economic cooperation, I believe there will be much information of value to be gained from these meetings. I commend this conference to the attention of Senators. I request unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a supplemental statement and conference program, for the benefit of those who have not seen the full listing of subject matter and discussion leaders.

There being no objection, the statement and program were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

The United States-India Conference on Economic Cooperation is sponsored by five outstanding American organizations whose leadership is drawn to a large extent from the business community of our Nation as well as leaders in other endeavors. Further, the contributing sponsors who are helping to make this conference possible number among them some of our major business and banking concerns with broad experience in economic affairs in many parts of the world.

I am referring to the national conference on India and the United States—1959, which has been organized by the Committee for International Economic Growth and which is cosponsored by the National Planning Association, the Asia Foundation, the Stanford Research Institute, and the Center for International Studies of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Among the companies which are contributing sponsors are the Bank of America, N.T. & S.A., the Bunge Corp., the Carborundum Co., Central Gulf Steamship Lines, Johnson & Johnson International, Kaiser Engineers Overseas Corp., Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., K. A. Export Co., Koppers Co., Inc., Merck, Sharp & Dohme International, Pfizer International, Inc., Standard-Vacuum Oil Co., Union Carbide International Co., and Willys Overland Export Corp., and Isthmian Steamship Company.

The list of distinguished participants and speakers includes more than 60 authorities: business executives of the United States and from India who will be in Washington expressly for this meeting; India specialists from more than 12 U.S. universities and foundations with broad first-hand experience in international economic affairs and the problems of Indian economic development; representatives of international finance organizations; and officials of Governments of India and the United States, including the distinguished President of the Senate, the Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON, and two of my esteemed colleagues of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator HUMPHREY and Senator KENNEDY.

Most gratifying is the concentration of this conference on the detailed practical scrutiny of Indian economic development in terms of industrial policy, small business, community development, the opportunities for private enterprise and other bedrock economic facts of life in India of importance to that nation and of importance to any country, such as ours, interested in economic development in a democratic framework which provides opportunities for private capital as well as government-to-government aid.

It is particularly noteworthy that among the Indians who will be in Washington for this significant meeting are the Honorable H. V. R. Iengar, Governor of the Reserve Bank of India and one of the chief architects of India's economic programs; the Honorable B. K. Nehru, India's Commissioner General for Economic Affairs, and the Honorable Asoka Mehta, member of the Indian Parliament and one of India's most outspoken anti-Communists, and a number of India's leading industrialists whose business activities are truly representative of the vigor of private enterprise in India today.

India's Ambassador to the United States, His Excellency M. C. Chagla, and a former U.S. Ambassador to India, the Honorable Chester Bowles, are also participating in the conference, as are Mr. John D. Rockefeller 3d and the Honorable Averell Harriman, both of whom have recently returned from extensive visits to the country which is the subject of the meeting; our Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. George Lodge; Miss Barbara Ward, the distinguished economist and author; and, in fact, a whole array of persons especially qualified to probe this subject for the benefit of all of us interested in international economic affairs.

Morris, University of Washington; Mr. Harry Pollack, AFL–CIO.

RETIREMENT OF GEORGE E. BIGGE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, tomorrow, April 30, George E. Bigge will retire from his position as Special Assistant on Federal-State Problems to the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. With his education, training, and experience in social security matters, he has contributed much to the administration of our social-security program, and I trust his retirement will be only from the Department and not from the fields of social security in which he is so well versed.

Mr. Bigge was born in Michigan, and taught in rural schools there before going to the University of Michigan. He received a doctor's degree in economics and taught at the university.

Moving on to Brown University as a professor of economics, he later became head of the department of economics. While at the university, he served on various public boards. As Governor of the State, I appointed him to the commission on interstate compacts affecting industry and labor, and, also, on the cotton textile industrial relations board. He also served as a consultant to the commission I selected to draft the first unemployment compensation law for Rhode Island. When that legislation was enacted I appointed him as the first chairman of the unemployment compensation board.

In 1937 I recommended George Bigge to the late President Roosevelt for appointment as a member of the Social Security Board to succeed the former and late Governor Winant of New Hampshire. He then served on the Social Security Board during its formative years to 1946 and contributed importantly to its sound development. As Director of Federal-State relations for the Federal Security Agency from 1947 to 1953, and as Special Assistant for Federal-State Relations in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare since 1953, his sound judgment and wise counsel have been of great value. His consistent interest has strengthened Federal-State grant-in-aid programs throughout the country. He served as a departmental representative in the work of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations and made a significant contribution to its deliberations.

During 1945 and 1946 he served as consultant on social security with American Military Government in Germany. In fact, throughout the years of his Government service he has shown his interest not only in all aspects of health, welfare, and social insurance in this country, but, also, in those of other countries of the world.

George Bigge's intellectual integrity, his breadth of knowledge, and his consideration for others, have won him the esteem of his associates. His qualities of character and his devoted public service warrant public recognition.

I know that all of us wish Mr. Bigge happiness in his retirement, and trust that his services will be available to those of us who are interested in social-security matters.

HISTORIC MILESTONE IN PACIFIC TRAVEL

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, this is a historic day for our Pacific rim nations.

The 50,000th flight of a Pan American Clipper takes off today for Honolulu, Guam, and Manila.

Hundreds of thousands who have flown this route since it was first opened in 1935 can reflect upon the part they have played in pioneering air travel across the Pacific Ocean.

So that this occasion may be appropriately marked in Congress, I ask unanimous consent that the statement I hold in my hand be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PAN AMERICAN TO MARK 50,000TH PACIFIC FLIGHT

Pan American World Airways will observe the 50,000th flight of a Clipper across the Pacific Ocean on April 29. Pan Am began commercial operations across the world's biggest ocean on November 22, 1935, when the famous China Clipper flying boat took off from San Francisco Bay with a load of airmail for Honolulu, Guam, and Manila.

Little fanfare will accompany the departure of Flight No. 1 on April 29. It will be simply another of the six Clipper departures that day for transpacific points.

By contrast, 25,000 people attended the 1935 ceremonies including State and Federal officials, and the then Postmaster General, James A. Farley. A crowd of 125,000 jammed observation sites to watch the China Clipper taxi out from its dock and roar off the water.

The late Capt. Edwin C. Musick commanded the China Clipper's crew of seven. In the plane's holds were 110,865 letters weighing 1,837 pounds. No revenue passengers were carried on the Pacific service until nearly a year later.

The China Clipper required 21 hours to reach Honolulu, its first port of call. It continued on via Midway, Wake, and Guam, and set down in Manila Bay 6 days after leaving San Francisco. Flight time for the 8,210-mile route was 59 hours 48 minutes.

Today's Super-7 Clippers make the 2,400-mile San Francisco-Honolulu flight in 9 hours. When jet Clipper service is inaugurated, flight time will be less than 5 hours.

From 1935 until October 1936 when the first passengers were carried, the Clippers made a total of 50 crossings. By December 7, 1941, when Pan American went on a wartime status, the number of crossings had increased to 199. By way of contrast, the total number of Pacific flights during 1958 alone was 4,370.

During the prewar period, the Clippers carried a total of 2,336 passengers. By the end of 1958, the total had swelled to more than a million and a half passengers and this is increasing at a rate of 3,000 per month.

In the pioneer days, the Pacific route was confined to Honolulu, Guam, and Manila. Today the company's Pacific-Alaska division also serves Fiji, Samoa, New Zealand, Australia, Tokyo, Hong Kong, Saigon, Singapore, Bangkok, and Rangoon. Connections are made with Pan Am's Atlantic division to provide round-the-world service. In addition the division operates regular polar route service from the west coast to Europe and from Seattle to Alaska's major cities.

Equally striking are the advances made in aircraft development and attending flight speeds during the 23½ years of Pacific Clipper operations.

The China Clipper cruised at 135 miles per hour; the DC-7C flies at 350 miles per hour, and the jet's speed is 575 miles per hour.

Carrying capacity of the Pacific Clippers also has risen sharply. The first commercial passenger flight in 1936 carried seven passengers. Today's Super-7's and stratocruisers can carry up to 81 passengers, and the jets will be able to increase this capacity to 150 or more.

Years of preparation by Pan American preceded the inauguration of transpacific service. The pioneers faced such obstacles as the fact that no airliner had the range Pan American required, and no aircraft or passenger facilities existed at many of the way stations on the proposed Pacific route.

In 1932, however, aircraft manufacturers submitted bids on planes which met Pan American specifications, and their construction was begun.

To staff its Pacific operation, Pan American brought in 41 veterans of its Caribbean services, which had opened in 1927. By 1935, the number of employees had grown to 221.

Pan American experts planned air routes, and developed communications facilities, weather forecasting, and operating techniques.

In early 1935 Pan American chartered a ship to carry material for airbases and housing, aircraft fuel, technicians, construction crews, several months' supply of food, and countless other items to prepare the Pacific islands for the coming of the Clippers.

Meanwhile survey flights were being operated out of San Francisco over segments of the route the China Clipper would follow. Between April and October 1935 four survey flights went out from the west coast to prepare the way for the November inaugural.

CALL OF THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

In accordance with the order previously announced, the Senate will proceed with the call of the calendar. The clerk will state the first measure on the calendar.

HARRY H. NAKAMURA

The bill (S. 611) for the relief of Harry H. Nakamura was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time for filing claims for compensation under the Act entitled "An Act to authorize the Attorney General to adjudicate certain claims resulting from evacuation of certain persons of Japanese ancestry under military orders", approved July 2, 1948 (62 Stat. 1231), is hereby extended until the expiration of one year after the date of enactment of this Act in the case of Harry H. Nakamura.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1075) to provide for the reimbursement of Meadow School District No. 29, Upham, N. Dak., for loss of revenue resulting from the acquisition of certain lands within such school district by the Department of the Interior, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ENGLE. Over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 91) to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security, the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the operations of such act, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

MAGDA KUSEN CANJUGA

The bill (S. 29) for the relief of Magda Kusen Canjuga was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration Nationality Act, Magda Kusen Canjuga shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act, upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

BERTHA GLICKMANN

The bill (S. 33) for the relief of Bertha Glickmann was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration Nationality Act, Bertha Glickmann shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act, upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

MARY (MARIJA) GROM

The bill (S. 181) for the relief of Mary (Marija) Grom was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Mary (Marija) Grom shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

HILDA M. HUMPOLE GOLDSCHMIDT

The bill (S. 334) for the relief of Hilda M. Humpole Goldschmidt was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Hilda M. Humpole Goldschmidt, who lost United States citizenship under the provisions of section 352(a)(2) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, may be naturalized by taking, prior to one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, before any court referred to in subsection (a) of section 310 of the Immigration and Nationality Act or before any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, an oath as prescribed by section 337 of such Act. From and after naturalization under this Act, the said Hilda M. Humpole Goldschmidt shall have the same citizenship status as that which existed immediately prior to its loss.

SOPHIE STANKUS

The bill (S. 625) for the relief of Sophie Stankus, also known as Sister Saint Ignace, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Sophie Stankus, also known as Sister Saint Ignace, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act, upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

MARIA WOLFRAM

The bill (S. 626) for the relief of Maria Wolfram was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 212(a)(4) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Maria Wolfram may be issued a visa and admitted to the United States if she is found to be otherwise admissible under the provisions of that Act: Provided, That a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by the Attorney General, be deposited as prescribed by section 213 of said Act: Provided further, That this exemption shall apply only to grounds for exclusion of which the Department of State or the Department of Justice has knowledge prior to enactment of this Act.

ASAE NISHIMOTO

The bill (S. 1034) for the relief of Asae Nishimoto was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

From and after naturalization under this Act, the said Asae Nishimoto shall have the same citizenship status as that which existed immediately prior to its loss.

YONG CHUL JURGENS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 182) for the relief of Yong Chul Jurgens, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, for the purposes of sections 101(a)(27)(A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the minor child, Yong Chul Jurgens, shall be held and considered to be the natural-born alien child of Mr. Charles J. Jurgens, a citizen of the United States: Provided, That no natural parent of Yong Chul Jurgens, by virtue of such parentage, shall be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UMEKO PARKER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 245) for the relief of Umeko Parker, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Umeko Parker, the widow of a United States citizen, shall be deemed to be within the purview of section 101(a)(27)(A) of that Act, and the provisions of section 205 of the said Act shall not be applicable in this case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GIOVANNI MALARA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 524) for the relief of Giovanni Malara, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "United States", to insert a colon and "Provided, That no natural parent of Giovanni Malara, by virtue of such parentage, shall be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of sections 101 (a) (27) (A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the minor child, Giovanni Malara, shall be held and considered to be the natural-born alien child of Giovanni and Margherita Malara, citizens of the United States: Provided, That no natural parent of Giovanni Malara, by virtue of such parentage, shall be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota desires an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ENGLE. The purpose of the bill, introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], as amended, is to grant to the minor child adopted by citizens of the United States the status of a nonquota immigrant which is the status normally enjoyed by alien minor children of U.S. citizens. The bill has been amended in accordance with established precedents.

I yield to the Senator from New York for any further explanation he desires to make.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, this child is a 12-year-old native and a citizen of Italy, who was adopted by citizens of the United States in an Italian court in Naples. He resides at present in Italy with his natural parents. He is the nephew of his adoptive father, who entered the United States in December 1954, and was naturalized in 1958. The adoptive mother is a native-born U.S. citizen who reentered the United States from Italy in July 1953. She had resided in Italy since the age of 3.

The beneficiary had been in the custody of his adoptive parents since his birth, until his adoptive mother departed from Italy for the United States in 1953.

The information before the committee is to the effect that the beneficiary's adoptive parents are fully financially able to care for this infant.

I may say to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota that the bill follows the precedents which have been established in such cases relating to infants.

Mr. LANGER. Can the distinguished Senator tell me whether this bill was previously before the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. KEATING. Yes; it was previously before the Judiciary Committee, and was unanimously reported.

Mr. LANGER. A year or 2 years ago?

Mr. KEATING. I think not, because the report from the Commissioner of Immigration is dated March 12, 1959.

Mr. LANGER. Was there a report last year?

Mr. KEATING. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

URSULA GEWINNER

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 843) for the relief of Ursula Gewinner, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments on page 1, line 10, after the word "Act", to insert a colon and "And provided further, That her marriage to her U.S. citizen fiancé, Raymond T. Watters, shall have occurred within six months after the date of the enactment of this Act.", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 212(a)(12) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Ursula Gewinner may be issued a visa and admitted to the United States for permanent residence if she is found to be otherwise admissible under the provisions of that Act: Provided, That this exemption shall apply only to a ground for exclusion of which the Department of State or the Department of Justice has knowledge prior to the enactment of this Act: And provided further, That her marriage to her United States citizen fiancé, Raymond T. Watters, shall have occurred within six months after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HLIAS ANTHONY LOUSEDES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 940) for the relief of Hlias Anthony Lousedes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judicary, with an amendment in line 7, after the word "fee", to insert "Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available."; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Hlias Anthony Lousedes shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act, upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HERBERT WESTERMANN

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1239) for the relief of Herbert Westermann, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment in line 7, after the word "Act", to strike out the comma and "upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence to such alien as provided for in this Act, the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota for the first year that such quota is available.", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Herbert Westermann shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER TRBOJEVIC AND HIS WIFE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 848) for the relief of Peter Trbojevic and his wife Milica Trbojevic, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, in the administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Petar Trbojevic shall be considered to have been registered on the waiting list for intending immigrants for the quota for Yugoslavia as of April 17, 1945, the date on which American consular officers abroad were authorized to resume registration of intending immigrants."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended, so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Petar Trbojevic."

MRS. MATHILDE RINGOL

The bill (H.R. 1453) for the relief of Mrs. Mathilde Ringol was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOGAN DUFF

The bill (H.R. 1462) for the relief of Logan Duff was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

The bill (H.R. 2237) to amend chapter 13—wage earners' plans—of the Bankruptcy Act was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SAMUEL ABRAHAM AND OTHERS

The bill (H.R. 4314) for the relief of Samuel Abraham, John A. Carroll, Forrest E. Robinson, Thomas J. Sawyers, Jack Silmon, and David N. Wilson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF DURATION OF FEDERAL AIR POLLUTION CONTROL LAW

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 441) to extend the duration of the Federal air pollution control law, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Works, with amendments on page 1, line 9, after the word "thereof", to strike out " "for each fiscal year such sum as may be necessary" " and insert " "for each of the four fiscal years during the period beginning July 1, 1960, and ending June 30, 1964, not to exceed $7,500,000",", and, on page 2, line 6, after the word "out", to strike out the comma and "and shall be allotted by the Surgeon General in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare" and insert "by the Surgeon General" ", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5 of the Act of July 14, 1955 (42 U.S.C. 1857(d)), is amended—

(1) by striking out "(a)" after "SEC 5.",

(2) by striking out "for each of the five fiscal years during the period beginning July 1, 1955, and ending June 30, 1960, not to exceed $5,000,000" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "for each of the four fiscal years during the period beginning July 1, 1960, and ending June 30, 1964, not to exceed $7,500,000",

(3) by inserting "for surveys and studies and" before "for research" in clauses (1) and (2) of such first sentence, and

(4) by striking out "by the Surgeon General" in the last sentence.

SEC. 2. Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 8. It is hereby declared to be the intent of the Congress that any Federal department or agency having jurisdiction over any building, installation, or other property shall, to the extent practicable and consistent with the interests of the United States and within any available appropriations, cooperate with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and with any interstate agency or any State or local government air pollution control agency in preventing or controlling the pollution of the air in any area insofar as the discharge of any matter from or by such property may cause or contribute to pollution of the air in such area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I have a technical amendment to offer to the first committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, after line 5, it is proposed to strike out through line 2, on page 2, and insert the following:

(2) after $5,000,000 in the first sentence insert a comma and the following: "and for each of the four fiscal years during the period beginning July 1, 1960, and ending June 30, 1964, not to exceed $7,500,000."

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, this is entirely a technical amendment. There was an imperfection in the bill as it was introduced and considered by the committee. The head of the staff of the Committee on Public Works is present. There is no objection to this amendment.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the chairman accepts the amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. I thank the chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] to the first committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the second committee amendment, on page 2, line 4.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate, extending the Air Pollution Research and Technical Assistance Act which will expire June 30, 1960, is a vital measure for the protection of health, property, and comfort of human beings and to prevent serious threatened losses to growing things, both animal and vegetable.

The act which S. 441 would continue for another 4 years enabled the Federal Government to join forces with State and local agencies, with industries, and with private scientific groups in battling the serious menace which is an inevitable consequence of modern day conditions and trends. The 84th Congress approved that measure, which I had the honor to introduce, when it became painfully obvious that the atmosphere was being fouled to the danger point in many instances by the increasing mechanization and motorization of our Nation and the mushrooming of thickly settled communities.

I am sure all of my colleagues agree with me, as I have pointed out on several occasions, that in our changed pattern of everyday living the phrase "free as the air" now is an anachronism. If our people are to enjoy pure, healthful air, which is indepensable to the existence of every living thing, we must pay a price.

The Air Pollution Research and Technical Assistance Act was an attempt to hold down the price of pure, healthful air. Its purpose was to mobilize the extensive and often unique resources of the Federal Government for a program of investigation, research, and training of personnel for the purpose of checking, reducing and ultimately controlling air pollution.

Because time was needed to organize for the battle against smog and other types of contamination, I regret the Federal Government has not participated to the full extent authorized by Public Law 159. Nevertheless, by the expiration date next year, we will have expanded more than $16,500,000 of the total authorized amount of $25 million.

I wish to point out that with the appropriations to date of $12,345,000, the Federal Government has stepped up the pace of its work each year. By the end of the present fiscal year it expects to have made grants to researchers for a total of 102 separate investigation and study projects. For the coming fiscal year, its budget contemplates grants for an additional 41 projects. These are being carried on by scientists in universities, colleges, hospitals, and research institutions and represent important fact-finding, observation, and measuring work.

The Public Health Service reports that through June 30, 1960, it will have expended $3,707,000 in individual grants for research and $4,789,000 for contract research, in addition to $8,190,000 for its own direct operations in the air pollution field. Thus, it is evident, the Air Pollution Act of 1955 has brought into play an assortment of individuals and agencies in what is truly a cooperative effort.

This is a far different situation than existed when I entered this body more than 6 years ago. At that time, the Federal Government was merely dabbling in questions of air pollution as part of its work in the field of sanitary engineering. In my own State of California, the annual expenditure for antismog activities greatly exceeded the amount available to the Public Health Service for its limited work. Other Federal agencies which subsequently have contributed to the effort to track down causes of pollution then were doing very little or nothing. Although their participation still is modest, under the law I sponsored the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Standards and the Weather Bureau have been brought into the drive to devise ways of reducing and controlling objectionable discharge of contaminating elements into our Nation's air.

The fact remains that a multitude of questions still remain unanswered. Progress admittedly is slow. Yet, the research and investigation under Public Law 159 has produced much knowledge and at the same time has revealed the complexity of the problem.

The present bill is in complete accord with the overwhelming sentiment of several hundred scientists and public officials who last November attended the conference called by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to appraise past efforts and to recommend future action in the fight against air pollution. It was the recommendation of virtually every discussion group at that conference, at which 41 States were represented, that the present Research and Technical Assistance Act should be extended and expanded.

That also is the sentiment of the public at large. There is mounting public demand that stringent regulatory action be taken at local, State, or regional levels. Under the bill, the Federal Government still would leave such responsibilities to local and State agencies. But in order to have effective or only potential helpful police action, much technical and scientific data must yet be obtained so any steps by such agencies may be reasonable, practicable, and sound.

For instance, in many places a clamor has been heard that certain gadgets should be made mandatory on automobiles or that changes in types of motor fuel be ordered. There are grave economic questions involved in reducing and eliminating air pollution attributable to motor vehicles. The studies now in progress under Public Law 159 should be helpful in reaching decisions about standards of purity essential to human health.

The urgency of identifying every single source of pollution and of laying bare all secrets about the mystic natural forces which cause smog is undeniable. The effects of contamination can be and often are far-reaching. Countries surrounding heavily populated areas can be affected because the winds roll clouds of fumes across manmade boundaries. Food supplies can be endangered since some 40-odd separate crops are known to be susceptible to injury from polluted air.

Problems of such character cannot be solved solely by local levels. Air is a natural resource. Like all natural resources, it must be husbanded and conserved with all the ingenuity and determination our Nation possesses. Without fresh, uncontaminated air, people will not congregate nor long remain in thriving communities. The foundation for future growth and development of many sections of America may well rest on solution of the smog problem.

The obvious public interest in relieving air pollution necessitates Federal participation and S. 441 will enable the Federal Government to continue and to expand its role in this effort.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a statement regarding Senate bill 441, Calendar No. 167.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ENGLE

In this age of scientific accomplishment our Nation is losing a battle critical to the present and future health of our burgeoning urban and metropolitan centers. Today the ravages of air pollution are eating like a cancer at the very heartland of our Nation. No area of the country is immune, no city safe from the effects of this modern dilemma.

And it is a dilemma—a problem of such magnitude that it is properly a subject for the consideration of this body as much as the issues of international tensions, the exploration of outer space, and national defense. For unless the living places of America are made safe, secure and comfortable, unless the great urban and metropolitan centers containing more than 64 percent of our population are protected from the expanding menace of air pollution, the resolution of these other problems would lose much meaning. In the large scope of history it may be that the issues making headlines today will be viewed as less important than the fundamental problem of creating and maintaining healthy, happy, and convenient living places for our exploding population.

Today, one of the compelling facts of modern existence is that we live in urban and metropolitan environments. More than this, we are now creating great conglomerations of metropolitan and urban centers, some of them stretching hundreds of miles along our seacoasts and fertile inland areas. And a problem now gnaws at the heart of these areas, a problem so large and so complex that it has defied solution in spite of the concentrated attention of local governments, private industries, and well meaning citizen groups.

The problem? The wholesale contamination of the air supplies serving urban dwellers everywhere. This is a problem which we in California have felt perhaps sooner and more acutely than other areas of the Nation. In our State population has doubled during the past 20 years, but our air supply has remained constant. The steady and unremitting outpouring of pollution from the almost infinite sources comprising a metropolitan complex has now exceeded the carrying capacity of the atmosphere. The air has become overburdened with contaminants and millions of people have fallen victim to the scourge of air pollution.

As severe as the problem has become in California, we are not its only victims. Last November the Surgen General of the United States convened the first National Conference on Air Pollution. Approximately 1,000 representatives from 41 States were told that air pollution respects no boundary lines—geographic, political, professional, or disciplinary. Reports delivered before that conference demonstrated that thousands—not hundreds—of communities throughout the United States have fallen prey to excessively polluted atmospheres. What is worse, the problem now seems to be far larger and more serious than anyone had imagined it to be.

Evidence that air pollution has killed and may even now be eating at the health of the Nation's urban dwellers is striking. Here are the facts as reported to that conference:

1. Physicians in Great Britain have demonstrated a relationship between chronic bronchitis and air pollution levels. Deaths from chronic bronchitis are significantly related to smog conditions and population density.

2. The appalling increase in the incidence of lung cancer in this Nation now seems partially traceable to the polluted atmospheres of urban areas.

3. In California the death rate from emphysema, a disease of the respiratory system, has almost quadrupled since 1950. The rate is about twice as high in cities as in rural areas, and there is a widespread belief among physicians that air pollution plays an important role in this disease.

4. Ten years ago air pollution killed 20 persons in Donora, Pa., and sickened thousands more. Later studies performed by the U.S. Public Health Service have shown that those sickened in the 1948 Donora smog attack have had poorer health and higher mortality rates than their neighbors who were unaffected by the episode.

Other evidence could be cited, but one compelling fact is apparent: Polluted atmospheres over our Nation's urban areas already constitute a leading public nuisance, and there is good reason to believe that the nuisance now is becoming a killer.

In spite of all we have tried to do in California to stem the rising tide of air contamination, our smog conditions have worsened. In Los Angeles County alone 6 million people are affected by eye irritation, visibility-cutting haze, and abnormally high concentrations of nuisance-causing contaminants. In this single county live more people than are to be found in 43 States of the Union, and their health, their comfort, their property are threatened by a problem beyond their ability to solve. Why?

In Los Angeles County more has been done to curb the sources of air pollution than in any other spot on the face of the globe. More than $70 million has been spent to muzzle the stacks of industry, and more than $10 million is being spent annually to collect and bury the area's 14,000 tons of daily refuse. Because of antismog laws in force in that county, there probably are fewer open fires there today than there were when the huts and tepees of an Indian race dotted the great Los Angeles Basin.

But this vigorous and costly antipollution program has not yet been able to control the river of pollution thrown daily from the largest single source of air contamination—which is the 3 million automobiles registered in the county.

We cannot assert that the automobile is the only source of air pollution worthy of note, nor can we conclude that automobile exhausts are a problem in every city in the Nation. Almost all of our modern living habits result in some form of air pollution, and we must recognize the infinity of possible sources and the technical complexity of the problem. But Los Angeles has largely conquered the problems posed by other sources and auto exhaust-originated smog remains. From the smelting of metal to the painting of manufactured goods, industrial operations have been brought within the scope of the local air-pollution control program.

According to informed officials in Los Angeles, several thousand tailormade pollution controlling or destroying devices have been installed on industrial plants located there. As a result of experience in southern California, solutions to most of the urban air pollution problems in the United States now can virtually be bought off the shelf. No longer is there any excuse for excessive industrial air pollution in this Nation, assuming only that existing technical information is assembled in usable forms and made available to those areas and jurisdictions where it is required.

For the automobile, however, there is yet no practicable solution, and this is the nub of the problem. We must stimulate the finest scientific research that money can buy so that this problem may be solved speedily. Today the control of automobile exhausts is the key to the solution of the smog problem in Los Angeles and in an increasing number of other areas. In spite of this, the automobile, alone, has been immune from local air pollution control efforts.

Los Angeles is a county on wheels. Its 1,200 square miles of coastal plain has been developed on a pattern molded by the automobile. Its great freeway systems are equaled by no other area, and its streets are crowded with motor vehicles in numbers far surpassing even the wildest imagination. The entire 6 million population of the area could be placed, at any given moment, in the front seats of their family automobiles—with plenty of room left over.

The entire metropolitan area has been built around the concept of the automobile as the basic mode of transportation. They have created a market for motor vehicles that could spell the difference between profit or disaster for the automobile industry. They are as dependent on the automobile for their continued community existence as a soldier is upon his rifle. But give the soldier a weapon that backfires, that blinds him in the seering flash of its explosion, and the soldier will not realize his purpose. He will perish.

And so it is in Los Angeles County, in the heavily populated coastal plains of California, and in other vital and growing urban areas of the Nation. Their very existence as thriving communities is dependent on the use of the modern automobile. But that tail-finned monster of chrome now threatens to choke the air they breathe with the smog-forming contaminants ejected from the engine and thrown out of the tailpipe.

This is the great dilemma of our most serious form of urban air contamination.

By its very character, by its basic design, the modern automobile has become an instrument of terror and discomfort. For every gallon of gasoline placed in its tank, from 4 to 7 percent of the fuel is exhausted into the air as an unburned or partially burned smog-forming hydrocarbon. In Los Angeles County, approximately 70 percent of the demonstrated smog-forming contaminants thrown into the atmosphere are derived from the operation of motor vehicles. And the 6 million people will continue to suffer from persistently frequent and severe attacks of eye-irritating smog until the automobile is controlled. Until the exhaust systems of the motor vehicle are successfully muzzled, until the most colossal problem of "bad breath" in history is solved, these millions will continue to suffer.

Why? Is it because the automobile industry of this Nation, and to some degree the petroleum industry, have not yet fully met their responsibility for this problem? Is it because these industries have not yet kept faith with the public they serve? I was appalled by the alleged progress reports given by these industries to the National Conference on Air Pollution. I was not impressed by the meagerness of the research effort they described.

For example, I could not help but think it strange that the automobile industry whose gross annual sales total more than $20 billion should be spending less than $1 million per year to protect the public health and welfare from the growing menace of automotive exhausts. I thought it strange that less money should be spent to meet a basic and compelling responsibility to the consuming American public than is spent on a single television program.

Since that report was given to the National Air Pollution Conference, there has been reason for hope that the attitude of the automobile industry has changed, that their sense of responsibility has been sharpened, and that the tempo of their research effort has been increased. Encouraging reports of progress were presented in January by industry members to the annual meeting of the Society of Automobile Engineers. Perhaps the challenge of this problem now has been perceived, but the risks and dangers of government relying too greatly on mere words must be recognized.

I believe it is the responsibility of the automobile industry and the gasoline refiners to accept major responsibility for solving the problems created by their products. And it is the responsibility of government to see that these industries do in fact meet this challenge.

Under present laws our State and local governments bear the responsibility for the enactment and enforcement of control regulations. I have told you how, in my State, Los Angeles County has made supreme efforts to curb smog by local controls administered through a county air pollution control district. The State of California has joined the attack on smog through our State Department of Public Health and our State Department of Motor Vehicles. Gov. Pat Brown, in a special message to the legislature on February 10, 1959, recommended new State laws to impose strict standards on the discharge of motor vehicle pollutants and to establish an effective system of inspection and enforcement.

Two weeks ago—about April 15—the legislature passed and the Governor signed the first of these as an urgency measure—the Rees-Richards bill, senate bill 117, requiring the State Department of Public Health to develop and publish such standards prior to next February. The legislature also adopted Joint Resolution No. 4 memorializing Congress to extend the Federal air pollution control program. More forceful State legislation will follow.

But the State and local governments alone cannot successfully tackle this problem unsupported by their Federal Government. The automobile is a creature of interstate commerce. Its parts are drawn from here and there, assembled everywhere, and the ultimate product is used on every street and highway in the Nation. It may be that positive Federal restrictions ultimately will be required with respect to vehicles transported in interstate commerce.

In the meantime, as minimum Federal action we should extend the Federal air pollution control law by approving the legislation now before us. S. 441, which was introduced by Senator KUCHEL, Senator CLARK, and myself, as amended in committee, proposes to raise the limit on authorized Federal expenditures from $5 million to $7½ million annually, and to extend this authority through June 30, 1964, in order to finance a broader Federal program of research and assistance by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Under this broadened authority the Surgeon General of the United States, for example, could promulgate national standards on exhaust emissions and recommend regulations to the States to prevent the occurrence of public health nuisances.

To extend and broaden this law is the very least we can do at the Federal level, if we are to continue to leave to the States the responsibility for corrective action in order to stop the ravages of modern-day air pollution.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of Assembly Joint Resolution No. 4 adopted by the California Legislature, and a statement on community air pollution funds, issued by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION 4

Joint resolution relative to requesting Congress to authorize further appropriations for air pollution control.

Whereas the entire Nation has been benefited during the operation of the Federal air pollution control program since its inception in 1955; and

Whereas current authorization for Federal appropriations concerning research and investigation of the many problems relating to air pollution control extends only to June 30, 1960; and

Whereas the country will suffer a great loss in matters relating to our increasing national problems of air pollution control if this program is not extended: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States is respectfully memorialized to enact necessary legislation to authorize further appropriations for air pollution control; and be it further

Resolved, That the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare fully utilize all appropriations for air pollution control to achieve the goal of a full, comprehensive, and effective national program in air pollution research; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk, of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States.

EDWARD ARTHUR PATTERSON LAKE

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 16) to designate the lake to be formed by the water impounded by the Dickinson Dam in the State of North Dakota as "Edward Arthur Patterson Lake" was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the lake to be formed by the waters impounded by the Dickinson Dam in the State of North Dakota shall hereafter be known as "Edward Arthur Patterson Lake", and any law, regulation, document or record of the United States in which such lake is designated or referred to shall be held to refer to such lake under and by the name of "Edward Arthur Patterson Lake".

CONSTRUCTION OF BARDWELL RESERVOIR

The bill (S. 601) to authorize and provide for the construction of the Bardwell Reservoir was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in recent years parts of Texas have suffered both severe floods and serious drought. This embraces the area of the proposed Bardwell Reservoir.

Droughts have lowered the ground water table and reduced the supply in local wells. Meantime, domestic requirements have increased to such an extent that ground water supplies for municipal and industrial use are inadequate.

The provision of 29,500 acre-feet of conservation storage in the Bardwell Reservoir would, in addition to the benefits to be derived from flood control, assure a water supply for nearby municipalities and prevent a recurrence of the existing water shortage.

This proposal is part of a comprehensive plan for improvement of the Trinity River and its tributaries in Texas. The bill provides for construction and operation of the Bardwell Reservoir on Waxahachie Creek, in the Trinity River Basin.

The Waxahachie Creek watershed is subject to severe and intense storms. Average annual flood damage along Waxahachie and the adjacent Chambers and Richland Creeks has been estimated at $437,290.

The need for additional water supply is general throughout the area, but is urgent in the cities of Ennis, Corsicana, and Waxahachie.

According to the 1950 census, more than 2 million people live within a radius of 100 miles of the Bardwell Reservoir site, and more than 1 million live within a 50-mile radius.

Construction of the Bardwell Reservoir would provide a dependable water supply to meet the urgent municipal needs of that area.

In addition to affording recreational opportunities, the Bardwell Reservoir would perform two major functions, both of which are vitally needed:

First. Control of floods in the Waxahachie Creek watershed; and Second. Conservation of surface runoff for beneficial use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the project for modification of the comprehensive plan for improvement of the Trinity River and tributaries, Texas, to provide for construction of the Bardwell Reservoir on Waxahachie Creek, is hereby authorized in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers as contained in House Document Numbered 424, Eighty-fifth Congress, at an estimated total cost of $6,922,000.

SEC. 2. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

CONSTRUCTION OF FIREPROOF ANNEX FOR USE OF GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 219) to provide for the construction of a fireproof annex building for the use of the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Works, with amendments on page 1, line 7, after the word "including", to strike out "equipment" and insert "the mechanical equipment for the building"; and, in line 9, after the word "Plant", to insert "in accordance with plans to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be constructed in accordance with plans to be prepared by the Administrator of General Services and approved by the Public Printer, a fireproof annex building for use of the Government Printing Office, including the mechanical equipment for the building, connections with the present Government Printing Office buildings and utilities, interconnections with the Capitol Power Plant in accordance with plans to be approved by the Architect of the Capitol, access facilities over or under public streets, other necessary appurtenances or facilities, and such mechanical and other changes in the present Government Printing Office buildings as may be necessitated thereby.

SEC. 2. (a) To carry out the purposes of section 1 of this Act, the Administrator of General Services is authorized to acquire on behalf of the United States, by purchase, condemnation, donation, transfer without reimbursement, or otherwise, such publicly or privately owned real property in the District of Columbia (including streets and alleys or parts thereof) as may be located in the area extending west of the property line at the rear of the present Government Printing Office Building Numbered 3, along H Street west of North Capitol Street to the alley connecting G and H Streets and south to Jackson Alley, including that portion of Jackson Alley adjacent to the proposed site bordered on the south by present Government Printing Office property and to the north by lots numbered 823, 824, 47, 48, 49, 68, 67, and including the "T" shaped public alley bounded by lots 64, 65, and 66 on the north, lot 67 on the east, Jackson Alley on the south and lot 68 on the west, in square numbered 624 in the District of Columbia.

(b) Any proceeding for condemnation ordered under subsection (a) shall be conducted in accordance with the pertinent provisions of the Act entitled "An Act to provide for the acquisition of land in the District of Columbia for use of the United States," approved March 1, 1929 (16 D.C. Code, secs. 619–644).

(c) The Administrator of General Services is authorized to provide for the demolition and removal as expeditiously as possible of any buildings or other structures on, or constituting a part of, such real property as may be acquired under, or made available for the purpose of this Act.

(d) The Administrator of General Services is authorized to cause the building herein provided for to be constructed pursuant to the applicable provisions of the Act approved May 25, 1926 (44 Stat. 630), as amended, but without regard to the appropriation authorizations contained therein, and pursuant to section 401, title IV, of the Act approved June 16, 1949 (63 Stat. 198), except as otherwise provided herein.

SEC. 3. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Government Printing Office such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, and such sums may be available for transfer to the Administrator of General Services to remain available until expended.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE-OWNED HYDROELECTRIC POWER PROJECTS

The bill (S. 114) to provide for equal treatment of all State-owned hydroelectric power projects with respect to the taking over of such projects by the United States was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Act entitled "An Act to facilitate the development and construction of water conservation facilities by States and municipalities, and for other purposes", approved August 15, 1953 (Public Law 278, Eighty-third Congress, 67 Stat. 587; 16 U.S.C. 828) is hereby amended by deleting from section 3 thereof the following: ", except that the provisions of section 14 and section 4(b) shall continue to be applicable to any license issued for a hydroelectric development in the International Rapids section of the Saint Lawrence River".

Mr. ENGLE subsequently said: Mr. President, has Calendar 171, S. 114, dealing with State-owned hydroelectric power projects, been passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill was passed.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider its action in passing the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. ENGLE. I had a request to ask that that bill go over so that another Senator may discuss it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I withdraw my previous request for unanimous consent for reconsideration of the vote by which Calendar 171, Senate bill 114, was passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 4601) to amend the act of September 1, 1954, in order to limit to cases involving the national security the prohibition on payment of annuities and retired pay to officers and employees of the United States, to clarify the application and operation of such act, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEATING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will resume with the call of the calendar.

MEASURES PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 455) to provide for the appointment of an assistant to the Secretary of State to assure joint policy and planning and equitable budgeting of exchange of persons programs and administrative cooperation between staffs engaged in carrying out such programs, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ENGLE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 34) favoring the meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentary Conference for 1959 in Washington, D.C., was announced as next in order.

Mr. ENGLE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING REPORT ON S. RES. 318, 85TH CONGRESS

The resolution (S. Res. 100) to extend the time for report on Senate Resolution 318 of the 85th Congress, relative to preservation and display of Senate documents and records was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That S. Res. 318, Eighty-fifth Congress (as amended by S. Res. 72, Eighty-sixth Congress), establishing a special committee of the Senate to study and report with respect to preserving memorabilia of the Senate, is further amended by striking out "April 2" in section 4 and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30".

MARY CUNNINGHAM

The resolution (S. Res. 104) to pay a gratuity to Mary Cunningham was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mary Cunningham, sister of Henry Patrick Kiley, an employee of the Senate at the time of his death, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF CERTAIN HEARINGS ON TRANSPORTATION PROBLEMS

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 22) to print additional copies of certain hearings on transportation problems in Maryland, Virginia, and the Washington metropolitan area was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems, one thousand additional copies of the hearings held during the Eighty-fifth Congress entitled, "Transportation Problems in Maryland, Virginia, and the Washington Metropolitan Area."

PRINTING OF COPIES OF "CANNON'S PROCEDURE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES"

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 301) providing for printing of copies of "Cannon's Procedure in the House of Representatives" was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BARGAINING WITH PURCHASERS BY COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS OF MILK PRODUCERS—BILL PLACED AT FOOT OF CALENDAR

The bill (S. 753) to authorize cooperative associations of milk producers to bargain with purchasers singly or in groups, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill from the authors of it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An explanation of the bill is requested.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, since the authors of the bill, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], are not immediately available, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar, and I request the Senate aids to notify those two Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be placed at the foot of the calendar.

EXTENSION OF SPECIAL MILK PROGRAM FOR CHILDREN—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 690) to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

MILK PROGRAM FOR CHILDREN—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1289) to increase and extend the special milk program for children was announced as next in order.

Mr. ENGLE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina subsequently said:

Mr. President, I should like to ask what disposition was made of Calendar No. 184, S. 1289, to increase and extend the special milk program for children?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was passed over.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, I urge that the bill be scheduled for early consideration. It is especially necessary that we pass a bill such as this. This year it was necessary for us to pass an emergency bill to provide $3 million to take care of the milk program. From all indications in the hearings, we will need $2 million more, because of the increased population next year in the schools throughout the United States.

We have already gone into the program for 2 more years. The bill will be an enabling act. I should like to state to the Senate that year after year the Department of Agriculture has turned back money it did not use in this particular field.

I merely wanted to bring the situation to the attention of Senators.

Mr. ENGLE. The views of the Senator will be communicated to the majority leader and to the Policy Committee. I am sure the bill will be scheduled for consideration at an early date, as the Senater has requested.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I understand that the bill should not be passed by unanimous consent on the call of the calendar, but I wanted to make a brief explanation of the bill in order to get action on it as soon as possible.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I should like to explain to the distingushed Senator from South Carolina that we did not object to the bill on this side of the aisle.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1120) to amend section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act with respect to the reserves required to be maintained by member banks of the Federal Reserve System against deposits was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1062) to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide safeguards against mergers and consolidations of banks which might lessen competition unduly or tend unduly to create a monopoly in the field of banking, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AUDIT OR FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 14. (a) The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited annually by a certified public accountant in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial corporate transactions and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States. The audit shall be conducted at the place or places where the accounts of the corporation are normally kept. The certified public accountant, or his representatives, shall have access to all books, accounts, financial records, reports, files, and all other papers, things, or property belonging to or in use by the corporation and necessary to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositories, fiscal agents, and custodians.

(b) The corporation shall file annually with the Comptroller General, in accordance with such regulations and upon such form as he shall prescribe, a complete statement of such annual audit, verified by the certified public accountant by whom the audit is made, for the fiscal year ending on June 30.

And, in lieu thereof, to insert:

AUDIT OF FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 14. (a) The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited annually by an independent public accountant of recognized standing in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards. The audit shall be conducted at the place or places where the accounts of the corporation are normally kept. The independent public accountant, or his representatives, shall have access to all books, accounts, records, reports, files, and all other papers, things, or property belonging to or in use by the corporation and necessary to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositories, fiscal agents, and custodians.

And, on page 10, at the beginning of line 4, to strike out "(c)" and insert "(b)", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following named persons, to wit: Ann Clumfoot, Port Huron, Michigan; Audree Jonechat, Covina, California; Nettie Ludwig, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Esther Beer, Mansfield, Ohio; Evelyn Lauritson, Cedar Falls, Iowa; Ethel Stevensen, Fresh Meadows, New York; Etta Drayton, Flint, Michigan; Evelyn Bednar, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Edna Crorey, Grants Pass, Oregon; Erma Sweeney, Long Beach, California; Josephine Plant, Waterloo, Iowa; Dorothy Christensen, Flint, Michigan; Mary Tracey, Brooklyn, New York; La Vina Shope, Lima, Ohio; Olga Barnes, Roseburg, Oregon; Levia Jamison, Jamestown, Pennsylvania; Jean Williams, Port Orchard, Washington; Ida Alford, Little Rock, Arkansas; Edna May Standing, Orange City, Florida; Charlotte Cobb, Chatham, Massachusetts; Ann Sine Gale, Milwaukee, Wisconsin; Ann F. Fetting, Smiths Creek, Michigan; Irene Uhl, Rosemead, California; Hazel Rue Scott, Arlington, Virginia; Louise Meyerhoff, Queens Village, New York; Ivah Jones, Long Beach, California; Florence Brown, Pontiac, Michigan; Erma Hoffman, Columbus, Ohio; Nellie Leonhardt, Detroit, Michigan; and all past national presidents, and their successors, retiring or leaving their office in good standing, are hereby created and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia, where its legal domicile shall be, by the name of the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc. (hereinafter referred to as the corporation), and by such name shall be known and have perpetual succession and the powers, limitations, and restrictions herein contained.

COMPLETION OF ORGANIZATION

SEC. 2. A majority of the persons named in the first section of this Act, acting in person or by written proxy, are authorized to complete the organization of the corporation by the selection of officers and employees, the adoption of a constitution and bylaws not inconsistent with this Act, and the doing of such other acts as may be necessary for such purpose.

PURPOSES OF CORPORATION

SEC. 3. The purposes of the corporation shall be: To perpetuate the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., and the memory of all the men and women who have served our country as members of the Armed Forces; the further object of this organization shall be patriotic, educational, social, and for service; to maintain true allegiance to the Government of the United States; to educate our members and others not to divulge military, naval, or other Government information; to assist in veterans' ceremonies, to attend patriotic rallies and meetings; to foster true democracy; to care for the unsupported mothers who gave their sons to the service of the Nation; to aid in bringing about recognition of the need of permanent civilian defense for each community and to ever be alert against invasion of un-American activities; to uphold the American institutions of freedom, justice, and equal rights, and to defend the United States from all enemies.

CORPORATE POWERS

SEC. 4. The corporation shall have power—

(1) to have succession by its corporate name;

(2) to sue and be sued, complain and defend in any court of competent jurisdiction;

(3) to adopt, use, and alter a corporate seal;

(4) to choose such officers, managers, agents, and employees as the activities of the corporation may require;

(5) to adopt, amend, and alter a constitution and bylaws; not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of any State in which the corporation is to operate, for the management of its property and the regulation of its affairs;

(6) to contract and be contracted with;

(7) to take by lease, gift, purchase, grant, devise, or bequest from any public body or agency or any private corporation, association, partnership, firm, or individual and to hold absolutely or in trust for any of the purposes of the corporation any property, real, personal, or mixed, necessary or convenient for attaining the objects and carrying into effect the purposes of the corporation, subject, however, to applicable provisions of law of any State (A) governing the amount of or kind of property which may be held by, or (B) otherwise limiting or controlling the ownership of property by, a corporation operating in such State;

(8) to transfer, convey, lease, sublease, mortgage, encumber and otherwise alienate real, personal, or mixed property; and

(9) to borrow money for the purpose of the corporation, issue bonds therefor, and secure the same by mortgage, deed of trust, pledge, or otherwise, subject in every case to all applicable provisions of Federal and State laws; and

(10) to do any and all acts and things necessary and proper to carry out the objects and purposes of the corporation.

MEMBERSHIP; VOTING RIGHTS

SEC. 5. Eligibility: A mother, adopted mother, or stepmother (a stepmother eligible for membership in the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc., can claim that eligibility only if she has given a mother's care to the stepchild from the age of thirteen or under), living in the United States, of a son or daughter serving in the Armed Forces of the United States, or having a son or daughter who has served, or has been honorably discharged from the Armed Forces of the United States in World War II or the Korean hostilities. The term "Armed Forces" shall include the United States Army; United States Navy; United States Marines; United States Air Force; United States Coast Guard; National Guard; United States Army Reserves; United States Navy Reserves; United States Marine Reserves; United States Air Force Reserves; United States Coast Guard Reserves; United States Naval Militia; merchant marines; and the armed home guards who have served on active duty.

GOVERNING BODY

SEC. 6. The supreme governing authority of the corporation shall be the national convention thereof, composed of such officers and elected representatives from the several States and other local subdivisions of the corporate organization as shall be provided by the constitution and bylaws: Provided, That the form of the government of the corporation shall always be representative of the membership at large and shall not permit the concentration of control thereof in the hands of a limited number of members or in a self-perpetuating group not so representative. The meetings of the national convention may be held in any State or Territory or in the District of Columbia.

OFFICERS OF CORPORATION

SEC. 7. The officers of the corporation shall be selected in such manner and for such terms and with such duties and titles as may be prescribed in the constitution and bylaws of the corporation.

PRINCIPAL OFFICE; SCOPE OF ACTIVITIES; DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AGENT

SEC. 8. The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia and shall have in the District of Columbia at all times a designated agent authorized to accept service of process for the corporation, and notice to or service upon such agent, or mailed to the business address of such agent, shall be deemed notice to or service upon the corporation.

USE OF INCOME; LOANS TO OFFICERS, DIRECTORS, OR EMPLOYEES

SEC. 9. (a) No part of the income or assets of the corporation shall inure to any of its members or officers as such, or be distributable to any of them during the life of the corporation or upon its dissolution or final liquidation. Nothing in this subsection, however, shall be construed to prevent the payment of compensation to officers of the corporation or reimbursement for actual necessary expenses in amounts approved by the council of administration of the corporation.

(b) The corporation shall not make loans to its officers or employees. Any member of the council of administration who votes for or assents to the making of a loan or advance to any officer or employee of the corporation, and any officer who participates in the making of such loan or advance, shall be jointly and severally liable to the corporation for the amount of such loan until the repayment thereof.

NONPOLITICAL NATURE OF CORPORATION

SEC. 10. The corporation and its officers and agents as such shall not contribute to any political party or candidate for public office.

LIABILITIES FOR ACTS OF OFFICERS AND AGENTS

SEC. 11. The corporation shall be liable for the acts of its officers and agents when acting within the scope of their authority.

PROHIBITION AGAINST ISSUANCE OF STOCK OR PAYMENT OF DIVIDENDS

SEC. 12. The corporation shall have no power to issue any shares of stock or to declare or pay any dividends.

BOOKS AND RECORDS; INSPECTION

SEC. 13. The corporation shall keep correct and complete books and records of account and shall keep minutes of the proceedings of its national conventions and council of administration. All books and records of the corporation may be inspected by any member, or his agent or attorney, for any proper purpose, at any reasonable time.

AUDIT OF FINANCIAL TRANSACTION

SEC. 14. (a) The financial transactions of the corporation shall be audited annually by an independent public accountant of recognized standing in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards. The audit shall be conducted at the place or places where the accounts of the corporation are normally kept. The independent public accountant, or his representatives, shall have access to all books, accounts, records, reports, files, and all other papers, things, or property belonging to or in use by the corporation and necessary to facilitate the audit, and they shall be afforded full facilities for verifying transactions with the balances or securities held by depositories, fiscal agents, and custodians.

(b) A report of such audit shall be made by the corporation to the Congress and not later than March 1 of each year. The report shall set forth the scope of the audit and shall include a verification by the person or persons conducting the audit of statements of (1) assets and liabilities, (2) capital and surplus or deficit, (3) surplus or deficit analysis, (4) income and expense, and (5) sources and application of funds. Such report shall not be printed as a public document.

REPORT TO CONGRESS

SEC. 15. On or before March 1 of each year the corporation shall report to the Congress on its activities during the preceding fiscal year. Such report may consist of a report on the proceedings of the national convention covering such fiscal year. Such report shall not be printed as a public document.

USE OF NAME

SEC. 16. The corporation and its subordinate divisions shall have the sole and exclusive right to use the name, "Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc.", and no other organization shall use the name "Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc.". The corporation shall have the exclusive and sole right to use, or to allow or refuse the use of, such emblems, seals, and badges as have heretofore been used by the Blue Star Mothers of America.

USE OF ASSETS ON DISSOLUTION OR LIQUIDATION

SEC. 17. Upon dissolution or final liquidation of the corporation, after discharge or satisfaction of all outstanding obligations and liabilities, the remaining assets, if any, of the corporation shall be distributed in accordance with the determination of the national executive board and in compliance with the constitution and bylaws of the corporation and all Federal and State laws applicable thereto.

RESERVATION OF RIGHT TO AMEND OR REPEAL CHARTER

SEC. 18. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, this proposed legislation, as amended, would confer a Federal charter on the Blue Star Mothers of America, Inc.

The Blue Star Mothers of America is an organization dedicated to the memory of the men and women who have served the United States as members of the Armed Forces. This organization was incorporated in Wisconsin in 1942.

Membership in the organization is limited to mothers, adopted mothers, or stepmothers whose sons or daughters have served or have been honorably discharged from the Armed Forces of the United States in World War II or the Korean hostilities, or who have sons or daughters presently serving in the Armed Forces of the United States.

The Blue Star Mothers have today a membership of over 19,000, with 703 chapters located in practically every State of the Union.

Members of this organization work in Veterans' Administration hospitals on a volunteer basis, visiting and helping to care for the needs of ex-servicemen who are patients in these facilities. This organization has donated more than $30,000 to veterans' hospitals for surgical equipment.

Mr. President, I am very happy the bill will be passed, because it gives recognition to a group that has sought to get recognition. I might point out charters have been given to many other groups in America. I felt this group was a very worthy organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GREAT LAKES BASIN COMPACT

The bill (S. 548) granting the consent of Congress to a Great Lakes Basin Compact, and for other purposes was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby given, subject to conditions hereinafter set forth, to any and all of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin to enter into a Great Lakes Basin Compact in the form as follows:

"GREAT LAKES BASIN COMPACT

"The party states solemnly agree:

"Article I

"The purposes of this compact are, through means of joint or cooperative action:

"1. To promote the orderly, integrated, and comprehensive development, use, and conservation of the water resources of the Great Lakes Basin (hereinafter called the Basin).

"2. To plan for the welfare and development of the water resources of the Basin as a whole as well as for those portions of the Basin which may have problems of special concern.

"3. To make it possible for the states of the Basin and their people to derive the maximum benefit from utilization of public works, in the form of navigational aids or otherwise, which may exist or which may be constructed from time to time.

"4. To advise in securing and maintaining a proper balance among industrial, commercial, agricultural, water supply, residential, recreational, and other legitimate uses of the water resources of the Basin.

"5. To establish and maintain an intergovernmental agency to the end that the purposes of this compact may be accomplished more effectively.

"Article II

"A. This compact shall enter into force and become effective and binding when it has been enacted by the legislatures of any four of the States of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin and thereafter shall enter into force and become effective and binding as to any other of said states when enacted by the legislature thereof.

"B. The Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec, or either of them, may become states party to this compact by taking such action as their laws and the laws of the Government of Canada may prescribe for adherence thereto. For the purpose of this compact the word 'state' shall be construed to include a Province of Canada.

"Article III

"The Great Lakes Commission created by Article IV of this compact shall exercise its powers and perform its functions in respect to the Basin which, for the purposes of this compact, shall consist of so much of the following as may be within the party states:

"1. Lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan, Ontario, St. Clair, Superior, and the St. Lawrence River, together with any and all natural or man-made water interconnections between or among them.

"2. All rivers, ponds, lakes, streams, and other watercourses which, in their natural state or in their prevailing condition, are tributary to Lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan, Ontario, St. Clair, and Superior or any of them or which comprise part of any watershed draining into any of said lakes.

"Article IV

"A. There is hereby created an agency of the party states to be known as The Great Lakes Commission (hereinafter called the Commission). In that name the Commission may sue and be sued, acquire, hold and convey real and personal property and any interest therein. The Commission shall have a seal with the words 'The Great Lakes Commission' and such other design as it may prescribe engraved thereon by which it shall authenticate its proceedings. Transactions involving real or personal property shall conform to the laws of the state in which the property is located, and the Commission may by bylaws provide for the execution and acknowledgment of all instruments in its behalf.

"B. The Commission shall be composed of not less than three commissioners nor more than five commissioners from each party state designated or appointed in accordance with the law of the state which they represent and serving and subject to removal in accordance with such law.

"C. Each state delegation shall be entitled to three votes in the Commission. The presence of commissioners from a majority of the party states shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at any meeting of the Commission. Actions of the Commission shall be by a majority of the votes cast except that any recommendations made pursuant to Article VI of this compact shall require an affirmative vote of not less than a majority of the votes cast from each of a majority of the states present and voting.

"D. The commissioners of any two or more party states may meet separately to consider problems of particular interest to their states but no action taken at any such meeting shall be deemed an action of the Commission unless and until the Commission shall specifically approve the same.

"E. In the absence of any commissioner, his vote may be cast by another representative or commissioner of his state provided that said commissioner or other representative casting said vote shall have a written proxy in proper form as may be required by the Commission.

"F. The Commission shall elect annually from among its members a chairman and vice-chairman. The Commission shall appoint an Executive Director who shall also act as secretary-treasurer, and who shall be bonded in such amount as the Commission may require. The Executive Director shall serve at the pleasure of the Commission and at such compensation and under such terms and conditions as may be fixed by it. The Executive Director shall be custodian of the records of the Commission with authority to affix the Commission's official seal and to attest to and certify such records or copies thereof.

"G. The Executive Director, subject to the approval of the Commission in such cases as its bylaws may provide, shall appoint and remove or discharge such personnel as may be necessary for the performance of the Commission's functions. Subject to the aforesaid approval, the Executive Director may fix their compensation, define their duties, and require bonds of such of them as the Commission may designate.

"H. The Executive Director, on behalf of, as trustee for, and with the approval of the Commission, may borrow, accept, or contract for the services of personnel from any state or government or any subdivision or agency thereof, from any intergovernmental agency, or from any institution, person, firm or corporation; and may accept for any of the Commission's purposes and functions under this compact any and all donations, gifts, and grants of money, equipment, supplies, materials, and services from any state or government or any subdivision or agency thereof or intergovernmental agency or from any institution, person, firm or corporation and may receive and utilize the same.

"I. The Commission may establish and maintain one or more offices for the transacting of its business and for such purposes the Executive Director, on behalf of, as trustee for, and with the approval of the Commission, may acquire, hold and dispose of real and personal property necessary to the performance of its functions.

"J. No tax levied or imposed by any party state or any political subdivision thereof shall be deemed to apply to property, transactions, or income of the Commission.

"K. The Commission may adopt, amend and rescind bylaws, rules and regulations for the conduct of its business.

"L. The organization meeting of the Commission shall be held within six months from the effective date of this compact.

"M. The Commission and its Executive Director shall make available to the party states any information within its possession and shall always provide free access to its records by duly authorized representatives of such party states.

"N. The Commission shall keep a written record of its meetings and proceedings and shall annually make a report thereof to be submitted to the duly designated official of each party state.

"O. The Commission shall make and transmit annually to the legislature and Governor of each party state a report covering the activities of the Commission for the preceding year and embodying such recommendations as may have been adopted by the Commission. The Commission may issue such additional reports as it may deem desirable.

"Article V

"A. The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation but the expenses of each commissioner shall be met by the state which he represents in accordance with the law of that state. All other expenses incurred by the Commission in the course of exercising the powers conferred upon it by this compact, unless met in some other manner specifically provided by this compact, shall be paid by the Commission out of its own funds.

"B. The Commission shall submit to the executive head or designated officer of each party state a budget of its estimated expenditures for such period as may be required by the laws of that state for presentation to the legislature thereof.

"C. Each of the Commission's budgets of estimated expenditures shall contain specific recommendations of the amount or amounts to be appropriated by each of the party states. Detailed commission budgets shall be recommended by a majority of the votes cast, and the costs shall be allocated equitably among the party states in accordance with their respective interests.

"D. The Commission shall not pledge the credit of any party state. The Commission may meet any of its obligations in whole or in part with funds available to it under Article IV (H) of this compact, provided that the Commission takes specific action setting aside such funds prior to the incurring of any obligations to be met in whole or in part in this manner. Except where the Commission makes use of funds available to it under Article IV(H) hereof, the Commission shall not incur any obligations prior to the allotment of funds by the party states adequate to meet the same.

"E. The Commission shall keep accurate accounts of all receipts and disbursements. The receipts and disbursements of the Commission shall be subject to the audit and accounting procedures established under the bylaws. However, all receipts and disbursements of funds handled by the Commission shall be audited yearly by a qualified public accountant and the report of the audit shall be included in and become a part of the annual report of the Commission.

"F. The accounts of the Commission shall be open at any reasonable time for inspection by such agency, representative or representatives of the party states as may be duly constituted for that purpose and by others who may be authorized by the Commission.

"Article VI

"The Commission shall have power to:

"A. Collect, correlate, interpret, and report on data relating to the water resources and the use thereof in the Basin or any portion thereof.

"B. Recommend methods for the orderly, efficient, and balanced development, use, and conservation of the water resources of the Basin or any portion thereof to the party states and to any other governments or agencies having interests in or jurisdiction over the Basin or any portion thereof.

"C. Consider the need for and desirability of public works and improvements relating to the water resources in the Basin or any portion thereof.

"D. Consider means of improving navigation and port facilities in the Basin or any portion thereof.

"E. Consider means of improving and maintaining the fisheries of the Basin or any portion thereof.

"F. Recommend policies relating to water resources including the institution and alteration of flood plain and other zoning laws, ordinances, and regulations.

"G. Recommend uniform or other laws, ordinances, or regulations relating to the development, use, and conservation of the Basin's water resources to the party states or any of them and to other governments, political subdivisions, agencies, or intergovernmental bodies having interests in or jurisdiction sufficient to affect conditions in the Basin or any portion thereof.

"H. Consider and recommend amendments or agreements supplementary to this compact to the party states or any of them, and assist in the formulation and drafting of such amendments or supplementary agreements.

"I. Prepare and publish reports, bulletins, and publications appropriate to this work and fix reasonable sale prices therefor.

"J. With respect to the water resources of the Basin or any portion thereof, recommend agreements between the Governments of the United States and Canada.

"K. Recommend mutual arrangements expressed by concurrent or reciprocal legislation on the part of Congress and the Parliament of Canada including but not limited to such agreements and mutual arrangements as are provided for by Article XIII of the Treaty of 1909 Relating to Boundary Waters and Questions Arising Between the United States and Canada. (Treaty Series, No. 548.)

"L. Cooperate with the Governments of the United States and Canada, the party states and any public or private agencies or bodies having interests in or jurisdiction sufficient to affect the Basin or any portion thereof.

"M. At the request of the United States, or in the event that a Province shall be a party state, at the request of the Government of Canada, assist in the negotiation and formulation of any treaty or other mutual arrangement or agreement between the United States and Canada with reference to the Basin or any portion thereof.

"N. Make any recommendation and do all things necessary and proper to carry out the powers conferred upon the Commission by this compact, provided that no action of the Commission shall have the force of law in, or be binding upon, any party state.

"Article VII

"Each party state agrees to consider the action the Commission recommends in respect to:

"A. Stabilization of lake levels.

"B. Measures for combating pollution, beach erosion, floods, and shore inundation.

"C. Uniformity in navigation regulations within the constitutional powers of the states.

"D. Proposed navigation aids and improvements.

"E. Uniformity or effective coordinating action in fishing laws and regulations and cooperative action to eradicate destructive and parasitical forces endangering the fisheries, wildlife and other water resources.

"F. Suitable hydroelectric power developments.

"G. Cooperative programs for control of soil and bank erosion for the general improvement of the Basin.

"H. Diversion of waters from and into the Basin.

"I. Other measures the Commission may recommend to the states pursuant to Article VI of this compact.

"Article VIII

"This compact shall continue in force and remain binding upon each party state until renounced by act of the legislature of such State, in such form and manner as it may choose and as may be valid and effective to repeal a statute of said state, provided that such renunciation shall not become effective until six months after notice of such action shall have been officially communicated in writing to the executive head of the other party states.

"Article IX

"It is intended that the provisions of this compact shall be reasonably and liberally construed to effectuate the purposes thereof. The provisions of this compact shall be severable and if any phrase, clause, sentence, or provision of this compact is declared to be contrary to the Constitution of any party state or of the United States, or in the case of a Province, to the British North America Act of 1867 as amended, or the applicability thereof to any state, agency, person, or circumstance is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of this compact and the applicability thereof to any state, agency, person, or circumstance shall not be affected thereby, provided further that if this compact shall be held contrary to the Constitution of the United States, or in the case of a Province, to the British North America Act of 1867 as amended, or of any party state, the compact shall remain in full force and effect as to the remaining states and in full force and effect as to the state affected as to all severable matters."

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in this Act or in the compact consented to hereby shall be construed to affect the jurisdiction, powers, or prerogatives of any department, agency or officer of the United States Government or of any international commission or agency over or in the Great Lakes Basin or any portion thereof, nor shall anything contained herein be construed to establish an international agency or to limit or affect in any way the exercise of the treatymaking power or any other power or right of the United States. In carrying out its functions under this Act the Commission shall be solely a consultative and recommendatory agency which shall cooperate with the agencies of the United States and shall report annually to the Congress and to the President or to any official designated by the President, make available to the Federal Government any information within its possession and always provide free access to its records by duly authorized representatives of that Government. The consent herein granted does not extend to paragraph B of article II or to paragraphs K and M of article VI of the compact; and consent is granted with respect to paragraph L of article VI of the compact subject to the following conditions: (1) cooperation shall be extended to and carried on with the Government of Canada or any of its subdivisions only through or with the approval of the Department of State; (2) cooperation with an international commission or agency having jurisdiction in the basin shall be extended only to the United States section thereof and in such manner as the section may direct; and (3) proposals to any such international commission or agency shall be submitted only to the United States section thereof and shall be submitted to that section only through the Government of the United States. The consent herein granted is on condition that recommendations under article VI, paragraphs B and G, shall not be made to any foreign government or subdivision thereof and that recommendations to international bodies or agencies shall be made through the Department of State.

SEC. 3. (a) A Federal representative to the Commission shall be appointed by the President, and shall report, in writing to the Senate, the House of Representatives, and to the President either directly or through such agency or official of the Government as the President may specify. Such representative shall have all the rights and privileges of any other member of the Commission except that he shall have no vote. (b) The Federal representative shall receive compensation and shall be entitled to travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as provided for experts and consultants under sections 5 and 15 of the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946 and the Travel Expense Act of 1949, except (1) that his term of service shall be governed by the terms of this Act and shall not be affected by the time limitations of said section 15, and (2) his per diem rate of compensation shall be in such amount, not in excess of $100, as the President shall specify, but the total amount of compensation payable in any one calendar year shall not exceed $15,000: Provided, That if the Federal representative be an employee of the United States he shall serve without additional compensation: Provided further, That a retired military officer or a retired Federal civilian officer or employee may be appointed as such representative, without prejudice to his retired status, and he shall receive compensation as authorized herein in addition to his retired pay or annuity but the sum of his retired pay or annuity and such additional compensation as may be payable hereunder shall not exceed $15,000 in any one calendar year. (c) The Federal representative shall be provided with office space, consulting, engineering, and stenographic service, and other necessary administrative services. (d) The compensation of the Federal representative shall be paid from the current appropriation for salaries in the White House Office, or for staff assistance for the President in connection with special projects. Travel and other expenses provided for in subsections (b) and (c) of this section shall be paid from any current appropriation or appropriations selected by the head of such agency or agencies as may be designated by the President to provide for such expenses.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this Act is expressly reserved.

AMENDMENT OF ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1954, AS AMENDED

The bill (S. 1197) to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, this bill amends section 251 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, by deleting the words "and July" in the first sentence thereof. The first sentence of section 251 now provides that the AEC shall submit to the Congress, in January and July of each year, a report concerning the activities of the Commission. This amendment, in subtance, provides that the Commission shall in the future submit such report only in January and not also in July, and thus on an annual, rather than a semiannual basis.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 1197) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 251 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by deleting the words "and July" in the first sentence thereof.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS TO THE ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

The bill (S. 1228) to amend Public Law 85–590, to increase the authorization for appropriations to the Atomic Energy Commission in accordance with section 261 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, may I ask for an explanation of this bill, also?

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, this bill amends Public Law 85–590, the AEC Authorization Act for the current fiscal year 1959, to increase the authorization for project 59–c–5, phermex installation, Los Alamos, N. Mex., from $2,250,000 to $3,550,090, or a net increase of $1,300,000.

This amendment is just an increase in the authorization for the single project 59–c–5, and does not increase the total amount authorized by Public Law 85–590.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the distinguished Senator for his explanation.

I understand the bill was reported unanimously from the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator is correct. The bill was requested by the Atomic Energy Commission. The letter of the Commission and an unclassified analysis of the project are printed in the committee report, on pages 2 and 3 thereof.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter and analysis be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
February 24, 1959.

Hon. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Congress of the United States.

DEAR SENATOR ANDERSON: I have submitted today to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate proposed legislation which would amend the 1959 authorization act (Public Law 85–590) to increase the amount authorized for project 59–c–5, phermex installation, Los Alamos, N. Mex., to $3,550,000 from $2,250,000.

The increase of $1,300,000 is attributable to a sharp rise in the cost of components, the need for considerably more monitoring and control equipment than had been originally anticipated and changes in machine design to insure more satisfactory performance. No change is being made in the scope of the project. Since even greater emphasis must be placed upon nonnuclear methods of development during a test moratorium, the need for the phermex installation becomes more compelling than at the time the project was originally requested.

Copies of the proposed legislation and the unclassified analysis of the project are enclosed. Copies of the classified analysis will be furnished separately to your staff.

Sincerely yours,

H. S. VANCE,
Acting Chairman.

59–c–5. Phermex installation, Los Alamos, N. Mex., $3,550,000:

This project will provide a weapons diagnostic facility consisting of laboratory and power control buildings, phermex chamber, detection chamber and X-unit pad. This facility will be located in a remote technical area at Los Alamos.

During the past year the Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory has continued development work to improve the machine design. As a result of the more definitive information developed by this continual study, the estimated cost of the project has been increased by $1,300,000 over the amount authorized by Public Law 85–590. The higher estimate is attributable to a sharp rise in the cost of components, the need for considerably more monitoring and control equipment than had been originally anticipated and changes in machine design to insure more satisfactory performance.

The AEC also furnished the Joint Committee a classified statement containing additional information justifying this project which is necessarily classified because of the defense information and restricted data which it contains.

In a hearing held in executive session before the Subcommittee on Legislation on February 27, 1959, the following representatives of the AEC testified in support of this project: Mr. A. R. Luedecke, general manager; Brig. Gen. A. D. Starbird, director of the division of military application; and Mr. Don S. Burrows, controller. The testimony indicated that the project was ready for construction, and that the Commission considered it important for its atomic weapons development program.

COMMENTS OF THE JOINT COMMITTEE

1. Public Law 85–590 contains in section 102 certain limitations on the authority of the Commission to start projects authorized by section 101. Insofar as project 59–c–5 is concerned, it was provided that the Commission was authorized to start this project only if the currently estimated cost does not exceed by more than 25 percent the estimated cost set forth in the act, $2,250,000. Inasmuch as the current estimated cost is now $3,550,000, the increase of $1,300,000 is more than the maximum allowable 25 percent. Thus the Commission is not authorized to start project 59–c–5 without amendment to Public Law 85–590. The Commission has stated that the increase is attributable to the sharp rise in the cost of components, the need for considerably more monitoring and control equipment than had been originally anticipated, and changes in machine design to insure more satisfactory performance.

2. The Joint Committee recommends that this bill be considered and enacted by the Congress as soon as possible, in order that this project, important to our atomic weapons program, may proceed as expeditiously as possible.

CHANGES IN EXISTING LAWS

In accordance with subsection (4) of rule XXIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, changes in existing law made by the bill accompanying this report are shown as follows (new matter is printed in italic, and deleted matter is shown in brackets):

"PUBLIC LAW 85–590

"SEC. 101. PLANT OR FACILITY ACQUISITION OR CONSTRUCTION.—There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Atomic Energy Commission, in accordance with the provisions of section 261 a. (1) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, the sum of $386,679,000 for acquisition or condemnation of any real property or any facility or for plant or facility acquisition, construction, or expansion, as follows:

"* * * * * *

"(c) ATOMIC WEAPONS.—

"* * * * * *

"5. Project 59–c–5, phermex installation, Los Alamos, N. Mex., [$2,250,000] $3,550,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 1228) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 101(c) of Public Law 85–590 is amended by striking therefrom the figure "$2,250,000" for project 59–c–5, phermex installation, Los Alamos, N. Mex., and by inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$3,550,000".

REPRESENTATION OF INDIGENT DEFENDANTS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The bill (S. 895) to provide for the representation of indigent defendants in criminal cases in the district courts of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEATING. Over, Mr. President.

I will say, Mr. President, that we have not had an opportunity to study any bills which may be on the calendar, from this point on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The clerk will state the bill at the foot of the calendar.

BARGAINING WITH PURCHASERS BY COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS OF MILK PRODUCERS

The bill (S. 753) to authorize cooperation associations of milk producers to bargain with purchasers singly or in groups, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ENGLE. Over, by request, Mr. President.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I understood that an explanation of the bill was desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. AIKEN. I can understand perhaps why the Senator from California might want to have the bill go over. As originally introduced, the bill would have applied to all cooperative asssociations. There was rather strenuous objection from some of the cooperative group associations on the Pacific Coast, because of fear that passage of the bill would not work out to their advantage. Therefore, the bill was changed to apply to milk marketing cooperatives only.

The need for the bill is that under the law, the Capper-Volstead Act, the cooperative associations which do business in a marketing agreement area may get together and sit down with a distributor to bargain in relation to the distribution of milk, and all the cooperatives may get together and bargain with the distributor, but then under the Robinson-Patman Act they have to give the same identical terms to every other distributor and have to deal with the distributors one by one. For that reason, the process becomes rather expensive and it is a rather cumbersome way of doing business in a milk marketing area where there is a Federal order.

The bill would permit these groups to bargain with more than one handler at a time, because they have to give them all the same identical terms, whatever the terms may be.

The bill has been changed. It was amended in the committee last year, I believe, so as to prohibit strictly any discussion of resale prices of the milk. That was to overcome an objection on the part of the Department of Justice.

After those things were done, the bill was passed by the Senate last summer, without any opposition; but failed of passage in the House.

Under one law the milk cooperatives have to do one thing, and under another law they are constantly in trouble if they try to do it in the most efficient manner.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I have no personal objection to the bill, but by request, I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

That concludes the call of the calendar.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated. It is designated "4–28–59—A."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 31, it is proposed to strike out lines 10 through 18.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this amendment is directed toward eliminating the additional appropriation of $283,000 for furniture, and so forth for the new Senate Office Building. It should be remembered that last year when this question was before the Senate, an appropriation of $1 million was requested. I moved at the time that this figure be cut in half, and stated that in my judgment, $1 million was an excessive figure. I urged that instead of all the offices in the new building being equipped with new furniture, a large portion of the used furniture from the Old Senate Office Building be transferred to the new building. The final result was that the appropriation for $1 million was approved although that amount represented $300,000 less than was originally requested.

This year the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. J. George Stewart, came forth with a request that $293,000 additional be appropriated for furniture. This request, if granted, would, of course, practically bring the total appropriation to the $1,300,000 which was requested last year, which request the Senate Committee rejected and reduced to $1 million.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations this year has reduced the request of the Architect of the Capitol by $10,000, but retains a request for a further appropriation of $283,000.

Upon close inspection of the testimony of Mr. Stewart, under cross-examination by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], it appears that $113,000 of this amount is to provide additional furniture in 40 office rooms of the new building, $150,000 is to provide carpets in 207 rooms, at an average cost of approximately $750 per room per carpet. It is these major items which I believe should be eliminated from the bill. I should like to point out for the sake of the record what every Senator knows, that the corridors of the Old Senate Office Building are jammed with the furniture which has been taken out of the offices in that building, and which apparently is not to be used in the new building.

I mentioned on the floor of the Senate yesterday the results of the census which I had taken of the furniture. We had a count made yesterday. We found in the corridors and in the attic of the Old Senate Office Building 375 desks. That ought to be enough to provide furniture for 40 offices. We found 215 steel filing cabinets. That number would provide five filing cabinets to an office. We also found 400 chairs. That would make 10 chairs to an office. I mentioned the fact that there were also bookcases in the corridors, but I did not mention the number, because I had not then taken a census. However, I have had a census taken this morning, covering the four floors of the Old Senate Office Building. We found 85 bookcases there.

Therefore we have ample furniture, more than enough, to equip the 40 offices. There is no necessity whatever to spend $113,000 for furniture.

Now $150,000 is requested for carpets. The Architect of the Capitol, Mr. J. George Stewart, and the architects whom he has engaged for the building, were supposed to exercise great ingenuity in laying out the offices. They provided that the inner office of each Senator's suite should have a carpet, and the other offices were to have very fine rubber tile on the floor. The tile has been put in at great expense. Now it is claimed that the rubber tile is so dangerous that it is necessary to have carpets put down over it, at a cost of $750 per carpet. That is $150,000 more. There are other items, too, which are not needed, because we have on hand 85 bookcases, and there is no need for additional steel bookcases.

Therefore, this whole appropriation is unnecessary. At a time when the administration is making appeals to us to balance the budget, I believe it ill behooves the Architect of the Capitol, appointed by the President, and who holds his office at the pleasure of the President, to come forward with this request for expenditures for luxurious equipment.

Mr. President, this is not an issue between the Senator from Illinois and the Appropriations Committee. Last night I paid sincere tribute to the members of the Committee on Appropriations, particularly the distinguished Senator from Arizona, the committee chairman [Mr. HAYDEN], and I also paid tribute to the very able chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. They can in no sense be held responsible for what is going on. They are busy men. The Architect of the Capitol works at this job day in and day out with his staff assistants, and I believe, to say the least, he has not been economical in the expenditure of public funds.

This is only a part of the general program the Architect of the Capitol is carrying out. He was largely the moving spirit behind the construction of another House Office Building. Its exact cost is not certain, but this morning's Washington Post states it is to be $64 million. It will be interesting to see whether this figure will increase as the work progresses.

Mr. Stewart was largely responsible for the building of the new Senate Office Building, which initially was promised to cost only $20,600,000, but which now will cost over $25 million, and which, with the request for $750,000 more for construction and equipment in the new building, the request for $283,000 for furniture, the request for $4 million for completing the subway, and bringing it across the road, and for the construction of a terminal which will rival the Moscow subway, will cost only $5 million more or a total of over $30 million.

Therefore, if we approve the program of the Capitol Architect, we will have an expenditure of $30,500,000. And the end may not be yet. I say that because in the testimony which the Architect gave before the subcommittee it was apparent that he would like to redevelop the north or Senate wing, and that he also has designs on the House wing. We know that he is reconstructing the central portion of the Capitol at a cost of at least $17 million.

Therefore, the Architect of the Capitol has mapped out a gigantic program. What we are really trying to do is to help the members of the Committee on Appropriations, who are busy men dealing with many other things, to resist the blandishments of the Capitol Architect. I say that this is not a case of the Senator from Illinois versus the Appropriations Committee in any sense. It is a case of the people of the United States versus the bureaucracy of the Eisenhower administration.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I warmly commend the Senator from Illinois for the pending amendment and for the series of amendments which I understand he intends to call up. This is not an easy or pleasant thing to do, but it is essential and important that it be done.

I also commend the Senator from Illinois for his remarks about the Committee on Appropriations. I read his speech of last night, in which he emphasized the fact that the Appropriations Committee has done an outstanding job, and a very thorough job. Service on the Committee on Appropriations is perhaps the most onerous and difficult work in the Senate. The members of the committee have done an extremely good job. I am sure that the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois are offered in a spirit of constructiveness and in an attempt to try to improve somewhat the excellent work which the members of the committee have already done.

It is extremely important for U.S. Senators, who believe in economy, to set a good example themselves. As I understand, the furniture to which the Senator has referred is for the use of Senators and their staffs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. And it is also for use by committees.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And committees also, on which, of course, the Senator serves.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. In the second place, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois whether there has been any reply to him to the effect that the furniture is obsolete or cannot be used. I refer to the furniture which he found in the corridors and in the attic of the Old Senate Office Building.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course, it has been used. It was used until the last few days. It was used in the present or Old Senate Office Building. I have such furniture in my own office. I believe that furniture, like wine, improves with age. The old chairs are more comfortable than the new chairs. The old couches are more comfortable than the new ones. The old desks are perfectly adequate.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Can the Senator from Illinois, with his fertile imagination, think of anything which would justify the new furniture on the ground that it will provide better service for the increased taxes which will result?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I think it is sheer waste.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Before any furniture was decided upon for the new building, a questionnaire was sent to each and every Senator. The new furniture was not forced upon Senators. They were asked in the questionnaire whether they wanted to move to the new building and also whether they wanted to take with them their old furniture, or to have new furniture provided.

Seventy-two percent of the Senators who answered wanted to move to the new building and to have new furniture. That was the only reason why the buying of new furniture was recommended.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is a new Congress. There are many new Senators. When the new Senators came here, they did not commit themselves on a questionnaire. Apparently 28 percent of the Senators who answered the questionnaire, plus some of the other Senators, did not want new furniture. Since there are some 300 offices in the new building, this furnishing of 40 offices really refers to only 13 percent of the offices.

So I think under my proposal it will be possible to provide the simple life for those who like simplicity and will not force upon them the expenditures of the unwilling and imprudent; namely, luxury and extravagance.

Mr. CHAVEZ. A number of the senior Senators are remaining in the old building. I do not know how many rooms the Senator from Illinois has at the moment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have six.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I know the Senator is going to have two additional rooms assigned to him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will have two additional rooms assigned to me, after having handled a large volume of work for 10 years with only four offices.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I think the Senator is entitled to the additional rooms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. I am happy with the old furniture.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I know the Senator is. Everyone of those rooms has a rug in it, and has had it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator from New Mexico thinks there is danger of slipping, I will allow him to have the rugs taken up from my offices and transferred to the New Senate Office Building, to be laid there.

Mr. CHAVEZ. No one denies the sincerity of purpose or the honesty of the Senator from Illinois. But, after all, certain committees have certain responsibilities given to them by law. There is a reason why all these things have been done. In connection with the extension of the Capitol, it was carried in the Legislative Appropriation Act of 1956.

Public Law 242, 84th Congress, provides for the extension, reconstruction, and replacement of the central portion of the Capitol in substantial accordance with an approved architectural plan, but "with such modifications and additions, including provision for restaurant facilities, and such other facilities in the Capitol Grounds, together with utilities, equipment, approaches, and other appurtenant or necessary items, as may be approved by said Commission."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from New Mexico forgive me for interrupting him? I think he is reading from the authorization for the changes in the central portion of the Capitol, not the authorization for the new office building.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am one of those who voted against that authorization, but I do not think what I am now discussing relates to that.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It has to do with the tunnel to which the Senator from Illinois has referred.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall come to the tunnel in another amendment; for the moment I am speaking about furniture, carpets, et cetera.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Referring to furniture, whether the Senators who answered the questionnaire are now Members of the Senate or not, they were then Senators of the United States. Seventy-two percent of them, after they were asked, stated that they wanted to move into the new building, and that they wanted new furniture. Many Senators discussed the question with their office personnel—typists, clerks, and administrative assistants. The personnel informed their respective Senators that they wanted new furniture. The committee was only trying to carry out the desires of the Senators.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think another vote should be taken on this question, so that the Senate as a whole can pass upon the matter. The 86th Congress has a number of new Senators. Some of them may be of a different mind.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am glad there are new Senators here. The project of the new Senate Office Building was started by a predecessor of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct; the man whom I defeated for the Senate.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Probably on that idea.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, no; that was not an issue in the campaign.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Or on that justification. Nevertheless, it was started in 1949, but the start of the project was delayed so often that it became necessary to wait until 1954. At that time, costs had risen. That is why the costs for the construction and furnishing of the new building have been so high. But the furniture was not forced on Senators at all.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I was talked into moving into the new office building by my staff when I was in Wisconsin. When I returned and found I had been moved, I was most unhappy about it and changed my mind, but too late. I think one of the prerogatives of the office of a Senator is that a Senator may change his mind once in awhile. I should like to change my mind with respect to the questionnaire which was circulated. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether he has any knowledge that such a questionnaire has been circulated with respect to carpets. My office is now in the new office building. Four of the five rooms of my suite are not carpeted. I presume the proposal before the Senate now is to carpet those rooms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I, myself, think it would be bad for a number of reasons.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Carpeting would be bad.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I think carpeting would tend to destroy attractiveness of appearance. I think the additional expense of $150,000 to lay carpets, without asking Senators about it, would be an extravagance.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think it would make the Senate look ridiculous, very frankly. We should all care sufficiently for the good reputation of the Senate not to take such action.

I had hoped that the members of the committee would withdraw their requests, because, frankly, I think they have been talked into this by the Architect of the Capitol. I do not see any reason why we should defend his bureaucracy. The Architect of the Capitol is not chosen by either Congress or those who elect the Members of Congress; he is appointed by the President. He holds office at the pleasure of the President. His appointment does not have to be confirmed by Congress.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Would not the Senator agree to an appropriation large enough to paint some attractive, lively murals on the walls of the tunnel between the Old Senate Office Building and the New Senate Office Building?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think there is much to be said for paintings around the Capitol. I think they would perhaps cover up some of the other atrocities. I have often thought the walls could be used for paintings; but the trouble is that when such a suggestion is made, everyone has a different idea of what is art. I once got into a very unhappy experience on that subject when I helped to arrange for the decoration of some Midwestern post offices. There is always a controversy between the traditionalists and the modernists, between the classicists and the neoclassicists, between the portrait painters and the landscape painters. So it is very difficult to determine the kind of paintings to be used, and also where the portraits shall come from. The Senator from Vermont comes from a State which has some very eminent painters—at least, they spend their summers in Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. They spend winters there, too. Even a snow scene would be better than the present drab walls. When one walks through the tunnel now he gets the impression that a chair may be waiting for him at the other end.

Mr. DOUGLAS. One of the paintings I like is of Mount Equinox. I would be glad to see a painting of Mount Equinox, if we could have one of the Dunes, as well.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Although this is a small item, it is one of great importance, because it will reduce the expense of the U.S. Senate. This is a proposal for spending made by an officer appointed by the administration.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The position of the Democratic Senator from Illinois is that the proposal is wasteful.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So the Senator from Illinois feels that we should not only oppose wasteful spending, but that we should accomplish, in practice, economy on ourselves and in our own offices.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

And I hope our good friends on the Appropriations Committee, on both the Democratic side and the Republican side, will disavow this attempt to use them to help obtain expenditures for luxurious items.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, if the last argument made by the Senator from Illinois had not convinced me that he is wrong, I might agree with him. But he is willing to spend money to have pictures of landscapes painted on tunnel walls, although he is not willing to have carpets placed in the new building, so the girls in the offices will not break their legs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I meant to say that the paintings should be donated; and I am willing to subscribe to a fund for decorating the walls. I will start the fund right now; I will give $20 for a good mural.

In fact, I will make another offer: I will offer to buy rubber heels for every clerk, male or female, in the 250 offices; and if the Senator from New Mexico will send me the foot measurements of his clerks, I will send the heels to him tonight.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I wish wholeheartedly to endorse the offer the Senator from Illinois has made for the purchase of heels for all employees who work in the Senate Office Building—because, although he may not know it, in one town in Vermont more heels are manufactured than in all the rest of the country put together. In that town, soles are made, too.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was going to ask whether Vermont had the record for the number of heels which it produces.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct; more heels are made in that one town than in all the rest of the country put together—and they are for sale.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is a dubious distinction.

Mr. AIKEN. I think the offer was dubious, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I thank the Senator from Illinois for yielding to me.

It is very laudable of the Senator from Illinois to try to purchase rubber heels and soles for the girls who work in the Senate Office Building.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not think it is at all necessary, but I am willing to do it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Let the Senator from Illinois try to do it, and let him see how many acceptances he will get. Evidently, he does not know the girls.

Mr. DOUGLAS. A second argument which has been advanced is that the electric typewriters make so much noise that it is necessary to install carpets, in order to deaden the sound. But there is already good insulation on walls and the ceiling.

Mr. CHAVEZ. For the moment, I shall confine my remarks to the suggestion about heels.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not an expert on that subject.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Two girls in the Senate Office Building already have broken their legs while they were working there.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What are their names?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not recall their names. But they had to go to the hospital.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Did they break their legs, or did they just fall? Many women have fallen, you know—although not in the Senate Office Building.

Mr. CHAVEZ. My point is that we do not want the young women who work in the Senate Office Building to be injured in any way.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not think there is any danger; I think it is a safe building—safe physically and safe morally. I repudiate the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. No; the suggestion which was made was that the Senator did not want anyone to fall in the Senate Office Building.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from New Mexico is very solicitous.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Yes, I am. I have a good office force. I am very proud of those who work for me. I never saw harder work done anywhere in Washington than the work that is done by the young women who work for the Members of Congress.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But I do not think they need $150,000 worth of carpets.

Mr. CHAVEZ. They do not have the benefit of 8-hour laws or NRA hours. If the Senator for whom they work wants them to work until 8 or 9 o'clock in the evening, they will be there. Some of them work until 10 or 12 o'clock at night.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is not an attack on the office force of the Senate. It is an attempt to save money for the taxpayers, because throughout the country people are in trouble; and many of those who are in trouble are compelled to pay Federal taxes that, if we are not careful, will be wasted. So we have the obligation to be economical.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Of course. But the Appropriations Committee also has an obligation.

This supplemental appropriation bill is not the creature of any particular member of the committete. The bill comes from the whole committee. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], presided over the committee's consideration of the bill. I participated in the consideration of the items in regard to the new office building and the so-called tunnel. I also participated in the consideration of the items which affect the Department of Defense. Other Senators who are on the committee worked on the items which affect other departments.

So the bill which has been reported to the Senate by the committee is the work of the whole committee. We worked on the bill in the best faith. The bill as we have reported it calls for appropriations of $82 million less than the amounts called for by the budget; and I do not think that is a very small amount of money.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me say to my good friend, the Senator from New Mexico, that I was very careful, both last night and in the beginning of my remarks today, to make it clear that I was not reflecting in the slightest on the members of the Appropriations Committee. I do not want the Senator from New Mexico to try to make my amendment appear to be an attack upon their integrity, their devotion to the country, or anything of the kind.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not so regard it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But all Members of the Senate who vote for the passage of the bill will, in essence, approve all the items contained in it. If my amendment is rejected, that will mean that Senators approve of this appropriation of $283,000; and then, when we return to our States, we shall have to defend our action, because this is a democracy.

Personally, I do not think an item of this kind can legitimately be defended. I would hate to be asked, when I was in Illinois, "Why did you vote for spending money for furniture which was not needed and for carpets on floors which already are expensive—because they already have rubber tiling?"

Mr. CHAVEZ. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me to speak further, let me say there are better floors in the old Senate Office Building, because those floors are marble. Nevertheless, there are carpets on them.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I am very glad to yield to my very dear friend, the Senator from North Dakota, whom all of us love. If anyone is in trouble, he can be certain that the Senator from North Dakota will come to his or her aid. Moreover, there is a touch of mischief in the Senator from North Dakota. So I await with interest what he is going to say.

Mr. LANGER. I want to come to the aid of the Senator from Illinois, because I think he is in trouble. [Laughter.]

Some years ago, before I was reelected, I conceived the idea of taking back to North Dakota, with me, the desk I had in my office in the Senate Office Building. Therefore, I had it appraised; I wanted to know what I would have to pay for that old desk. To my surprise, it was appraised at $800.

As I understand from reading the newspapers, there are scores of these desks. Can the Senator tell me the number?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; there are 375 good desks in the corridors and in the attic.

Mr. LANGER. I am talking about the desks that Senators use. Mine was appraised at $800. And, even then, those in charge said they would not sell it, because they could not replace it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from North Dakota is talking on my side of the issue.

Mr. LANGER. Yes, I am talking on the Senator's side; I am helping him.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Good.

Mr. LANGER. Because I think he is absolutely right. I do not see how we can go before the taxpayers and justify the purchase of scores and scores and scores of expensive new desks, when we already have all those desks available for use. I do not know of any Member of this body who would not be able to use one of those old desks?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

Does not he also believe that the chairs we have are good, too?

Mr. LANGER. They certainly are.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Four hundred of them are stacked up. Could not they be moved into the new offices? And there are 85 good wooden bookcases. They do not need to be scrapped and to be replaced with steel bookcases, do they? And there are 215 steel filing cases, each with 4 drawers.

Mr. LANGER. I wish to say that both the Republican platform and the Democratic platform called for economy. Here we have a chance to show that we are really in favor of economy. So I shall support the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As always, the Senator from North Dakota is the friend of the underdog.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I recall that at one time Secretary Wilson made a reference to kennels and dogs. So there is nothing wrong there.

In reference to the desks which now are piled up in every corridor of the Old Senate Office Building, let me say to the Senator from Illinois that as soon as the two extra rooms are made available to Senators, after the reconstruction work is done, every one of those desks will be used in those rooms. They are not to be given away to anyone, or sold. They are to be put back in the rooms of the Old Senate Office Building.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I already have my old desk and chairs. I believe Senators in the new building, with the exception of some of their rooms, already have their desks and chairs. What the Senator is asking is that we equip all the offices in the new building with new furniture. I am saying now, as I said last year, that I think we should utilize a large portion of the old furniture, instead of scrapping it and throwing it away.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not doubt the sincerity of purpose of the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not doubt the sincerity of purpose of the Senator from New Mexico, so we are even.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I do not doubt a word the Senator says. I am trying to explain why the action complained of was taken. I have absolutely no quarrel with the argument of the Senator from Illinois, because I know he believes in what he is urging——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why does not the Senator support me, then? I will withdraw my amendment and the Senator can offer the amendment, if he cares to.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Oh, no.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. I was not present, but I understand there was some discussion about the tunnel yesterday.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. LANGER. We are trying to run the whole world, and countries all over the earth. We have American boys sticking their noses into every country of the world except Russia and the satellite countries. Yet we are not smart enough to build a tunnel from the Capitol to the Senate Office Building. Is that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think the Senator is completely correct. The tunnel is a blind alley. I shall come to that subject later. Right now I want to stick to the subject of furniture.

Mr. LANGER. I want the Senator to know I am going to aid him in the tunnel amendment also.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Good for the Senator.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. If we want to save money, there are many ways in which we can do so. In the same bill, the committee restored $100 million for foreign aid. The Senator is not willing to provide real necessities for our offices in order that the service Senators render may be facilitated, but he possibly will vote for the restoration of the $100 million. The Senator could save $100 million on that item.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The request for the restoration of the $100 million was made by the President. Indeed, the restoration was less than he requested. He wanted $125 million. The committee restored $100 million. I may say that although I have been a supporter of foreign aid, I am in doubt as to how I am going to vote this time. I am tired not only of waste, but I am sick and tired of supporting the administration on foreign aid measures and then finding that the Republican Party and the Republican administration, because I supported this administration on foreign aid, accuse me of being a wild spender. So do not count me necessarily as a supporter of the foreign aid appropriation. I am in doubt as to how I shall vote. But I should like to point out that it has nothing to do with the subject of furniture. The "flowers that bloom in the spring tra-la" have nothing to do with the question of furniture.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The question does have something to do with it, because the item is in the bill, and the Senate will come to it eventually. The committee was not willing to give $2 million to the State of West Virginia so that people there could be put to work. There are about 60,000 miners out of work. Yet, money is provided in this bill to build a dam in Taiwan.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the Senator is willing to eliminate the item for furniture and furnishings and apply the $283,000 for the relief of unemployed, I would be willing to withdraw both amendments and propose to provide that the money should be used for the distribution of food in West Virginia and Kentucky.

Will the Senator agree to that?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I would be glad to provide for such relief.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator agree to put the $4,283,000 which is involved in a fund to purchase surplus food and distribute the food to the people of West Virginia and Kentucky?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I will tell the Senator why I will not agree.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Senator does not want waste, and I am for——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator mean he is for waste?

Mr. CHAVEZ. I am against the waste of money we appropriate.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh.

Mr. CHAVEZ. We have spent probably as much as we are going to get for the new tunnel. If the new tunnel is not completed, it will come to a dead end and will be a complete waste.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not speak about it until later, except to say that the Architect of the Capitol has apparently tried to confront us with an accomplished fact, and has not observed due caution and architectural commonsense in the laying out of the tunnel, but, instead, has brought the tunnel to about 100 feet from the Senate wing of the Capitol. He now wants about $4 million to complete it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator realizes there is more than one way to waste money. The tight money, high interest rate policy of the present Administration has cost this country about $8 billion in taxes. That policy has cost probably 1,000 times as much as the total savings which would have been effected had the amendments the Senator has offered to reduce expenditures of the Government been enacted. The Senator has been quoted as advocating the high interest policies. Those policies have resulted in costing the people of this Nation about $15 billion each year. It operates as hidden taxes on the masses of our people.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that the quotations which have been used by Secretary Humphrey have embarrassed me, too. First I am held up as a wild spender. Then I am called a fiscal savior. I will discuss the question later of whether the Federal Reserve Board should support the bond market and keep the interest rates artificially low; but the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from New Mexico are trying to lead us away from the issue now before the Senate. The issue is whether the Senate should spend $283,000 for furniture and carpets which are not needed. That is the issue.

I am pained to see my fellow Democrats pulling the chestnuts out of the fire for the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. J. George Stewart, a Republican, who was nominated by a Republican President, and not confirmed by the Senate, who holds office at the will of the President. I am pained to see my fellow Democrats rush to his defense.

Mr. LONG. If the Senator would restrict his amendment to providing that no Republican's office shall have carpets, I might be willing to go along, but I expect to vote to have the rugs where secretaries of Democrats are going to be walking in the offices.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not think we should spend $150,000 for those rugs. I do not believe in it.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. If we may get back to a pertinent matter——

Mr. DOUGLAS. It would be welcome, indeed, to get back to something pertinent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Something has been said which, if it can be verified, would have great influence on me. The implication was made that if the $113,000 for additional furniture is not provided, then staff assistants in the offices of Senators would be without desks, chairs, or necessary files. If that is not true, if the furniture referred to by the Senator from Illinois is sufficient to cover all the needs of Senators' offices, then I would enthusiastically support his position. I do not know how any Senator could be against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say that on page 1163 of the hearings there is a statement on the construction of the additional Senate office building. Cross-examination about that matter appears on succeeding pages.

There has already been spent, for furniture and furnishings, roughly, nearly a million dollars. On page 1176 of the hearings there is a list of the items, by contractor and by method of awarding the contract. The total is almost a million dollars, so that much has been spent on furniture already.

There are 40 offices which have not been equipped with new furniture. My proposal is to take the surplus of used furniture and put it into the 40 offices and committee rooms.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The position of the Senator from Illinois, as I understand it, is that since the size of staff has not changed much, with only two Senators more than there were last year, the million dollars should be adequate to provide all the necessary furniture we need for roughly the same sized staff and two more Senators' offices. That is the two additional Senators from Alaska. Is that a correct understanding?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. That seems to be sensible.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As a matter of fact, I do not think a million dollars was needed, to begin with.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I proposed that we cut the million dollars to $500,000.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, the original request was for $1,350,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The committee decided that the work could be done for a million dollars. After we went forward, we found that the million dollars would not adequately furnish the building. That is the explanation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The million dollars would not furnish new furniture for every person who works in the new office building. My point is that some of the used furniture, which has been taken out of the offices in the old building, could be transferred to the new building. That is my position.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I will say to the Senator once again, with regard to the old furniture, that every piece of furniture presently there is going to be used in the Old Senate Office Building. If we want to furnish the new offices in the new building, we will have to provide new furniture. All the furniture which can be seen in the hallways will be used.

Mr. DOUGLAS. All I can talk about is what I know concerning my corridor, which is one-sixteenth of the building. The offices along that corridor, so far as I can tell, already have furniture in them. I have an adequtae supply of furniture in my six rooms. The furniture is perfectly adequate. However, there are hundreds of pieces in the hall, and some in the attic.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The largest suites in the old building were probably four rooms. It is contemplated that every Senator in the old building shall now have six rooms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Senators already have that much room. The point is that in some offices previously the clerks were packed very closely together, and will not be packed as closely together in the future.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Therefore, there are surplus desks which have been moved out into the hall.

For instance, in one of my offices previously I had five assistants and now there are three. In another office I had five assistants, and now there are two. The surplus stock would have been moved out into the hall, except that we moved it laterally along the line into the new offices. We have equipped our six offices, I think, with identically the same furniture we had before. Therefore the furniture which was formerly in the two additional rooms I have is now surplus.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LANGER. I understood the Senator from New Mexico to say that each Senator in the old building would have six rooms.

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct.

Mr. LANGER. I have been robbed. I have only five rooms.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I will tell the Senator why: he does not watch over the situation. [Laughter.] The Senator should have kept in touch with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who belong to the group which assigns the rooms.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

FOREIGN AID

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point an editorial published in today's Wall Street Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROPOSAL ON FOREIGN AID

One thing that makes U.S. foreign aid such a difficult issue to debate is that almost anything you say about it is true.

The U.S. aid program has done sensible things, and it has done foolish things. It has spent money efficiently, and it has spent wastefully. Among its administrators are men energetic and level-headed, and men who are boondogglers and dunderheads. It has been a boon to foreign countries, and it has been a bane to them. It has made us friends abroad, and it has lost them. It has thus advanced the interests of the United States, and it has done those interests injury.

We have lately had a close look at U.S. foreign aid ourselves, in places as varied as the advanced nations of Europe and the so-called backward nations of Southeast Asia, and it would not be difficult to marshal evidence for any of these views.

This explains, we think, why it has been possible for reasonable men to argue that our present gigantic aid program must be preserved intact. Or to argue that all foreign aid is sheer nonsense better abandoned altogether.

Yet it seems to us that the truth is neither the one nor the other. And it also seems to us that the task of finding it begins with the separation of the general question of whether there is a point in any foreign aid and the question whether the U.S. foreign aid program as presently conceived and executed is a sensible one.

Foreign aid is not necessarily condemned by condemning the present program. Nor, conversely, is the present program—$5 billion a year in some 70 countries—justified simply by justifying some uses for foreign aid.

For what they may contribute to the present debate, we will set down our own views. They are:

First, that there are circumstances today in which realism suggests that the United States can use foreign aid, economic or military, to promote its own best interests.

Second, that the present foreign aid program has lost touch with those realities and should be abandoned.

And third, that to find a foreign aid program manageable in size and reasonable in concept it will first be necessary to abolish the International Cooperation Administration, in fact as well as in name.

Foreign aid is one of the oldest, and at times one of the most useful, instruments of foreign policy.

Its origins probably reach farther back into history than history records, but it was certainly used extensively by the Romans in their day, by the British, French and other European powers, by the Russians in the days of the Czars and the Chinese in the days of the Emperors. In every case, the purpose and the objective has been straightforward: One country, by giving aid to another country, hoped to create or to preserve a state of affairs favorable to itself and saw some reasonable prospect that the aid would accomplish its purpose.

Today there are places in the world where this practical principle may apply to the United States. At least it is plain that without U.S. aid, military and economic, there would now be no such country as the Republic of Korea.

The critic of all foreign aid can argue whether the price paid was worth the gain. He would be hard put to argue that the aid in these cases did not have clear objectives against a measurable danger and a reasonable prospect of accomplishment—that is, that the aid could be disciplined by practical judgments.

It was on this principle that our foreign aid program was started and that, at the time of Greece and Turkey, it was supported by this newspaper.

But today our foreign aid program is something else again. From the premise that some foreign aid can be useful, our government has jumped to the conclusion that almost all foreign aid is justifiable. Foreign aid has ceased to be a precision tool of foreign policy and has become instead a program of "uplift" in all parts of the world. It is in this change that it has become unhinged from reason.

We no longer limit ourselves to giving some help, say, to Thailand that will strengthen its government or its people in resisting the military and diplomatic threats of Red China. Even in extending self-interest to generosity, we are not content with some modest aid that might attain some modest improvement in the Thai economy. We undertake to reshape the whole country, its agriculture, its industry, its public works, its schools, and even its customs and way of living.

In short, we no longer discipline ourselves in giving aid by hard, practical judgments on the point of danger, or on what we hope to accomplish or whether there is a reasonable prospect of accomplishing it. This gives our foreign aid program unattainable objectives, limitless costs, and accounts for practically all of its troubles.

Those troubles—the foolish spending, the waste, the graft, the irritation of the recipients with their benefactors—hardly need to be chronicled here. The point is that these are symptoms, not the real malady. The fundamental difficulty is in the concept of the foreign aid program, which makes all these things inevitable and buries what good there might be in foreign aid under an avalanche of errors.

The way back, it seems to us, must begin with a new sense of proportion on foreign aid, both as to the times and places where we will give aid and the manner in which we will give it.

This means abandoning the idea that the U.S. Treasury is a cornucopia for any country just because it is undeveloped, or backward or in financial troubles or could use some U.S. dollars. There's hardly any country in the non-Communist world that wouldn't fit such a loose standard; hardly any, in fact, that doesn't fit it now, and it is patently ridiculous for the United States to undertake to support some 70 countries.

It means, even when we do decide to aid some country, that we use some precision in what kind of aid we give for what purposes. Military aid to Korea, with a Red army across the border, is one thing; military aid to a South American country is something else again.

It means an insistence that the country can profitably use such aid as we do give and that it is willing to do its part.

And this means in practically every case that we turn from grants to loans, from the sweeping general program to consideration of specific projects, from sending hordes of American planners to sending a few technical advisers to help a country carry out its own plans in its own way, if we decide the plans are worth our helping at all.

We do not suppose that these will be easy decisions to make; in fact, the decisions will be harder than under the type of program we now have where many decisions are avoided by embracing nearly every kind of foreign aid almost anyplace.

But we are convinced that a program approached in this way will cost a fraction of what it now costs the U.S. taxpayer, that it will gain us flexibility in our foreign policy, and that in this fashion we may have a foreign-aid program that works to our own best interest instead of being, as it now too often is in too many places, a monstrous liability.

We are also now convinced that this is an impractical hope unless we first abolish the ICA.

This seems to us a prerequisite for two reasons. First, what is needed here is a completely new beginning which would replace the whole concept on which ICA is based. Secondly, under the concept of foreign aid we are now discussing, an organization like ICA would be unnecessary.

Once we turn from grants to loans, from U.S. planned projects to indigenous projects, from limitless to limited objectives, there will no longer be a need for a vast bureaucracy with swarms of oversea missions to replan the economy of these foreign countries.

And once we restore foreign aid to its role as an instrument of foreign policy, rather than as a program for uplift, there is not even need for a vast administrative machinery in Washington. The direction of it, and the primary policy decisions, could be made where other foreign policy is directed, in the State Department, with such military aid as may be necessary still handled by the Defense Department.

We recognize that even with this approach there will be some multiplication of offices. But it will help to correct what we are now persuaded was the fundamental error, the creation of a special organization to dispense foreign aid.

This is, indeed, the nub of the matter. An organization whose sole function is to give foreign aid is bound to proliferate plans and programs for spending because it has no other way to justify its existence. This is what has happened. A mission is sent to country X to "see what we can do for them" and by that process of bureaucratic cellular growth there sprout divisions to help on education, on roads, on public health or whatever. These need other divisions for housekeeping and soon the whole needs an office manager, a manager to manage the car pool and the secretary pool, a manager to manage personnel living facilities and so on ad infinitum.

And it is simply not realistic to ask the education division, for example, to re-think itself out of existence. Or the mission as a whole to replan its program around a concept that will in effect liquidate its reason for being.

Ours is, perhaps, a drastic proposal. But we think too much of the debate on foreign aid has been on an all-or-nothing basis. The public is being asked to endorse all of what we are doing now, in exactly the way we are now doing it, or to abolish foreign aid altogether. Faced with that choice, it is very difficult to make any kind of reasonable case for continuing the foreign aid program at all.

Yet what we really need is a reappraisal of what foreign aid can do to serve our best interests—and what it cannot do—as an instrument of foreign policy. And we are not likely to succeed in that until we are willing to scrap the present set-up and make a fresh beginning.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Illinois to some facts which he may have overlooked. From 200 to 250 employees of the Senate, who are attached to committees and subcommittees, have been moved into the two Senate Office Buildings. Most of them had been occupying quarters in buildings known as the Securities and Exchange Commission Building and the Home Owners Loan Corporation Building at the foot of Capitol Hill. They were rented quarters. By bringing those employees up to the Senate Office Buildings, we cease paying rent to other Government agencies.

The Committee on the Judiciary had the following subcommittees located elsewhere than in the office buildings: Internal Security, Antitrust and Monopoly, Constitutional Rights, Juvenile Delinquency, Patents and Trade Marks, Refugees and Trading With the Enemy.

The Subcommittee on Preparedness of the Committee on Armed Services, of which subcommittee the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] is the chairman, also was located in rented quarters, as was a subcommittee of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

In addition, we have brought back to the Senate Office Buildings the indexers, who formerly occupied space in the Government Printing Office. It is now much more convenient for Senators to maintain contact with them.

Also, the Select Committee on Small Business, which is now practically a standing committee of the Senate, and the Joint Economic Committee, of which the Senator from Illinois is chairman, were located away from the Senate Office Buildings. All of the personnel of those committees are now being brought up from outside offices and placed either in the Old or the New Senate Office Building, where they are located much more conveniently for the service of Senators.

Naturally, it was necessary to provide furniture for these employees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that the members of the staffs of those subcommittees had furniture in the places where they previously worked?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why did they not bring their furniture with them?

Mr. HAYDEN. My understanding is that some of it was rented furniture; it did not belong to the Senate. The Senate rented quarters and used some furniture borrowed from other departments of the Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Both furniture and quarters were rented?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is my understanding.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not want to embarrass the Senator from Arizona by asking these questions, because he really is not the person involved; it is the Architect of the Capitol. What does the Architect of the Capitol plan to do with the 385 desks, 400 chairs, 215 filing cabinets, and 85 wooden bookcases, which are now in the corridors of the Old Senate Office Building and in the attic? I think they can be used to furnish the rooms of the suites of Senators and committees. That is my whole case.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think most of the articles of the nature which the Senator mentioned will be returned to the old rooms after the rooms have been painted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that as every Senator has become settled, there has been a thinning out of the equipment. Equipment which had been accumulating in four rooms is now placed in five or six rooms. What has happened is that Senators who have moved out of the old building have had their old furniture placed in the halls, and when they moved into the new building they received new furniture at a cost of a million dollars.

Mr. HAYDEN. And each of the Senators who take their places will occupy five rooms in the building and will use the same furniture, after the rooms are painted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that. But are not most of the suites painted now?

Mr. HAYDEN. They are being painted. As I walk along the corridors I see many rooms which are not yet painted, and I see the furniture in the halls outside. And as I see the rooms painted, I see the furniture returned to the rooms.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator said there were 275 people in the Securities and Exchange Building.

Mr. HAYDEN. I said there were about 200 or 250 employees in the Securities and Exchange Building and the Home Owners Loan Building.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Does the Senator from Arizona have the figures for the number of indexers?

Mr. HAYDEN. There are very few.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Twenty or thirty or so?

Mr. HAYDEN. No; less than half a dozen.

Mr. PROXMIRE. So, altogether, the total would be approximately 300 additional persons; is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. Perhaps.

Mr. PROXMIRE. One million dollars has been spent on furniture so far, after being appropriated last year; and now the request is for an additional $283,000; is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is furniture for the new building. The old furniture we have is used in the old building.

Mr. PROXMIRE. As I understand, the only ones who will need new furniture are, first, those the Senator from Arizona has just listed, who at the present time use rented furniture, and who would have permanent furniture; and, second, the staffs of the two Senators from Alaska, who were not here during the last session. Therefore, it seems to me that the $283,000 would be available for furniture for 300 or 350 persons. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not at all. The Senator must remember that Senators whose offices remain in the old Senate Office Building—those who could not get rooms in the new building—will have more rooms, and will need furniture for them.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand. But instead of having his office staff in a few rooms, with the desks and chairs jammed together, each such Senator will now have not more than three or four members of his staff in a room. But the same number of desks will be used, and the same number of chairs will be used; and, roughly, the same number of filing cabinets will be used. There simply will be more room.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is it the Senator's suggestion that the old desks could not be used in the new office building?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I, myself, would be delighted to use some of the old desks. My point is that when we are providing equipment and furniture for the committees, it may or may not be sensible or economical to use the old furniture we now have, rather than to scrap that furniture and buy new furniture.

Mr. HAYDEN. We are equipping the committee rooms and the subcommittee rooms with furniture. Obviously they have to have furniture.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The position of the Senator from Arizona, as I understand it, is that we have spent $1 million for additional furniture, and that we need another $285,000, roughly, in order to complete the provision of furniture for approximately 300 or 350 persons who previously used rented furniture.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not know about that, at all. The amount of money appropriated for furniture for the new building turned out to be insufficient. Is not that correct?

Mr. CHAVEZ. That is correct. The first request was for $1,350,000. The committee thought it could provide the needed furniture for $1 million, so it asked for only $1 million. But after the building was finished and after the furniture was moved in, we found that we did not have enough furniture, even with what had been bought with the $1 million.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that $115,000 is the proper figure for the extra furniture, disregarding the item of carpets. Is it the position of the Senator that when that furniture is available, there will still be a deficiency of desks and chairs?

Mr. HAYDEN. I understand that a certain number of tables, chairs, and so forth, are required in order properly to equip the new offices in the New Senate Office Building, and that that amount of money is required for that purpose. However, I am not an authority on the subject.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. For several years we were considering the situation in the offices of Senators. We found, for instance, that the Senators from New York had the same number of clerks the Senators from New Mexico had—although obviously such an arrangement is unfair, because the much larger population of New York State requires the office forces of the Senators from New York to do three or four or five times as much work as that done by the office staffs of the Senators from New Mexico. Therefore, we included in the appropriation bill the amounts required on the basis of population. In other words, a Senator who represented a State with a population of 5 million would be allowed to employ a certain number of additional clerks; and a Senator who represented a State with a population of 2 million would be allowed to employ a lesser number of additional clerks. In many instances, some of the Senators from the larger States could not house all their employees in the rooms in the Senate Office Building which were assigned for their use. That is one of the reasons why many of those employees even had to use rooms downtown. I recall that we even had to go to the Library of Congress and try to obtain office space there; and I recall that when Senator Lehman was a Member of this body, he had about 12 employees in offices downtown, because there was not sufficient space for them in the Senate Office Building.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am glad to yield; or the Senator from Mississippi can have the floor.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I can throw additional light on the furniture item. Last year, I was chairman of the Legislative Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. When the matter came to us, the estimates had already been made for the new furniture, based on the requests which had been submitted. The figure was $1,350,000. There had been discussions in the newspapers, and perhaps mention on the floor, that some kind of special deal was going to be made about the furniture, that no competitive bids would be taken, and that the transaction would be a private one.

I remember that the Senator from Illinois was very reasonable in what he said to me about the matter. We made specific demand that competitive bids be taken in all possible cases. Then, as an experiment, we cut this figure in last year's appropriation bill to $1 million; and we asked the commission to do all it could to hold the amount within that figure.

In light of what has happened, we are already right back to almost the identical figure—actually, a little less than that. The furniture has been purchased. There is not a scintilla of evidence of any wrongdoing about the matter or of any special "deal." Ninety-nine percent of the furniture was purchased on the basis of competitive bids.

So the amount now requested is just the second increment of what the original, known request was.

The only question is whether the Senate—not the Architect of the Capitol, not the Congress, but the Senate—is going to reverse itself, and is not going to supply the building with new furniture of proven quality and kind.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield, if I have the floor.

Mr. BRIDGES. I wish to substantiate what the distinguished Senator from Mississippi has said. He is the chairman of the Legislative Subcommittee, and I am the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee. The statement he has made about the original request—namely, that it was $1,350,000—is correct. We felt that by reducing that amount, and by providing at that time only $1 million, which may or may not have been a mistake—that would have a tendency to cause the proceedings to be watched more carefully; and the result—if we proceeded in that way—might be a little more economy; and then we could have those in charge come back to the committee and ask for the exact amount of additional money they needed. We may have been wrong in proceeding in that way; but we proceeded from the point of view of what was best for the Senate and what was best in the interest of economy. In the way we proceeded we had a chance for a second look.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on this point, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. STENNIS. I shall be glad to yield.

First, let me thank the Senator from New Hampshire for the statement he has made. He and I were on the committee; and I agree with what he has said.

Now I yield.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Does the item of $283,000 include the cost of installing rugs? I understand that the installation of rugs is the major item of the cost; and it seems to have developed rather recently.

Mr. STENNIS. The item to which my remarks pertain is solely the one for furniture for the new building. It was the estimate of the Architect that it would cost $1,350,000. But, for the reason which has been stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, we reduced that amount to $1 million.

Mr. PROXMIRE. And the item now under discussion is for $115,000, I believe.

Mr. STENNIS. This item is for $283,000, as I recall.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand; and I understand that it includes $150,000 for carpeting.

Mr. STENNIS. That is correct; the carpeting is included in the item of $283,000.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I understand that the furniture will cost $115,000-plus; in other words, there is some additional amount for filing cabinets.

Mr. STENNIS. Yes; that is approximately correct. I have not reviewed the figures in the last few months.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator's point would apply to furniture; but the carpeting is something additional and extra; is it?

Mr. STENNIS. That is correct. The carpeting is a new item. I did not mean to convey anything to the contrary.

I may say I have known about the need for additional facilities that has existed for years, and I have known of the conditions which have existed in the Old Senate Office Building, where the personnel have been working all these years. I do not know of any place which has been more crowded or where the people have worked harder than at least some of those who have been attached to the staff of the Senator from Illinois and some of the other staffs. As I walked by open doors, I observed some of the people working on perhaps one of his committees. The personnel come early in the morning. They are there all day. They work into the night. They have been working under those conditions for all these years. Young ladies at typewriters have had to work with perhaps the noise of five or six other typewriters pounding in their ears. If our medical authorities are correct in stating that a health factor is involved, then I do not think any employer in the Nation has neglected its workers more than the Senate has in some cases. The new building and adequate furniture have been long overdue.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCOTT. I would not want to let the impression get around that carpeting serves no purpose or that carpeting is unnecessary. I am located in the old office building and intend to remain there, but the use of carpeting serves a very important purpose so far as acoustics are concerned. Trouble is already being encountered in the attempt to reduce the amount of noise. Excessive noise results in tensions and difficulty in getting work done.

While the item now under consideration does not affect me personally, I think there is a particular purpose to be served by the use of carpeting, whether it be new or old carpeting. I do not believe rubber-tiled flooring is the answer from the standpoint of health and safety factors. I desired to bring that thought to the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

I am heartily in sympathy with the attempts and desire of the distinguished Senator from Illinois to save money. I am fairly certain that the use of carpeting for the suites in the New Senate Office Building will not only improve the efficiency of the employees through lessening noise and providing more comfortable working conditions, but will actually save money in the long run; my concern regarding this amendment has to do with the best use to be made of surplus furniture, and on that basis I may support the amendment.

I wish to quote to the Senate the reasons given by the Architect of the Capitol for the inclusion of carpeting in the suites. He said, and I quote:

> In my report I explain that by stating that since the time when the building was originally planned and the use of the rubber tile was approved for all offices except the Senators' private offices, the use of electric typewriters and other machines have become much more prevalent, with the added noise of operations. When these machines are operated from stands or desks resting on tile, the noise factor is greatly increased, although acoustical tile and other acoustic materials are utilized on the walls throughout the suites. The use of carpets with rubber cushions underneath will greatly reduce the noise of the machine operation. Other advantages are that the carpets are safer to walk on, and the carpets will improve the appearance of the rooms, also, the daily cleaning and waxing of the rubber tile is more difficult and more costly, than daily cleaning of carpets.

Maintenance costs with carpets range from 40 percent to 50 percent less than maintenance costs for most floors. Over any period of time, this, of itself, amounts to enough to pay for most of the carpet costs and also installation costs. Furthermore, the modern carpet wears remarkably well and also protects other surfaces which are vulnerable to wear.

The controversy surrounding carpets here concerns offices, but a rapidly growing trend is the installation of carpeting not only in offices, but in corridors. The new Socony-Vacuum Building in New York, for example, has wall to wall carpeting in offices and corridors. So does the Alcoa Building in Pittsburgh; and the new Union-Carbide Building in New York, I am informed, also will have carpeting in the halls. The owners of these buildings are not operating them as a public service. It is necesary that they make a profit to stay in business. Evidently they feel that carpets, in the overall sense, are economical and an asset in their business operations.

Actually, the policy of the entire Federal Government toward the use of carpeting in its buildings is far behind the times. In the case of personnel, carpeting is restricted to officials with a GS–15 rating and above, and the minimum salary for GS–15 is $12,770. The result is, of course, that very few workers rate carpets. The entire Federal Government spends only between $2.5 and $3 million for carpeting in a year. In 1957, I am informed that the Department of Agriculture spent only $15,000. Incidentally, I am told that the standards for purchase were borrowed from the Department of Agriculture, but nobody knows who drew them for the Department, way, way back yonder.

Anyone who walks the corridors of our vast Government buildings hears the chatter of typewriters issuing from offices like the chatter of a vast drove of blackbirds or, if you please, our own starlings. The Government has made no studies and has no data about the effect of this noise on morale and efficiency. Aside from the economy factor, we do not know whether the use of carpeting would save money in other ways or not.

I would suggest that the Senator from Illinois join me at the proper time in moving for a study of the use for carpets in public buildings. Such a study, I am certain, will result in a sharp increase in Government carpet buying.

Such a study might even result in the use of carpets in the corridors and halls of our public buildings, including museums. In such a case, there will be a sharp decline in an annoying and prevalent malady in Washington, museum fatigue, which wears out even the hosts of young high school students who come here. It also might give us a little additional strength and vigor. We too do a lot of walking over hard surfaces, and anything which saves us unnecessary physical wear and tear is, I think, a contribution to good government.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. With regard to the question which has been raised by the Senator from Illinois, I believe the floors in all of the offices of various Senators need carpeting, from the point of view of acoustics and the possibility of slipping. There have been several instances of slipping. Of course, I think carpeting should be provided in the offices in the old office building, and that is also true of the new office building. Anybody who has had any experience at all with these offices will agree on the necessity of carpeting.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator. I understand the pending amendment has to do only with furniture or carpeting.

Mr. PROXMIRE. It is my understanding the amendment has to do with furniture and carpeting.

Mr. STENNIS. With respect to the new building, although I have not moved into it yet, I am in the process of doing so. However, I have been present in the hearing rooms in the new building. With all deference to what has appeared in the newspapers, about the defects of the new building, they are, to my mind, very small. When we study the question of Senators' being able to do their work more expeditiously, we must conclude that the new facilities are invaluable to a Senator's getting his work done. I have already worked in the new building as a member of the Appropriations Committee. Last week we had a delightful all-day session in the conference room, where we marked up this very bill. Everybody had an opportunity to be heard, to confer with staff members, to check items, and to go into the telephone booths and place necessary calls. Senators will be able to work much better with the new facilities available. I have also been in the smaller committee rooms in the new building. I think the advantage to the Senate as a whole and the committees which will work in the new building will be tremendous.

My only comment is that the facilities are long past due. The costs involved are high. One reason is that the Senate dragged the matter along, delayed a decision, and put it off, and was unwilling to face the issue of Senators and their staffs having the appropriate tools with which to work.

I support the item.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Some statements have been made about the desirability of having carpeting in the new office building. I occupy a 5-room suite in that building. I understand the item in question is to provide carpeting, not in Senators' offices, but in the parts of the offices occupied by members of their staffs. Is that correct?

Mr. STENNIS. The item is to provide carpeting in the reception room and in the rooms where the staff members actually do the work.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have been in a number of offices in the new building. I have noticed there is carpeting in the Senators' offices, but not in the offices occupied by the staffs.

Mr. STENNIS. Yes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. My experience has been that the rubber tiling is adequate. There has been no question of slipping. The improvement in acoustics involved is really one of the few good things that can be said in favor of the old building as it is without carpeting. Many mistakes have been made in the new building, but I do not think the installation of the rubber tiling has been one of them. I have not heard any grievances voiced by Senators on that account. I have heard of complaints on other grounds.

It seems to me that if the Senate provides carpeting merely to improve the acoustics, and so that the footing of stenographers will be made a little surer, it will be providing a frill and will be wasteful of the taxpayers' money. While the item involved represents an extremely small expenditure, it is symbolic, as an example. Economy begins at home. It seems to me we have here an opportunity to show we mean it when we say we are really trying to economize.

Mr. STENNIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin and his staff do not desire to have the carpeting, he has that choice. I personally think the carpeting would be an asset. I do not spend much time in those rooms. I wish I could spend more time there than I do.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BRIDGES. If the Senator from Wisconsin feels it is unnecessary to have carpeting in his offices, the money will not be spent for that purpose. He can individually set an example of economy if he feels this is the way to do it. But it is believed that providing carpeting will improve the acoustics, the health of our employees by relief from noise tensions, and will reduce the incidence of accidents from slipping. We who are concerned about these matters should be entitled to have the carpeting. Any U.S. Senator should have the right to exercise his judgment in these matters wherever he may have his offices, in the old building or the new.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I have been listening to the debate and the discussion with great interest. I am particularly surprised by the suggestion that there should be carpets in the inner offices of Senators themselves, but not where their staffs work. I wonder if it would thus be possible to remove the roofs from over the offices where the staffs work, and save money that way? Perhaps we would not have to heat the rooms where the staffs are, but just where the Senators are. Perhaps we could economize to such an extent that we could have, in the new building and the old building, air conditioning only in the offices of Senators themselves, and not where their staffs work, but the staffs could use some of the old-fashioned Japanese fans.

It seems to me absurd to suggest that there should be one loft for the "kings" and another one for the "people." If there is going to be air conditioning and carpeting and roofs, let them be for everybody who works in the new building, whether they be Senators or staff members.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, before the discussion is concluded, certain things should be borne in mind.

One of the main points for us to ask ourselves is, what is going to happen to the old furniture in the Old Senate Office Building? The corridors are jammed with it. I have inspected the attic. There is a great deal of furniture in the attic.

The census which I have taken, which I have repeated many times, shows that there are in the corridors 375 desks, 400 chairs, 215 steel filing cabinets, and 85 wooden bookcases.

The people who are now in the Old Senate Office Building already have their offices equipped. Virtually all the people in the New Senate Office Building have their offices equipped with new furniture. There is a surplus of furniture in the Old Senate Office Building. It is perfectly good furniture to use, but it is proposed not to use it, and instead to buy more new furniture at a cost of $113,000.

On the question of carpets, I know the Senator from Oregon has made an argumentum ad hominem which is perhaps quite effective, but I think there is a real question as to the degree to which we can heap luxuries upon ourselves and upon our staffs at the expense of the taxpayers.

The building was presumably laid out with due attention to acoustics. I think it will be found that the walls and ceilings in the new building have been so insulated and so treated that there is far less noise, so far as that factor is concerned, than in the present office building. I do not think, therefore, that the added advantage, if there be any, of having a carpet on the floor to deaden the sound of electric typewriters, is worth paying $150,000 of the taxpayers' money.

I am extremely skeptical about the dangers to life and limb from walking on the rubber tiling. I think there is very little danger of accident at all.

Mr. President, may we have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have received an added bit of information which is extremely important. It has been stated on the floor of the Senate that the furniture used by the committees which occupy the HOLC and the SEC Buildings are largely rented, and that moving the committees into the New Senate Office Building would make it necessary to buy new furniture.

The custodian's office has just informed my assistant that the furniture in these buildings is owned by the Senate wing of the Capitol, and that it is not rented furniture for the subcommittees. Therefore, if this statement is true—and the information was received from the custodian's office—the furniture of the Senate subcommittees in the HOLC and SEC Buildings could be transferred to the new Senate Office Building without the purchase of any additional furniture whatsoever.

I am sure the original statement concerning the renting of furniture was made in good faith, but the custodian's office has informed us as to what the facts are.

Mr. President, I think this is a very important moral issue, even though it may not involve very much in terms of dollars. The example which we set is extremely important. I think there is a tremendous amount of waste in the executive branches of this Government. I am sure many of us will try to reduce this waste, but we must come into court with clean hands when we do, and we must be as ready to purge ourselves of waste as we are to purge others of waste.

Mr. President, I hope very much the amendment to eliminate the appropriation of $283,000, which would be on top of an existing appropriation of $1 million, will be carried.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR HILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have another matter to discuss briefly. I am advised by the leadership, in view of the fact that a good many of our colleagues are in attendance at the very wonderful luncheon being given downtown in honor of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], it would be appreciated if I could take a few minutes now to make a brief speech pending arrival of our colleagues.

Mr. STENNIS. If the Senator will yield, I suggest that most of our colleagues have returned from the luncheon.

Mr. MORSE. This will take only 3 or 4 minutes. I do not observe some Senators present who were at the luncheon, to my knowledge.

I wish to say, Mr. President, it is a matter of deep regret to me that I could not be at the luncheon, because I do not know of anyone who is more deserving of the tribute which is being paid at the luncheon than the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. For years and years the Senator from Alabama has made a great record in the Senate in the whole field of health legislation. I think it is particularly fitting that this honor is bestowed upon him at the luncheon today. I am very, very sorry I could not be there.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

PERMISSION FOR DAVID SCHREIBER TO BE PRESENT IN THE SENATE CHAMBER DURING CONSIDERATION OF THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT BILL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I understand the Senate will take up shortly the railroad retirement bill. As was true last year, this year I should like to ask unanimous consent that Mr. David Schreiber, one of the outstanding experts on railroad retirement, who is on the staff of the Railroad Retirement Board, and who is able to answer the most technical questions in the field of railroad retirement, be granted the privilege of being present in the Chamber to sit with me and other members of the committee, in case it becomes necessary for us to obtain from him some technical information which we do not carry in the backs of our heads.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that such permission be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn very briefly to a matter of personal privilege in connection with continued criticisms of the position which I have taken in regard to the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the proceedings are not audible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Oregon will speak so that he can be heard.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the statement by Mr. Henry R. Luce, as it was published in this morning's New York Times, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF STATEMENT BY HENRY R. LUCE

For 25 years in the course of her public life my wife has taken not only the criticisms provoked by her own views and actions but also many punches which were really intended for me or for the publications of which I am editor in chief. The attack of Senator WAYNE MORSE is perhaps the most vitriolic example of this.

Mrs. Luce has long had a deep feeling about the importance of all South America and its vital significance to the United States. When Secretary of State John Foster Dulles conveyed to her President Eisenhower's wish to send her to Brazil she accepted without hesitation because she believed that she might be able to play a useful part in developing constructive action in the relations of our country to Brazil. The needs are urgent and the opportunities are great.

The mission has now been profoundly compromised. The 16 to 1 vote in Mrs. Luce's favor by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and her overwhelming confirmation in the Senate are all the vindication required by American public opinion. But there remains the question of Brazilian opinion and whether she can now hope to accomplish the delicate mission assigned to her by the President in a climate of uneasiness which the smears and suspicions aired on the Senate floor have naturally created in Brazil. This attempt to destroy a mission was deliberately, cleverly, and irresponsibly created by a few angry men who intend at her expense and at the expense of our Latin American relations to settle their little grievances with Time.

I think one more point is valid. It is to be found in the Senate hearings. A few days after the Bolivian incident, Mrs. Luce telephoned Acting Secretary of State Christian Herter and said she would be perfectly willing to have her name withdrawn if her nomination might become the slightest cause of embarrassment either for the State Department or for the President. Mr. Herter refused her offer and I, too, advised her that the Bolivian incident had little or no connection with her becoming Ambassador to Brazil. Almost unanimously the press of Brazil asserted that, even if a few U.S. Senators were unable to do so, the Brazilian people were quite capable of distinguishing between Bolivia and Brazil and between Clare Boothe Luce and Mr. Luce.

In the 3 weeks since then, Senator WAYNE MORSE and others have devoted themselves to undermining Mrs. Luce's usefulness. Senator MORSE happens to be the chairman of the Foreign Relations Subcommittee which has cognizance of inter-American affairs and Brazil.

As an Ambassador she will not be able to defend herself from vendetta politics at home which makes common cause with anti-Americanism in South America. Therefore, I have asked my wife to offer her resignation again.

Finally, I should like to say that I am proud of the splendid and effective record which Mrs. Luce has made in public life, and I know that she herself was deeply touched by the warm support which she received from so many distinguished Senators on both sides of the aisle and from responsible editors in every part of America.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in the course of his statement, Mr. Luce says, "In the 3 weeks since then, Senator WAYNE MORSE and others have devoted themselves to undermining Mrs. Luce's usefulness."

I understand also that statements are being made to the effect that this is a political vendetta against the Luces, being conducted by the senior Senator from Oregon. Nothing could be further from the fact, as the record shows.

Mr. President, in the hope that I can make the record perfectly clear, I refer the Senate to the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee of March 3, 1959. This was before the Bolivian incident. This was before any issue had been raised with respect to Mrs. Luce.

This was before any information was made available to me in regard to her record in Italy. I, too, had labored under the impression that she was a pretty good Ambassador in Italy. This was before my attention had been called to the record she had made in regard to the objections which I subsequently raised in the Foreign Relations Committee public hearing.

I am in a position where I am privileged, as a matter of right, to refer only to my own statements in committee, and that is all I shall do. But the Luce nomination came up, and the official transcript shows as follows:

Senator MORSE. I move we recommend her name to the Senate.

My motion was seconded by another member of the committee.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think the Senator should read the sentence preceding his declaration and the sentence following his motion that the nomination of Mrs. Luce be reported favorably, and that names should be mentioned.

Mr. MORSE. I shall be very glad to do so if the Senator thinks that by so doing I will not in any way violate any of the rules of the Foreign Relations Committee, because this is an executive record of the committee. I think the Senator from Montana will join me in saying that if I read this material no violence will be done to the Foreign Relations Committee or to its rules or policy.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. Several other members of the committee are present. I have no objection to the Senator's reading the transcript.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to read this portion of the transcript.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. MORSE. I am very happy to do it. The transcript reads as follows:

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

The CHAIRMAN. May I raise one other question if you have time? Mrs. Luce's name has been sent up. She needs, I am told, a small operation on her foot. It is nothing serious. We have confirmed her before. We all know her well. She has been before the committee. I feel no particular need to examine her again if the committee does not. What is our thought?

Senator MORSE. I move we recommend her name to the Senate.

Senator MANSFIELD. Second.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is made and seconded that her name be reported favorably. Any discussion?

The motion was agreed to. Let the RECORD show that on March 3 it was the senior Senator from Oregon who moved that her name be reported favorably to the Senate. Does that look like a political vendetta? Does that indicate that the Senator from Oregon has carried on an attempt at a political vendetta against her or any other member of the Luce family?

Following that meeting the Bolivian incident occurred. It involved Time magazine. There was considerable discussion among us as to whether or not we should let the dust settle, so to speak, and whether or not further consideration should be given to the Luce nomination. So I take the Senate to the record of the Foreign Relations Committee on March 10, 1959. I should like to have the attention of my colleagues on that committee, because I want them to know that I proceed in reference to this document only with their consent.

On March 10 the chairman of the committee, under the business heading "Nomination of Clare Booth Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil" said the following:

The CHAIRMAN. If I understand correctly, the Senator from Oregon is moving that we reconsider the vote.

Senator MORSE. I move we reconsider the Luce nomination without prejudice, so we can have some executive discussion, possibly an executive hearing on the matter. I think the dust ought to settle a little bit before this appointment goes through.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is correct.

There was further discussion, but I see nothing in it which would add to the only point I seek to make, and that is the point involving my attitude, my point of view, and my purpose when, on March 10, 1959, I moved the reconsideration of the Luce nomination.

My motion was overwhelmingly carried in the committee. There followed then a considerable amount of public discussion throughout our country and the presentation of a considerable amount of information—at least to me, as a member of the committee. I cannot speak for others. There was presented to me all the information which I have used in the debate on this subject. It became my duty to proceed, then, with a thorough consideration of the nomination. I reached the judgment that the nominee was not qualified, and I have acted accordingly. I am perfectly willing to stand on the record I have made.

Earlier in the day I referred to criticism which I understand was going around, to the effect that I had followed some improper course in my investigation into the qualifications of this nominee.

The record is an open book. I have followed a course in which I have attempted, within the proprieties, to protect the nominee in connection with any charge or allegation which, in my judgment, my investigation showed should not be brought up on the floor of the Senate.

In the first speech on the floor of the Senate last Monday, I believe, I reviewed again the four historic criteria which the Senate has followed throughout its history under the advice and consent clause, based upon the research and study which I did in 1945. In conducting that library research project I studied, over a long period of time and with considerable assistance, every confirmation controversy in the history of the U.S. Senate, in regard to which the Library of Congress could find any written documentation, or with respect to which the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shed any light.

In a speech I made in 1945, as I said the other day, I set forth what I thought the historic record showed were the four criteria which the U.S. Senate has followed in carrying out its constitutional obligations under the advice-and-consent clause.

The other day I mentioned the first criterion, as I did in 1945, and as I have done several times since. I set forth that criterion a few years ago when there was before us the nomination of President Eisenhower's nominee for the post of Chief of the Bureau of Engine Inspection. Senators will remember the great battle which took place on that occasion. I felt that partisan lines were being drawn. I did not believe that partisan lines should be drawn. I thought the nominee should be tested by these four criteria, and I stated them, as the RECORD will show, in that debate.

What is the first? Character and mental soundness. I discussed it then.

The second is freedom from conflict of interest. I discussed it then.

The third is loyalty to our form of government. I discussed that criterion then, too.

Last there is the criterion of competency to perform the duties of the job.

Last Monday, as the RECORD will show, I told the Senate, after I had listed these four criteria, that I based my opposition to Mrs. Luce on the criterion of competency to perform the duties of the job. I have discussed the subject of competency to perform the duties of Ambassador to Brazil at some length in this debate.

As I said earlier today, and repeat now, so long as I am on the Foreign Relations Committee or any other committee which has jurisdiction over looking into the qualifications of a nominee, and there is brought to me what I consider to be good-faith information from a reliable source in respect to any one of those criteria, it is my duty to investigate.

I must satisfy myself, as I did in this case, that there was a real justification for my making a proper inquiry; which I did. But I based my objections to Mrs. Luce on what I consider to be her incompetency to perform the work of the new position.

It is not my intention to say very much about the statement the President of the United States made at his press conference this morning. He said, in effect, that he had checked with Brazilian officials and found that his survey satisfied him that Mrs. Luce would still be welcome in Brazil. I wonder whether he really expected any other answer. I wonder if the President really thought that if the President of the United States talked to Brazilian Government officials in regard to the nominee he had appointed and who was under fire in the Senate, the Brazilian officials would say to him, "Don't send her." I doubt it.

If anyone thinks this controversy makes me happy or that it is a pleasant task which I am performing in connection with what I consider to be my public duty, then he does not know me. I have carried out my duty. I said yesterday Mrs. Luce has been confirmed, and I wish her well. I said she will receive from me, as chairman of the Latin-American Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, my cooperation on any matter which involves her work as Ambassador to Brazil. However, that does not mean that I think she should be sent. I am of the same opinion still. She should not be sent to Brazil. In my capacity as chairman of the subcommittee I have named I wish to say for the RECORD today that I think it is a great mistake to send her. I think her usefulness is over. As I suggested yesterday, the people who really count, the people who in the long run determine what kind of relationships will exist between Brazil and the United States, are the people in the homes of Brazil.

Some of the homes, Mr. President, are not very luxurious. Some are the homes of very, very poor people. In those homes there is a reverence for the memory of a great man, President Franklin Roosevelt. It has been reported to us from time to time by travelers throughout Latin America, including travelers in Brazil, that it is not uncommon to go inside one of these homes and still see, pasted sometimes on a mud wall, a newspaper or magazine picture of Franklin Roosevelt.

I repeat what I said yesterday, it is not what the nominee said in 1944 about President Franklin Roosevelt, but what the nominee said on April 15, 1959, which, in my opinion, continues to disqualify her for effective service in Brazil.

It is now in other hands. If the President, in line with this record, wants to send Mrs. Luce to Brazil, and she really wants to go there, then it is now an Executive responsibility. I have performed my duty as I see it. I am perfectly willing to stand on the record of my performance of that duty.

I hope that it will not be necessary for me to discuss this matter further, because it is always unpleasant to me inside, when I find it necessary to do so. But if it is necessary to continue to protect my record, I shall do so, because in my own heart I know I have taken a stand that I believe to be right. I know that the attack made by the nominee and her consort against the senior Senator from Oregon is without merit. I do not intend, if I may make the matter perfectly clear, to bow before even the great Time-Life-Fortune empire, or to trim in any way the position I have taken, that Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce is not, in my judgment, qualified to serve as Ambassador to Brazil.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. On Tuesday evening, after a very tiring and interesting day on the floor of the Senate, I went to my apartment. For the purpose of a little relaxation, I got out a volume of poetry. It just happened that I came across a poem which interested me, and I should like to read it into the RECORD at this point. It is entitled "The Woman With the Serpent's Tongue," and was written by William Watson. It reads:

She is not old, she is not young,
The woman with the serpent's tongue,
The haggard cheek, the hungering eye,
The poisoned words that wildly fly,
The famished face, the fevered hand—
Who slights the worthiest in the land,
Sneers at the just, condemns the brave,
And blackens goodness in its grave.
In truthful numbers be she sung,
The woman with the serpent's tongue;
Ambitious from her natal hour.
And scheming all her life for power;

With little left of seemly pride;
With venomed fangs she cannot hide;
Burnt up within by that strange soul
She cannot shake or yet control:
Malignant-lipped, unkind, unsweet;
Past all example indiscreet;
Hectic, and always overstrung—
The woman with the serpent's tongue.
To think that such as she can mar
Names that among the noblest are.
That hands like hers can touch the strings
That move who knows what men and things?
That on her will their fates have hung.
The woman with the serpent's tongue.

I thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding to me.

Mr. MORSE. May I say that I think the poem read by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] is very apropos. Mr. President, I close my statement on the floor of the Senate by saying that I rose to make the RECORD clear as to the position I took in the Committee on Foreign Relations on the Luce nomination, which I believe to be a complete answer to the charges of Mr. Henry Luce.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, when I have more time, I am going to go into that poetry business myself. However, for a few moments at least I wish to address myself to the RECORD.

Yesterday I was advised from two different sources, in connection with the statement Mrs. Luce made in New York involving a horse, that some telephone calls had been made which probably could be put in evidence as provocation. In fact, I was told that telephone calls were made concerning the medical records of her personal health, and whether or not she had been under the care of and receiving treatment by a psychiatrist. I say that information came from two sources. I was authorized to make public expression of it, which I did before some twenty-odd people representing the press. It came to the attention of the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon, and at about 6 o'clock last night, before we concluded our labors here, he and I discussed the matter very briefly. He said, "Believe me, on my word of honor, I never made inquiry about the personal health records of Clare Boothe Luce."

He said, "I did make other inquiry, but not about that."

I want to do him full justice, so that whatever I may have said yesterday on the basis of information derived from credible sources might be adequately corrected.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a clarification?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. We had our conversation by the door at the entrance to the middle aisle. I understood the Senator from Illinois to say he had been informed that I had asked the doctor for Mrs. Luce's personal health record. I asked no doctor for her personal health record. I consider that a matter of privilege; I would not consider asking for it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall clarify that point briefly.

This morning Clare Boothe Luce called me. What I do today, I do because she has asked me to do it. I think, moreover, that I should do it in the interest of a complete and clear record.

She urged that I call her doctor in New York. I had been advised that the distinguished Senator from Oregon had called her doctor. I did not have his name yesterday, nor was I disposed to call him. But I did call him at 12:50 p.m. today. I had somebody on the line to make a careful transcript of the entire telephone conversation, which was very brief. So I read, in amplification of the Senate RECORD, the transcript of the conversation between Senator DIRKSEN and Dr. Rosenbluth at 12:50 p.m., April 29, 1959:

TRANSCRIPT OF CONVERSATION BETWEEN SENATOR DIRKSEN AND DR. ROSENBLUTH, 12:50 P.M., APRIL 29, 1959

SENATOR. Doctor, are you Clare Boothe Luce's doctor?

DOCTOR. That is right, sir.

SENATOR. She called me this morning and she wanted me to talk to you about the thing that happened yesterday. I said I would.

DOCTOR. Yes, sir.

SENATOR. I want to get a few facts nailed down. When did Senator MORSE call you?

DOCTOR. I believe, sir, Senator MORSE called me on Thursday—Wednesday or Thursday——

SENATOR. Of last week?

DOCTOR. Of last week.

SENATOR. Did he ask you for any medical records on her personal health and that sort of thing?

DOCTOR. I will tell you as best I can. He asked me whether she had been under psychiatric care and I said to him as I would say to anyone that I would be perfectly willing to give him any information he would like provided he first had written permission from Mrs. Luce. I told him basically that. He said he heard a rumor from my father, who had been Mrs. Luce's physician prior to myself, and that he read a few clippings in the paper, and said he heard this tip, that it had come from my father. I assured him that it would not have come from my father, that he would not have said such a thing, and that to the best of my knowledge she had not attended a psychiatrist, and that was all that I said to him. I said I would be glad to help if he could send me written permission.

SENATOR. Was there anything else?

DOCTOR. No, sir; I believe that was the extent of it.

SENATOR. I was advised that he made a request for her health records.

DOCTOR. No, sir; he told me—all he said was that he was going to fight this thing. He did not specifically request my records. The only information he asked was whether or not she was under psychiatric care.

SENATOR. I just wanted to verify that from you. Thank you very much, Doctor.

DOCTOR. You are quite welcome, sir.

SENATOR. Goodby.

DOCTOR. Goodby.

Mr. President, if through inadvertence I made a statement which went out to the country that the distinguished Senator from Oregon had asked for the personal health records of Mrs. Luce, I here and now voluntarily, and very freely, withdraw that statement in justice to the Senator from Oregon, and reveal the rest of the record that on Thursday last he did call Dr. William Rosenbluth in New York City and there requested an answer to the question whether Mrs. Luce was under psychiatric treatment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I think at this point in the RECORD should come my account of the matter. I am very happy to give it.

As the official notes will bear out, a newspaperman—a very reliable newspaperman—quite some time ago came to me and said he thought it was important that an investigation be made as to the emotional stability of the nominee.

I may say to the Senator from Illinois that I regret very much that it is now necessary to discuss this incident, because it is not of my choosing. I understand that Mrs. Luce has requested of the Senator from Illinois that he raise the matter on the floor of the Senate. I therefore intend to keep the RECORD straight, so far as my position in the matter is concerned.

The newspaperman said, "We are satisfied that she has been under psychiatric care since her ambassadorship in Rome."

I said, "That is very difficult for me to believe, and I am not inclined to pursue that matter unless I have some evidence which would cause me to say that at least there is enough to justify my looking into the matter of the mental health of the nominee."

Of course, the health of a nominee is something which we should look into. Mr. Christian Herter's appointment apparently was held up for some time by the President himself, in order to have an examination made of Mr. Herter's physical health. If any question is raised to cause us to think there is justification for an inquiry concerning the mental health of a nominee, I think it is our duty to conduct that investigation.

So I said, "I am not inclined to look into it until I have reason to believe that there would be more justification for this type of inquiry."

This was quite some time before the public hearing. Then we had the public hearing. I had an opportunity to sit there and study the reactions of the nominee.

In order to illustrate the background basis for my decision to make this inquiry, I may say that before I ever took up or before I ever decided to take up the study of law and become a lawyer, I was well on the way toward the completion of my study for a doctorate in abnormal psychology at the University of Minnesota. In fact, my study in the field of abnormal psychology includes a seminar in clinical psychiatry at Ward's Island, in New York. I have spent many an hour, I may say, in the clinic as a graduate student while psychiatrists, psychologists, and doctors have conducted examinations of mental patients.

As I observed the nominee in the public hearings during her testimony I was a little concerned, because I said to myself: I am not confident of the emotional stability of this nominee. It was after I observed her in that public hearing that I decided to follow the recommendation of the newspaper correspondent and call the doctor who, he said, he was satisfied would be glad to talk to me on a confidential basis about this matter.

I said, "If she is his patient, he should not talk to me about her on a confidential basis, because of the doctrine of privilege of the doctor-patient relationship."

"Well," he said, "let me show you this." He said, "I am satisfied that he is not her doctor now."

He then gave me the material which I put in the RECORD in my discussion in regard to the so-called plaster-flaking incident, which was given by Time magazine as the reason for her leaving Rome.

He said, "We are satisfied that that was pure fantasy."

It has always been a little tough on my imagination to stretch it so far as to accept that story; but that is a matter of personal opinion.

The doctor was quoted in the newspaper articles—and Senators will find the statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—to the effect that it was not his opinion that there was any arsenate of lead poisoning which caused Mrs. Luce's illness. But those newspaper clippings will have to speak for themselves.

So I decided to call the doctor. I called, only to discover that he had died about 2 weeks ago, but that his son had taken over his medical practice. So I expressed my very deep regret over the death of his father; and I said, "Under the circumstances, I do not think there is any assistance you can be to me, but I want you to know what I wanted to talk to your father about." I told him what my purpose would have been if his father had been alive. I said, "I have copies of your father's statements in regard to the plaster incident." And I said, "I recognize the doctrine of privilege and privacy that exists as between doctor and patient." Then he told me that he—this young doctor—was the doctor of Mrs. Luce.

"Well," I said, "all I was seeking to find out from your father was whether or not it is true, on the basis of the allegation made to me, that she has been in psychiatric care at any time since the Rome incident."

My best recollection of what he said is that first he stated, "I am sure that my father did not have her under treatment for psychiatric care when he was her doctor." He said, "I would not want to discuss her case without written authority from her."

I said, "I don't think you should." I continued, "I want you to know that I find myself in opposition to this nominee, and I am seeking to check on this question of mental stability."

That, to the best of my recollection, was the sum and substance of our conversation.

I wish to say to the Senate that whenever a question is raised, with any reliable background, as to the mental competency of any nominee, I happen to think that in carrying out our trust it is our duty to make the kind of examination I made; and I also think it is our duty to handle it as I handled it. Let Senators read the RECORD. I made no report in regard to any allegation that has been made concerning any emotional instability. It is a matter of opinion.

In conclusion, I only wish to say that I think Mrs. Luce's statement out of New York, yesterday, does raise a question of emotional instability.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have ventilated the whole record, so far as the Senator from Illinois is concerned. I believe open confession is good for the soul.

I am not willing ever to say anything, publicly or privately, to the press or on the Senate floor, that I am not willing to correct at any time, and particularly so when it does the slightest injustice to anyone.

Of course, I believe the record would be rounded out if the name of the hitherto unnamed newspaper correspondent could be inserted in the RECORD.

I have mentioned Dr. Rosenbluth's name and my own name, in connection with this matter. I have had no reluctance to say to the Senate that Clare Boothe Luce called me at home this morning.

So I believe the whole story ought to be told.

But I also believe that the name of the newspaperman ought to be included, unless question is raised as to whether or not there is a privileged status there.

But I direct the attention of the Senate to what I think now is a policy question growing out of this matter.

First, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in it entirety, the Hippocratic oath that is enjoined upon all practitioners of the healing art.

There being no objection, the oath was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIPPOCRATIC OATH

I will look upon him who shall have taught me this art even as one of my parents. I will share my substance with him, and I will supply his necessities, if he be in need. I will regard his offspring even as my own brethren, and I will teach them this art, if they would learn it, without fee or covenant. I will impart this art by precept, by lecture and by every mode of teaching, not only to my own sons but to the sons of him who has taught me, and to disciples bound by covenant and oath, according to the law of medicine.

The regimen I adopt shall be for the benefit of my patients according to my ability and judgment, and not for their hurt or for any wrong. I will give no deadly drug to any though it be asked of me, nor will I counsel such, and especially I will not aid a woman to procure abortion. Whatsoever house I enter, there will I go for the benefit of the sick, refraining from all wrongdoing or corruption, and especially from any act of seduction of male or female, of bond or free. Whatsoever things I see or hear concerning the life of men, in my attendance on the sick or even apart therefrom, which ought not to be noised abroad, I will keep silence thereon, counting such things to be as sacred secrets.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I shall read to the Senate only the last sentence of the Hippocratic oath. It is as follows:

Whatsoever things I see or hear concerning the life of men, in my attendance on the sick or even apart therefrom, which ought not to be noised abroad, I will keep silence thereon, counting such things to be as sacred secrets.

Mr. President, this question may come up from time to time. The competence of a person is a highly delicate matter. When it becomes noised abroad that telephone calls have been made to practitioners in that field—who probably think that when a Senator calls, there is something particularly solemn and compelling about it—that raises in my mind the question of whether there should be committee procedure, and whether, instead of having an individual Senator take it on himself to call a practitioner 500 miles away, and ask him whether a particular nominee for office has been receiving psychiatric care, such a matter ought to be presented to the committee behind closed doors. Should it not first be carefully considered there; and should not the will of the committee be expressed on that question, before a telephone call is sent to a doctor whom such a person does not know?

What it amounts to, in effect, is to say to a doctor, "I am a Senator; and, although others may not agree, I am asking you these questions. I know the Hippocratic oath, and what I ask you, Doctor, is actually a violation of the last paragraph of the Hippocratic oath."

How far are we to go in the case of nominees, under similar circumstances? I do not answer the question; I simply leave it right where it is, because I think now I have made the record in its entirety.

Yesterday question arose—because of a statement made out of New York by Clare Boothe Luce—as to whether perhaps it should be said that there was provocation for the statement. I do not sit as a court or jury in the matter; I do not pass on it. It will speak for itself—the fact that an individual Senator did call a doctor, and did raise the question.

I put the transcript in the RECORD; and now it is for the Senate to determine what the course of procedure will be and whether in other days individual Senators will call doctors and will ask them, "What about the mental competence of this nominee?" or whether the matter shall be carefully considered by a Senate committee, before damage can be done to the reputation of a citizen of the country.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am willing to yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. I am very happy to discuss the merits of this matter with the Senator from Illinois. But first I think there are several very important operative facts which should be made clear in the RECORD.

When I sought to call the elder doctor—who, as I have said, I found, when I placed the call, had died 2 weeks ago—I did not call him with any understanding or belief that he was the doctor of Mrs. Luce. I knew from the newspaper clippings that at one time he had treated her for some physical ailments. But I judged from the newspaper clippings that he probably was no longer her doctor. I was led to believe that he was not now her doctor by the representation of the newspaper correspondent who gave me the information, and who told me that it was his understanding that if

I would place that call the doctor would give me some information bearing on this nomination. I placed the call for that purpose—only to discover that the doctor was dead, and that I was talking to his son, who had taken over his father's practice. When his son advised me that he presently was the doctor of Mrs. Luce, it was the senior Senator from Oregon who said, in effect, "Well, that settles it, but I want you to know the nature of the call that I was going to make to your father."

In regard to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois that, as individual Senators, we cannot proceed to investigate the qualifications of a nominee in regard to any one of the four historical criteria I have pointed out over and over again during the years, without having committee approval, I wish to say that I completely reject that suggestion. Each one of us has a trust to perform in the examination of the qualifications of any nominee. That is our job as individual Senators.

I certainly would never agree that a committee—which might be dominated at the moment by an overwhelming majority of Senators who, for one reason or another, might be interested in preventing a thorough investigation of a nominee—should be granted officially, by the Senate, the power to stop an individual Senator from carrying out the obligation of his trust as a Senator.

I think that if any such proposal officially were made here on the floor of the Senate, it should be vigorously opposed, because in my judgment it would amount to seeking to put Senators in a straitjacket and to restrict them from exercising their honest judgment as to the course of action they should follow in carrying out their duty to investigate the qualifications of a nominee.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I shall yield in just a minute.

I think it must be left up to the judgment of the individual Senator, Mr. President. He has to do those things he thinks right and proper under the circumstances, in light of the facts that have been developed up to that time. He has to decide whether or not he thinks there is a sufficient basis to justify an inquiry into a nominee's mental or physical health, into his loyalty to the Government, into whether or not he has a conflict of interests that would make it impossible for him to reconcile the obligations of the position to which he is appointed with his occupation or profession. That is up to us. Therefore I made this investigation. I delayed my final decision to make it. As I said, quite frankly, I made it after I observed the nominee herself in the committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The weakness in the case of the Senator from Oregon is this: He is a distinguished lawyer. He was the dean of a law school. He knows the Hippocratic oath. He knows the privilege that exists between a patient and doctor. There is nothing in the record to show the Senator from Oregon ever contacted the patient and asked permission to get the information from the doctor. That is the weakness in his case. The Senator can make all the inquiries he likes, but when he goes to the doctor of the nominee, then he knows, as I know, and as he knows every doctor and lawyer knows, there is a privilege, and he has to ask permission of the patient before he can ask the doctor to disclose those things that are sacred to the two people in their relation of patient and doctor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I say to the Senator, most respectfully, the weakness he alleges in my case is nonexistent. I certainly do not think the Senator from Illinois wants to take the position that when we are investigating a nominee on any one of the criteria of qualifications to which I have referred, we have to get the consent of the nominee as to whether or not we can conduct the investigation.

Second, as I have already pointed out, I was not calling the elder doctor, who, as I said, I discovered had died 2 weeks before, on the belief that he was her doctor at the present time. I did not believe he was her doctor; but, quite to the contrary, that he was not her doctor. Furthermore, so far as I know, he was not a psychiatrist. I was not calling him on the basis of his being a psychiatrist. I do not know, as a matter of fact, as to whether or not he was a psychiatrist, but it is my belief and understanding he was not. But I could not raise my right hand and say I know that to be a fact. I was advised that here was a doctor, however, who thought that information ought to be obtained from him to the effect that there was a question as to the mental health of the nominee.

As a Senator it was my duty, as I saw it, to talk to the doctor and ascertain what his point of view was, and discuss it with him, as I would have if he had been alive, in greater detail than I did with his son, because I dismissed the inquiry when I saw he was not available and I was talking with the son, who had not been involved. I would have talked to the elder doctor had he been alive to learn whether or not the information he might present to me should be made available and whether I should make public use of it.

I certainly do not agree with the premise of the Senator from Illinois that I should have called up Clare Boothe Luce and said, "Clare, will you give me your permission to consult your doctor to see whether or not you are mentally competent?" I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from Oregon is one of the most resourceful and skilled debaters I have ever encountered. He knows every rule in the books. He knows this afternoon, as I know, that he is begging the question every step of the way.

I did not for a moment contend he did not have a right to investigate. I did not for a moment say he could not have directed his questions anywhere he liked—except one place. That is the jumping off place. That is the doctor of the nominee. All the wit and all the piety and all the argument is not going to rub out or vitiate the Hippocratic oath, or make it appear that it was not a question to the nominee's doctor asking for information which if imparted would have been in violation of the Hippocratic oath. The Senator can search where he can, and he can get all the information on competence he is able to collate, but he is begging the question, and it is the only one here involved, namely, it was a telephone call to a doctor. The Hippocratic oath is involved, and the prestige of the Senate is involved, because if we are going to arrogate to ourselves the right to call a doctor and find out whether a person is stable or emotionally sound, what kind of business will it be, and how quickly will we put the Senate in disrepute in the eyes of the country, and particularly in the eyes of the profession?

That is my case, Mr. President. I do not care to discuss it any further. I have laid it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where the whole wide world can see it.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senate yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. I shall discuss the subject a little further, because I want my friend to know I never beg a question. I want him also to know that his brilliant oratory and emphasis are not going to change my course of action in conducting investigations, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, into the mental qualifications of nominees I have cause to believe are not qualified.

I proceeded to the point when I made the call to the elder doctor to ascertain whether or not I was reliably informed that he would be desirous of discussing this matter with me. I put in the call to him to find out on what basis he would be desirous of discussing it with me. I wanted to find out what his relationship to the alleged patient might be, to find out what kind of a doctor he was.

Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that he and I and all others in the Senate have a great public trust to see to it that the interests of the United States may never be jeopardized by our sending to a post a person who might not have the mental competency to perform the work required, without embarrassment to the Nation.

The Senator seems to think that under no circumstances at all do doctors ever discuss problems of their patients. Let me say to the Senator from Illinois that there are circumstances under which a doctor considers it his duty, from the standpoint of the welfare of the patient, to make clear to those in positions of responsibility that the patient should not be allowed to follow a certain course of action.

There are many examples I can cite; one out of my own experience. I once had on my staff in law school a professor I had appointed just a few weeks before a certain incident occurred. His behavior after he was hired gave me serious doubts in regard to his mental and emotional stability. I ascertained who his doctor was. I talked to his doctor. He said, "Dean, I am glad you came in, because I was planning to call you today. I have a patient that I want you to help me with." He went on to explain that I had a member on my faculty who was in the first stage of paresis. He said, "It is very important that we find a way, without his knowledge, of getting him off your faculty immediately and into an institution, where he can receive whatever help that in a case as serious as this, can be given by medical science."

Did he violate his oath? He did not. He made clear to me that he had a trust which he owed to the patient. He had a trust he owed to the university and to the public to see to it that I knew that steps ought to be taken to remove that patient from my law faculty.

Many other examples could be cited as to instances when doctors recognize their public duty in behalf of the patients themselves to make known the problems of the patients.

I wish to say that the position taken by the Senator from Illinois, that under no circumstances whatsoever, in accordance with the great oath of the medical profession, is a doctor free, because of any doctrine of privacy, to disclose the condition of the patient in order to protect the patient as well as the public, is simply a position not borne out by medical practice.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I have listened very carefully to this debate. I want to say to the senior Senator from Oregon that the junior Senator from Colorado was not present on the floor the other day during the debate on this issue. I was home with a heavy chest cold. I wish to take this opportunity now to say that one of the reasons I voted against the confirmation of the nomination of this able lady is a bit different from what has been previously stated. I do not know her personally. I came to the House of Representatives after she had retired. I believe she left with the 79th Congress; I came to the House in the 80th Congress. I know nothing bad about her. There is nothing vindictive or vengeful with regard to my vote at all.

I voted on the basis that in the light of critical conditions which exist in Latin America today, in the light of the scandalous events which happened to the Vice President in Venezuela, in the light of what has occurred in Cuba, in Panama, and in Bolivia, Mrs. Luce was not, in my opinion, a wise selection. I did not question her competency and character. I thought politically and psychologically it was an unfortunate appointment not in keeping with our national interest. That is why I voted against the confirmation of Mrs. Luce.

I want to say to the Senator from Oregon, I think there is much logic in the position that any Senator or any person in a position of official responsibility has a duty, an obligation, and a trust to inquire into the capacity and competency of people who seek high Government office.

Hundreds of investigations are going on every day in this Government of ours, being conducted by the FBI, by the Civil Service investigators, and others, looking into the competency, the character, and the mental stability of people who work for the Federal Government. Why should any such person be exempt? Of course, we recognize that if one is elected to high public office, however desirable one does not have to go through that test, but when one is appointed under a Government procedure, he or she has to expect these investigations.

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon one or two questions. When Mrs. Luce came before the committee, were any questions put to embarrass or harass her in any way with references to medical treatment?

Mr. MORSE. No. The record speaks for itself.

Mr. CARROLL. Did anyone impugn the mental stability of Mrs. Luce at the time she appeared before the committee?

Mr. MORSE. Not at all.

Mr. CARROLL. Was the investigation prior to or subsequent to the time Mrs. Luce came before the committee?

Mr. MORSE. It was subsequent.

Mr. CARROLL. Did the senior Senator from Oregon ever issue a public press statement which would injure or embarrass this fine lady in this respect?

Mr. MORSE. Not on this matter. I do not have any doubt that she has been embarrassed by statements I have made in the debate as to why I think she is incompetent to perform the job.

Mr. CARROLL. I am referring to mental competence.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct. I made no public statements on it.

Mr. CARROLL. The medical aspect.

Mr. MORSE. That is correct.

Mr. CARROLL. Is this the first time the matter has come up on the floor of the Senate about the conversation with her doctor?

Mr. MORSE. It was raised by the Senator from Illinois at the request of the nominee just a few minutes ago. I mentioned it in a general way earlier today because of statements the Senator from Illinois had made to the press.

Mr. CARROLL. It was never raised by the senior Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORSE. The Senator can read the RECORD. It has not been.

Mr. CARROLL. I commend the senior Senator from Oregon for this conduct.

Mr. BUSH and Mr. CHAVEZ addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARROLL. I wish to say in conclusion that this debate would really be humorous if it were not so serious. On one hand, the senior Senator from Oregon has merely suggested an emotional instability. The nominee or the appointee by her intemperate remark of yesterday, when the Senator made a suggestion of emotional instability, responded by saying that the senior Senator from Oregon had been kicked in the head by a horse, no doubt to convey the impression of a permanent mental imbalance. I suggest that if we continue along these lines in this debate much longer, not only the whole country, but also Latin America, will think we are all "nuts." [Laughter.]

Mr. CHAVEZ and Mr. BUSH addressed the Chair.

Mr. CARROLL. I leave this matter in the hands of the President of the United States. Methinks only the President and I are capable of exercising calm sane judgment, and if he insists upon this appointment, a question of doubt may be raised against him or possibly vice versa.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BUSH. I did not hear all of the discussion this afternoon, but since the question has been raised with regard to the health of Mrs. Luce, and since there has been a possible question as to mental health raised, I should like to say, for the RECORD, I have positive knowledge, from both Mrs. Luce and from her husband, that she has not ever been under the care of a psychiatrist. I make that statement for the RECORD now.

There is one other item I should like to ask the Senator a question about. When Mrs. Luce was before the committee and under questioning by the Senator from Oregon, the Senator raised a question as to her health. I read from the record of the hearings:

> Senator MORSE. Mrs. Luce, at the time of your leaving Italy, Time magazine carried a story to the effect that the primary reason for you leaving Italy was because of arsenic poisoning. Was that a correct story?
> Mrs. LUCE. They would have been a little more correct if I were the editor of Time, I should have seen to it that they were more correct, if they said "arsenate of lead."
>
> Senator MORSE. Arsenate?
>
> Mrs. LUCE. Arsenate.
>
> Senator MORSE. That was the primary reason of your leaving——
> Mrs. LUCE. The primary reason of my leaving was my health, Senator, yes.

In view of all this I should like to ask the Senator why he did not pursue the question of health at that time, to give Mrs. Luce a chance, when she was on the witness stand, to discuss the matter?

Mr. MORSE. I think that is perfectly obvious. She was not talking about mental health. Why should I, at a public hearing, on the basis of that testimony, before I had reached any decision as to whether I should make any inquiry based upon the information which has been given to me concerning her emotional stability, proceed to discuss with Mrs. Luce any question about her emotional stability? There has been some talk about chivalry. It would not have fitted into my thoughts of chivalry to raise that question at that time in a public hearing.

I will say to the Senator, if there had been, to my complete satisfaction, any verification of a record of ill health mentally I would have taken it before the committee for a "behind the door" discussion.

Mr. BUSH. I am sorry, for the sake of the record, that the Senator did not do so, so that we could have avoided all this discussion, which is most unfortunate.

Mr. MORSE. I reached the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence to make that a basis for objection.

Mr. BUSH. The Senator is not implying, then, that there is any question about the mental health of Clare Boothe Luce right now?

Mr. MORSE. I say for the record that I think she has demonstrated a high state of emotional instability, to such a degree that I do not believe she should be appointed to a diplomatic post.

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—MINORITY VIEWS (EXECUTIVE REPORT NO. 2)

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to submit, from the Committee on the Judiciary, a favorable report on the nomination of Potter Stewart, to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, together with the minority views of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. I ask that the report, together with the minority views, be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Illinois; and the nomination will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will now proceed to discharge its other responsibilities.

Mr. President, the pending amendment is on page 31, lines 10 to 18. The amendment would strike out all that language. It contains an item of $283,550—$150,000 for floor covering, $103,550 for furniture, and $30,000 for security files and steel shelving. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and I hope we may now have a vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, senatorial discussion frequently deals with issues other than those pending before the body. We are now about to vote on the pending amendment. I should like to take a couple of minutes to sum up the situation.

We already have 375 desks and 400 chairs available for the 40 rooms which it is proposed to furnish. We also have 215 filing cases and 85 bookcases available.

The statement was made—I am sure in good faith, but it has turned out to be incorrect—that the office staff which is being moved from the HOLC building was using, in that building, rented furniture, and that furniture will have to be bought for the offices in the new Senate Office Building.

As I have previously mentioned, we have checked on this report with the custodian's office. We are informed that the furniture at the HOLC building being used by the Senate staff is owned by the Senate wing of the Capitol, and that it is under the custody and direction of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate. We are informed that those employees did not use rented furniture, and therefore the furniture could be taken with them.

The question of the carpets has been pretty thoroughly discussed. They are not necessary for acoustics. They are not necessary for safety. The entire proposal represents a waste of $283,000, in addition to the $1 million which has already been spent for furniture and furnishings. I hope that by a decisive vote the Senate will say that it wants to save money and is willing to save money on itself, as well as on other departments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] to the committee amendment on page 31.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Will the Chair please state the interpretation of the Chair as to the amendment on which we are about to vote, on page 31, lines 10 to 18?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois to strike out lines 10 to 18 in the committee amendment on page 31.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of death in his family.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] are absent on official business.

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is necessarily absent, and, if present and voting, would vote "yea."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 55, as follows:

NOT VOTING—9

Bible	Javits	Schoeppel
Frear	Monroney	Wiley
Hartke	O'Mahoney	Yarborough

So Mr. DOUGLAS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment designated "4–28–59—B," and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 31, it is proposed to strike out lines 2 to 9, inclusive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator indicate to the Senate how long he expects the proponents of the amendment will take, so that Senators who desire to have another bill considered and who have dinner engagements this evening can estimate how late the Senator will remain in session?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is never safe to estimate in advance how long a debate will take. I think the members of the committee and I consumed a little more than 1 hour on the first amendment. Then certain other matters were taken up by the Senate which took 2 hours. So one never knows when a typhoon or a hurricane is likely to strike this body. Therefore, pledges cannot be given in advance.

I myself do not intend to take more than 20 minutes. The amendment relates to the proposed further appropriation of $4 million for a subway which ends nowhere and which carries with it very dubious possibilities about its future.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would the Senator from Illinois be agreeable to a unanimous-consent agreement which would give the proponents of the amendment 30 minutes?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I make such a request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, could we carry that further and ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes; as soon as the agreement has been entered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, while the Senator from Illinois is in such a cooperative frame of mind——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am always in a cooperative frame of mind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. While other Senators who are also cooperative are present, but for whom the Senator from Illinois does not speak, I wonder if it would be agreeable to have me ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the railroad retirement bill, with the understanding that there be a time limitation of not to exceed 20 minutes on each side. I am informed that one side will not use all its time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In other words, does the Senator propose to lay aside my amendment for 40 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is agreeable.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937, RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT, AND RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, H.R. 5916, the supplemental appropriation bill, be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 211, Senate bill 226; and that the time on the bill and on all amendments be limited to not to exceed 20 minutes on each side, the time to be controlled by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 226) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I did not hear the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the railroad retirement bill, Calendar 211, Senate bill 226, and that debate be limited to 20 minutes on each side, the time to be controlled, on behalf of the proponents of the bill, by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], and on behalf of the opponents, by the minority leader.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Would that allow some time on all amendments and on amendments to amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the retirement bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will ask for the yeas and nays after the bill has been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I do not wish to get squeezed into a corner on this proposal. I wish to propound some questions. I simply wish to have some assurance that I may have 5, 7, or 10 minutes to propound the questions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator will have such an opportunity.

Mr. ALLOTT. I do not object.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, if I correctly understand the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, it provides for 20 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; a total of 20 minutes on each side.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. On all amendments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand there is no amendment to be offered, except one which is acceptable to the Republicans, and the committee has agreed on it. The minority, I have been informed, desire to have no discussion on the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That may well be true. I have no amendment to offer, but I would not want to agree to a limitation of time of only 20 minutes to a side regardless of the number of amendments which might be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will be glad to agree to a proposal which will allow 5 minutes on each side on any amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I think it should be 20 minutes to a side.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. All right; 20 minutes to a side on each amendment which is offered. I am informed, however, that there are no amendments to be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, can the distinguished majority leader tell the Senate what the amendment is to which he says there is no objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The distinguished minority leader can give the Senator that information.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is an amendment to reduce the tax on carriers from 4 percent to 3¾ percent. I was advised yesterday that that is agreeable, and that the Senator from Oregon is willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference.

The House is likely to pass, not an identical bill, but a similar bill, today. Whatever differences there may be can be adjusted in conference.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I had heard rumors that some other amendments might be offered. If the proposed unanimous-consent agreement will allow 20 minutes to a side on each amendment, as well, I will not object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The proposed agreement so provides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to consider the bill (S. 226) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, with amendments on page 3, line 5, after the word "which", to strike out "became" and insert "become"; on page 4, line 7, after the word "before", to strike out "January 1, 1959" and insert "the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959"; in line 10, after the word "after", to strike out "December 31, 1958" and insert "the month in which this Act was so amended,"; on page 5, line 15, after the word "before", to strike out "January 1, 1959" and insert "the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959"; at the beginning of line 18, to strike out "December 31, 1958" and insert "the month in which this Act was so amended"; on page 6, line 10, after the word "before", to strike out "January 1, 1959" and insert "the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959"; in line 13, after the word "after", to strike out "December 31, 1958" and insert "the month in which this Act was so amended,"; on page 7, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 308. (a) Subsection (d) of section 10 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever the Board finds at any time that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be insufficient to pay the benefits and refunds which it estimates are due, or will become due, under this Act, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account such moneys as the Board estimates would be necessary for the payment of such benefits and refunds, and the Secretary shall make such transfer. Whenever the Board finds that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, without regard to the amounts transferred pursuant to the next preceding sentence, is sufficient to pay such benefits and refunds, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to retransfer from the railroad unemployment insurance account to the credit of the Railroad Retirement Account such moneys as in its judgment are not needed for the payment of such benefits and refunds, plus interest at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, and the Secretary shall make such retransfer. In determining the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of September 30 of any year pursuant to section 8(a) of this Act, any moneys transferred from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account which have not been retransferred as of such date from the latter account to the credit of the former, plus the interest accrued thereon to that date, shall be disregarded."

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

On page 20, at the beginning of line 6, to change the section number from "308" to "309"; in the same line, after the word "by", to insert "section 301(b) shall be effective with respect to days in registration periods beginning after June 30, 1959"; in line 17, after the word "of", to strike out "January 1, 1959" and insert "the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted"; and, in line 21, after the word "after", to strike out "December 31, 1958" and insert "the month in which this Act was enacted"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PART I—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937

SECTION 1. (a) Section 2(a)3 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended to read as follows:

"3. Individuals who will have attained the age of sixty and will have completed thirty years of service or, in the case of women, who will have attained the age of sixty-two and will have completed less than thirty years of service, but the annuity of such individual shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that he or she is under age sixty-five when the annuity begins to accrue."

(b) Section 2(d) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If pursuant to the third sentence of this subsection an annuity was not paid to an individual with respect to one or more months in any calendar year, and it is subsequently established that the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year as determined in accordance with that sentence (but exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) did not exceed $1,200, the annuity with respect to such month or months, and any deduction imposed by reason of the failure to report earnings for such month or months under the fifth sentence of this subsection, shall then be payable. If the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year (exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) is in excess of $1,200, the number of months in such year with respect to which an annuity is not payable by reason of such third and fifth sentences shall not exceed one month for each $100 of such excess, treating the last $50 or more of such excess as $100; and if the amount of the annuity has changed during such year, any payments of annuity which become payable solely by reason of the limitation contained in this sentence shall be made first with respect to the month or months for which the annuity is larger."

(c) Section 2(e) of such Act is amended by striking out "than an amount" and inserting in lieu thereof "than 110 per centum of an amount".

(d) Section 2(g) of such Act is amended by inserting after "wife under age 65" the following: "(other than a wife who is receiving such annuity by reason of an election under subsection (h))".

(e) Section 2 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) A spouse who would be entitled to an annuity under subsection (e) if she or he had attained the age of 65 may elect upon or after attaining the age of 62 to receive such annuity, but the annuity in any such case shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that the spouse is under age 65 when the annuity begins to accrue."

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(a) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended (1) by striking out "3.04", "2.28", and "1.52" and inserting in lieu thereof "3.35", "2.51", and "1.67", respectively; and (2) by striking out "$200" and inserting in lieu thereof "$250".

(b) Section 3(c) of such Act is amended by inserting after "or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954," the following: "and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended,".

(c) Section 3(e) of such Act is amended (1) by striking out "$4.55", "$75.90", and "his monthly compensation" and inserting in lieu thereof "$5.00", "$83.50" and "110 per centum of his monthly compensation", respectively; (2) by striking out "is less than the amount, or the additional amount" and inserting in lieu thereof "is less than 110 per centum of the amount, or 110 per centum of the additional amount"; (3) by inserting after "age sixty-five," the following: "women entitled to spouses' annuities pursuant to elections made under subsection (h) of section 2 to be entitled to wife's insurance benefits determined under section 202 (q) of the Social Security Act,"; and (4) by striking out "such amount or such additional amount" and inserting in lieu thereof "110 per centum of such amount or 110 per centum of such additional amount".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 5(f)(2) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended by striking out "and 7 per centum of his or her compensation after December 31, 1946 (exclusive in both cases of compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, and in the latter case in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954)," and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "plus 7 per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1946, and before January 1, 1959, plus 7½ per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1958, and before January 1, 1962, plus 8 per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1961 (exclusive of compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, and in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954, and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended),".

(b) Section 5(h) of such Act is amended by striking out "$33", "$176", and "$15.40" wherever they appear and inserting in lieu thereof "$36.30", "$193.60", and "$16.95", respectively.

(c) Section 5(i)(1)(ii) of such Act is amended by striking out "or in which month he engaged on seven or more different calendar days in noncovered remunerative activity outside the United States (as defined in section 203(k) of the Social Security Act)" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "or, having engaged in any activity outside the United States, would be charged under such section 203(e) with any earnings derived from such activity if it had been an activity within the United States".

(d) Clause (A)(i) of section 5(l)(9) of such Act is amended by striking out the word "and" appearing after "July 1, 1954," and by inserting after "June 30, 1954," the following: "and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and any excess over $400 for any calendar month after the month in which this Act was so amended,".

(e) Clause (A) (ii) of section 5(l)(9) of such Act is amended (1) by inserting "and before 1959" after "1954" where it first appears; (2) by inserting after "$4,200" where it first appears the following: ", or for any calendar year after 1958 is less than $4,800,"; (3) by striking out "$350" and inserting in lieu thereof "$400"; and (4) by striking out "and $4,200 for years after 1954, by" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ", $4,200 for years after 1954 and before 1959, and $4,800 for years after 1958, by".

(f) Section 5(l)(10) of such Act is amended by striking out "44", "11", "$350", "$15.40", "$36.66", "$27.50", and "$14.66" wherever they appear and inserting in lieu thereof "49", "12", "$400", "$16.95", "$40.33", "$30.25", and "$16.13", respectively.

SEC. 4. Section 20 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended (1) by inserting "(a)" immediately after "SEC. 20."; and (2) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Pensions and annuities under this Act or the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935 shall not be considered as income for the purposes of section 522 of title 38 of the United States Code."

SEC. 5. All pensions under section 6 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, all joint and survivor annuities and survivor annuities deriving from joint and survivor annuities under that Act awarded before the month next following the month of enactment of this Act all widows' and widowers' insurance annuities which began to accrue before the second calendar month next following the month of such enactment, and which, in accordance with the proviso in section 5(a) or section 5(b) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, are payable in the amount of the spouse's annuity to which the widow or widower was entitled, and all annuities under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, are increased by 10 per centum.

SEC. 6. (a) The amendments made by section 1 (other than subsection (b) thereof), by subsections (a) and (c) of section 2, and by subsection (b) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities (not including annuities to which section 5 applies) accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendment made by subsection (b) of section 1 and by subsection (c) of section 3 shall be effective with respect to annuities accruing during the calendar year 1959 and subsequent calendar years. The amendment made by subsection (a) of section 3 shall be effective only with repect to lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(2) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendments made by subsection (f) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act and lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(1) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. Sections 4 and 5 shall be effective only with respect to pensions due in calendar months after the month next following the month of enactment of this Act and annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act.

(b) All recertifications required by reason of the amendments made by this part shall be made by the Railroad Retirement Board without application therefor.

PART II—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

SEC. 201. (a) Section 3201 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3201. Rate of tax.

"In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of every employee a tax equal to—

"(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961, as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956."

(b) Section 3202(a) of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended (1) by striking out "after December 31, 1954" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959"; (2) by striking out "$350" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$400"; (3) by striking out "after 1954" and inserting in lieu thereof "after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959".

(c) Section 3211 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3211. Rate of tax.

"In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of each employee representative a tax equal to—

"(1) 13½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"(2) 14½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961, as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to twice the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956."

(d) (1) Section 3221 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended by striking out "In addition to" and all that follows down through "$350" the first time it appears, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(a) In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on every employer an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ, equal to—

"(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after December 31, 1961, as is, with respect to any employee for any calendar month, not in excess of $400".

(2) Such section 3221 is further amended (A) by striking out "after December 31, 1954" and "after 1954" wherever they appear in that section and inserting in lieu thereof "after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959"; (B) by striking out "$350" wherever else it appears in that section and inserting in lieu thereof "$400"; and (C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The rate of tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3111 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3111 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956."

SEC. 202. The amendments made by section 201 shall, except as otherwise provided in such amendments, be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid after the month of such enactment, for services rendered after such month of enactment.

PART III—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

SEC. 301. (a) Section 1(i) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the proviso in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof ": Provided, however, That in computing the compensation paid to any employee, no part of any month's compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954, and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended, shall be recognized".

"(b) The first proviso of section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out '$400' and inserting in lieu thereof '$500'."

SEC. 302. (a) Section 2(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the language between "(i)" and "(ii)" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "for each day of unemployment in excess of four during any registration period, and".

(b) Section 2(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out columns I and II and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Column I Total Compensation	Column II Daily Benefit Rate
$500 to $699.99	$4.50
700 to 999.99	5.00
1,000 to 1,299.99	5.50
1,300 to 1,599.99	6.00
1,600 to 1,899.99	6.50
1,900 to 2,199.99	7.00
2,200 to 2,499.99	7.50
2,500 to 2,799.99	8.00
2,800 to 3,099.99	8.50
3,100 to 3,499.99	9.00
3,500 to 3,999.99	9.50
4,000 and over	10.20".

(c) The proviso in such section 2(a) is amended by striking out "50" and "$8.50" and inserting in lieu thereof "60" and "$10.20", respectively.

SEC. 303. (a) Section 2(c) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu of such period a colon and the following: "And provided further, That, with respect to an employee who has ten or more years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, and who had current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment in a benefit year but has exhausted such rights, the benefit year in which such rights are exhausted shall be deemed not to be ended until the last day of the extended benefit period determined under the following schedule, and the maximum number of days of, and amount of payment for, unemployment within such benefit year for which benefits may be paid to the employee shall be enlarged to include all compensable days of unemployment within such extended benefit period:

"If the employee's 'years of service' total—	The extended benefit period shall begin on the first day of unemployment following the day on which the employee exhausted his then current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment and shall continue for successive fourteen-day periods (each of which periods shall constitute a registration period) until the number of such fourteen-day periods totals—
10 and less than 15	7 (but not more than 65 days)

but no such extended benefit period shall extend beyond the beginning of the first registration period in a benefit year in which the employee is again qualified for benefits in accordance with section 3 of this Act on the basis of compensation earned after the first of such successive fourteen-day periods has begun. For an employee who has ten or more years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, who has fourteen or more consecutive days of unemployment, and who is not a 'qualified employee' for the general benefit year current when such unemployment commences but is or becomes a 'qualified employee' for the next succeeding general benefit year, such succeeding benefit year shall, in his case, begin on the first day of the month in which such unemployment commences."

(b) An employee who has less than ten years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, and who has after June 30, 1957, and before April 1, 1959, exhausted (within the meaning prescribed by the Railroad Retirement Board by regulation) his rights to unemployment benefits, shall be paid unemployment benefits for days of unemployment, not exceeding sixty-five, which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before July 1, 1959, and which would not be days with respect to which he would be held entitled otherwise to receive unemployment benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, except that an employee who has filed, and established, a first claim for benefits under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 may not thereafter establish a claim under this subsection, and an employee who has registered for, and established a claim for benefits under this subsection may not thereafter establish a claim under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958. Except to the extent inconsistent with this subsection, the provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act shall be applicable in the administration of this subsection.

(c) The Secretary of Labor, upon request, shall furnish the Board information deemed necessary by the Board for the administration of the provisions of subsection (b) hereof, and the Board, upon request, shall furnish the Secretary of Labor information deemed necessary by the Secretary for the administration of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958.

SEC. 304. Section 3 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500".

SEC. 305. Section 4 (a-2) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out subdivision (iv), and by striking out the semicolon at the end of subdivision (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

SEC. 306. Section 8(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by inserting after "June 30, 1954" where it first appears the following: ", and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month paid by him to any employee for services rendered to him after the month in which this Act was so amended"; (2) by inserting after "June 30, 1954" where it appears for the second time the following: ", and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and to not more than $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended"; (3) by inserting after "June 30, 1954" where it appears for the third time the following: ", and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or less than $400 if such month is after the month in which this Act was so amended"; (4) by striking out "December 31, 1947" in paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof "the month in which this Act was amended in 1959"; and (5) by striking out the table (except the column headings) in such paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

	Percent
"$450,000,000 or more	1½
$400,000,000 or more but less than $450,000,000	2
$350,000,000 or more but less than $400,000,000	2½
$300,000,000 or more but less than $350,000,000	3
Less than $300,000,000	4".

SEC. 307. Section 8(b) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by striking out "3 per centum" and inserting in lieu thereof "4 per centum"; and (2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ", and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and as is not in excess of $400 paid to him for services rendered as an employee representative in any calendar month after the month in which this Act was so amended."

SEC. 308. (a) Subsection (d) of section 10 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever the Board finds at any time that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be insufficient to pay the benefits and refunds which it estimates are due, or will become due, under this Act, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account such moneys as the Board estimates would be necessary for the payment of such benefits and refunds, and the Secretary shall make such transfer. Whenever the Board finds that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, without regard to the amounts transferred pursuant to the next preceding sentence, is sufficient to pay such benefits and refunds, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to retransfer from the railroad unemployment insurance account to the credit of the Railroad Retirement Account such moneys as in its judgment are not needed for the payment of such benefits and refunds, plus interest at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, and the Secretary shall make such retransfer. In determining the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of September 30 of any year pursuant to section 8(a) of this Act, any moneys transferred from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account which have not been retransferred as of such date from the latter account to the credit of the former, plus the interest accrued thereon to that date, shall be disregarded."

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 309. The amendments made by section 301(b) shall be effective with respect to days in registration periods beginning after June 30, 1959. The amendments made by sections 302, 303(a), and 305 shall be effective with respect to benefits accruing in general benefit years which begin after the benefit year ending June 30, 1958, and in extended benefit periods which begin after December 31, 1957. The amendment made by section 304 shall be effective with respect to base years after the base year ending December 31, 1957. The amendments made by clauses (4) and (5) of section 306 and clause (1) of section 307 shall be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid for services rendered in calendar months after the month in which this Act was enacted.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield myself 20 minutes or so much thereof as I may need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the bill now before us is Senate bill 226.

Senate bill 226, as originally introduced by me, is in most respects the same as Senate bill 1313 which was passed by the Senate on August 22, 1958. However, the committee has made the following six changes in that bill:

1. CHANGES IN EFFECTIVE DATES

(A) The 10-percent increase in retirement and survivor annuities is made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to annuities acccruing for months after the month of enactment of this act. The effective date for the 10-percent increase in pensions is changed accordingly.

Mr. President, that was done upon my recommendation—in fact, upon my insistence. I do not like the idea of retroactivity when we are imposing a financial burden upon a party to what, in this instance, might be termed a controversy, without that party's having knowledge that, for some reason, it can expect to be bound by such retroactivity; and I think it most unfair to the carriers to include in the bill, in connection with this matter, a retroactive clause. So my amendment for prospectivity was adopted by the committee.

(B) The increase in tax rates for Retirement Act purposes, as well as the increase in the taxable and creditable monthly compensation base, is also made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month.

(C) The increase in lump-sum payments is also made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this act.

The effective date with regard to the work restrictions on disability annuitants, and survivor beneficiaries working outside the United States, and the inclusion of social security wages for the purpose of computing survivor benefits, are not changed, effective for calendar years beginning with the calendar year 1959, because they all require computation on an annual basis.

2. CHANGES IN THE MAXIMUM CONTRIBUTION RATE FOR UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

In view of the testimony in the record of the hearings that the maximum contribution rate of 3½ percent provided in the original bill would be inadequate to retain the railroad unemployment insurance account on a sound financial basis, the maximum contribution rate in the newly proposed table for unemployment insurance contributions is changed from 3½ to 4 percent; but this table, as well as the increase in the monthly taxable base from $350 to $400 a month, is made effective with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month.

I wish to discuss briefly the contribution rate, and I wish to stress two things which were pointed out during our hearings. First, in recent years the railroads have, in effect, saved approximately $1,100 million as a result of the experience rating provision the Senate adopted some years ago, comparable to the experience rating which exists in many State laws in connection with the matter of determining unemployment compensation. The percentage is flexible: If employment is high, the rate can go down one-half of 1 percent; and when unemployment is high, the percentage rate goes up.

The Railroad Retirement Board suggested that 4 percent should be agreed upon as the figure; but the Board's own statistics, as we see by examining page 24 of our report, show that with the proposed changes, a tax of 3.75—or 3¾—percent would be fiscally sound for this fund; and I understand that when I conclude, and when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] takes the floor, in view of the table which appears on page 24 and in view of the testimony from the Railroad Retirement Board, the Senator from Illinois will propose an amendment to reduce the tax from 4 percent to 3¾ percent.

I wish to say that when the Senator from Illinois does that, I will accept the amendment, in behalf of the committee. So I think the amendment for a tax of 3¾ percent should be accepted by the Senate.

The provisions for increasing and extending the benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act and the effective dates of such increases and extensions are not changed.

3. CONFERRING AUTHORITY UPON THE BOARD TO BORROW MONEY FROM THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACCOUNT

In view of the low balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, as shown in the record of the hearings, a new amendment is added to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act; and the amendment confers upon the Railroad Retirement Board the authority to borrow from the railroad retirement account, for the payment of benefits and refunds under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, on a reimbursable and 3-percent interest basis.

Let me say that all parties agree—the carriers the brotherhoods, and the Railroad Retirement Board itself; and in the committee we are unanimous—on this point, namely, that this borrowing power should be granted as recommended by all the parties—the carriers, the brotherhoods, and the Board.

4. EXTENDING TO JULY 1, 1959, THE PERIOD FOR THE PAYMENT OF TEMPORARY UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

The provision in the bill for the payment of temporary unemployment compensation to employees with less than 10 years of service, up to a maximum of 65 days, but not later than April 1, 1959, is extended to July 1, 1959, in order to conform, as nearly as possible, to the provisions in Public Law 86–7, which was approved March 31, 1959, extending the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 to July 1, 1959.

5. A TECHNICAL AMENDMENT WITH REGARD TO SUBSIDIARY REMUNERATION

The committee amendments include also a technical amendment to section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, with regard to subsidiary remuneration. Under present law, if an individual's base year's earnings are insufficient to make him a qualified employee but for the inclusion of "subsidiary remuneration", no day on which he earns such subsidiary remuneration is a day of unemployment, although otherwise it may be. In view of the proposed increase in the qualifying earnings from $400 to $500 in the base year, section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500."

This is a desirable amendment, and I think it is deserving of adoption. I believe it is a fair amendment; and the committee was unanimous in regard to it.

6. AN ATTEMPT TO PROTECT A SMALL GROUP OF VETERAN PENSIONERS

Section 20 of the Railroad Retirement Act is amended to provide the annuities and pensions under the Railroad Retirement Act should not be deemed income for purposes of determining veterans' income, in cases involving non-service-connected disability pensions now afforded veterans who are totally and permanently disabled.

All these six changes are shown in italics on the several pages of the committee bill now before us.

Mr. President, at this time I wish to say a word, because I know the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is always interested in veterans' legislation. This amendment is a veterans' amendment; and it came to us also with the recommendation of the expert on veterans affairs who assists our Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, that simple justice entitles the veterans to this consideration.

As so amended, the committee bill would amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act in the following respects:

A. AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

First. All retirement and survivor annuities, including spouses' annuities, computed under the regular railroad retirement formulas, including the minimum formulas, would be increased by 10 percent, effective with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of the bill.

In other words, it will be prospective.

Second. All retirement and survivor annuities, including spouses' annuities, computed under the overall social security minimum would be increased by 10 percent, effective with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of the bill.

Third. All pensions payable under section 6 of the Railroad Retirement Act would be increased by 10 percent, effective with respect to pensions due in months after the month next following the month of enactment of this bill.

Fourth. The maximum amount of monthly compensation creditable for benefit purposes would be increased from $350 to $400 effective with respect to services rendered after the month of enactment of this bill.

Fifth. The formula for computing the "residual" lump sum would be amended—in conformity with amendments proposed to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act to increase the tax rate and to increase the maximum monthly tax base to $400—by increasing the percentage factor applicable to compensation after 1958 and before 1962, to 7½ percent, and to compensation after 1961 to 8 percent, and by increasing the maximum amount of compensation to which such factors are applicable from $350 to $400 earned in months after the month of enactment of this bill.

Sixth. The privilege—now available to a male employee with 30 years of service—of electing to receive a reduced annuity at age 60 would be available to women employees with 10 years of service at age 62. Also, spouses of annuitants—age 65 or more—would have the right to elect to receive a reduced spouse's annuity at age 62. The reduction in each case would be by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month the beneficiary is under age 65; and both provisions would be effective for annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of the bill.

Seventh. The earnings test now applicable to disability annuitants under which such an annuitant under age 65 does not receive his annuity for any month in which he is paid more than $100 in earnings, would be modified by a proviso to the effect that if the annuitant's total earnings in any calendar year do not exceed $1,200, the annuity otherwise not payable because of his earnings in excess of $100 in any month in the year would become payable. Should the annuitant's earnings exceed $1,200 in any year, loss of annuity would not exceed 1 month's annuity for each $100 that the annuitant earned in excess of $1,200, treating any remainder of such excess of $50 or more as $100.

Earnings from employment with an "employer" as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act, and from employment with the disability annuitant's last employer before he retired—whether or not a railroad employer—will not count toward this $1,200 maximum, since no annuities are payable in any event under section 2(d) of the act for any month in which the disability annuitant had such employment, regardless of the amount of earnings in that employment.

The earnings test now applicable to survivor annuitants working outside the United States—no more than 6 days' remunerative activity in a month—would also be changed to a yearly earnings test applicable to survivor annuitants who are U.S. workers.

These changes would be effective for calendar years beginning with the calendar year 1959, although it will not be before 1960 when the question of the yearly earnings for 1959 will have to be determined.

Eighth. The amendment to section 20 of the Railroad Retirement Act would make it unnecessary for a railroad employe to waive part of his annuity or pension in order to avoid forfeiting his non-service-connected disability pension. Under this amendment, his annuity or pension under the Railroad Retirement Act would not be considered as income for purposes of the "income limitations" prescribed by section 522 of title 38 of the United States Code, under which non-service-connected disability pensions, otherwise due, are not to be paid to "any unmarried veteran whose annual income exceeds $1,400 or to any married veterans or any veteran with children whose annual income exceeds $2,700." This amendment would be effective prospectively, the same as the increases in annuities and pensions mentioned previously.

B. AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

First. The bill would increase, effective with respect to compensation earned in months after the month of enactment of the bill, the tax rate on employees and employers from 6¼ percent to 6¾ percent on the employee's compensation earned up to $400 in any month after the month of enactment of the bill and before 1962, and to 7¼ percent of the employee's compensation up to $400 earned in any month after 1961. This tax rate would be increased, with respect to compensation paid after December 31, 1964, by the same number of percentage points—or fractions of percentage points—by which the then current social security tax rate exceeds 2¾ percent—the social security tax rate scheduled to be in effect from 1960 through 1964 under the Social Security Amendments of 1956—this increase is conditioned, of course, on the increase in social security taxes.

Second. The tax rate on employee representatives would be increased from 12½ percent to 13½ percent, with respect to compensation earned after the month of enactment of the bill up to $400 in any month after the month of enactment of the bill and before 1962, and to 14½ percent of compensation up to $400 earned in any month after 1961. This tax rate would also be increased with respect to compensation paid after December 31, 1964, just as in the case of the employer and employee tax rates, but this increase would be by twice the number of percentage points—or fractions of percentage points—by which the then current social security tax rate exceeds 2¾ percent. This latter increase, too, would be conditional.

Third. The withholdings required of employers of the taxes imposed on their employees would be increased in accordance with the increase in tax rate and tax base.

C. AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

First. The maximum number of days of unemployment in the first registration period in a benefit year for which benefits may be paid would be increased from 7 to 10 days, the same number as the law now provides with respect to all subsequent registration periods in the benefit year. This amendment would be effective with respect to benefits payable in the current benefit year and thereafter, for normal benefits, and as early as January 1, 1958, for benefits in extended periods.

Second. A new schedule of increased daily benefit rates would apply, ranging from a minimum daily benefit rate of $4.50 for compensation of $500 to $699.99 in a year to a maximum daily benefit rate of $10.20 for compensation of $4,000 or more in a year. The proposed daily benefit rates are from 50 cents to $1.70 higher than present rates. The alternative minimum daily rate payable would be increased from 50 to 60 percent of the daily rate of compensation—with a maximum of $10.20 per day—for the employee's last employment in which he was engaged for an employer during the base—calendar—year. This amendment would be effective with respect to benefits payable in the current benefit year and thereafter, for normal benefits, and as early as January 1, 1958 for benefits in extended periods.

Third. The substitution of "$500" for "$400" in section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, with regard to subsidiary remuneration, and the change in the minimum earnings from $400 to $500 in a base—calendar—year which would qualify an employee for benefits, would be effective with respect to benefits payable in the benefit year beginning July 1, 1959.

Fourth. An employee with less than 10 years of service who has, after June 30, 1957, and before April 1, 1959, exhausted his rights to unemployment benefits under present law would receive additional unemployment benefits, payable retroactively, for days of unemployment, not exceeding 65, which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before July 1, 1959.

Fifth. An employee who has 10 or more years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, who has 14 or more consecutive days of unemployment, and who is not a "qualified employee" for the general benefit year current when such unemployment commences, but is or becomes a "qualified employee" for the next succeeding general benefit year, such succeeding benefit year shall, in his case, begin on the first day of the month in which such unemployment commences and continues to such time as it otherwise would.

An employee with 10 but less than 15 years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, upon exhaustion of his rights to normal unemployment benefits under present law in a given benefit year would have such benefit year extended by an additional 7 successive 14-day periods after such exhaustion, with a maximum of 65 days of additional benefits.

An employee with 15 or more years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, upon exhaustion of his rights to normal unemployment benefits under present law in a given benefit year would have such benefit year extended by an additional 13 successive 14-day periods after such exhaustion, with a maximum of 130 days of additional benefits.

The extended benefit period in any case could begin as early as January 1, 1958.

Sixth. Sundays and holidays could be compensable days of unemployment, just as any other day, whether or not such Sundays and holidays are preceded and succeeeded by a day of unemployment. This amendment would be effective with respect to benefits payable in the current benefit year and thereafter, for normal benefits, and as early as January 1, 1958, for benefits in extended periods.

Seventh. To provide funds for the additional benefits recommended, the bill would increase the monthly limit on taxable compensation for services after the month of enactment, from $350 to $400 a month per employee—and would increase the credit base as well—and would change the contribution or tax rate schedule so that when the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account should fall below $300 million by September 30 of any year—including the year 1958—the rate in the following calendar year, but not before the month next following the month of enactment of the bill, would be 4 percent—instead of the present 3 percent when the account falls below $250 million—with step changes to provide lower rates when the balance increases, with a minimum rate of 1½ percent when the balance reaches $450 million.

Eighth. The bill would also provide an increase in the maximum creditable and taxable base from $350 to $400 a month on compensation earned by employee representatives after the month of enactment; but this amendment has no practical significance—it is merely a formal amendment to conform to the pattern of the act since employee representative earnings are disregarded for unemployment and sickness insurance purposes, including contribution purposes.

Ninth. In view of the low balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, as shown in the record of the hearings, a new amendment is added to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act which confers upon the Railroad Retirement Board the authority to borrow from the Railroad Retirement Account for the payment of benefits and refunds under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, on a reimbursable, and 3 percent interest, basis.

In conclusion, the bill would serve the public interest by returning the railroad retirement system to an essentially sound actuarial basis and strengthening the morale of railroad workers by providing for them a better retirement and unemployment insurance system. The increase in taxes and in the compensation base to which the taxes apply would reduce the present actuarial deficit of 4.18 percent of taxable payroll, or some $213 million a year, to an estimated .61 percent, or some $34 million a year, in the retirement system. The change in the contribution schedule with provision for a maximum contribution rate of 4 percent would place the unemployment insurance system, too, on a sound financial basis. The change in the retirement tax would accord with the request of the President made in 1956 when he signed the stop-gap legislation providing a moderate increase in retirement benefits.

The railroad system which is, of course, the most vital and important element in the national transportation system and which is so important to the Nation's welfare, economic strength, and defense, cannot function without a stable and experienced work force. To maintain such a work force it must compete with other industry which generally provides generous private retirement benefits supplementary to social security benefits, which benefits were, in addition, increased substantially in the very last session of Congress. The increased retirement and unemployment benefits, as well as the financial stabilization provided by this bill, would serve to better the condition of the railroad worker and greatly help the railroads to preserve their efficient labor force on which the industry and the Nation are so dependent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oregon has expired.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to apologize to the Senator from Illinois. I thought that I could finish my statement in not more than 15 minutes and that I would have 5 minutes remaining to answer questions. If the Senator from Illinois has some time available, I ask him to yield me 5 minutes, so that I may answer any questions the Senator from Colorado has in mind.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I first yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not certain there will be a yea and nay vote on the bill, so I wish to say for the record I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Louisiana has been of great help.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER].

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator from Oregon tell me what the retirement pay would amount to for a man who is 65 years old who has been receiving $500 a month and who becomes totally disabled?

Mr. MORSE. Retirement is on a monthly basis, as the Senator knows. The maximum would go up 10 percent over what it is now.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator give me a dollar figure?

Mr. MORSE. The average for all employee annuities under the bill will be approximately $125.

Mr. LANGER. I thank my friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I feel a sense of responsibility with respect to the bill. I should like to state, first, that I think the Senator from Oregon has us all in his debt for the skill and study he has given this whole problem.

I hope very much that we now have a bill in balance so much that it will pass. I asked for this time to express my sentiment for the bill, and to express my gratification that the bill came from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

I also wish to urge the same thing which was urged upon us, and which prevailed with us, that all of us should stretch a point with respect to the details of the bill in order to get a bill enacted. If we do not do that, both here and in the other body, we will not have a bill at all, that having been the sad experience of last year.

I thank my colleague from Illinois for yielding to me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. ALLOTT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I should like the RECORD to show that the Senator from Oregon is present on the floor at this time, because I desire to address some questions to him at a later point in my remarks.

Perhaps a little history with regard to this matter is not out of line as a part of the record. In 1956, as a member of the Subcommittee on Railroad Retirement of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Railway Brotherhood officials came to the members of the committee late in the session to ask us to raise the retirement benefits 10 percent. At that time they agreed to come back the next year to work out a basis for financing that increase. That was done. In the President's approval of the bill that year the President said he approved the bill with the understanding that it would be financed by the Congress at the coming session of Congress.

At the next session of Congress we got a bill which also contained quite a few changes, and was more than a bill simply to finance the raises we had given in the preceding Congress. We started to work upon the bill in 1957, and we worked all through 1957 and 1958. The Senator from Oregon was the chairman of the subcommittee. I was still a member of the subcommittee at that time.

The Senator from Oregon will recall, I am sure, that although there was at one time some criticism raised with regard to me, I rose upon the floor of the Senate to defend the part I had played in trying actively to create a bill which would be brought to the Senate. I think the record should be made clear.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to say that the Senator was of great help. I am very sorry, although I am delighted with the cooperation I receive from my present associates in the committee, that the Senator from Colorado is no longer a member of the committee. The Senator was of great help in getting the bill through the committee in 1958.

Mr. ALLOTT. At that time, as a result of the raises we had given upon retirement, the fund went into debt over the fiscal years 1957 and 1958 a total of some $140 million.

I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon a question. As the result of our not acting on this matter prior to this time, what will be the deficit for the 3 years as of July 1 of this year?

Mr. MORSE. The present deficit is $213 million a year, as was brought out in the hearings. I am sorry I cannot put my finger on the evidence exactly, but I assure Senators it is in the hearings. If the bill under consideration is enacted it will reduce the deficit to about $34 million a year.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Senator for that information, because it justifies in my mind the position I took with respect to the former bills, which was that we should bring to the Senate a bill to put the fund on a sound actuarial basis.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to bring to the Senator's attention page 19 of the committee report, which shows the figure of a $34 million deficit if the bill is adopted.

I also wish to say that the Railroad Retirement Board tells us that figure is not of sufficient significance to make the bill not actuarially sound, because there is a great fluctuation in a fund with as many millions of dollars as this fund has. If at a given time there is a $34 million deficit, it would not make the fund actuarially unsound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 more minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado is entitled to make a record and to be helpful with regard to the legislative history. Under these circumstances I think possibly we ought to try to obtain a few minutes of extended time for the Senator to ask questions. It may take a little time to dig the information out of the record.

Mr. ALLOTT. I believe we have adequate time, and if we need a few minutes more I will ask for unanimous consent.

The Senator from Oregon will recall that because of the situation which existed last year when the railroad retirement bill was before the Senate, he offered a bill which he had been forced to work out with Members of the House at the last minute, and there was no opportunity to examine that bill. I opposed the bill on the ground that it did not put the fund in a sound actuarial condition.

From an examination of the bill for this year, I understand the bill which is proposed will place the fund on a sound actuarial basis, including taking care of deficits which we have incurred during the last 3 years.

Mr. MORSE. I wish the record to show this very clearly. We pressed the Board at the hearings on that subject. They point out that there will be a deficit, according to present calculations, of $34 million; but they also point out that for all practical purposes, the bill would restore the system to a sound financial basis. When we are dealing with the sum of $34 million, it is small in comparison with the total amount of the funds. So my answer is "Yes," if we bear in mind that the testimony is that the fund will be substantially actuarily sound.

This bill is substantially the bill which we arrived at in compromise with Representative HARRIS last year in the closing days of the session.

Mr. ALLOTT. I understand that; and I understand that the figure of deficit as it now appears is not significant with relation to the whole. With the assurance of the Senator that the bill finally arrived at is on a sound actuarial basis—and that is my understanding from my own studies—I agree that it is a good bill.

I merely wish to make it clear that when I voted against the bill last year I did so on the basis that I did not believe the members of the brotherhoods in Colorado wanted me to preside over the interment of the railroad retirement fund. I am sure the Senator from Oregon will recall my insistence that the bill have a sound actuarial basis. I have insisted that the spouse survivors be taken care of. They were not taken care of in the first bill, in 1956.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. This bill does take care of the spouses, as the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Oregon have always insisted.

Mr. ALLOTT. I understand that. I am very happy to see it, and also to see that the amount which a beneficiary is permitted to earn in a year has been adjusted and amended so that he can earn $1,200 a year, rather than $100 a month.

I have received many letters from railroad people. In fact, I sent out a questionnaire to all those who asked to hear from me. I sent a letter to the president of one railroad brotherhood, who said that I had no right to write to members of the railroad brotherhoods direct. I consider it my right. As a matter of fact, I consider it my duty.

I plan to support the bill. I do not know whether or not there will be a yea-and-nay vote, but I wish the record to show how I would vote. I favor the bill primarily because, at long last, after 3 years, we are seeing the fund brought into a sound actuarial balance. So that when a railroader retires he can be sure that the necessary funds will be there to pay the benefits he has been promised.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. As I understand, the position of the Senator from Colorado last year was that if the expenditure was to be made mandatory, the Senator from Colorado felt that, concurrent with that order, provision should be made to supply the money needed to make the expenditure.

Mr. ALLOTT. Yes. If the retirement fund were to be paid out, the retirement fund should, at the same time, be placed upon a sound acturial basis—not on a level basis. Over a period of years, in a curve upward, it will be on a sound basis.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Colorado took the position that it would not be good policy to grant the increase and delay the necessary change in the law to provide the money with which to finance the increase.

Mr. ALLOTT. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 18, in the tabulation following line 10, it is proposed to strike out the numeral "4" and insert in lieu thereof "3¾."

On page 18, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the numeral "4" and insert in lieu thereof "3¾."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I have discussed this amendment with the distinguished Senator from Oregon, and he is willing to accept it and take it to conference.

Mr. MORSE. I am willing to accept it and take it to conference.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When the Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board appeared before the committee, his first notion was that 3½ percent would be sufficient. Then he had some doubts about it, but he was quite sure that 3¾ percent would be enough, particularly when the base is extended. This figure appears to be agreeable to all concerned, and we can take it to conference without further discussion.

Mr. MORSE. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield half a minute to a very able Member of our committee, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, for 2½ years I have had the honor of serving as a member of the Subcommittee on Railroad Retirement under the leadership of the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE].

We have held many weeks of hearings on the bill. I believe we have a bill which is actuarially sound, and one which will correct many inequities in the Railroad Retirement Act.

I wish to pay tribute to the senior Senator from Oregon for his fairness, for his patience, and for his vast knowledge of the subject, which has enabled us, after almost 2½ years, to come before the Senate with a bill which I believe will be unanimously accepted.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky was chairman of the subcommittee under a Republican Congress, and my predecessor. I could not have brought this bill to the Senate without his great knowledge and cooperation. That statement is true of every member of the subcommittee. No chairman of a subcommittee could possibly have had a subcommittee which would work more cooperatively than did this subcommittee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am very happy that the bill has been brought before the Senate. I congratulate the Senator from Oregon for the fine work he has done in the subcommittee and in the full committee, as well as on the floor of the Senate, in expediting the consideration of the legislation.

I commend the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Illinois for the contribution they have made in this field. I believe that this legislation will benefit a number of worthy people who need the assistance, and I am delighted that we can pass the bill this afternoon without prolonged debate, and I trust without a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the people of my State have been active in connection with this bill. I wish to compliment the committee for the fine work it has done. I particularly wish to pay tribute to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], as well as to the legislative representative of the brotherhoods, Walter Monroe, and men of that type, who have spent hours explaining the bill to us. I believe the president of one of the brotherhoods, J. Park Kennedy, traveled all over the United States speaking on this subject. He deserves a great deal of credit. The bill is a result of a fine job of cooperation.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the minority leader yield 1 minute to the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL]?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I gladly yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. CARROLL. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Oregon and his colleagues for their excellent work in connection with the bill. I am happy to join in sponsoring the bill to improve the railroad retirement compensation. An increase in railroad retirement benefits is long overdue, and will enable railroad workers to deal more effectively with the high cost of living and the extension of unemployment benefits gives recognition to the serious unemployment situation which exists in the railroad industry today.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the minority leader yield briefly to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I commend the senior Senator from Oregon for bringing the bill to the floor of the Senate. The increase provided by the bill is needed in order to keep up with the cost of living.

In the Government we have already done what is being done here today, which is no more than right and just. We regret that we cannot do more, but we realize that in connection with retirement systems, we cannot go too far, for if we do, it results in harm in the other direction.

I am glad to join the Senator from Oregon today in doing what I consider to be nothing more than right and just.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the bill before the Senate (S. 226), which will bring railroad retirement and unemployment insurance benefits in line with present living costs, and place both systems on a stable, self-supporting basis.

In my opinion, there should be little controversy about this bill. It corrects a number of inequities—and at no cost to the Federal Government.

Last session Congress voted retirement increases both for social security beneficiaries and retired civil service employees. The bill intended to give retired railroad workers a few more dollars to meet today's soaring living costs was passed by the Senate but died in the House. Enactment of the measure before us today by both Houses will give to those workers who have devoted their lives to the railroad industry the same consideration already given to other groups.

The improvements in the insurance system will be especially helpful in these times of high railroad unemployment. Technical changes and changes in methods of operation are displacing thousands of veteran railroad workers with 10, 20, and even 30 years of service, and many of them are finding it impossible to locate work in other fields.

Since the bill calls for an increase in payroll taxes on both employers and employees, the question naturally arises as to how it would affect the financial status of the railroads. I realize that additional expense to any business requires readjustments, but there is every indication that the taxes required by this measure would not put too heavy a burden on the railroad industry. The railroads have made a strong recovery from the 1957 and 1958 recession, and their financial condition is now reported to be good.

I am naturally most concerned about the condition of western railroads, so I have studied with interest the month-by-month financial statements for three of them—Southern Pacific, Western Pacific, and Union Pacific, which show gross earnings for the years 1957 and 1958. The figures were taken from reports made by the carriers to the California Public Utilities Commission. They show railroad income at a substantial level, and rising in the last half of 1958—a rise which I am told unofficially is continuing in 1959. I ask unanimous consent to have these statements placed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, the bill before us has the endorsement of the 23 standard railway labor organizations. It was reported by the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee by a vote of 14 to 1, with 1 member voting present. For several years delegates to railway labor conventions have voted overwhelmingly for the added protection this legislation would give to retired, unemployed, and ill railroad workers and their families.

The railway labor organizations of my State of Utah, and hundreds of their members, are strongly supporting it. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point a cross-section of the letters I have received from organizations and individuals in my State in support of this bill.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RETIRED AND VETERAN RAILWAY EMPLOYEES,
UNIT NO. 77,
Salt Lake City, Utah, January 20, 1959.

Senator F. E. MOSS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Members of the National Association of Retired and Veteran Railway Employees are very proud of the progressive action you have taken in connection with bills H.R. 1012 and H.R. 1013 to improve the Railroad Retirement Act and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act and your cosponsorship of S. 226.

The increase in retirement benefits will greatly assist retired workers and their families in meeting the high cost of living, the majority of pensioners and disability annuitants are in the low pension brackets and in need of these additional benefits. We also hope any increase will be made retroactive to January 1, 1959.

Best wishes to you for a happy and prosperous new year.

Very truly yours,

JAMES M. WELLS,
Secretary-Treasurer.

UTAH STATE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CLERKS, FREIGHT HANDLERS, EXPRESS AND STATION EMPLOYEES,
Salt Lake City, Utah, February 12, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing this short letter to thank you for the help that you are giving to pass Senate bill 226, and House bill 1012.

I am sure that you appreciate the necessity for the passage of this legislation and the beneficial results to be obtained therefrom.

Sincerely yours,

L. M. RUSK,
Chairman.

UTAH STATE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
ORDER OF RAILWAY CONDUCTORS AND BRAKEMEN,
Salt Lake City, Utah, February 14, 1959.

Senator FRANK E. MOSS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOSS: I have contacted a large number of our membership here in Utah, and I earnestly request your active interest to Senate bill 226.

I am sure your support of this measure will be greatly appreciated by your constituents here in Utah.

With very best personal regards.

Very truly yours,

E. J. KEMPTON,
Secretary and Treasurer.

BROTHERHOOD RAILWAY CARMEN OF AMERICA,
MOUNT BEN LOMOND LODGE NO. 548,
Ogden, Utah, February 10, 1959.

Hon. Frank E. Moss,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Legislation sponsored by the standard railway labor organizations to improve the railroad retirement and railroad unemployment insurance benefits, has been introduced at this session of the Congress.

Of special importance is the program of extended unemployment insurance benefits, which are needed particularly at this time since unemployment in the railroad industry is the highest in many years and a substantial number of railroad workers have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits.

At our last regular monthly meeting a motion was made and passed unanimously that we write to you asking for your favorable consideration and support to S. 226 now before the Congress.

Thanking you for your past support.

Sincerely yours,

BLAINE W. ROUNDS,
Recording Secretary.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, February 14, 1959.

Senator FRANK MOSS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I have been instructed by Local 999 of Fireman and Oilers Union which represents some employees of the Union Pacific Railroad to write and advise you of our views on the Honorable WAYNE MORSE bill (S. 226) which is before the Senate now.

We are deeply concerned with the welfare of our members and are aware of the good this bill can do to help members who are pensioned or unemployed. We as a group feel that this bill is a great step toward a better future for the people and the railroadman.

We urge you to give careful consideration and support to this bill.

Thank you,

JAMES A. NEWBOLD,
Recording Secretary.

RAILROAD YARDMASTERS OF AMERICA,
GENERAL GRIEVANCE COMMITTEE,
UNION PACIFIC SYSTEM,
Salt Lake City, Utah, February 21, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOSS: On behalf of the employees of the Union Pacific Railroad Co., represented by this organization, we urgently request that you vote for S. 226, a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act, Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Yours truly,

W. A. SNYDER,
General Chairman.

SHEET METAL WORKERS' INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION,
LOCAL UNION NO. 92,
Salt Lake City, Utah, February 23, 1959.

Senator FRANK E. MOSS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOSS: In behalf of the Sheet Metal Workers Local No. 92, we endorse Senate bill 226, to amend Railroad Retirement Act, Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

We believe that, with so many of our railroad workers who have been working for many years, who now are being furloughed, and their age being a handicap to gain other employment, that the passage of this bill is necessary.

Hoping that you will take this into serious consideration, I remain

Very truly yours,

THOMAS H. WILLIAMS,
Recording Secretary.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CLERKS,
FREIGHT HANDLERS, EXPRESS, AND STATION EMPLOYEES,
GOLDEN SPIKE LODGE NO. 926,
Roy, Utah, March 3, 1959.

Senator FRANK MOSS,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOSS: By directive of the unanimous vote of the members present at the last regular meeting of the above lodge, your attention is called to Senate bill 226, which provides for certain amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act and the Railroad Retirement Tax Act.

We urgently request that you give this bill the benefit of your active support and favorable vote, as opportunities arise for you to do so.

Sincerely and fraternally,

UDELL F. KEARL,
Secretary-Treasurer.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CLERKS,
FREIGHT HANDLERS, EXPRESS, AND STATION EMPLOYEES,
SYSTEM BOARD OF ADJUSTMENT NO. 83,
Ogden, Utah, March 18, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
U.S. Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Before the Congress of the United States are companion bills, H.R. 1012 and S. 226, designed to amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act in such manner as to extend the benefits and provisions of this legislation to a more equitable basis with current economic conditions and, at the same time, to wipe out the deficit occurring under the present unusually heavy demands on the system.

The members of this organization (the largest of all standard railroad labor organizations), comprising a substantial block of your constituency, are the beneficiaries of these acts, and, as such, contribute to the well being of our State and our local economy.

We urge your serious consideration of this legislation and we call upon you to assist with the passage of Senate bill S. 226 in every way possible.

Your advice of the status of this legislation and your comments will be appreciated.

Yours very truly,

LLOYD C. MURDOCK,
General Chairman.

BROTHERHOOD OF RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP CLERKS,
FREIGHT HANDLERS, EXPRESS AND STATION EMPLOYEES,
RAILWAY EXPRESSMEN'S LODGE 2018,
Salt Lake City, Utah, March 23, 1959.

Senator FRANK E. MOSS,
Washington, D.C.

HONORABLE SENATOR: We understand Senate bill S. 226 will be up for consideration soon. As legislative representative of Express Lodge 2018 it is desired that you give your support to the enactment of this legislation thereby giving railroad and express workers and their families fair treatment.

We also thank you for anything you do to help pass this measure.

Very truly yours,

G. K. JENSEN,
Legislative Representative.

BOUNTIFUL, UTAH, March 24, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
U.S. Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing in regard to proposed bills H.R. 1012 and S. 226 pertaining to increased benefits of the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance.

I have before me the benefits and costs of these proposed bills. I have contacted a number of my fellow workers and they are of the same opinion as myself. The increase of 10 percent in annuities is needed very badly. The retired people are in a terrible squeeze, as you are fully aware of, in this mounting inflationary whirl. I am not speaking for myself at the present time as I am only 48 years old and all of this setup may change before I ever reach retirement age. The increase to us working in the railroad industry, so far as the additional costs are concerned, is small. I say this from the standpoint that we are all faced with the outlook of getting old and needing some sort of help.

In closing I urge you gentlemen to adopt these bills and reject the proposals of bill S. 987 as sponsored by railroad management. Those of us working can well afford the increase in costs and according to the profits of the railroads, they can afford the increase also.

Very truly yours,

GLENN E. FOX.

MORONI, UTAH, March 10, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing to ask that you do everything possible to support Senate bill 226 and H.R. 1012 now being heard in Washington, D.C., by the Labor and Public Welfare Committee of the U.S. Senate and by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives. It would require each railroad employee to pay an additional tax on $400 rather than on the present $350 per month of his earnings.

Although I am just a railroad employee I believe this to be a good measure because it will also allow an increase in the annuity payments when we retire. This small increase at the present time is worth it and can be met while we have the ability to earn. Thank you.

Sincerely yours,

F. A. CHRYST.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, March 5, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. MOSS: From May, 1917, to October 1949, I was an employee of the Union Pacific Railroad in its special agents' department. In October 1949, I was elected to the office of full time president of the Railway Patrolmen's International Union, AFL–CIO, which office I held till October 1956 at which time I retired, age 68. It goes without saying that both the wife and I are particularly interested in the enactment of amendments to bring equity and fair treatment to retired railroad workers, and the purpose of this letter is to remind you, though I doubt whether reminding is needed, not to overlook giving your serious consideration and your able support to the enactment of pending Senate bill 226, for which, we assure you, we shall deem ourselves deeply indebted to you.

From the time of enactment of the Railroad Retirement Act till the time of my retirement, to assist in financing this retirement program, deductions were withheld monthly from my paychecks. It should therefore be kept in mind that this program, including amendments contained in Senate bill 226, is self-financing, operating without Federal subsidy of any kind.

Again thanking you for this as well as for past considerations.

Respectfully and sincerely yours,

CULBERT BOWEN.
JEAN A. BOWEN.

MILFORD, UTAH, April 12, 1959.

Hon. FRANK E. MOSS,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. MOSS: I am taking this opportunity to ask your support of H.R. 1012, which provides for increased railroad retirement benefits. As a retired railroad man I find it increasingly harder to meet my actual needs on what I get.

In these times of extremely high costs of living, people working for a living get raises in wages, many on escalator clauses of their agreements with their employers, based on the cost of living increases. Nothing has been done for us that have retired.

Hoping that you will take this request into consideration, I am

Respectfully yours,

E. G. WALKER.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, in conclusion, I point out that the railroad industry and its workers are essential to a healthy national economy and a strong national defense. I hope this bill to strengthen the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance system will pass without any delay.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the bill is passed the Secretary of the Senate may be authorized to make clerical and technical corrections in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I merely wish to say that last year I was a member of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee.

Mr. MORSE. Before the Senator says another thing I should like to say something. He was a member of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee, and a very helpful member. Let me tell the Senate, without employing the colloquialism I was about to use, that what he kept pressing upon me as did the Senator from Colorado also, was the question, Is this bill actually sound? Do we have a sound bill? He was very helpful in getting agreement among all concerned so that we now have a bill which is actuarially sound.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to commend the senior Senator from Oregon for his hard and intelligent work on the bill. I am pleased that it has been possible to bring out an actuarially sound bill, a bill which will be of benefit to all concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be offered, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to table was agreed to.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY AMERICANS OF UKRAINIAN DESCENT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement prepared by me in connection with some resolutions adopted by Americans of Ukrainian descent. I also ask unanimous consent that the resolutions, dealing with our relations with the Soviet Union, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement and resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

Over the Washington Birthday weekend the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America held its Seventh Triennial Congress of Americans of Ukrainian Descent at the Statler Hilton Hotel in Washington, D.C. The Ukrainian Congress Committee of America is the national organization which unites all American groups and organizations of Ukrainian ancestry. It represents about 2½ million American citizens with certain well-founded thoughts and sentiments toward Eastern Europe and Russian Communist imperialism.

This national organization is led by Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, its national chairman, and also a professor of economics at Georgetown University. It has been my pleasure for many years to know the activities of this organization in behalf of our national security interests. The work of its membership in Chicago, under the able leadership of Mr. John Duzansky, president of the League of Americans of Ukrainian Descent, has always been of particular interest to me.

The Seventh Congress of Americans of Ukrainian Descent unanimously passed a body of resolutions dealing with U.S. foreign policy. These resolutions are of particular importance to all Americans who closely follow U.S. relations with the Soviet Union. Needless to say, they are deserving of the studied interest of all Members of Congress. I request that these resolutions be printed in full.

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICANS OF UKRAINIAN DESCENT AT SEVENTH TRIENNIAL CONGRESS, FEBRUARY 21–23, 1959, WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Seventh Congress of Americans of Ukrainian Descent, representing all the social, political, and scientific forces of the Ukrainian-American community, gathered on the birthday of George Washington and also in the month of the anniversary of one of the greatest statesmen of this country, Abraham Lincoln, unanimously decided:

1. In the years between the sixth and seventh congress (1955–59), the tension between the Russian Empire and the free world, headed by the United States of America, has not diminished;

2. The Bolshevik leaders of the U.S.S.R., having somehow alleviated their internal crisis in the empire, have directed the Bolshevik aggression against Western Europe, demanding from the governments of the free world freedom to transform Western Berlin into a Russian springboard for the conquest of Western Europe;

Simultaneously Moscow, wearing an anti-colonial mantle, is instigating among the Asian and African peoples, endeavoring to conquer them by masking its Russian colonialism with international communism;

3. By negotiating with respect to coexistence and economic competition between the United States and the Soviet Russian imperialist tyranny, which tactics Moscow interjects constantly, the free world will not succeed in averting the final onslaught on freedom by bolshevism. The smallest concession in the Berlin matter will be a repetition of the Munich of 1938, which led to the outbreak of World War II;

4. Taking this into consideration, the Congress calls to the attention of the U.S. Government the fact that all support and attempts to preserve a great and indivisible Russia is a great error which the imperialist strategists of the Kremlin are utilizing in their struggle against the free world and for the enslavement of peoples and countries. We are convinced that Bolshevik aggression can only be stopped by the resolute stand of the United States of America in cooperation with and support of the peoples and nations enslaved by Russia. We are convinced again that only a full recognition of the natural right to national and political independence of the enslaved nations by Russia in various times—especially when in 1917 these nations, through their national revolutions, attained their national independence and sovereignty—could provide the basis for a successful policy and struggle against bolshevism.

5. Therefore, we are certain that the aggression of the U.S.S.R. should be answered by a most decisive counteraction of the United States of America and other free governments of the world, including the eventual breaking off of diplomatic relations with the U.S.S.R., and at the same time a clarifying of the policy and stand with respect to the aspirations of the nations enslaved by Moscow, aspirations to freedom and independence, which aspirations are based on the principles of the American Declaration of Independence;

6. The Congress believes that in the present cold war and with regard to the Soviet Russian aggressions which began immediately after World War II, a dynamic policy of liberation with respect to the nations enslaved by Russia will strengthen the power and prestige of the United States in the world, while planned and consequential policy of supporting the enslaved nations in their struggle for independence could solely oppose the traditional imperialist policy of Moscow in creating new nuclei of unrest and blackmail in the world;

7. In accordance with this approach we should deepen our understanding not only of the Russians, but of the non-Russian peoples, who are forced to live in Soviet Russian slavery and oppression.

In order to achieve the desired objectives, a series of measures should be undertaken by the U.S. Government:

(a) With a more imaginative and dynamic policy toward the U.S.S.R., restoration and expansion of the broadcasts of the Voice of America to all the non-Russian nations of the U.S.S.R. The recent elimination of the Uzbek language of the Voice of America system, as well as the curtailment of the Estonian, Latvian, Lithuanian and Ukrainian broadcasts of the Voice of America, constituted an irreparable blow to American prestige and leadership, and indirectly helped Moscow strengthen its grip over the enslaved non-Russian nations;

(b) Publication of the USIA magazine Amerika not only in the Russian language, but in the languages of other republics of the U.S.S.R., especially the Ukrainian language. Such initiative would remove the suspicion that the U.S. Government is sanctioning the Russification policy of Moscow with respect to the non-Russian nations within the U.S.S.R.;

(c) Furthermore, to support, both morally and materially, legislation providing for the erection of a statue of Taras Shevchenko, Ukraine's greatest national poet, in Washington, as tribute for his work in the cause of freedom on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of his death in 1961;

8. Intercession on the part of the Government of the United States of America with the Soviet Government in the matter of restoration of religious freedom in the U.S.S.R., especially, the full restoration to freedom of the Ukrainian Autocephalic Orthodox Church and the Ukrainian Catholic Church, both of which were ruthlessly destroyed, their hierarchs and clergy and faithful either imprisoned or destroyed, and as a result of which the Ukrainian churches were driven underground;

9. Opposition to any peaceful coexistence policy which serves only the present Russian Communist leadership as a means to disarm the West and thus enslave it piecemeal.

In this respect we support the recent report of the American Bar Association which stresses that only the alternative to a surrendering peaceful coexistence is not world war III, but a reasonable course of action which would check Moscow in its traditional policy of creating sore spots in various parts of the world and capitalizing upon them by threatening the neutral and noncommitted nations with atomic destruction.

10. In view of the confessions of genocide made by Nikita S. Khrushchev at the XXth Congress of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union in February 1956, ratification by the U.S. Senate of the Genocide Convention, and an investigation on the part of the United Nations into the crimes of genocide committed by the U.S.S.R. since 1917;

11. Display of sympathetic understanding on the part of the U.S. Government to the cause of liberation of the nations enslaved by Moscow, and to their aspirations to independence. This would embrace the understanding that the U.S.S.R. is not Russia, and that not all the inhabitants of the Soviet Union are Russians. On the contrary, more than 50 percent of the population of the Soviet Union consists of the enslaved and conquered non-Russian nations, which are waging an undying struggle against the Russian enslaver;

12. We note with indignation that the imperialistic policy of the U.S.S.R. has found moral support among the Russian emigres in the United States, in the form of an ultimatum of 23 Russian organizations, which, at their meeting on August 2, 1958, appealed to President Eisenhower of the United States not to support the natural liberation struggle of the peoples enslaved in the Russian empire, calling such process a "dismemberment of Russia," and threatening that unless the United States withdraws its support of the enslaved peoples, "the Russian people will defend the Soviet Government."

13. To express gratitude to Governors and State governments and to mayors of cities who, understanding the struggle of the Ukrainian people for freedom, statehood, and independence, proclaimed January 22 as Ukrainian Independence Day to commemorate the 41st anniversary of Ukrainian independence.

Likewise, the Seventh Congress of Americans of Ukrainian Descent expresses gratitude to many U.S. Senators and Congressmen for their statements and declarations made on that day in Congress.

It unanimously supports the Bush-Javits resolution, which would have the U.S. Government permanently proclaim January 22 as Ukrainian Independence Day to be observed throughout the country;

14. Because at this time the AFL–CIO, especially under its president, George Meany, conducts a brave and courageous policy with respect to Russian imperialism and against its slave system and defends the right of Ukraine and other enslaved nations to full liberation, the Seventh Congress of Americans of Ukrainian Descent unanimously decides to express its support of the stand of the AFL–CIO and its president George Meany and recommends to the new executive board of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America to maintain constant relations with this organization and its leaders, who represent the true conscience of the labor movement of America.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Senate of the possibility that when we conclude consideration of the supplemental appropriation bill, we may proceed to the consideration of the following measures, but not necessarily in the order in which I list them:

Calendar No. 143, S. 994, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain the Spokane Valley project, Washington and Idaho under Federal reclamation laws.

Calendar No. 145, H.R. 3293, to authorize the construction of modern naval vessels.

Calendar No. 174, S. 455, to provide for the appointment of an assistant to the Secretary of State to assure joint policy and planning and equitable budgeting of exchange of persons programs and administrative cooperation between staffs engaged in carrying out such programs.

Calendar No. 175, H. Con. Res. 34, favoring the meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentary Conference for 1959 in Washington, D.C.

Calendar No. 182, S. 753, to authorize cooperative associations of milk producers to bargain with purchasers singly or in groups and for other purposes.

Calendar No. 183, S. 690, to provide for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes.

Calendar No. 184, S. 1289, to increase and extend the special milk program for children.

Calendar No. 185, S. 1120, to amend section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act with respect to the reserves required to be maintained by member banks of the Federal Reserve System against deposits.

Calendar No. 186, S. 1062, to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide safeguards against mergers and consolidations of banks which might lessen competition unduly or tend unduly to create a monopoly in the field of banking.

Calendar No. 195, Senate Resolution 96, favoring an international agreement for a suspension of nuclear weapon tests.

Calendar No. 206, S. 1434, to amend title XI of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, with respect to insurance of ship mortgages, and for other purposes. That bill will be held up for a few days at the request of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS], who needs some additional information.

It is possible that any or all of these bills may be brought up on motion when we conclude the consideration of the supplemental appropriation bill.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10:30 O'CLOCK TOMORROW MORNING

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 10:30 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5916), making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, my amendment calls for the elimination of the added appropriation of $4 million which the Architect of the Capitol is insisting upon for the new subway.

I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the chairman of the committee, for making available in the well of the Chamber the map showing the old subway and the new subway. I may say I have inspected the new subway on foot and in great detail, so I think I know what I am talking about.

A few facts are very important, namely, that $2,103,729 has already been spent on the new subway. An additional sum of $246,000 has already been appropriated for it, so the subway, as it has been constructed to date, will cost $2,349,000, or roughly $2,350,000.

Now it is proposed to spend $4 million more, or a total of $6,250,000.

I shall indicate on the map some of the details of the subway construction. While the subway was being constructed, I had expected, and I think almost everyone else had expected, that it would join the existing subway at some point and that the two would have a joint terminus. To my amazement, when I went down into the subway yesterday morning, I found that this is not the case. The subway runs under the Capitol grounds and then stops directly facing the Senate wing of the Capitol. A spur was constructed from the rotunda in the basement of the Old Senate Office Building to run into the new subway line, so that the new subway from the old office building is made a subsidiary of the new subway. It becomes 4 tracks from that point. I do not know what will happen to the present subway but obviously it will be rendered useless.

Then the plans call for the extension of the new subway from its present dead end to underneath the steps of the Senate wing; and in the process of that construction the steps of the Senate are to be torn down, the walls reconstructed, and a new terminal built, which will rival the Moscow subway, according to the plans which I have seen. The present subway will then be left all alone. I do not know what it will be used for. It will simply be a hole in the ground, and there will be two subways, more or less, side by side.

What are the arguments for the proposed construction? One argument is that it will save steps; that Senators coming out underneath the present Senate stairs can move directly into the elevator and come up into the Capitol Building. How many steps will this save as compared with the distance from the present terminal? I paced off the distance yesterday and found it will save 50 steps.

As a general rule, I think it is good for us to walk. Exercise is one of the things we Senators normally miss. To spend $4 million in order to save 50 steps, at a cost of $80,000 a step—steps which we should take anyway—seems to me somewhat exorbitant.

It is said that the steps outside the Senate wing will fall down some day and that they had better be repaired now. I do not know whether that is the case. I should like to see a very thorough engineering report before we commit ourselves.

The point I wish to make can be stated very briefly. I think the Architect has exceeded his authority. Instead of making it possible to join the two subways at a common terminal, he has proceeded according to an entirely different plan. Now he virtually faces us with an accomplished fact and, in effect, says: "You must go through with this plan, or else all the new construction will go to waste."

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Why was the new subway brought to such an awkward and unusable state?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I cannot speculate as to that. I think it has been a great blunder. If I may be brutal, I think the Architect may have done it by accident or design in order to confront us with the fact that, since it was obviously incomplete, and ended in a blank wall, we would have to give him more money to finish it.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from Illinois state the cost of the part of the subway which has been completed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Two million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The Senator from Ohio has touched on a very good point.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What will be the cost of this unfinished segment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Four million dollars. In other words, it will cost almost twice as much to finish it as it has cost to construct this whole area.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Has the Senator from Illinois ever been acquainted, until recently, with the fact that the new subway ended in this unusable, awkward manner?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. Perhaps I assumed too much; I assumed, as the subway was being built, that it would curve in, and would join the existing subway, and that the two would have a common terminal—that we would be able to use the old subway in going to the Old Senate Office Building, and would be able to use the new subway in going to the New Senate Office Building, and that the two subways would share a common terminal. But, instead, we find that it is proposed to scrap the old subway; and we are told that the new subway must have a new approach to the Senate wing.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Am I correct in understanding that the new subway which has been constructed, and which has generally been regarded as the means of conveyance from the New Senate Office Building to the Capitol, has cost in excess of $2 million?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, $2,350,000.

Mr. LAUSCHE. And now we are confronted with the proposition that in order to finish it, we must spend $4 million more?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. That is what I am trying to eliminate. Something must be done to cure this architectural bungle; that is perfectly true.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. I do not intend to engage in general debate at this point. But before we leave in the RECORD a charge of willfulness on the part of the Architect—a man whom I hardly know—or of willfully putting the Senate in a hole in connection with this matter, so that we would have to give him more money——

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I said "willful," I withdraw the word, I say it was either by accident or by design.

Mr. STENNIS. Does not the Senator from Illinois know that this situation was brought about by the Senate itself, in abandoning the original plans for the east wing of the Capitol, and in leaving out of those plans the garage feature, of which the entrance at this particular point is a part? Is that not correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Now the Senator from Mississippi is coming to a very vital point. I think the Architect of the Capitol, who has large and expensive designs, wants an underground garage constructed; and I think he wants the terminal to be built at this point, and wants to tear down the existing Senate steps and to reconstruct the walls, as a partial step toward the construction of an underground garage. This is one of the things about his policy to which I object—namely, that he would commit us to one appropriation which can be justified only if we take a second step; and then, if we take the second step, he says we must proceed to the third step.

Mr. STENNIS. I understand that the Senator from Illinois withdraws any charge or implication of "willful."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; I do.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I am not a member of the Building Commission. I am a member of the legislative appropriations subcommittee, of which the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] was the chairman last year. It is my understanding—I say this in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Ohio of the Senator from Illinois—that the old subway tunnel, which is shown on the left in the plan which now is displayed in the Chamber, is to be used for general utility purposes and storage purposes, and not for a subway; and I understand that the new subway has been built as far as it has under the direction of the Commission, under whose direction the New Senate Office Building was constructed, and that the new subway was built by using part of the funds which were appropriated for construction of the New Senate Office Building.

As will be recalled, last summer we had a long debate in regard to extending the east front of the Capitol. The completion of the subway was to be a part of the work on the east front of the Capitol, together with the proposed underground garage which the Senator from Mississippi has just now described. When we finally passed the measure, it called for the work on the east front of the Capitol; and the garage feature was given up, and no funds for it were ever included.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. So no funds have been appropriated for completion of the tunnel which we are now asked to complete.

I also understand that if the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Illinois will turn to page 38 of the supplemental bill, they will see a breakdown of the $4 million. I understand that some of that money—not a great part of it—is to be used to restore the steps, which now are in bad shape. That situation has been discovered, and at some time or other it must be corrected.

So I would say to the Senator from Illinois, whom I know is very sincere in his efforts to reduce expenditures, that the east front of the Capitol is being constructed under the supervision of the Commission, and the New Senate Office Building was built under the supervision of another Commission. The New Senate Office Building has been completed, and this part of the tunnel has been completed.

The plans in connection with the east front were changed at the last moment, some time last August; and the garage part was omitted. Consequently, no funds were appropriated to finish the tunnel or to have it extended. That is why I voted, in the committee, for the $4 million item, which includes $325,000 for reconstruction of the Senate wing steps.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that my good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, states that there is no authorization for an underground garage.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. That is my understanding. It was eliminated last year.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If there is no authorization for an underground garage, then there is no moral obligation upon us—unless we approve an item for an underground garage—to vote to extend the subway, so as to facilitate construction of an underground garage in the future.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Except that we now have a tunnel which ends in a blank wall, and all Senators who come to the Senate from the New Senate Office Building will have to walk underneath and come over to the old tunnel.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the point I make—namely, that—whether by accident or by design—the Architect has confronted us with a situation in which we face a blank wall, instead of making a connection—which would be very easy—with the existing subway, at a common terminal. So he has gotten us into an apparently impossible position.

I am suggesting that we not vote for this appropriation at this time, but that it be studied, and that we let public opinion play on this situation for a time, and see whether we can work out an arrangement, so that, instead of tearing everything to pieces, we can join the two tunnels at the present terminal, even though that would cause us to walk 50 extra steps.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for an explanation?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The map which is displayed in the Chamber shows a double line coming to the "Y." As I understand, the present subway terminal is not large enough to accommodate a turn around for both.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It could be made large enough. It has been proposed that we spend $4 million to extend this one about 200 feet. It is perfectly true that probably more money will be needed; but I doubt seriously whether $4 million is needed.

My motion is to postpone this item, and to let it be studied, and to let more detailed recommendations be brought in.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. The Senator from Illinois has called our attention to a matter which I believe should be thoroughly examined by the Senate before it votes on this item. The Senator from Illinois has said that the Architect, either by accident or by design, has gotten us into this position. Do I correctly understand that the Architect devised this plan without consulting the Building Commission? There is a Building Commission. Did the Building Commission approve the change; or was the change made without approval by the Building Commission? That is an important question which should be answered. The Senate as well as the Architect has some responsibility on this fiasco and I want to hear from the Building Committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not a member of the Commission, and I cannot speak to that point.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I am a member of the Building Commission and I have been for the last 2 months. So at least that will spare me from the wrath of my friend, the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have no wrath against anyone.

Mr. ALLOTT. As I understand the situation, it is as the Senator from Massachusetts has said.

The part shown in white on the map, on the farther side of the street from the Capitol steps, has been constructed or substantially constructed now for several months.

When this matter came before the Building Commission and also before the Appropriations Committee, it was discussed at great length.

There is one situation which I believe should be brought out here: In the committee we had numerous photographs of the area under the east steps of the Senate wing. The photographs show—as was observed by those who examined them—that the substructure there has cracked very badly, and is in danger of collapsing.

That is not true of the steps on the House side. Apparently, at some time there was a subterranean leakage of pipes or sewers, which, over a period of years, have completely cracked the foundations, and before long a reconstruction of that structure will be necessary.

When the Architect appeared before the Appropriations Committee, he stated that the steps, in any case, would have to be redone. These steps are marble.

Page 38 of the report states that the existing granite steps should be replaced with marble steps. That is an error and the words should be reversed. The present marble steps should be replaced with granite steps. I think the report should be corrected to that extent.

I hold in my hand some of the numerous pictures which were given to us by the Architect, which show large cracks in the understructure of the steps, and which will have to be repaired. The Architect said it would have to be done some time.

So far as concerns what was originally contemplated for the subway, I cannot add anything to the discussion except to say it was always my undersanding that the present subway would have to be abandoned because of the very high cost of operating and maintaining the present cars, and that there would be a branch off the Old Senate Office Building which would come into a common tunnel.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If my friend from Colorado will look at the breakdown of the estimate of expenses as it appears on page 1186 of the hearings, he will find that the estimate for the demolition and reconstruction of the Senate wing east steps is $325,000 out of a total estimate of $4 million. The major cost of the work is for structural work; general finish work; relocation of water, sewer, and steam lines, sprinkler and drainage systems; mechanical work, air-conditioning and heating; electrical work, lighting, power, trolley extension, signal system, and other miscellaneous work; architectural and engineering fees, administrative, and contingencies.

Mr. ALLOTT. May I call to the Senator's attention the first item in the breakdown? As I have said, I cannot throw any light on the subject. I do not know whether it was originally intended that the two tunnels would meet at a juncture with the old subway, or whether it was intended to have the subway end under the Capitol steps. However, it will be seen that $2½ million of the total $4 million is for structural work, such as sheet piling, excavations, foundations, concrete floors, walls and roof, which I assume would be necessary for the tunnel work. Another item is for underpinning the east wall of the Senate wing of the Capitol.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Part of it is for the extension of the tunnel, but part of it also is for a very elaborate new terminal. In this connection, I think the $2,350,000 to bring the tunnel to the point I indicate is quite high, but to spend $4 million to bring it another 200 feet is, I think, excessive.

Mr. President, I have no desire to continue to hold the floor on this matter.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am not a member of the Building Commission, and never have been, but I wanted to inquire as to whether or not the projection to which I now point, from the contemplated new tunnel to the old tunnel, is part of the plan.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The symbols indicate that we would have to walk from the point I indicate to the point where I am now pointing.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am indicating the terminus of the proposed "Y" subway construction. If this portion were to be used, Members would take cars from the point which I now indicate and proceed in this manner, and then possibly walk from this point——

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; they would not walk.

Mr. HENNINGS. How would they get there?

Mr. DOUGLAS. More dirt could be excavated from this point to get a bend in the line, as is true of the present subway, and they could join.

Mr. HENNINGS. Of course, that would involve an engineering problem.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not an engineer, of course, but I think it is fairly obvious it could be done.

Mr. HENNINGS. The link is not here at the present time; it is indicated on the diagram.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is the link constructed?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Reference was made to the fact that plans for the garage were abandoned. The word "abandoned" may be technically correct, but it is my understanding that some of the underpinning going into the terminal will be constructed in such a manner that if a garage is ever authorized, it will not be necessary to have a new excavation, and that the present excavation can be used if a garage is constructed. As the Senator knows, plans for the garage were abandoned last summer in the bill.

Since I discussed the matter previously with the Senator, I have been informed that the new tunnel was started before the Architect knew the garage was not to be built. Therefore, the tunnel was designed to save money, so that it would not go through the garage. Then it was decided to abandon plans for the garage.

Mr. DOUGLAS. You say the Architect drew the plans and started carrying out the plans before he knew the garage was not to be constructed, and has made no change in construction plans, even though he has had since last summer to change the plans, and has proceeded until he has brought us up against a blank wall. It seems to me the Architect ought to know what the Senate has decided to do, and that he should not live in complete ignorance of the facts of life.

Mr. President, I think thus far the discussion has been taken out of my time, but I think at least half the actual time has been taken by other Senators. I wonder if the Senator from Arizona is willing to have the time taken up to the present time charged equally to both sides. Then I shall be glad to yield.

May I ask the Chair how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has 1 minute remaining to him.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, a half hour to each side was allocated. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HAYDEN. Suppose we agree that the Senator from Illinois may have 10 minutes to close.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Very good.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I notice that the chairman of the building committee is on the floor. I should like to have an answer to one question. Were these plans changed from the original specifications? If so, were they changed with or without the approval of the building committee?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I also have another question: Were the plans changed when the plans for a garage were abandoned, or did they continue?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. That is correct; and whether or not the Architect proceeded on his own or whether it was done with the full approval or instructions of the building committee. There is a Senate building committee. I think we have a right to know the answer to that question. I wonder if the chairman would furnish us with that information. Who is responsible?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Please do not invite the building committee to bail out the Architect.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I am not excusing anyone; but we have a committee of the Senate which was in charge of the building. As members of that committee, they cannot shirk their responsibility. A serious question has been raised. Perhaps the Architect exceeded his authority. If so, we should know it. I think the Members of the Senate have a right to know whether this was done over the objection of or with the approval of the committee.

Certainly someone can answer this question.

I am in favor of holding up these appropriations until full responsibility has been established.

Mr. HAYDEN. I should like to point out that the authorization for the "Extension of the Capitol Project" is carried in the Legislative Appropriation Act, 1956, Public Law 242, August 5, 1955, 84th Congress, as amended by Public Law 406, 84th Congress. Public Law 242 provides for the extension, reconstruction, and replacement of the central portion of the Capitol in substantial accordance with an approved architectural plan, but "with such modifications and additions, including provisions for restaurant facilities, and such other facilities in the Capitol Grounds, together with utilities, equipment, approaches and other appurtenant or necessary items, as may be approved by said Commission.

That is the authority.

On March 25, 1959, the Commission addressed a letter to Mr. Stewart, the Architect of the Capitol, as follows:

> Pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 242, 84th Congress, as amended by Public Law 406, 84th Congress—
>
> You are hereby authorized and directed to submit to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, for consideration for inclusion in the Second Supplemental Appropriation Bill, 1959, an estimate of appropriation in the amount of $4 million, for the extension of the Capitol project, to provide for the design and construction of a subway terminal for the new Senate subway system, to be located under the steps of the Senate wing of the U.S. Capitol, and extension of the new Senate subway into the Capitol Building, to be designed in such a manner as to permit of the future construction of a garage beneath the Capitol Plaza, if hereafter approved; also, the reconstruction of the steps of the Senate wing of the Capitol and their substructure, which are presently in a deteriorated condition, replacing the present marble steps with granite steps.
> Upon availability of the appropriation herein requested, you are authorized to proceed with the design and construction work, herein approved, at a cost, including architectural and engineering fees, not to exceed $4 million.

The letter is signed by SAM RAYBURN, the Speaker of the House of Representatives; RICHARD NIXON, the President of the Senate; EVERETT DIRKSEN, the minority leader of the Senate; CHARLES HALLECK, the minority leader of the House; and by the Architect. That is the Commission for the Extension of the Capitol.

In other words, we proceeded under the direction of the New Senate Office Building Commission to construct the tunnel up to this point, which we have done. The remainder of the work comes under another authority of law, directed from another authority entirely.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The Senator is correct. The Senate Office Building Commission only had authority to go as far as it went. That is now finished. The additional tunnel which is now desired is under the authority outlined by the Senator from Arizona, which is the result of the extension of the Capitol of the United States, which came under a different commission headed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Will the Senator yield for an observation?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. It is my understanding, after talking with the Office of the Architect of the Capitol, that there is one contract for all excavation work. The excavation was started at both ends of the tunnel at the same time.

Mr. HAYDEN. I should like to point out where we are now. Senators who have offices in the New Senate Office Building will have the cars in operation to this point. Those can be put in use. We have to stop right here to allow space for people to get on and off. That would mean one could not take advantage of the track going through here. There would be no advantage to that. Anyone having offices in the Old Senate Office Building would continue to use the old cars.

We will have an investment in a wider tunnel and in the cars and the tracks of the tunnel which will be absolutely useless until the work is done. If we go in here, we construct it with the idea in mind that ultimately a garage could be built in the front. That will fit right in.

There is one other item of importance, and that is the removal of the steps, for which there is provided $325,000. We could possibly go under the steps without moving them, but it would be a very expensive operation, because there would have to be some way of bearing up all the weight. I think we would save money, if we are going to come in that way, to take the steps out, and, when the work is finished, put in the new steps.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. McNAMARA. As I understand the matter, from reading the request to the Appropriations Committee, this is a bipartisan Commission?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. McNAMARA. It is set up to deal primarily with the extension of the east front of the Capitol?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct. This is a part of the extension of the east front.

Mr. McNAMARA. This bipartisan Commission has one Democrat and four Republicans? Am I correct in that, as I heard the Senator read the names?

Mr. HAYDEN. I did not inquire about politics.

Mr. McNAMARA. I am inquiring about politics, because I assumed it was a bipartisan Commission.

Should this not be charged as a part of the cost of the east front extension?

Mr. HAYDEN. It will be.

Mr. McNAMARA. It is not the building or the tunnel, but it is just a part of the extension of the east front of the Capitol?

Mr. HAYDEN. This is a charge against it.

Mr. McNAMARA. As one who has always opposed the extension of the east front of the Capitol, I think this $4 million is being unwisely spent. I thought the original sum was unwisely spent. Now the figure has gone up from $10½ million to $17 million, and does not include the furniture and refurbishing and carpets. Before, when the cost was $10½ million, we thought it was the most expensive building in the history of man so far as usable space is concerned. It is certainly exceeding that.

Mr. HAYDEN. Congress has authorized it, and this is a part of the work.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator from Delaware asked a question, and the chairman of the committee read the answer so far as the Senate Office Building Commission is concerned. I should like to read a portion of the testimony of the Architect before the committee, in which he referred to the action of the Commission on the extension of the east front of the Capitol.

The Chairman of that Commission is the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The second member is the Vice President of the United States. The third member is the minority leader of the Senate. The fourth member is the minority leader of the House of Representatives. The fifth is the Architect.

Mr. Stewart said:

> The Commission on the Extension of the Capitol * * * felt that since we are not going to proceed at this time with the construction of the proposed underground garage beneath the Capitol Plaza, they wanted to go on record that they concurred in the Senate's desire to complete their terminal so they could have the use of it soon, perhaps years in advance of the actual construction of the underground garage.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. I submit to the Senate, that is the gist of the situation now.

Both commissions knew all about this at the time and, in effect, ordered that the work be done, subject, of course, to the appropriations being provided.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. When did the Senate ever agree to carry through on an underground garage? When did the Senate ever agree to appropriate money for a terminal of this type?

Mr. HAYDEN. We are agreeing to it right now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I see—but not until now?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not until now. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. If we decide we do not want to agree to it, that is perfectly proper?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is an "if" question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In other words, we are not bound by anything which has gone before?

Mr. HAYDEN. We are taking a new and perfectly voluntary action here today.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am glad the Senator said that.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is a very solemn decision.

Mr. HAYDEN. If we do not do it, what will we have? We will have an investment in the cars and tracks and the tunnel for which we will have no use. Everyone in the New Senate Office Building will have to walk 350 feet down and up through a little "rathole."

Mr. DOUGLAS. No. That could ultimately be connected with the present tunnel.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion. If there are any more tunnels to be dug, I suggest that we get some hard rock miners from Butte, Bisbee, and the Coeur d'Alene.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, if this job were left to the miners of Montana, the connections would have been made without any difficulty whatsoever. The next time there is a program of this kind the junior Senator from Montana should be put on the committee. Then no mistake will be made.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Whether the Senate gets the money for the tunnel or not, the steps will have to be propped up.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question in my mind about that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. After seeing the lack of accuracy on the part of the Capitol Architect in the building of the tunnels, I should like to sprinkle a little salt on the idea of the Senate steps falling down. Eventually, perhaps, in 500 years, they may fall down.

Mr. CHAVEZ. They are falling down right now.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. In view of the fact that we have destroyed the traditional charm of the front of the Capitol, and have gotten into a mess over the tunnel, and in every step of the planning for the so-called improvements, might we not consider using the large auditorium in the New Senate Office Building for a Senate Chamber? Then it would not be necessary to use the Capitol at all.

Mr. HAYDEN. I cannot answer "iffy" questions.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Authorization for the extension of the Capitol project is carried in the Legislative Appropriation Act, 1956, Public Law 242, 84th Congress, as amended by Public Law 406, 84th Congress. Public Law 482 provides for the extension, reconstruction, and replacement of the central portion of the Capitol in substantial accordance with an appropriated architectural plan, but "with such modifications and additions, including provisions for restaurant facilities, and such other facilities in the Capitol Grounds, together with the utilities, equipment, approaches, and other appurtenant or necessary items, as may be approved by said commission."

So the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations are in accordance with that law.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I think it is very important for us to understand, in the light of this discussion, whether or not a tunnel, as indicated, between the new project and the present passageway, can be constructed, and if so, under what circumstances, and what would be the cost. The exhibits which I have examined seem persuasive. I am not a member of either the Commission or the committee. The photographs show large gaping cracks and very serious deterioration in the building. I am not a construction engineer or an architect or technically qualified. The assistant minority leader [Mr. KUCHEL] and I were looking at these pictures together. It seems evident that great deterioration is taking place underneath the Capitol structure.

Mr. HAYDEN. If we stop at the point indicated on the chart, we can use only the tracks which go to the new building, because we must leave space to get on and off the cars. It will be observed that the proposed tunnel spreads out at a certain point. Why? To allow space for passengers to get on and off the cars.

If the narrow tunnel were carried all the way through, we would be likely to kill someone as the cars come and go. But if the tunnel is spread out at the point indicated, passengers can get in and out. That is why we have allowed a larger space. From the larger space, passengers can have access to the elevators.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I have listened to the evidence in this case. I have listened to plans, and I have listened to all the problems. While I realize that a few mistakes have been made in the new Senate Office Building, they were inevitable in an undertaking of that magnitude. There have been problems which we did not anticipate, but we are in the midst of the program, and we might as well meet the situation. The work on the east front of the Capitol is such as to have an effect upon the Senate steps. I think we might as well do the complete job, and do it right.

A few years ago I stood up in the Senate and said something to the effect that in generations to come the Capitol should become a great historical museum for the people of the United States and of the free world, and that we should build a modern Capitol.

Many of the newspapers ridiculed the idea at the time. They preferred to go ahead with maintenance and repair of the old structure. That is what we are up against today. We might as well face the problem. If we had proceeded in the direction I suggested, at a time when we were spending $65 million or $70 million for a United Nations Building in New York, we could have built a modern Capitol which could have been economically operated, and all activities could be under one roof. Then the present Capitol could have become one of the great historic spots of our Nation.

But the decision was in the other direction. Now we are faced with a definite problem. We might as well meet our responsibilities and go ahead, whether or not, as individuals, we like the idea of the tunnel.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. I should like to say a word in response to the "50-step" argument of the Senator from Illinois. It is not a matter of space. It is a matter of time.

A Senator handed me his schedule for today. At 10 o'clock there was a meeting of the Armed Services Subcommittee in the old building. At 10 o'clock this morning there was a meeting of the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the Committee on Appropriations, in the new building. At 10:30 he had another meeting of a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, namely, the subcommittee dealing with the Department of Labor, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies. That meeting was in the Capitol.

At 10:30 there was a meeting of an appropriations subcommittee in the new building. At 11 a.m. the Senate met. At 2 p.m. there was another meeting of an appropriations subcommittee in the new building.

There have been some votes this afternoon, and there were some yesterday afternoon. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], who was holding hearings in the Old Senate Office Building, said that he was interrupted five times to come to the Senate Chamber, four times to vote, and once on another mission.

So it is a question of time. It is time to stand up and tell the American people that these improvements are not for our convenience or comfort. Personally, I never would use the tunnel, unless it were raining, if I had time to walk back and forth. This issue involves a question of meeting obligations in connection with senatorial work, not play.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have just taken 50 steps in an anteroom, and it required only 25 seconds of time. In the old days I could step off at the rate of 130 steps to the minute. At present, the best I can do is approximately 120. I do not believe that 25 seconds is very important. Also I do not think it is important to try to hide from our constituents. I am perfectly ready to meet them in the subway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], striking out lines 2 to 9 inclusive, on page 31.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time, if the Senator from Illinois will do likewise.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. And all the time has been yielded back?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, do not the dilatory tactics now being used demonstrate the need for a new subway?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I make a point of order on the Senator's inquiry. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained. Debate during a yea and nay vote is not in order.

The rollcall was resumed and concluded.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH], are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. BIBLE] is absent because of a death in his family. I further announce the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARTKE], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. If present and voting, the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea" and the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] would vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] are detained on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay" and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea."

On this vote, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay" and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 43, as follows:

So Mr. DOUGLAS' amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is at the desk, which I offer on behalf of myself, my colleague [Mr. ELLENDER] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 9, line 24, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated shall be used for the purpose of reducing the strength of the active Army below 900,000, nor be expended directly or indirectly for the purpose of transporting any person or persons pursuant to any plan or program for reducing the strength of the Army below 900,000.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to carry out the intention of Congress that the Army shall be maintained at a strength of 900,000. Last year, when the Defense appropriation bill for fiscal year 1959 was considered by the Senate-House conference committee, the committee included language in its report directing the Secretary of Defense to maintain Army manpower at 900,000.

I ask unanimous consent that this statement in the conference report be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is the belief of the committee of conference that the national defense requires the maintenance of a Regular Army of not less than 900,000 and it is the intent that the planned strength for fiscal year 1950 be maintained at that level in accordance with the funds provided. (P. 5, House Rept. 2503, 85th Cong., 2d sess., dated Aug. 6, 1958.)

Mr. LONG. I have discussed the amendment with the chairman and members of the Appropriations Committee. It is my understanding that the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would the Senator incorporate in his amendment a stipulation that the Marine Corps, in accordance with congressional intent, shall be maintained at 200,000 men?

Mr. LONG. I would have no objection to a similar amendment, but it would have to appear at a different place in the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will support such an amendment.

Mr. CHAVEZ. It was the intention of both the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Appropriations last year to have the number in the Marine Corps fixed at 200,000.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I urge Senators to vote for this amendment. It does nothing more than to reemphasize the intent of the Congress as expressed in the regular fiscal 1959 Department of Defense appropriation bill which was passed in the Senate last year.

Senators will recall that when the bill was considered by the Committee on Appropriations, it contained funds—inserted by the House of Representatives when the bill was being debated there—to maintain the Army at a strength of not less than 900,000 during the current fiscal year.

The Committee on Appropriations on which I serve endorsed the House position. We provided sufficient amount for "Army personnel" and "Operation and maintenance" accounts to forestall proposed cuts in Army strength and, in addition, in our report stated as follows:

The committee has approved the action of the House in recommending an increase in the strength of the Regular Army from 870,000 to 900,000, and has agreed to the Department's request to restore to a direct appropriation, $100 million, which the House had provided by transfer.

The Senate approved of our action and passed the bill. When the bill went to conference the Senate's position prevailed.

However, the ink was hardly dry on the act before the President served notice that he would not abide by the wishes of Congress. But, as a result of the crisis in Lebanon, the President found it convenient to have an Army of 900,000 men and kept Army strength at that level until the crisis had subsided. He immediately began reducing the strength of the Army to 870,000 in direct violation of the wishes of the Congress, and the announced intent of the over-budget increase provided in the regular Department of Defense appropriation bill.

The amendment which my colleague and I have offered is, to be perfectly frank, in the nature of a stopgap. It would, in effect, state that the Congress, when acting on the regular fiscal 1959 defense appropriation measure meant what it said in funding and requiring an Army of not less than 900,000.

I remind Senators that while the President, under the Constitution, is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, it is the Congress which is charged, under that same Constitution, with raising and supporting armies.

It is my frank intention to raise this issue again when the Defense Subcommittee begin consideration of the fiscal 1960 budget, and I am hopeful that, again, congressional action directed toward eliminating proposed cuts in Army strength will prevail. In any event, I believe it is time that the legislative branch, particularly the Senate, put its foot down and serve notice on the executive branch that we have in the past, and will in the future, exercise our responsibilities in this area of national defense.

I remind the Senate that the May 27 deadline set by Mr. Khrushchev for turning over control of our access routes to Berlin is drawing close. There are ominous rumblings in other parts of the world. I do not believe it would be either prudent or, for that matter, economical for us to at this time permit further reductions in the strength of our Armed Forces.

I cannot help believing that when viewed in this manner the Senate will join me and my junior colleague in assisting to maintain our present defense posture, particularly insofar as the Army is concerned, until such time as we have had an opportunity to thoroughly review the issue of Army strength and balance of military forces during consideration of the regular fiscal 1960 appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, some Senators desire to address the Senate later this evening. It is not expected, anticipated, or planned to have any more yea-and-nay votes this evening. The Senate will convene at 10:30 tomorrow morning. There will be a morning hour.

An amendment will be offered to reduce the amount of the developmental loan fund from $200 million to $100 million. It is expected that there will be a yea-and-nay vote on that amendment.

Some other amendments may be offered tomorrow. It may be possible to complete action on the supplemental appropriation bill tomorrow and then take up several relatively noncontroversial general bills on the calendar, bills which I have previously announced, and which will be listed in the RECORD tomorrow morning.

If it is possible to have the Senate conclude action on those bills tomorrow, it is planned to have the Senate go over until Monday, so that we may have a long weekend, because we have had a rather productive 2 weeks. We are waiting now for bills to be reported by the committees.

DISPOSITION OF ASSETS OF THE GENERAL ANILINE & FILM CO.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, for the past few months there has been a great deal of speculation in the newspapers concerning the disposition of General Aniline & Film Co., the stock of which was seized at the beginning of World War II, on the basis that such stock was the property of enemy nationals.

At the present time, and for some years past, the question of the ownership of this stock has been the subject of litigation. There is no doubt that this litigation will continue for years unless some amicable settlement is reached between the United States and the Swiss claimant, Interhandel. At the present time this case is in the U.S. district court, to be tried on its merits. The case is also pending before the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

On July 31, 1957, the White House issued the following statement, which indicated that the administration was planning prompt action to provide "an equitable monetary return" with respect to all properties seized under the Trading With the Enemy Act:

THE WHITE HOUSE.

For some time the administration has been deeply concerned over the unresolved problems relating to the vesting, the liquidation and the disposition of enemy assets seized as a result of World War II.

The problem of German vested assets and the claims of American nationals against Germany arising out of World War II has been a long-standing source of controversy. An increase since June of 1955 in the amount of funds available, and which it is expected will be realized from the liquidation of vested assets, should facilitate an equitable and final solution of these problems.

Consequently, in order to reflect the historic American policy of maintaining the sanctity of private property even in wartime, the administration intends as a matter of priority to submit to the Congress, early in the coming session, a supplementary plan.

It is contemplated that this plan would provide for the payment in full of all legitimate war claims of Americans against Germany and would permit, as an act of grace, an equitable monetary return to former owners of vested assets. Subject to the applicable provisions of law, the present program of liquidating vested assets will be completed at the earliest possible time.

It is hoped that it will also be possible to work out a final solution of the Japanese vested assets problem for presentation to the next session of Congress.

I should like to point out that almost 2 years have passed since the issuance of that statement. To date, the administration has not submitted any plan "to reflect the historic American policy of maintaining the sanctity of private property," as promised by the White House. Why this issue has been avoided, I do not know.

I should like to make another point: On February 17, 1959, my distinguished colleague, the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] introduced a bill, S. 1103, to provide for the sale of properties now held by the Attorney General, even though they are now the subject of litigation to determine whether or not they were or were not in fact the properties of enemy nationals. At the present time these properties cannot be sold. They must be held pending the outcome in court. If the claimant prevails, he will get his property back. If the claimant fails to prove his case, then under existing law, the United States will be the owner and may dispose of the property as it will.

The Department of Justice has recently submitted a report to my Subcommittee on the Trading With the Enemy Act, with recommendations that the Congress enact Senate bill 1103. This would permit the sale of General Aniline & Film Co., even though title to the stock is in issue before the courts.

A number of questions are involved in this contemplated action. One of these involves the good faith of the U.S. Government; another involves the constitutionality of such legislation.

With respect to the question of good faith, I should like to point out to the Congress that on November 5, 1958, Mr. Loftus Becker, legal advisor to the Department of State, as the representative of the Government of the United States and as co-agent with Mr. Dallas Townsend, Alien Property Director, stated to the International Court as follows:

Under section 9(a) of the Trading With the Enemy Act, the Government of the United States is forbidden to sell vested property as long as a suit for its return is pending. Interhandel having been reinstated as a plaintiff, there cannot, and will not, now, be a sale of the vested stock by the U.S. Government unless and until a final determination in that suit, that suit in the United States, is made in favor of my Government.

Again, on November 6, 1958, Mr. Becker, as the representative of the United States, continued his argument to the Court, and reiterated:

Accordingly, the stock here in issue cannot now, and will not be sold by the Government, but is being retained to await the outcome of Interhandel's suit on the merits of the litigation in the United States.

And again:

Clearly, now, upon the readmission of Interhandel into the U.S. litigation, the stock—to use the language of the Supreme Court—will be "retained by the Custodian to abide the result, and, if Interhandel prevails, * * * returned to it", after a full hearing on its claim "in a court having power to enforce it if found meritorious."

After this argument, it was not necessary for the International Court to act to prevent a sale of the General Aniline & Film Co. stock. One would assume that the Court would be justified in relying upon the statements of our Government's agents who appeared before it. I do not see now how the administration can, with propriety and honor, recommend to the Congress the passage of legislation which would make meaningless the solemn representations made to the International Court.

On the same subject, on April 22, 1952, at a general stockholders meeting of the General Aniline & Film Co., held in New York, the then chairman, Mr. Jack Frye, stated—as shown by the minutes of that meeting—that the Senate Judiciary Committee took the position that there was a constitutional question about the passage of such legislation, and that he had been told, also, that the Department of Justice was inclined to agree that such legislation was questionable, at least so far as its constitutionality was concerned.

If this be so, why, again, does that Department now recommend the legislation? If such legislation was questionable then, it should be so now.

The present bill, S. 1103, is, in effect, identical with Senate bill 2171, which was considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee in 1953. At that time, after full hearings, that bill failed to receive committee approval.

Upon the basis of this background, it would be best for the administration to send to the Congress a program which can be supported and which will fulfill the promises of restitution of these vested properties. Failing in this, the administration should consider with the Swiss claimant a compromise solution which will put an end to this long-standing controversy. Such a means was suggested to the Alien Property Custodian in 1953 by the late Senator McCarran, of Nevada. Now, as then, any plan of settlement should be sent to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, for its approval.

Mr. President, when the pending litigation over the General Aniline & Film Corp. is concluded, and when it is determined, if it is so determined, that the United States has a right to sell the assets of the company, I insist that a really public sale of the assets be had.

I wish to have inserted in the RECORD my communication of March 23, 1959, to the Attorney General, and his reply to me under date of March 31. I trust that these assurances will give every prospective bidder who is eligible under the law an opportunity to bid freely for these assets. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD my letter of March 23, 1959, to the Honorable William P. Rogers, and his reply to my letter, under date of March 31, 1959.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT,
March 23, 1959.

Hon. WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
The Attorney General of the United States,
Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: The subcommittee and I have received several inquiries in reference to a sale of General Aniline & Film Corp. The asset being the largest of all the vested properties, I urge that great care be taken in the preparation of the prospectus and advertisements for its sale. I further urge that this asset be sold at public auction, with provision for each competitive bidder to increase his offer during the auction of this property. Such provision will eliminate future complaints or criticism that favoritism existed or that the asset was sold for less than its true value. This view seems to me to be within the letter and spirit of section 12 of the Trading With the Enemy Act, as amended. A private or negotiated sale of this asset should be prohibited.

I am of the firm opinion that every prospective bidder should have access to all the pertinent facts concerning the administration of this vested asset, its potentials, and its current value at the time of the sale.

Please furnish me at the appropriate time with copies of all advertisements, prospectus, etc.

With kind regards, I remain

Sincerely yours,

OLIN D. JOHNSTON,
Chairman.

MARCH 31, 1959.

HON. OLIN D. JOHNSTON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: This will acknowledge your letter of March 23 advising that you have received inquiries with respect to a possible sale of General Aniline & Film Co.

As you know, section 9 of the Trading with the Enemy Act prohibits the sale of vested property while a suit for return is pending and such a suit is now pending in the District Court for the District of Columbia (I. G. Chemie v. Rogers). In view of the pendency of this litigation there is no present prospect of a sale of the vested shares unless the Congress should enact into law one of the various pending bills which would amend section 9 to permit the sale of vested property despite the pendency of the suit for return or unless the litigation is dismissed or settled. The Department of Justice has supported bills to enable the United States to sell the stock it now holds and to hold sufficient proceeds to pay off any claims.

I have stated on numerous public occasions, and I am happy to repeat it again, this property, when and if sold, will be offered at public sale to the highest bidder after full and adequate public advertisement.

The procedure which will be followed is set forth in section 12 of the Trading with the Enemy Act and by section 501.25 of the Regulations of the Office of Alien Property (8 CFR 501.25). Every prospective bidder, of course, would have access to pertinent facts concerning the vested asset, business secrets excepted, and such information will be disclosed in the prospectus and registration statement which will be issued prior to sale. This procedure is the one which has been followed in the cases of other vested assets disposed of by the Office of Alien Property.

At no time has any consideration been given, and none will be given, to a negotiated sale of the stock of General Aniline & Film Corp., now owned by the United States.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Attorney General.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. HARRIS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MACK of Illinois, Mr. ROBERTS, Mr. BENNETT of Michigan, Mr. SPRINGER, and Mr. BUSH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

NATURAL RESOURCES, THEIR PROTECTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Public Affairs Institute, a distinguished organization devoted to a broad program of education and enlightenment on major public policies, has just produced a stimulating and provocative new study, "Natural Resources, Their Protection and Development," which should be required reading for everyone who is concerned with the formulation of public policies in the field of natural resources conservation.

This study is the fruit of long and searching inquiry into the conservation needs of the Nation, the product of extensive conversations and discussions among the leading conservationists of the Nation. The authors have performed a unique service in pulling together into one compact package a distillation of the soundest thinking in the conservation field.

I am particularly pleased to note that among the 25 major proposals which the study sets forth, in the interest of sound conservation and development of natural resources, is proposal No. 4: "Establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps as a voluntary conservation and educational activity of the Federal Government."

Many organizations, Mr. President, have requested the opportunity to testify on S. 812, the proposal for a Youth Conservation Corps, and the distinguished senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] is making every effort to provide the opportunity for such testimony in mid-May, I am very pleased to say.

Each of the 25 proposals of the study deserve careful and respectful attention, Mr. President, and I am hopeful that each Member of the Congress will find it possible to read these challenging proposals. They can become the basis for more vigorous, more rational, and more productive national policies in the field of natural resources.

Mr. President, I would call particular attention to proposal No. 4 because it relates, as I have said, to pending legislation, S. 812. This particular bill, for the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps, has wide appeal throughout the Nation. If there is one thing which this Congress can do which will be of help to our young people, it is the enactment of this bill.

I noticed the other day in the press that the Department of Labor predicts an increase in unemployment among our young people. That, of course, places special emphasis upon the importance of enacting constructive legislation such as the Youth Conservation Corps proposal.

I would invite my colleagues, as they look over the RECORD, to prepare testimony that can be considered by the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare when it holds its hearings on S. 812.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a press statement issued by the Public Affairs Institute on April 15, 1959, describing the newly published study, "Natural Resources, Their Protection and Development."

There being no objection, the news release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"During the next half century we will either form a lasting partnership with nature through a much broadened resources conservation program, or face the prospect of becoming a have-not nation," says Dewey Anderson, executive director of the Public Affairs Institute of Washington, D.C., in a newly published study, "Natural Resources, Their Protection and Development." "The turning point comes in our generation," he continues, "because the growth of population and industry will demand more metals, minerals, land, wood, water, wildlife, parks, and recreational areas than nature can continue to supply as conservation practices are now organized."

With the American standard of living at stake, the study develops the new policies and practices required to bring us to the end of the century stronger than we are now. The first 50 years of conservation policy as laid down by President Theodore Roosevelt and Gifford Pinchot have saved our resources from wholesale destruction but much more must be done now.

Conservation leaders across the Nation shared in this statement, so that it represents a composite of the best thinking of some of the best minds in this broad field. Among those quoted under a section in which "Conservation Leaders Speak" are Dr. Shirley Allen, member of the Michigan Conservation Commission, Senators Hubert H. Humphrey and Richard L. Neuberger, Alex Radin, of the American Public Power Association, and Attorney Anthony Wayne Smith, of the National Parks Association.

Three persons were largely responsible for this provocative and searching statement on conservation—Morris Llewellyn Cooke, engineer and former chairman of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission; David Cushman Coyle, author, and Dr. Spencer M. Smith, Jr., secretary of the influential Citizens Committee on Natural Resources. It breaks new ground on every topic presented. For example, in the forestry section the declaration is made that destructive practices and shortages require Federal regulation of cuttings both on private as well as public forests.

Among the changes advocated in the interest of sound conservation and development of natural resources are:

1. Organization of all resources programs at the President's own level through a coordinating policy commission, submission of a single program and budget to the Congress to eliminate overlapping, duplication and waste of Federal funds.

2. Capitalizing of resources development projects by means of a specially devised system of long-term, low-interest-bearing bonds instead of annual appropriations items in the budget. For "trees won't grow as fast as compound interest at 6 percent, but they will pay out in the long run."

3. Operation of the newly formed National Outdoor Recreation Commission in a "goldfish bowl," with widest possible public participation and support of this essential effort to provide for the recreational needs of a growing population.

4. Establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps as a voluntary conservation and educational activity of the Federal Government.

5. Planned public works, both as a contracyclical economic measure and as a major conservation program, presented in unified form to the Congress after due clearance between interested departments.

14. Protection of existing wildlife refuges, extension of such areas, and enaction of a national policy respecting the rights and limits of the Defense Establishment in creating firing and bombing ranges out of the public domain.

15. Amendment of the Federal Power Commission Act to give the Secretary of the Interior the power to review licenses under consideration whenever migratory fish or wildfowl are involved. Definition of standards respecting conservation aspects of any projects being passed on by the Commission.

16. Establishment at the State level of acts consonant with Federal law now providing for a study of State water development projects by the agencies having oversight of fish and wildlife; and coordination of such efforts between the States and Federal Government.

17. Revision of laws and administrative practices respecting small water projects and Federal lands management to insure the conservation of natural values.

18. Reforestation programs on both public and private lands to overcome as quickly as possible our present and growing shortages of sawtimber and of certain species of trees.

19. A Federal regulatory policy respecting cutting of trees on both public and privately owned lands.

20. Acquisition of more forest lands to be included in a national system of forests.

21. More adequate protection of forests through wider application of approved practices and new technologies.

22. Extension of the public park system, both federally and within the States, to meet the growing needs of an enlarging population.

23. Strengthening of the Federal antipollution measures, enlarging their scope and resources.

24. Research and administration of measures to combat the pollution of the air, the use of insecticides, detergents, and herbicides which are proving so destructive of our plant and animal life.

25. A congressional survey of the water needs of the Nation, region by region, with a view to developing a comprehensive nationwide plan, including the storage and replenishment of our ground water, the transfer of waters from surplus to deficit areas, a reconciliation of the various claims on water supplies, and a program of development which will insure against water shortages for the future.

Fifty years from now the conservation story may again be set down, in memory of what we shall have succeeded in doing in our time. If we do well, it can be a story of gain for all the world's peoples, looking toward continuing progress in the long future. Then, as Franklin Roosevelt wrote on the day before he died, "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow will be our doubts of today."

WATER POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to call attention of the Senate to another bill which has been acted upon favorably in the other body of the Congress.

Mr. President, as the sponsor in the Senate, along with my colleague from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY], of the bill, S. 805, to expand the program for construction of sewage treatment plants under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, I was gratified at the approval this past week by the House Public Works Committee of a companion measure offered by Representative JOHN BLATNIK, of Minnesota, H.R. 3610.

It was my privilege to testify in support of this measure in the committee of the House of Representatives. I am most pleased that Representative BLATNIK's bill has received such favorable consideration. He is the main mover and author of this proposed legislation, and has already, as we know, been able to have passed in the Congress at least the initial legislation for the purpose of water pollution control.

The necessity for expansion of this sewage-treatment program has been well established. The demand for fresh, clean water has been constantly increasing, but sewage-treatment facilities have not kept pace.

The Federal Water Pollution Control Act of the 84th Congress, which was the Blatnik-Humphrey bill, and which authorized $50 million annually to be spent in matching funds to help communities build sewage disposal plants, has stimulated the greatest waste treatment construction program in our Nation's history. It is proposed in the companion bills as offered by Representative BLATNIK and by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McCARTHY] and myself, that Federal funds be increased from $50 million to $100 million a year.

Despite the widespread agreement on the need and desirability of such a program, the administration has not only opposed expansion of the program, but has advocated abolishing the program altogether. Such opposition, of course, comes as no great surprise. The administration has throughout the years shown a lack of foresight and awareness as to the needs of our country. It has resisted almost without exception proposals designed to meet the needs of America in the mid-20th century. The administration turns its back on the realities of our times and prefers to look back with nostalgia to the simple and uncomplicated days of the 19th century.

Mr. President, these water pollution control programs are as vital to the health and safety of the American people as are public health officers and public health facilities. It is almost unbelievable that the Bureau of the Budget, representing the President, would strike from the budget as proposed by the President any consideration at all in terms of Federal assistance to local communities for water pollution control and the construction of necessary sewage disposal plants.

I was most pleased to read in this morning's New York Times, however, Mr. President, that not all Republicans agree with the administration's horse and buggy policies. There are some in the GOP who are aware of the needs of America, and I am happy to say that there are many in the Democratic Party who are aware of the needs of America, including the distinguished Presiding Officer [Mr. MUSKIE] who has shown such great alertness to these problems and who has given such dedicated and devoted energy to their solution.

One such Republican is Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, of the State of New York, who has announced his support for the extension of the Federal water pollution treatment program in a letter to Representative BLATNIK.

I hope the Governor of New York will drop a little note to the President of the United States. Then if the Governor of New York should meet the Director of the Bureau of the Budget at one of these Republican conclaves, I hope he will mention the fact that he is in favor of water pollution control to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. If perchance he should meet the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, I trust that the Governor of New York, who shows interest in writing to Democrats, will perhaps pass a little friendly note to the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Furthermore, I suggest that the Governor of New York could send a letter to the U.S. Senate in support of S. 805, the bill which is pending before the committees of Congress.

We want to welcome any other Republican Governor or any other Republican anywhere, Governor or no Governor, who wishes to take issue with the penny pinching attitude of this administration when it comes to health matters.

Mr. President, I noticed in this morning's newspapers that the House of Representatives increased the health research funds substantially over the budget request. I wish to commend Representative FOGARTY, of Rhode Island, and others who were instrumental in that fine piece of legislative work in the other body.

The administration cannot seem to understand the importance of preventive medicine, the importance of public health, or the fact that this Nation is growing and the water-pollution problem is one of the major problems of the Nation. As a matter of fact, it would be a good idea if the executive branch would recess for 1 hour a day and go out to look at the Potomac River, which is one of the most polluted rivers in the United States. In that way the administration could do something for the Nation, for it might then advocate a serious program of water-pollution control on the Potomac River, which is supposed to symbolize the great strength of the United States.

The only thing which is strong about the Potomac River under current conditions of pollution is the odor on certain days. I regret to have to say this, because the Potomac is a beautiful river and has a great place in American history. However, this administration insists upon denying an opportunity to States and localities and, indeed, denying the responsibility of the Federal Government in any kind of effective control program for water pollution.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the newspaper report on the endorsement of Governor Rockefeller, of New York, of this measure be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, we are pleased to have the support of the distinguished Governor of New York. Nothing would please me more than to be able to rise in the Senate in the near future and to announce that because of the support of this Republican Governor of New York, who is so frequently mentioned as a possible candidate for much higher office, the administration has reconsidered its position, has been moved by the eloquence and logic of the letter from the Governor of New York to Representative BLATNIK, and is now in favor of our bill. While I admit that such a prospect does not seem too probable, I still have the hope in my heart, and I earnestly suggest to the administration that it reconsider its position on this important matter.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the New York Times, Apr. 29, 1959]

ROCKEFELLER BACKS DEMOCRAT'S PLAN—FAVORS A CONGRESSIONAL BILL ON WATER POLLUTION THAT WHITE HOUSE OPPOSES

WASHINGTON, April 28.—Governor Rockefeller took issue with the Eisenhower administration today on the subject of curbing water pollution.

He strongly endorsed a bill, sponsored by Representative JOHN A. BLATNIK, Democrat, of Minnesota, that would increase Federal aid funds for sewage-treatment plants from $50 million to $100 million a year.

Representative BLATNIK said the endorsement had come to him from the Governor's office in a totally unexpected letter.

In the letter, Governor Rockefeller said the operation of the Federal-aid program under the National Water Pollution Act has provided an incentive which has been extremely helpful in attacking the pollution problem in New York State.

He said he had had all the interested departments and agencies of New York State study the Blatnik bill. "It is their consensus that it is sound and desirable," the letter said.

The Eisenhower administration has taken the position that as a matter of strengthening State governments, the Federal water pollution control program and the Federal vocational education program should be turned back to the States.

The President's proposal was that these programs be paid for in the States through the relinquishing to the States of part of the telephone tax collected by the Federal Government.

Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, strongly urged the administration plan in an appearance before the House Government Operations Committee. However, the committee reported out the Blatnik bill, which now is pending before the Rules Committee.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, first I should like to express congratulations to the Senator from Minnesota for his excellent address. I think the problem of water pollution in a growing country with an increasing population is extremely important. What the Senator had to say about the Potomac River is also extremely important. I commend the Senator for his remarks.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

TRIBUTE TO FORMER SENATOR IRVING IVES

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to express my appreciation to a fine American no longer with us, former Senator Irving Ives of New York.

The labor reform bill which passed the Senate this year is comparable to the labor reform bill which passed the Senate last year by a vote of 88 to 1. Senator Ives was the cosponsor and codrafter of the bill at that time. I think the prestige of Senator Ives and his long and eminent association with the problems of labor-management in this country gave the bill a standing which otherwise it would have lacked, and I think this also contributed to the passage of the bill last year, which favorably affected the prospects for passage of a labor reform bill this year.

Senator Ives is no longer with us in this body. The bill which passed this year is known as the Kennedy-Ervin bill, rather than the Kennedy-Ives bill, but part of the credit for its passage is due to former Senator Ives. I take this opportunity to pay my respects to former Senator Ives again, as a distinguished member of the Republican Party, as a distinguished former Member of the Senate, and also as a distinguished American.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

THE KENNEDY-ERVIN LABOR-MANAGEMENT REFORM BILL

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senate last week completed a monumental task in approving by a vote of 90 to 1 the labor-management reform bill generally known as the Kennedy-Ervin bill. The Senate labored long and hard—it can be proud of the results. The American people demanded a strong, workable, effective and fair anti-racketeering measure—and the Senate has passed such a measure.

Honest union members and businessmen, responsible labor leaders, law enforcement officers and the general public—all will benefit from the increased protection this bill will provide. The battle for labor-management reform, however, is not over. I am hopeful that our press and public, as well as interested organizations, will not permit their interest to lag simply because the bill has passed the Senate. This Congress must not go home this year until it has placed on the President's desk sound labor-management reform legislation.

It has always been easy to say that everyone is for reform—that everyone is against racketeering—and that everyone is disturbed by the headlines from these investigations. But the hard, complex task of legislation is a more difficult matter. The Senate demonstrated by a vote of 90 to 1 that reform legislation should be and can be above partisanship—despite those who would rather have a political issue than a bill—those who wish to keep a whipping boy alive—and those who are more concerned about curbing labor at the bargaining table than they are about curbing racketeers.

The Kennedy-Ervin bill as it passed the Senate meets every necessary test—it is a strong bill—it is workable—it is fair—it is effective. It carries out all of the previously unfulfilled recommendations of the McClellan committee. It is aimed at ending the abuses revealed before that committee; and adds other legislative curbs on racketeering as well. It is based upon the bill drafted last year by two members of the McClellan committee, with the strong support of the distinguished chairman of that committee himself. It is broader and stronger than any alternative proposal in this area. It is a bill designed to permit responsible unionism to operate without being undermined by either racketeering tactics or bureaucratic controls. It is designed to strike a balance between the dangers of too much and too little legislation in this field.

I realize that it is always possible to find fault with any bill—to point out omissions, to read in other meanings, or to call indefinitely for further amendments. This is particularly true in the controversial field of labor, which is precisely why no major labor legislation has been passed in the last decade. The extremists on both sides are always displeased; the technical experts will always disagree. No doubt each Senator might have drafted his own bill differently. But what is important and significant about this bill is not what it fails to do but what it does accomplish, not what might have been added in the way of unrelated or punitive measures, but what is included. For this bill provides the most comprehensive and effective set of weapons against racketeering ever to pass this body. The basic provisions of the Kennedy-Ervin bill as it passed the Senate include the following:

First. It guarantees the basic rights of all union members, including their freedom of speech and assembly, freedom to set union dues, provides safeguards against improper disciplinary action and protects the rights of a member to sue in Federal courts for the enforcement of his basic rights.

Second. It sets up strong barriers against the control of unions by unreformed convicted thieves, racketeers, and thugs, or their service as union officers. It prevents union officials from using union funds to perpetuate themselves or their friends in office.

Third. It sets up safeguards in court proceedings so that members of unions can protect themselves against arbitrary control by large international unions through the device of the trusteeship.

Fourth. It guarantees America's working men and women the fundamental right of the secret ballot in selecting their union officers and permits the majority of the members of a local to remove crooked officials at any time.

Fifth. It provides workable machinery for contesting in Federal courts crooked or rigged union elections and insures fair election procedures, regular elections, due notice of all union elections, and real opportunity to nominate opposing candidates.

Sixth. It puts the spotlight of publicity on middlemen racketeers and unscrupulous antiunion employers.

Seventh. It compels comprehensive detailed reporting of union economic and administrative data so that the members and the public can really know what is happening.

Eighth. It strikes hard at the "sweetheart" contract by penalizing both the giver and the taker of a bribe in labor-management relations.

Ninth. It requires union officers to reveal personal financial transactions which might conflict with their responsibilities as union officers.

Tenth. It places strong power in the Secretary of Labor, with adequate safeguards of individual rights, to compel compliance with the provisions of the act and imposes heavy criminal penalty for violations.

Eleventh. It requires that all union officers or employees handling union funds be bonded in sufficient amount to protect their membership.

Twelfth. It prohibits picketing for 9 months where a union has had an election and lost it.

Thirteenth. It outlaws the vicious "hot cargo" clause in the trucking industry and prevents the enforcement of existing contracts containing such clauses.

Fourteenth. It imposes criminal sanctions for embezzlement of union funds, false reporting, false entries on books, failure to report, or destruction of union books.

Fifteenth. It prohibits loans by employers or unions to union officers.

Sixteenth. It authorizes suits by union members for recovery of funds embezzled or misappropriated by union officers.

Seventeenth. It prohibits picketing for extortion or to secure payoff from employer.

Eighteenth. It prohibits the solicitation or payment of fictitious fees for unloading cargo from interstate carriers.

In short, it is a strong, effective bill. It will enable all union members to know how their dues are spent, instead of having them carried around in a little black box by Anthony Doria, the friend of racketeers, or used to purchase an air-conditioned Cadillac by the secretary-treasurer of the Garbage Local in New York. It will require minimum standards of union democracy, with elections at regular intervals by secret ballot or by a convention of delegates elected by secret ballot, and prevent Johnny Dio from setting up fake paper locals and casting votes in the names of persons who did not even know they were members of the union, much less council delegates. It will bar convicted felons from serving as union officers, so that Herman Kierdorf could no longer go straight from his prison cell in the Ohio State Penitentiary to an appointment as business agent for the Teamsters in Detroit.

It will limit and supervise union trusteeships, so that the vice president of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers cannot again appoint himself trustee of two Chicago locals whose funds he misused on his personal hobbies to the tune of some $40,000 in 5 years. It will require union officials to completely disclose all possible conflict of interest transactions, so that Teamster members urged to buy lots in a so-called model Teamster community in Florida would know that Jimmy Hoffa had arranged the financing of this development through coercion on the union's banks, had placed the promoter on the Teamster payroll and stood prepared as a hidden partner to reap a large hidden profit.

It will prohibit loans by either employers or unions to union officers, so that the president of the old Bakery Workers would not again be able to borrow heavily from one of their employers to buy expensive homes in Washington and Palm Beach, and then negotiate a substandard union contract with his benefactor without consulting the local members. And it will expose and prevent the undermining of honest unionism through management collusion, middlemen, and union-busting techniques, operations of so-called consultants like Nathan Shefferman, who promised employers he could keep out the responsible unions which could not be bought, through his various techniques of antilabor committees, company unions, payoffs and teamster collusion.

I do not say that the Kennedy-Ervin bill, or any law, under our Constitution, can eliminate Jimmy Hoffa. He is entitled to the same rights as any other citizen, including the protection of the fifth amendment and trial by jury. But we can eliminate the evil practices by which he and his associates rose to power, their conflict of interest transactions, their destruction of union books, their manipulation of trusteeships, their rigged elections and conventions, their appointments of ex-convicts as union officials, their use of management middlemen, their use of union funds to build personal financial empires, their private arrangements with employers, their shakedowns and tribute for unloading interstate trucks, their falsification of union reports, their reprisals against honest members, their insistence on hot cargo clauses in trucking contracts and their strong-arm picketing of plants where the union has already lost an election.

Without doubt, there will continue to be criticisms of this bill from extremists on both sides, from those who are antilabor rather than antiracketeering, and from those who take a partisan view of this non-partisan problem. But I think it is of interest, in this connection, to compare the provisions of the bill which passed the Senate with another so-called antiracketeering bill which has been praised by those now engaging in partisan criticism of the Kennedy-Ervin bill; and I refer to the so-called Rockefeller labor reform bill which passed the New York Legislature this year. The Rockefeller bill, like the Kennedy-Ervin bill, also curbs conflict of interest transactions and employer bribes; provides for financial reports by labor organizations and employers; and requires the maintenance of accurate financial accounts. These are all desirable provisions. But this is all the Rockefeller bill does. Unlike the Kennedy-Ervin bill, it does nothing to insure honest and secret union elections, it does nothing to curb abuses of union trusteeships, it does nothing about prohibiting picketing for extortionate purposes or where a union has lost an election, it does nothing about the infiltration of convicted racketeers and felons into union office, it does nothing about guaranteeing the rights of union members, and so on down through the rest of the list.

In short, the bill that passed the Senate is second to none, and no Senator who voted for it needs to apologize for his position. This body acted once again with courage and wisdom, courage to eliminate demonstrated abuses now being practiced by powerful groups in this country, and wisdom in resisting irresponsible proposals which would have punished the innocent as well as the guilty, the victims as well as the racketeers.

Without doubt the future of this bill will again be plagued by the usual emotional arguments, political perils and powerful pressures which always surround this subject. But I am confident that the same constructive spirit which has enabled this body to pass the Kennedy-Ervin bill by a vote of 90–1, just as in 1958 it passed the Kennedy-Ives bill by a vote of 88–1, will characterize action on this bill in the other body and in the White House. The racketeers will not like it, the antilabor extremists around the country will not like it, but I am confident that the American people, and the overwhelmingly honest rank and file union members, will benefit from this measure for many years to come.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a detailed section-by-section analysis of the bill as passed by the Senate be inserted in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF S. 1555 AS PASSED BY THE SENATE APRIL 25, 1959

Section 1: Contains the short title of the bill: "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959."

Section 2: Contains the congressional findings, purposes, and policy.

TITLE I—BILL OF RIGHTS OF MEMBERS OF LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

Section 101(a)(1): Asserts the right of each member of a labor organization to be considered equally and to enjoy identical privileges within the organization to nominate candidates, vote in union elections, attend membership meetings, and participate in the deliberations of the organization. The rights protected by this subsection are circumscribed by the right of the organization to establish for itself reasonable rules in its own constitution and bylaws.

Section 101(a)(2): Guarantees the right of union members to meet and assemble freely with other members and express their own views and, further, to express their views on business before any union meeting or upon candidates in a union election, subject to the organization's established and reasonable rules pertaining to the conduct of meetings. This subsection clearly establishes the right of a labor organization to establish rules and regulations for the conduct of meetings regarding the responsibility of every member toward the organization as an institution and to restrain such member in any conduct that would interfere with the performance of its legal or contractual obligations.

Section 101(a)(3): Stipulates that the rate of dues presently in effect shall not be changed and that no new or additional dues or initiation fees shall be imposed or general or special assessments levied upon members except by (1) a majority vote by secret ballot on such question at a general or special meeting called upon due notice, or (2) by majority vote by secret mail ballot, or (3) by majority vote of a regular convention after 30 days' notice has been given to each local or constituent labor organization.

Section 101(a)(4): Asserts the obligation of a union not to limit the right of every member of a union to sue in a court, bring a matter before an administrative agency, appear as a witness in any judicial, administrative, or legislative proceeding, or petition any legislature. This subsection provides that a union member may be required to exhaust internal remedies (not to exceed 6 months) before instituting legal or administrative proceedings. The subsection also forbids an interested employer or employer-association to directly or indirectly finance, encourage, or participate in, except as a party, any suit or proceeding referred to in this subsection.

Section 101(a)(5): Insures due process for a union member, including written specification of charges, fair hearing, and time to prepare his defense before a member may be disciplined by a labor organization.

Section 101(a)(6): Voids any provision of a union constitution or bylaws or other governing charter which is inconsistent with the provisions of this section.

Section 102: Permits any person to bring a suit in a Federal court to enforce any of the rights mentioned in section 101. Suits shall be brought in the U.S. District Court for the district in which the alleged violation occurred or where the headquarters of the labor organization is located.

Section 103: Preserves rights and remedies which any member of a labor organization has under any other State or Federal law, or before any court or other tribunal, or under any union constitution or bylaws.

TITLE II—REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE

Section 201:

(a) Requires every labor organization in an industry affecting commerce to file with the Secretary of Labor a copy of its constitution and bylaws along with specific information detailing its major internal operations.

(b) Every such labor organization must also file a detailed and comprehensive report of the union's financial operations. Under this section all trade unions dealing with employers whose operations affect commerce must file reports whether or not they desire to use the facilities of the NLRB. All of the information required to be reported by present law will be reported under this section.

(c) Requires every labor organization required to report under title II to make available information in such reports to each of its members in a form prescribed by the Secretary. This section also permits union members to inspect books and records of the union under such conditions at such times as the Secretary shall prescribe.

(d) Permits the Secretary to exempt labor organizations with fewer than 200 members and annual gross receipts of less than $20,000 from the reporting requirements of 201(b) if he finds that such exemption would not interfere with the attainment of the objectives of the act.

Section 202(a): Every officer or employee of a labor organization other than clerical employees, as defined by the Secretary of Labor, paid more than $5,000 in compensation and allowances in the preceding fiscal year is required to report to the Secretary of Labor any of six specified transactions in which he may have been involved for the preceding fiscal year which might constitute a conflict of interest. Reports from a union officer or employee are required only if they have been involved in any of the transactions enumerated in the subsection. Publicly traded securities and other securities which are publicly regulated are exempt from the reporting requirements of this section.

Section 203(a): Requires every employer engaged in an industry affecting commerce to file an annual report with the Secretary of Labor listing expenditures to persuade employees not to exercise or persuade them as to the manner in which they exercise their rights to organize and bargain collectively or to obtain information about employees or labor organizations in connection with labor disputes except that reports need not be made of adjustments in wages or other employee benefits, employer newsletter and house organs, or expenditures to obtain information to be used solely in judicial, administrative, or arbitral proceedings. This subsection also requires employer reporting of any payment, loan or expenditure of which a report is required of a union officer under section 202.

Section 203 (b) and (c): Require reports of employers and persons who enter into agreements with employers to interfere with the right of employees to organize or bargain collectively or to provide information to the employer about the activities of employees. Employers are also required to report direct or indirect loans or payments to a labor organization or officer thereof except certain legitimate payments such as for services as an employee.

Section 203 (d) and (e): Provide that no person is required to make reports covering the giving of advice to an employer to be used solely in a court, administrative agency or tribunal of arbitration or in connection with collective bargaining negotiations. No person is required to make a report if he has not engaged in the activity described therein nor is an employer required to report on the activity of a regular employee.

Section 204:

(a) Specifies that the contents of reports and documents filed under sections 201, 202, and 203 should be public information and authorizes the Secretary to publish and use such information for statistical and research purposes, and to compile and publish studies and surveys based on the data contained in reports required to be filed under title II.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to prescribe regulations permitting the inspection and examination by any person of the information contained in reports and documents filed under title II.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary to furnish copies of reports filed under title II upon a payment of a charge based on the cost of the service, provided that the Secretary may make available to a State agency copies of reports required to be filed under this title at no charge. Also provides that no person shall be required by State law to provide the information contained in a Federal report if a copy of such report is furnished to the State agency.

Section 205: Requires the maintenance and preservation of records and accounts of financial transactions necessary to verify reports required of union, employer and labor-relations consultants for such periods of time as the Secretary shall prescribe.

Section 206:

(a) Requires that initial reports required by this title be filed not later than January 1, 1960 but initial reports required by 201 (b) and 203 would only have to cover the period between enactment and January 1, 1960.

(b) Authorizes the Secretary to issue rules and regulations prescribing the form, content, and publication of reports and to prevent circumvention or evasion of reporting requirements. The Secretary is directed to provide simplified reporting forms for small unions and small business organizations but he is also given the power to require a full reporting form if he believes it desirable.

(c) Authorizes and directs the Secretary, when he believes that any person or labor organization has violated any provision of the title, to make an investigation, inspect records, and ascertain all of the facts relevant to the report in question. This subsection also authorizes the Secretary to make a full report to the members of a labor organization concerning the facts required to be reported, if any person or organization fails or refuses to file the reports as required.

Section 207: Forbids a labor organization to make loans to any officer or employee aggregating in excess of $1,500 and forbids employers to make any loan to an officer or an employee of a labor organization representing or seeking to represent his employees. This section also forbids a union or employer to pay the fine or advance the defense costs of any person indicted for or convicted of a violation of the act except that upon acquittal a person may be reimbursed for expenses incurred in his defense.

Section 208:

(a) and (b) Prescribes a fine of up to $10,000 or up to 1 year's imprisonment, or both, for willfully violating or failing to comply with any provision of title II or the rules or regulations issued thereunder, willful false statements or misrepresentations of material facts or failure to disclose information required by the title.

(c) Imposes a similar penalty upon any person who willfully destroys any books, records, reports, or statements required to be maintained under this title.

(d) Assigns personal responsibility to each person required to sign reports under sections 201 and 203 for the filing and the accuracy of statements in the reports.

Section 209:

(a) Makes the embezzlement by any person of funds or assets of a labor organization a Federal crime punishable by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not in excess of 5 years.

(b) Permits an individual union member to sue a union officer or employee suspected of embezzlement or other conversion of union funds to his own use to recover such property if the union itself has not instituted such a suit or refuses to sue to recover such property within 4 months of having been requested to do so. Such a suit may be brought in a U.S. district court but a proceeding under this subsection cannot be brought except upon leave of the court, obtained upon verified application or good cause shown. The section provides for a reasonable recovery of counsel fees and the compensation of the member for expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the litigation. Nothing in this subsection is to be construed to limit the responsibilities of union officers and employees under any other State or Federal law or to interfere with any remedy to which members may be entitled under any other statute.

Section 210:

(a) and (b) Establishes a Commissioner of Labor Reports in the Department of Labor to administer the Act. Authorizes the Secretary to appoint personnel and prosecute cases under the Act.

(c) Authorizes the Secretary to bring civil suits for appropriate remedies against violations of the reporting title (title II) only and failure to abide by regulations issued thereunder. Such actions are to be brought in U.S. district court where the violation is alleged to have occurred or, at the option of the parties, in the U.S. district court for the District of Columbia.

Section 211: Amends section 302(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 so as to clarify an ambiguity which presently exists. Under present law it is illegal for an employer to pay or deliver anything of value to a representative of his employees. The purpose of these amendments to section 302 is to forbid any payment or bribe by an employer or anyone acting on his behalf, whether technically an agent or not. The demand or acceptance of such bribes is also proscribed. This section also makes unlawful the demand or acceptance of improper unloading fees from interstate truckers. This section exempts certain bona fide payments made by an employer to his employees or to representatives of his employees. It also provides that the general ban in section 302 of the Labor-Management Relations Act upon employer payments to unions is not to apply to employer payments to trust funds, for pooled vacation benefits, or apprentice or other employee training programs.

Section 212: Requires a non-Communist oath of union officers and principal employer officers annually when the union or employer has filed a petition or complaint with the NLRB within the 12 months preceding the date when such affidavits are required to be filed. Repeals the noncommunist oath requirement in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Section 213: Bans picketing about the premises of an employer for the purpose of or as part of a conspiracy to exact a bribe. Violations of this section are punishable by a fine of $10,000 or up to 20 years' imprisonment.

TITLE III—TRUSTEESHIPS

Section 301:

(a) Requires reports by national or international unions to the Secretary within 30 days of establishment of trusteeships over subordinate unions (or within 30 days of enactment for existing trusteeships) and semiannually thereafter.

The reports are to show: (A) the union in trusteeship, (B) the date trusteeship established, (C) a detailed statement of the reason for trusteeship and its continuance, (D) the nature and extent of voting by members of the trusteed union for convention delegates and national and international officers, and (E) a detailed account of the financial condition of the trusteed union, including any funds transferred to such union's national or international union or to any other union, as of the date the trusteeship was established and as of 30 days prior to the making of the report.

(b) Provides the Secretary with the same rulemaking and publication powers he has under title II.

(c), (d), and (e) Makes failure to report, false reports or concealment or destruction of documents or records upon which report is based by responsible officers punishable by a maximum $10,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

(f) Provides that reports made by labor organizations under this section shall be made available to each member of the labor organization in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe.

Section 302: Requires the establishment and administration of a trusteeship to be in conformity with the union constitution and for correcting corruption or financial malpractice assuring the performance of agreements, restoring democratic procedures, or the achievement of legitimate union objectives.

Section 303:

(a) Makes it unlawful during trusteeship (1) to count members' votes for convention delegates or national or international officers if not by secret ballot in which all members in good standing could participate, or (2) to transfer to parent organization any funds of the trusteed union except regular per capita and assessments payable by nontrusteed unions. It is provided that upon dissolution of the trusteeship, assets may be distributed in accordance with the charter, constitution, or bylaws.

(b) Makes violation of subsection (a) punishable by a maximum $10,000 fine or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

Section 304:

(a) Provides that upon the written complaint of a member or subordinate union alleging violation of section 302, 303, or 307, the Secretary shall investigate and if he finds an unremedied violation, he may petition the appropriate Federal district court to enjoin and dissolve the trusteeship and for other appropriate relief.

(b) Provides for place and manner of bringing suit.

(c) This subsection provides that a trusteeship established by a labor organization (1) in conformity with the procedural requirements of its constitution and (2) authorized or ratified by the executive board of the labor organization after a hearing before the union's executive board or other body provided for in its constitution or bylaws, shall be presumed valid for a period of 12 months. This presumption may be rebutted by clear and convincing proof that the trusteeship was not established for a purpose allowable under section 302. After the expiration of 12 months there will be a presumption that the trusteeship is invalid in any proceeding brought by the Secretary to remove the subordinate union from trusteeship unless the labor organization can show by clear and convincing proof that the continuation of the trusteeship is necessary for a purpose allowable under section 302. If the labor organization can so show, the court may dismiss the complaint or retain jurisdiction on such conditions and for such period as it deems appropriate.

Section 305: Requires a report within 3 years by the Secretary on operation of title III.

Section 306: Makes clear that Federal suits under title III are possible only upon suit initiated by the Secretary. But all other rights and remedies at law or in equity are specifically preserved, with the limitation that when the Secretary does file a complaint the proceeding is to be exclusive and the result res judicata.

Section 307:

(a) Requires local labor organizations to forward to every member who requests them, copies of collective bargaining agreements negotiated by such organization that directly affects such member's rights as an employee. National and international labor organizations are required to forward copies of agreements negotiated by them to each constituent unit whose members are directly affected. All unions are required to keep copies of agreements at their principal places of business where they are to be available for inspection by any member or employee whose rights are directly affected.

(b) Makes violation of section 307 (a) punishable by a maximum fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

Section 308: Requires bonding of officers, agents, representatives or employees of labor organizations who handle funds of such organizations or any trust in which such organization is interested. The amount of the bond in the case of unions is to be not less than 10 percent of the union's gross income during the preceding fiscal year or $250,000, whichever is the lesser; in the case of trusts in which unions are interested, it is to be not less than 25 percent of the amount of the trust, or $250,000, whichever is the lesser.

Section 309: Requires a jury trial in proceedings for criminal contempt committed outside the immediate presence of the court in connection with civil actions instituted in the Federal courts by the Secretary or any other person under the provisions of the Act.

TITLE IV—ELECTIONS

Section 401:

(a) Provides that each national and international labor organization (except a federation of such organizations) shall elect the officers named in its constitution and the members of its executive board or similar governing body at least every 5 years by secret ballot among the membership in good standing or by vote of a convention composed of delegates chosen by secret ballot and in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws.

(b) Requires that the officers named in a local union's constitution and the members of its executive board or other similar governing body be elected at least every 3 years by a secret ballot among its members in good standing and in accordance with its constitution and bylaws. This section further provides that local labor unions are to be under a duty, enforceable in an action brought in a Federal district court by any bona fide candidate for union office, to comply with reasonable requests of any candidate to distribute his campaign literature at his expense by mail or otherwise to the local union's members and to refrain from discriminating in favor of or against any candidate with respect to the use of the union's membership list. It is specifically provided that if use of the membership list is authorized by the union or its officers on behalf of any candidate or the union itself, similar use is to be accorded to any other bona fide candidate at his request, with equal treatment as to the expense of such distribution. Adequate election safeguards are also to be provided to insure a fair count of the ballots, including the right of candidates to have observers at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

(c) Requires that officers of intermediate bodies, such as general committees, system boards, joint boards, joint councils, or other associations of labor organizations, are to be elected at least every 4 years by secret ballot among the members in good standing or by union officers representative of such members who have been elected by secret ballot and in accordance with the union's constitution and bylaws.

(d) Requires that in elections required to be held by secret ballot members of a labor organization be given a reasonable opportunity to nominate candidates, to be a candidate for and hold union office (subject to reasonable qualifications uniformly imposed) and to vote without being subject to penalty, discipline, or improper interference or reprisal by the union or any member of the union. Fifteen days' notice of date and time of any election is to be mailed to members. Every member shall have one vote, and a member whose dues are checked off under a bargaining agreement is not to be disqualified for dues default. The votes cast by members of each local union are to be counted and the results published separately. Ballots and election records are to be preserved for 1 year by appropriate officials of the union. The union constitution and bylaws is to govern the election to extent not inconsistent with the act.

(e) Provides that when delegates in a convention are to choose officers, the union constitution and bylaws are to govern and delegate credentials, minutes, and convention records pertaining to the election of officers are to be preserved for 1 year after the election.

(f) Provides that neither union nor employer funds are to be used to promote candidates in union elections subject to this title. Union funds may be used for ordinary expenses in connection with elections—for notices to members, statements to members of issues not involving candidates to be voted on, and other expenses incident to the conduct of an election.

(g) and (h) Provides that if the Secretary upon application of a member of a local union finds after a hearing in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act, that the union's constitution does not provide for the removal of an officer guilty of serious misconduct, the officer may be removed by the members voting in a secret ballot vote. The Secretary is granted authority to promulgate rules and regulations prescribing standards for carrying out subsection (g).

Section 402:

(a) Provides procedures by which a member of a labor organization who (1) has exhausted the remedies available under the constitution and bylaws of his union and of any parent body, or (2) has invoked available remedies without obtaining a final decision within 3 calendar months, may initiate proceedings through the Secretary to have the election declared invalid and a new election conducted, or a hearing and vote held on removal of a union officer, pursuant to a Federal district court order, under the direction of the Secretary. Challenged elections would be presumed valid pending a final decision, and in the interim the affairs of the union are to be conducted by the officers elected or in such other manner as the constitution and bylaws provide.

(b) Court actions to enforce the election provisions of title IV would be brought by the Secretary if, after investigation he finds probable cause to believe title IV has been violated. The Secretary would be required to bring such action within 60 days after a complaint of violation has been filed with him. If the court voids an election after a trial it is empowered by this section to preserve the property and assets of the labor organization pending the selection of new officers.

(c) In any such action the court's decision would have to be based upon a preponderance of the evidence after a trial upon the merits.

(d) An order directing an election, dismissing a complaint, or designating the elected officers of a labor organization under this section would be appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action. However, an order directing an election could not be delayed by an appeal.

Section 403: Provides that no labor organization shall be required to hold elections more frequently or by different procedures than are required by its constitution or bylaws except as otherwise provided in title IV. Existing rights and remedies to enforce union constitutions and bylaws with respect to elections prior to the conduct thereof are not affected by title IV, but the remedy provided by title IV for challenging an election already conducted is to be exclusive.

Section 404: The election provisions are to become effective—

(1) within 90 days for unions whose constitutions and bylaws can be modified to conform by its officers or interim governing bodies such as a general executive board or council; or

(2) where appropriate modification can be made only by convention, by the next convention of the labor organization or within 2 years after enactment, whichever is sooner. If no convention is held within this 2-year period, the executive board or other governing body empowered to act for the union between conventions is empowered to make interim constitutional changes necessary to carry out the act.

Section 405:

(a) Bars persons convicted of committing certain specified crimes, e.g., robbery, bribery, extortion, from holding responsible union office, or employment for a period of 5 years after serving any part of a prison term by reason of such conviction.

(b) Bars any person from holding union office or employment who fails after notice to file reports required by titles II or III and who after a hearing on a written record the Secretary finds is in violation, or who has been convicted of a violation of such titles; such bar to be effective for 5 years from the date of such determination or conviction. No union or union officer shall knowingly and willfully permit any person to assume or hold office in violation of this subsection.

(c) Violations of section 405 are punishable by a fine of up to $10,000 or imprisonment for 1 year, or both.

(d) Specifies that for purposes of section 405 a person who has been convicted is to be deemed to have been "convicted" and under disability of "conviction" from the date of the judgment of the trial court, except that if the judgment of conviction is revised on appeal, such person shall not, after the date of such reversal, be deemed to be under any disability of "conviction."

TITLE V—CODES OF ETHICAL PRACTICES—ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Section 501:

(a) Declares that it is in the national interest that labor organizations and nationwide and industrywide associations of employers engaged in industries affecting commerce shall voluntarily adopt or subscribe to codes of ethical practices obligating such labor organizations or employers, as the case may be, to adhere to principles and procedures of conduct which will effectively eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities in the administration of their affairs, in the use and expendture of their funds and in their relations with each other.

Declares that codes of ethical practices applicable to national and international labor organizations should contain provisions which will safeguard the democratic rights and privileges of members and which will eliminate and prevent improper and unethical activities on the part of labor organizations or their subordinate locals or any officer or agent thereof. Codes of ethical practices applicable to both labor organizations and employers should contain methods and procedures to assure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions of such codes.

Provides that codes of ethical practices should contain appropriate provisions for publication of the provisions of the codes so that employers and employees in the industries affected and the public will be fully apprised as to the provisions of the codes.

(b) Provides that codes of ethical practices shall not authorize or sanction any conduct on the part of any labor organization or employer or any officer, agent, or representative thereof which violates any Federal, State, or local law.

Section 502 (a), (b), and (c): Establishes an Advisory Committee on Ethical Practices to advise the Secretary on the administration of this Act, including the provisions of title I, Reporting and Disclosure; title II, Trusteeships; and title III, Union Elections; as well as title IV.

Section 503: Provides that not later than 3 years from the date of enactment of the bill the Secretary shall report to Congress on the progress achieved by labor organizations and employers engaged in industries affecting commerce in the elimination of improper activities in the administration of their affairs and the use and expenditure of their funds with particular reference to the significance of the voluntary adoption of self-policing codes of ethical practices in achieving such results.

TITLE VI—DEFINITIONS AND MISCELLANEOUS

Section 601: Contains definitions of various terms in the bill. The definition of "labor organization" contained in section 601(h) was amended on the floor of the Senate to include conferences, joint boards, joint councils, or other associations or aggregations of unions other than State federations and central labor councils and other associations formed to carry on educational activity or to represent its members before any judicial, administrative, or legislative body.

Four new definitions were added during Senate floor consideration:

Section 601(k) defines the term "trust in which a labor organization is interested" as meaning a trust or other kind of organization created or established by a union, or of which one or more of the trustees or members of the governing body are elected or appointed by a union which provides benefits for members of their union or their beneficiaries.

(l) defines "labor relations expert, advisor, or consultant" as meaning any person who advises employers or unions concerning employee organizing, concerted activities, or collective bargaining activities.

(m) defines a union "officer" as meaning any constitutional officer, and any person authorized to perform the functions of President, Vice President, Secretary, or Treasurer, or other executive or governing function.

(n) defines "member" and "member in good standing" as including any person who has fulfilled the lawful requirements of membership, and who neither has voluntarily withdrawn nor been expelled or suspended from membership after appropriate proceeding consistent with lawful provision of the union's constitution and bylaws or other governing charter.

Section 602: Provides that, except as explicitly provided to the contrary, nothing in this Act is to reduce or limit the responsibilities of any union or any of its officers, agents or representatives, or of any trust in which a labor organization is interested, or take away any right or bar any remedy to which union members are entitled under any other Federal law or any State law.

Section 603: Specifies that titles I, II, III, IV, V, and VI are not to be construed as superseding, impairing or otherwise affecting the Railway Labor Act, or any obligations, rights, benefits, privileges or immunities thereunder, or as affecting in any way rights or obligations under the National Labor Relations Act.

Section 604: Specifies that for purposes of investigations provided under the bill, the Secretary is to have subpena power, as provided in sections 9 and 10 of the Federal Trade Commission Act.

Section 605: Requires other agencies to cooperate with the Secretary in administering his functions under the act.

Section 606: Makes the Administrative Procedure Act applicable to the issuance, amendment or rescission of rules and regulations authorized by the act.

Section 607: Provides that it is unlawful for any labor organization or its officers, agents, representatives, or employees to discipline any of its members for exercising any right extended under the act. Also makes it unlawful for any person to coerce or restrain by force or violence, or threat of force or violence or by economic reprisal or threat thereof any union member for the purpose of interfering with or preventing the exercise of rights under the act. Violation of this section would be punishable by a maximum fine of $10,000, imprisonment for 2 years, or both.

Section 608: Preserves the authority of States to enact general criminal laws with respect to certain enumerated crimes, namely, robbery, bribery, extortion, embezzlement, grand larceny, burglary, arson, violation of narcotics laws, murder, rape, assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to commit grievous bodily injury, and conspiracy to commit any such crime.

Section 609: Requires unions to inform their members concerning the act and the rights guaranteed them by the act in a manner prescribed by the Secretary.

Section 610: Provides that every officer, agent, or other representative of a union or of a trust in which a union is interested shall, "with respect to any money or other property in his custody or possession by virtue of his position * * *, have a relationship of trust to any such labor organization and the members thereof, or to any such trust and the beneficiaries thereof, and shall be responsible in a fiduciary capacity for such money or other property, notwithstanding any exculpatory clauses or action purporting to exempt him from such responsibility."

Section 611: Protects confidential information obtained by attorneys in the course of legitimate attorney-client relationships.

Section 612: Contains usual separability clause.

TITLE VII—AMENDMENTS TO THE LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947, AS AMENDED

Section 701: Authorizes the State and Territorial agencies, other than courts, to exercise jurisdiction in labor relations cases where the National Labor Relations Board has declined to act. The State or Territorial agency, however, is to apply the Federal law set forth in sections 8(a) and (b) and 9 of the NLRA as interpreted by the Board and the Federal courts. Injunctive relief under sections 10(j) and (l) is to be available to such agency but petitions under section 10(j) may be filed only when expressly approved by the General Counsel of the NLRB. Federal district courts are to be available to any such State or Territorial agency for enforcement of its orders and any person aggrieved by any such order may obtain review in the Federal district courts. In such cases the district court shall proceed in the same manner and have the same jurisdiction as it would have if the case had been brought by the State or Territorial agency.

Section 702:

(a) Permits an employer primarily engaged in the building and construction industry to enter into agreements with labor organizations despite the fact that the union's majority status has not been established under section 9 of the act. The section also permits the union shop provisions of such a contract to take effect within 7 days of hiring. No other change is made in union security limitations now in the law. The agreements could also provide for: Employer notification to the union of job openings and opportunity for the union to refer qualified applicants for the openings. Agreements for apprenticeship qualifications, experience, industry, or geographical seniority would be permissible to meet the peculiar needs of the industry. It is specifically provided that a contract permitted by this section would not be a bar to a representation or decertification election.

(b) This subsection specifically provides that the union security provisions of agreements permitted by (a) are subject to prohibiting the execution or application of such agreements.

Section 703: Amends the National Labor Relations Act to provide that economic strikers shall vote in representation elections even though they have been replaced in the course of a lawful strike under such regulations as the National Labor Relations Board finds are consistent with the purpose and provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 704: Amends the definition of the term "supervisor" contained in present law so as to make clear that it does not apply to service assistants in the communications industry.

Section 705: Authorizes prehearing elections in union representation cases under a procedure whereby the National Labor Relations Board, when there are no substantial issues between the parties, is authorized to hold a representation election 45 days following the receipt of notice of the filing of the petition. Aggrieved parties are assured a hearing, however, before the Board certifies the results of the election if they request such a hearing.

Section 706: Grants authority to the President to designate an Acting General Counsel when a vacancy in the office occurs pending appointment of a new General Counsel.

Section 707:

(a) Makes it an unfair labor practice for a union in a common carrier subject to part 2 of the Interstate Commerce Act to enter into so-called hot-cargo agreements.

(b) Specifies that the duty to bargain includes the mutual obligation of employers and the unions representing their employees to refrain from proposing or conditioning any contract upon a clause violating section 701(a).

(c) Provides that hot-cargo agreements violating section 701(a) are unenforceable and void.

(d) Makes the mandatory injunction provisions contained in section 10(1) of the National Labor Relations Act applicable to the prohibition of hot-cargo agreements contained in section 701(a).

Section 708:

(a) Adds to the National Labor Relations Act a new union unfair labor practice prohibiting picketing or threats to picket with the objective of forcing or requiring an employer to recognize or bargain with a union or force or requiring employees to accept or select such union as their bargaining representative under the following conditions:

(1) Where the employer has recognized another union (not established, maintained or assisted by any unfair labor practice defined in section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act) and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act; or

(2) Where a valid election under section 9(c) has been held within the preceding 9 months unless the union has been certified or has been designated or selected as the employee's bargaining representative by the majority of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) Makes the mandatory injunction provisions of section 10(1) of the National Labor Relations Act applicable to the enforcement of the new section 8(b)(7) added to the National Labor Relations Act by section 701(a). Such relief is to be subject to the limitation that it will be a defense to a charge filed under section 8(b)(7) that an unfair labor practice under section 8(a) has been committed. Where there is a failure to seek such relief the Board is to promptly make public the reasons for such failure.

Section 709: Adds to section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act a new subsection (m) providing that charges of unfair labor practices under sections 8(a)(3) or 8(b)(2) are to be given priority over all other cases except cases of like character and cases arising under section 10(1).

Mr. KENNEDY. I wish to express again my appreciation to Prof. Archibald Cox, of Harvard University, who contributed his services voluntarily last year and this year in the preparation of the bill on a completely nonpartisan basis. He now serves as chairman of the so-called Blue Ribbon Commission.

I wish also to express my appreciation to the majority members of the staff, Mr. Dungan, counsel for the Subcommittee on Labor, and Mr. Merrick, who is counsel of the Subcommittee on Railroad Retirement Problems, and is an expert in this field.

On the minority side, I wish to express my appreciation to Mr. Bertstein and various assistants of Senators who played a large role in bringing the bill to the floor of the Senate.

As I have said, the work in the Senate represents a bipartisan bill on a nonpartisan subject, and I am hopeful that in the other body it will continue to receive support from both sides of the aisle.

ADJOURNMENT TO 10:30 O'CLOCK A.M. TOMORROW

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I now move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 10:30 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 33 minutes p.m.), the Senate adjourned, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Thursday, April 30, 1959, at 10:30 o'clock a.m.

Edwin A. Robson, of Illinois, to be U.S. district judge for the northern district of Illinois.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1959

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Reverend Alonzo Jordan, chaplain, North Carolina House of Representatives, Raleigh, N.C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, in the quietness of these moments, we come to talk with Thee just now. Wilt Thou behold us with favor because we come to Thee with gratitude in our hearts, thanking Thee for Thy blessings, for Thy love, and for Thy mercy.

We come praying, our Father, for Thy blessings upon these Representatives, the servants of the people, and we pray that Thou wouldst be with them in their work. And may we all this morning be Thy servants. May we be like the prophet of old, Samuel, who, as a child when he heard Thy voice said:

"Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth."

Bless our work today and go with us through the day. And may we so work this day and all the days of our lives that when we come to the twilight hour and darkness has fallen upon the day of life, may we not be afraid, but may Thy voice be sweet and clear to us, and may we hear, "Thou hast been faithful over a few things; I will make thee ruler over many things, and enter thou into the joy of thy love."

For we pray our prayer in our blessed Saviour's name and for His sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution, as follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION 112

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Honorable JAMES G. POLK, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn until 11 antemeridian tomorrow.

The message also announced that the Senate having proceeded to reconsider the bill (S. 144) entitled "An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953", returned by the President of the United States to the Senate, in which it originated, with his objections, and passed by the Senate on a reconsideration of the same, it was

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. CARLSON members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the U.S. Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 59–9.

MODIFICATION OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. II OF 1939 AND REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

April 28 (legislative day April 27), 1959.

The Senate having proceeded to reconsider the bill (S. 144) entitled "An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953," returned by the President of the United States to the Senate, in which it originated, with his objections, and passed by the Senate on a reconsideration of the same, it was

"Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative."

Attest:

FELTON M. JOHNSTON,
Secretary.

MODIFICATION OF REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. II OF 1939 AND REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1953—VETO MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 144, "An act to modify Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939 and Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1953."

The bill provides that, in the approval and disapproval of loans, the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) shall not be subject to the supervision, direction, or other control of the Secretary of Agriculture. In all other respects the functions and activities of the REA would be exercised within the Department of Agriculture under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary.

Were S. 144 to become law it would mark a major retreat from sound administrative policy and practice. Twenty years ago the REA, then an independent agency, was by reorganization plan placed within the Department of Agriculture and under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary. The President, in his message transmitting Reorganization Plan No. II of 1939, said that the proposed reorganization was for the "sole purpose of improving the administrative management of the executive branch."

That action of 20 years ago accords entirely with the later finding of the first Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch that: "There must be a clear line of authority reaching down through every step of the organization and no subordinate should have authority independent of that of his superior."

Because S. 144 violates this sound injunction I am compelled to disapprove it.

Moreover, there is nothing in the recent history of the REA which affords any basis for concluding that the best interests of the agency or the public would be served by removing the Administrator's loan-making authority from the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture.

The REA since its inception has moved steadily in the accomplishment of its mission. When the agency was established, only a small percentage of the Nation's farms had central station electric service. Today 96 percent of our farmers have such service and about one-half the increase has been provided by REA financed facilities.

In the past 6 years the REA financed systems have made their greatest progress. Loans of more than a billion dollars have been made in this period, nearly half as much as was loaned by the agency in the previous 17½ years of its existence. Power sales have more than doubled since 1952, loan delinquencies have been reduced to the vanishing point and the net worth of electric borrowers has more than tripled. Plant investment for these systems has more than doubled in the past decade. The REA telephone loan program, authorized in 1949, has resulted in loan approvals which now total approximately $500 million and modern dial telephone service is rapidly being extended to the Nation's rural areas.

The REA has been working well and progressing efficiently under the existing administrative arrangements. The change in those arrangements proposed by S. 144 would be contrary to the public interest.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1959.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move that further consideration of the President's message be postponed until tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may sit during general debate today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR STANDARDS AND COMMITTEE ON LABOR-MANAGEMENT

Mr. LANDRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor Standards and the Committee on Labor-Management, sitting as a joint committee, have permission to sit this afternoon during general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

WE NEED IMMEDIATE ACTION ON THE HOUSING BILL

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, since February 27, 1959, the housing bill has been locked up in the rules committee. On Thursday, April 16, after hearings on the bill, S. 57, a tie vote in the committee denied a rule on this important legislation. I was glad to hear yesterday that the Speaker indicated that he expected that the tie would be broken very soon in favor of the bill.

The housing bill is important to our Nation's economy. Every day's delay on this legislation is harmful. The bill means jobs for unemployed workmen in our country. It means improved college housing. It means better homes, fewer slums and an increased gross national product.

This week I receive another letter urging that the housing bill be brought to the floor for action. I have received many such letters.

This letter came from Dr. O. Meredith Wilson, president of the University of Oregon in Eugene.

Dr. Wilson writes, in part:

We have been disturbed by discovery that the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives has refused to clear the college housing bill for consideration.

This university, with other institutions in the State system of higher education here in Oregon, has made application for housing loans under the bill. We are also aware of the fact that many of our fellow institutions throughout the country have been dependent upon the housing bill much more directly than we. In our judgment, it is one of the ways in which the Federal Government can help education without any threat to local autonomy and with considerable help for the development of schools during a period of rapid expansion.

Dr. Wilson urges the earliest possible action and so do I.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SILER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 31]

Andersen, Minn.	Davis, Tenn.	Miller, N.Y.
Ashley	Diggs	Perkins
Barry	Downing	Randall
Bonner	Glenn	Ray
Brewster	Hoffman, Mich.	Rivers, S.C.
Buckley	Holifield	Roberts
Bush	Jensen	Tollefson
Carter	Kilburn	Westland
Casey	King, Calif.	Whitten
Cooley	McMillan
	McSween

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 400 Members answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

REREFERENCE OF CERTAIN BILLS

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bills H.R. 3244 and H.R. 3991 for the relief of Harold N. Ward be rereferred from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

AMENDING RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937, THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT, AND THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 248 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5610) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed four hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5610 is of direct and in many cases of vital importance to some 2 million of our fellow citizens and their families. These include railroad men and women of America, actively employed by railroads and also the retired and unemployed. These people have been patiently waiting for Congress to act on this legislation for several years.

The high cost of living and inflation has been devastating on the retired citizen during the last few years. The unemployed railroad workers, whether permanent or temporary, has been shut out of the market for most of life's ordinary conveniences by reason of conditions beyond his or her control.

During the 85th session of Congress, the railroad retirement legislation was postponed and inexcusably neglected. A great number of our Members constantly fought to secure favorable action on railroad retirement legislation but to no avail. The time has finally arrived for the Congress to act.

The purpose of this legislation is, generally speaking, to strengthen and place on a sound self-supporting basis the railroad retirement and the railroad unemployment insurance system.

Each Member of the House should acquaint himself with all the provisions of H.R. 5610. The bill has outstanding merits and it also contains several provisions which are highly detrimental to the railroad workers and their families.

The most important provisions of H.R. 5610, as approved by a majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, are these:

First. It would generally increase railroad retirement benefits by 10 percent. It would also liberalize the railroad retirement system in several minor ways.

Second. The bill would raise the rates for railroad retirement taxes. These taxes are levied equally on railroad employes and on the railroads themselves. At present, both sides pay at the rate of 6¼ percent of each employee's compensation up to $350 a month. The bill would raise this tax rate to 6¾ percent from date of enactment to the beginning of 1962. Thereafter, the rate would go to 7¼ percent. Also, if in future years, the scheduled increases in social security taxes go into effect, similar increases would also be imposed in railroad retirement taxes. Moreover, the bill raises the taxable earnings base from $350 to $400 a month, effective with enactment.

Third. The bill would increase the maximum daily rate for railroad unemployment and sickness benefits by roughly 20 percent. It would extend to unemployed railroaders the same type of limited emergency prolongation of benefits that we voted for other unemployed workers last year. Jobless railroaders did not benefit from that emergency legislation last year.

Fourth. The bill would increase the tax ceiling for railroad unemployment insurance from 3 to 3½ percent and make other provisions needed to save this unemployment insurance fund from bankruptcy. These taxes, in contrast to the railroad retirement taxes, are paid solely by the railroads.

Fifth. H.R. 5610 would curtail or abolish certain unemployment and sickness benefits presently enjoyed by the railroad workers. The committee report estimates the value of these curtailments at $21.4 million a year. The workers would lose that amount, the railroads would gain it.

These are the main provisions in the bill. I should like to make two general comments:

First. I would emphasize that this benefit bill we are asked to discuss will not cost the U.S. Treasury one penny.

Second. This bill reminds us that the railroads and their workers are not under the general social security and unemployment insurance system. Instead, they have a special system of their own. This system is approved alike by spokesmen for the railroads and for their employees.

In some ways, the railroad system is more liberal than the general social insurance system; it is also more costly. The chief reason for this development, I believe, can be found in the fact that the Congress for many years, through the Railway Labor Act, has imposed special restrictions on collective bargaining and the right to strike in the railroad industry.

As a result, while organized workers in other industries have won supplemental pensions and unemployment and sickness benefits directly from their own industries—often by lengthy strikes—the railroad workers and their unions have turned more often to the legislative path to secure some of the same gains.

Let me now turn to a very brief interview of the legislative history behind H.R. 5610. This starts in the year 1956, when the Congress voted a 10-percent increase in most railroad retirement annuities. However, Congress then provided no increase in the tax rate to pay for those higher benefits.

At that time, spokesmen for both the railway brotherhoods and the industry assured Members that they would support the needed tax increases in the next Congress. President Eisenhower signed the 1956 act on the understanding, he said, that the needed financing would be forthcoming.

In the 85th Congress, the railway brotherhoods came to Congress with a bill which might be called the granddaddy of the present H.R. 5610. However, the grandparent was quite a bit larger and more comprehensive than the present offspring, H.R. 5610.

The 1957 bill provided a further 10 percent increase in retirement benefits, to relieve retirees from the effects of the constantly rising cost of living. It provided for tax increases on the employees and the railroads to pay for both the 1956 rise in benefits and the new rise. It also provided for a rise in the daily rate of unemployment benefits. Broadly speaking, in these various respects, the 1957 bill was not greatly different from our present H.R. 5610.

However, the 1957 bill also contained a major section designed to meet the fast growing problem of long-service railroad employees being thrown out on the streets because of increasing automation and declining passenger traffic on the railroads. This section of the 1957 bill provided extended unemployment benefits ranging up to 4½ years for railroad employees with 20 years or more of service who were laid off and unable to find new work for that long a period.

For various reasons, which I need not detail here, that 1957 bill did not emerge from the committees in either Chamber in 1957. Nor did it emerge in 1958 until near the end of the session.

When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did report out that bill last summer, it cut down sharply on the proposal for extended unemployment benefits. Last year's committee bill provided such extended benefits for just 13 weeks for laid-off employees with 10 to 15 years of service, and 26 weeks for laid-off employees with 15 or more years of service.

In the closing days of the last session, that committee bill was not granted a rule. In the other chamber, however, a vote was taken last summer during the closing days of the session. The Senate, by a large majority then approved a bill also limiting the extended unemployment benefits to the 13- and 26-week periods.

An attempt to bring the Senate bill to the floor of this House was defeated by an objection. Thus Members of the House in the 85th Congress had no opportunity to vote on the matter.

This year, the gentleman from Arkansas, chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the gentleman from Michigan, senior minority member of that committee, and numerous other Members of the House, introduced bills substantially identical to the measure that passed the other Chamber last summer.

Members will note, however, that the bill reported from the committee this year, that is, H.R. 5610, was still further changed. The two most important changes, I should say, are:

First. H.R. 5610 has dropped completely the idea of a regular system of extended unemployment benefits for long-service railroad workers. The 4½-year proposal went out last year. Now the 13 to 26 weeks are gone too. Nothing whatever of the former bill's provisions on this problem is left in H.R. 5610.

Second. H.R. 5610 cuts back or abolishes already existing unemployment and sickness benefits in certain cases. The committee bill last year did not do that. I note also that a minority of the committee, consisting of 11 members, have announced their opposition to H.R. 5610 and their continued support of the bills, including H.R. 1012 introduced earlier in this session. This rule should be adopted and I hope that the Members after debate will substitute H.R. 1012 for the pending bill.

Thus we are dealing here with a controversial subject. It is not my purpose now to debate the merits of the controversy. What I do wish to urge on the House is that it is high time we reach some conclusion on this matter.

Extended hearings have been held by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. All parties have been heard. Two million Americans and their families have been waiting long years for us to act. Many of these folks, whether retired or unemployed, are in real need. We owe them, at the very least, a decision on this legislation.

I reserve the balance of my time and yield 30 minutes to my colleague on the Rules Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has explained that this is an open rule, providing for 4 hours of general debate, for amendments under the 5-minute rule, and for one motion to recommit.

Last year this body passed the Transportation Act of 1958 by the vote of 348 to 2. We realized that the railroads were in serious financial trouble, caused mostly by conditions over which they themselves had no control. As a result of our action, the railroads were able to repair old equipment, to purchase new equipment, and to give employment that otherwise they would not have been able to do.

While the Transportation Act of 1958 dealt for the most part, perhaps, with railroad problems and came to be known by some as the railroad bill, its provisions were not by any means designed for the assistance, development, and welfare of the railroads alone. It was needed by and it benefited all forms of regulated, common-carrier transport—it was needed by and benefited shippers and consumers, and the public generally.

Interest in that bill was highlighted, it is true, by the plight of the railroad industry—especially certain parts of that industry—but an equally serious problem was posed by the weakening of our entire regulated, or common-carrier, system of transportation.

I believe all will agree that the railroads are still in serious financial trouble, especially the eastern railroads. We must be realistic as to just how much of an added tax burden the railroads can stand. I do not know whether they can withstand the impact of the provisions contained in H.R. 5610—but those provisions are much to be desired over the provisions of H.R. 1012.

Since it is apparent that it is the desire of the Congress to pass some legislation in the field of railroad retirement and unemployment insurance, I wish to congratulate the chairman and members of the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for favorably reporting H.R. 5610 which was reported after the committee held lengthy public hearings in lieu of H.R. 1012.

The bill presently before us—which, I reiterate, is a better bill than H.R. 1012—would add an immediate payroll tax increase paid by the railroads—of about $100 million a year. It has been reliably estimated that future tax increases provided in this bill would eventually add approximately $225 million to the railroads' payroll taxes.

One must not forget that these added tax burdens of hundreds of millions of dollars affect the railroads solely—the railroads' competitors are not affected.

One would not have to be an Einstein to know that these added tax burdens of hundreds of millions of dollars a year must inevitably result in loss of railroad jobs, purchase of fewer new cars and locomotives, reduced maintenance of property and equipment, and less transportation service.

I feel that this country needs a railroad system, and I would like to preserve it.

It seems probable to me that placing additional financial burdens on them will eventually put them out of the picture entirely.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SISK].

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to rise today to call the attention of the Members and the Nation to our country's pioneer and longest celebrated event honoring a great food industry—the 50th annual celebration of National Raisin Week on May 3 through 9.

This important agricultural industry is centered around Fresno, Calif., in the district I represent. The great, fertile San Joaquin Valley of California produces almost all the raisins grown in the United States and about one-half of the world's supply. Through the years, raisins have contributed greatly to California's economy. Since 1851, thousands of our farmers have depended on the stability and vigor of the raisin industry. From a 500-ton crop in 1878, the industry has grown to an average in current years of about 220,000 tons, with a first sale value of around $40 million. Some 100,000 persons, including growers, processors, employees and their families, depend upon this income, and their purchases from stores and all the people with whom they do business spreads the amount throughout the economy of the State.

Raisins are a versatile food, with a great variety of uses to provide fine flavor and quick energy, alone or in combination with other food products. Current research by the industry and by Government is ever widening and broadening uses and opening new markets.

Our raisin industry is progressive and is quick to adopt means of helping itself. It was one of the first agricultural industries to broaden and stabilize its markets by nationwide advertising, and I am sure many of you will recall the pictured and printed question: "Had your iron today?"

The raisin industry has stabilized itself and taken effective steps to reopen foreign markets under a national marketing order, and, in addition, is carrying on an effective and continuing market promotion program under the direction of the California Raisin Advisory Board, organized under a California State marketing order. It has adopted the most modern methods of culture, processing and packing. This progressive and creative attitude is helping solve surplus problems in this industry, and I think the same principles will work equally well in other agricultural fields in which there may be periodic surpluses, if the Congress will provide the proper climate by urgently needed amendments and improvements to our marketing order machinery. Incidentally, this year there is a short crop, and raisins are scarce. I advise you to provide for your needs while they are available.

It is particularly appropriate that during the coming week we look back on the first observance of National Raisin Week 50 years ago. In 1909 the event was celebrated locally in the streets of Fresno, raisin capitol of the world, with a parade and auto races. The races, held on a steeply banked board track, were record breaking events. Famous drivers of the era included Barney Oldfield, Ralph DePalma and many other pioneer drivers. Parade floats were the most magnificent and costly of the day, some of them costing more than $10,000.

The people of the San Joaquin Valley are proud of their most distinctive product, which is of worldwide reputation for its golden goodness and they invite the Nation and the world to join with them during the coming week in marking the golden anniversary of the granddaddy of all food industry "weeks."

I am sure my colleagues will want to join with me and the people of my district in our observance of National Raisin Week, honoring a great and progressive agricultural industry.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5610) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5610, with Mr. NATCHER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 40 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is presenting to you, as you were advised a moment ago during the discussion of the rule, the bill, H.R. 5610, to amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chairman, I plan to insert a full and detailed explanation of this bill in the RECORD and will undertake then to explain to the House the provisions of this bill and the problems in connection therewith.

First, let me say to my colleagues that no one here is more aware of the interest in this legislation than I. No one here realizes and understands more than I the controversial nature of it. No one here knows better than I or any other member of our committee, the importance of this legislation as well as some of the claims and contentions that have been made by those who have varying viewpoints. Because of that, I am going to ask the indulgence of my colleagues, to listen to me and to the other members of the committee, explain precisely the provisions of this legislation. We have had numerous people call on us and explain to us the problem that we have here from their own viewpoint, and certainly in their own interest.

Mr. Chairman. This is a highly technical and complicated bill. In such a program of social insurance benefits, it is necessarily complicated. There is a lot involved here. I trust the members of the Committee will endeavor to follow me as I explain this problem because I fear that some of us might have been influenced by certain efforts that have been exerted on the part of various people.

In the first place, let me take you back to 1951. This Congress, in an effort to provide the finest and the best Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Acts, extended benefits—both retirement benefits and unemployment insurance and sickness benefits—to the employees of the railroad industry. At that time there were approximately 1,400,000 employees in the industry. In 1951, this Congress extended and liberalized the benefits not only to the retired railroad employees themselves and those who become unemployed but also to dependents including the spouse and the widow and other surviving dependents of the railroad employee. In doing so, we integrated the railroad retirement program with the social security program. That was in 1951. Since that time there has been in effect a reinsurance of the railroad retirement program under social security. There is a transfer from the railroad retirement account to the social security trust fund an amount equivalent to the taxes which railroad employees and their employers would have had to pay if they were covered by the Social Security Act and in return there is a reverse transfer of funds which represent the benefits which social security would have had to pay these employees.

Under the retirement program there are today some 725,000 individuals who are drawing benefits from the railroad retirement fund.

Today, because of technology, because of business conditions, because of competitive conditions that exist in the transportation industry, of which we all know, the railroad industry has been losing some of its business. In fact, it has not been keeping up, percentagewise, with the total volume of freight and passenger service, and today there has been a reduction in the total rolls of employment in the railroad industry from 1,400,000 employees in 1950 to 810,000 employees a few months ago. In other words, in less than 10 years there has been a reduction in the number of employees in the railroad industry of some 600,000.

I present that to you as a very serious situation. To me that is a very bad situation for the railroad industry, which is the basic transportation system of this country. Everybody knows we have got to maintain the railroads. Service to the people of this country and our national defense requires it.

Last year, realizing the terrific condition that was presented to the Congress, we tried to do something to stabilize the railroad industry. That is a problem which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Congress considered for 5 years before we passed the Transportation Act of 1958 to try to help the railroad industry.

In 1956, realizing that it was necessary to meet the increased cost of living, the Congress increased the railroad retirement benefits by 10 percent. We did not provide for the financing of this increase. When we increased the benefits by 10 percent we also increased the long-term actuarial deficit to $169 million a year on a net level basis. Today the actuarial deficiency is $213 million a year on a net level cost basis. The Congress and the railway brotherhoods agreed at that time that we would provide increased taxes to take care of the deficiency in the retirement account, and that in 1957 we would come back and make up the deficit.

There is one thing everybody agrees to regardless of all the controversy in this program, and that is the necessity of maintaining an actuarially sound fund in the retirement program. There are too many people who are dependent upon this fund. The President, when he signed the bill in 1956, made a statement urging the Congress to make up the deficit in 1957.

In 1957 a bill, H.R. 4353, was introduced in an effort to carry out the commitment made by all of us. There were further liberalizing proposals in the bill, including both retirement benefits and unemployment benefits.

The committee was prepared to take action on the pending bill but was requested to defer such action, pending the outcome of a separate bill—H.R. 5551, 85th Congress—pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, which provided for the exclusion of employee retirement taxes from gross income for purposes of the employee's income tax and from withholding at the source. Therefore, no bill was reported by the committee during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

In the interim the 1958 amendments to the Social Security Act gave a 7-percent increase in retirement benefits and survivor benefits. Many retired annuitants and survivors under the Railroad Retirement system received the benefit of that increase under social security in addition to the 10 percent prior to that time. This occurred because of the social security minimum guaranty provision of the Railroad Retirement Act provides that in no case will monthly benefits payable to retired employees and their wives and the survivors of such employees be less than the amounts the social security system would pay them if railroad employment were covered by that system.

At the close of the session last year when it became so apparent that H.R. 5551 would not pass, the committee at the urging of those interested, endeavored to report a bill. We reported a bill that would have provided an additional increase of 7 percent in retirement and survivor benefits, and that would have liberalized and increased benefits under the unemployment insurance program. That would have made the retirement and unemployment insurance funds sound by increasing the amounts to be paid both by the employers and the employees in the case of retirement and by employers in case of the unemployment insurance programs. That was at the close of the session. It would have granted in addition thereto a 20 percent increase in the daily benefit rates for unemployment and for sickness. It would have extended on a temporary basis to the less than 10-year employees 13 additional weeks of unemployment benefits; to those from 10 to 15 years of service 13 permanent additional weeks of extended unemployment benefits; and those who were employed longer than 15 years a total of 26 additional weeks of extended unemployment benefits which would make a total of 52 weeks of unemployment insurance benefits for this group of workers with 15 or more years of service.

As you know, there was a logjam that came up in the House of Representatives. In the meantime, the other body had reported a bill. The chairman of the subcommittee came over and talked to me and some others here on the floor of the House. This was an effort to try to overcome some of the controversies, because neither side liked it. The railway brotherhoods did not like it.

The railroads did not like it. But we were trying to work out something. So we agreed that we would undertake to work out this modification or compromise. But when the bill came over from the other body it was tacked on to a bill amending the Longshoreman's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act which had nothing whatsoever to do with this program. It was an honest attempt to try to get something through, but it was blocked here on the floor of the House. So the whole thing died without anything being done.

At the outset of the present Congress, as chairman of the committee, I reintroduced the bill which became H.R. 1012, the one you heard so much about. We held hearings on that bill. We had executive sessions. The original bill introduced had a retroactive date for both benefit and tax payments to January 1, 1959. But we all knew this could not work, that you cannot go back to January 1 of this year and collect taxes from people who are not now working in the industry. There has been a turnover of something like 20,000 a month that have gone from the railroad industry to some other work, or for some reason are not any longer working for the industry. Therefore, you cannot go back to January 1 and collect taxes from somebody who does not work there any more. So it becomes a practical situation. Therefore, the committee changed the effective date of this bill, so that it would take effect on the first month following 46 days after the date of enactment, which gives the Railroad Retirement Board and the railroad industry a chance to take care of the paperwork in order to make these payments to the employees.

The retirement and taxing provisions of this bill, both the 10 percent increase and the amount of increased payments for both employer and employee, are identical, with the proposal in H.R. 1012 as it was originally proposed.

We have a bill here, H.R. 5610, that in the first place grants another 10 percent increase to the retired employees. That is what most of these people all over the Nation have been writing us about. They are interested in some increase to take care of the increased cost of living. So, therefore, there is no controversy over that phase of it. There is no controversy over amendments to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act because both bills are identical in this respect.

Part 3 of this bill is the part that is in controversy. That part contains the amendments to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. The committee read the bill paragraph by paragraph and went over a lot of these things that had been brought to the attention of the committee over a period of years and considered to be abuses. The committee has worked its will and considered everyone of these proposals. It has turned down many of them as not being in the best interest, but it did adopt amendments that would affect the unemployment insurance benefits in five principal respects. These are:

First. The committee bill provides for extended, retroactive, temporary unemployment benefits of 13 additional weeks to all employees, regardless of length of service, who had exhausted, during last year's recession, their rights to normal unemployment benefits under present law, which could be as much as 130 compensable days, or 26 weeks in a benefit year. These temporary benefits are the same as those generally provided for all other industries by the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958. H.R. 1012 would provide a temporary extension of benefits of 13 additional weeks to employees with less than 10 years of service, a permanent extension of 13 weeks to employees with 10 to 15 years of service, and a permanent extension of 26 weeks to employees with 15 or more years of service, provided they meet certain eligibility conditions specified in the bill.

Second. The committee bill eliminates the payment of maternity benefits, whereas H.R. 1012 does not change existing law which provides for maternity benefits.

Third. The committee bill would disqualify an employee for unemployment and sickness benefits if he leaves his railroad job voluntarily without good cause, and for unemployment benefits if he is discharged or suspended for misconduct related to his work. In the case of voluntary quits or discharges the disqualification would end when he has returned to work for a railroad and has worked at least 20 days. In the case of suspension the disqualification would end when the period of suspension ends.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law which permits an employee who quits voluntarily without good cause to claim unemployment benefits after a 30-day disqualification, and sickness benefits immediately, and permits an employee discharged or suspended for misconduct to claim unemployment benefits immediately.

Fourth. The committee bill provides that an employee cannot claim sickness benefits for any period which is more than 90 days after the day on which he last worked in the railroad industry. Other slight modifications are proposed in the sickness benefit program. H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law under which an employee who has left the railroad industry may, nevertheless, claim sickness benefits which could be as much as 130 compensable days or 26 weeks during the benefit year.

Fifth. The committee bill does not change existing law which provides that unemployment benefits may be paid for only 7 out of 14 days in the first registration period (consisting of 14 days) in a new benefit year. H.R. 1012 would provide for 10 compensable days during the first registration period, the same as the law now provides for subsequent registration periods.

Both the committee bill and H.R. 1012 provide for an average increase of 20 percent in the daily benefit rates for unemployment and for sickness.

Both bills provide for a maximum tax rate of 3½ percent of payroll up to $400 a month for each employee paid only by the railroad industry to finance the unemployment and sickness insurance programs, which is one-half of 1 percent more than is required under present law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it should be pointed out that the table of unemployment benefits that was written into H.R. 5610 is exactly the same table of benefits that was introduced originally in H.R. 1012; is that not correct?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; the same table of daily benefit rates that we have had before us now for the last 3 years in trying to resolve this matter.

The committee considered extended benefits, and in view of the fact that all industry in the United States, by the recommendation of the President and the action of this Congress, was given 13 additional weeks of unemployment compensation on a temporary basis, it was decided that everybody in the railroad industry should have the same thing. So, the committee then adopted an amendment that would give 13 additional weeks of unemployment insurance benefits on a temporary basis to those who became unemployed from June 1, 1958, until April of this year. That is precisely the same program that was presented to the employees and for the employees of all other industries throughout the United States.

Now, someone said that is a terrible thing to do to the employees. Let me show you the difference in costs between H.R. 5610 and H.R. 1012. Thirteen additional weeks on a temporary basis, to all unemployed in the railroad industry, would cost approximately $20 million. In H.R. 1012 the extended unemployment benefit program would cost $13½ million a year for men with 10 or more years of service and from $15 million to $18 million to provide the temporary unemployment benefits for men with less than 10 years of service.

Therefore, we do not feel as some have said in a letter that you have received, that the committee has slaughtered the bill. We do not believe, as was stated in a letter from the railroad industry, the other side, that the committee has slaughtered the industry. We do not feel that at all. We feel that the committee has worked its will and, from all the evidence it heard and the facts established in the record of the committee, has worked out a bill that is fair and reasonable and one that will do some good. And yet it will get rid of certain abuses.

Now, what are those abuses? In addition to the extended benefit differences that I have explained, there are four other differences in the bill. Ever since the 1948 amendments to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act there has been a controversy over what is referred to as maternity benefits. That is a rather delicate subject to discuss, but yet an important one. And I hope no one accuses me or the committee of being against motherhood on this, but we have heard so much about this over a period of time that I think it important to discuss it.

Under the present program adopted in 1949 a woman who is employed in the industry and who becomes pregnant is automatically entitled to a certain number of days prior to the birth and a certain number of days following the birth. That can go up to a maximum of 130 days. There have been all kinds of reports of abuses.

What the committee did was to strike that automatic entitlement and left it in the sickness and benefit program. In other words, if a woman is sick or ill from pregnancy, she gets the benefits she is entitled to have under the sickness program. If after the birth of the child she is ill because of that condition or situation and it is shown in the regular way, then she is entitled to draw that benefit.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Illinois.

Mrs. CHURCH. I wonder if the gentleman could give us any idea whether or not the particular types of occupation which the women fill would endanger them, whether they were ill or not, if they were pregnant?

Mr. HARRIS. Usually they are office employees.

Mrs. CHURCH. Can the gentleman tell me the numbers or types of office employees?

Mr. HARRIS. No, I do not believe we had information broken down to show the numbers, as to whether they were typists or bookkeepers or secretaries, and so forth. But I would say that practically all of them would be office employees. There are some 4,000 such cases a year; I believe I am correct in that figure. That is, that number have received such benefits at a cost of approximately $3.5 million a year.

That is the second of the differences, although I do not call them the major differences. I think there is only one real major difference here, and that is the extended unemployment benefits, whether we are going to give and whether we can afford to provide on a permanent basis at an additional cost of $13.5 million a year which will have to be financed probably from increased freight rates, which your people and mine are going to have to pay. It has to be made up because only the railroad industry pays it. We are increasing the tax on the railroad industry from 3 to 3½ percent of the payroll. If we give all of the benefits provided in H.R. 1012, you might as well make up your minds that you are going to have to increase the tax to 4 percent. It will be necessary because the fund is depleted. By June of this year there will not be enough money in that fund to pay the unemployed and sick what they are entitled to have unless we do something about restoring it in some way. So in order to meet that we have provided an amendment here that the Board can borrow from the retirement fund on a temporary basis such funds as are necessary to make those payments for unemployment and sickness claims. That is just how serious it is.

We talk about increased benefits. I am for liberalizing them all we can. I like to see these people get those benefits. But I also feel there is a responsibility for the money being there when they are entitled to have it. If there are no funds to pay for those benefits, you are going to get some of the most stinging rebukes from your constituents for providing an unsound program. To me that is the one big issue, and we just have to face it.

One of the most highly controversial differences in the two bills is the proposal dealing with voluntary quits. Under the present law a person working in the railroad industry can walk off his job, quit, with no intention of ever returning, and that is done on some occasions. He stays out for 30 days, makes his application, and then draws his full maximum unemployment benefits if he remains unemployed. Under the law he is entitled to it, and they do it.

The committee felt that that was a situation that was taking money out of the fund and paying it to people who were not entitled to it as a matter of right. Therefore, the committee suggested in this amendment that if a man quits on his own and walks off the job and does not intend to work any more he is not entitled to unemployment benefits until and unless he goes back to work in the railroad industry and works 20 days. When he does that, then he is restored to his full rights and benefits. If he becomes unemployed for reasons not his own, then he is entitled to those benefits. There is a lot of controversy over that, but there are not, in my opinion, so many involved.

It is not such a great controversy, which should in any way adversely affect this bill as to its adoption and approval by this Congress.

Then there is the so-called misconduct amendment. Under the present law, a man who is guilty of misconduct and is separated from his employment is entitled to unemployment benefits regardless. This amendment would prevent him from receiving such benefits until he returned to work for the railroad industry and worked for at least 20 days.

Mr. Chairman, those are the general provisions of this bill. A more detailed statement and explanation of the committee bill follow.

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill H.R. 5610 provides for certain amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, which would improve and strengthen the retirement and unemployment insurance systems for railroad workers. Before I go into a detailed explanation of these amendments, I think it is important to discuss some background information. This will help the Members better to understand what the committee recommends in the bill and why it makes such recommendations.

INTRODUCTION

Many Members of the House will recall that during the closing days of the 2d session of the 84th Congress, legislation was adopted granting generally a 10-percent increase in railroad retirement and survivor benefits, with some exceptions—Public Law 1013, 84th Congress.

No provision was made for the financing of the cost of these benefits, which amounted to $83 million a year on a net level cost basis. There already was an existing deficiency at that time in the railroad retirement account of $86,390,000 a year on a level cost basis. Hence, enactment of this law increased the deficiency to $169,390,000 a year, or 3.2 percent of taxable payroll on a level cost basis.

The Congress was told that enactment of this legislation was an emergency measure and was necessary to help thousands of retired railroad employees, their wives, and the widows of such employees to meet their day-to-day living expenses. The Congress was assured by members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and by others who were interested in this program that legislation would be considered promptly during the 85th Congress to finance the cost of these benefits. Representatives of railroad labor organizations gave firm assurances that they would propose, at the opening of the 85th Congress, a legislative program to assure adequate financing. The President, in a statement accompanying the signing of Public Law 1013 at that time, stated in part:

> It is imperative that satisfactory legislation for this purpose—to assure adequate financing of the railroad retirement system—be proposed and enacted.

In the 85th Congress, this committee held hearings on railroad retirement legislation early in the first session. The principal interest during these hearings centered around H.R. 4353 and other identical and related bills. These bills were sponsored by all the standard railway labor organizations and were comprehensive measures designed to grant additional benefits and to eliminate the deficit in the railroad retirement account. At these hearings the railroads agreed to a tax increase to make up the cost of the increased benefits provided by Public Law 1013 in the 84th Congress.

The committee was prepared to take action on the pending bills but was requested to defer such action, pending the outcome of a separate bill—H.R. 5551, 85th Congress—pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, which provided for the exclusion of employee retirement taxes from gross income for purposes of the employee's income tax and from withholding at the source. Therefore, no bill was reported by the committee during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

Recognizing the condition of the railroad retirement account, and the commitments made 2 years previously, the committee reported H.R. 4353 late in the 2d session of the 85th Congress which provided for an increase in retirement and survivor benefits of generally 7 percent and an increase in taxes sufficient to pay for these increases in benefits and to eliminate the actuarial deficit. Amendments were also proposed to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. A rule was not granted on this bill and so it could not be brought up for consideration in the House under the regular procedure.

The Members who were here will also recall that on the last day of the 85th Congress a bill providing for amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act, Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act was referred to the House by the Senate which had passed it only the previous day. These amendments were added to H.R. 12728 of the 85th Congress, a bill providing for amendments to the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. That was a bill not within the jurisdiction of this committee, and the parliamentary procedure was rather unusual. The only way this bill could have been brought up in the House was by unanimous consent, and, as the record shows, there was objection to the unanimous-consent request. And so the legislation died with the adjournment of the 85th Congress.

On the opening day of this session, I as chairman of this committee, introduced H.R. 1012, a bill containing all of the features which had been contained in the Senate amendment to H.R. 12728, 85th Congress. The reported bill, H.R. 5610, is a "clean" bill introduced by me, by direction of the committee and reflects all modifications in H.R. 1012 approved by the committee during its executive consideration of legislation to amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

PURPOSE OF REPORTED BILL

The purpose of the reported bill is, generally, to strengthen and place on a sound self-supporting basis the railroad retirement system and the railroad unemployment insurance system. As to the railroad retirement system, this objective is accomplished by first, practically eliminating the present long-range actuarial deficit in the railroad retirement account; second, providing a much-needed 10-percent increase in retirement and survivor benefits; third, eliminating certain inequities in the system; and fourth, providing for the adequate financing of the system. As to the railroad unemployment insurance system this objective is accomplished by first, providing for a much-needed increase in the daily benefit rate for unemployed workers; second, providing for a temporary extension of unemployment benefits, not exceeding 65 compensable days in registration periods which began on or after June 19, 1958, and before April 1, 1959, for those workers who have exhausted after June 30, 1957 their rights to normal benefits provided under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act; third, eliminating certain inequities in the system; and fourth, providing for adequate financing of this system.

PRINCIPAL PROVISIONS OF THE REPORTED BILL

The reported bill would amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act in the following respects:

I. AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

First. Ten-percent increase in benefits: Annuities—including spouse and survivor annuities—and pensions would be increased generally by 10 percent. The increase would be slightly more than 10 percent for most employee retirement annuities and survivor annuities which are computed under the regular railroad retirement formula owing to the rounding of the percentage factors used in the computation of such annuities.

These increases would begin to accrue on the effective date of this act which is, except as specifically provided otherwise, the first day of the first calendar month beginning more than 45 days after the date of enactment of this act.

Second. Maximum creditable compensation increased to $400 per month: The maximum amount of monthly compensation creditable for benefit purposes would be increased from $350 to $400 effective with respect to services rendered on or after the first day of the first calendar month which begins more than 45 days after the date of enactment of this act.

Third. Women employees and spouses annuities at age 62: The privilege now available to any male employee with 30 years of service, of electing to receive a reduced annuity at age 60, would be available to a female employee with 10 years of service at age 62. Spouses of annuitants may also elect to receive a reduced annuity at age 62. The reduction in the annuity would be by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month the beneficiary is under age 65.

Fourth. Earnings of disability annuitants: The earnings test now applicable to a disability annuitant provides that such annuitant, under age 65, does not receive his annuity for any month in which he is paid more than $100 in earnings. The reported bill would modify this provision so that if the annuitant's earnings in any calendar year begining with 1960 do not exceed $1,200, any monthly annuity which may have been withheld because the individual earned more than $100 in such month, would become payable. Should the annuitant's earnings exceed $1,200 in any year, his loss of benefits would not exceed 1 month's annuity for each $100 or less (providing it is more than $50) that the annuitant earned in excess of $1,200.

Earnings from employment with an "employer" as defined in the Railroad

Retirement Act, and earnings from employment with the disability annuitant's last nonrailroad employer before he retired, would not count toward this $1,200 maximum, since no annuities are payable under section 2(d) of the Railroad Retirement Act to individuals for any month in which such employment occurred.

Fifth. Residual lump sum: The formula for computing the residual lump sum would be amended in conformity with amendments proposed to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act (increasing the tax rate to 6¾ percent and later to 7¼ percent and the tax base to $400), namely, by increasing the percentage factor applicable to compensation to 7½ percent after the effective date of this act and before 1962 and to 8 percent for later compensation, and by increasing the maximum amount of compensation for any month to which such factors are applicable from $350 to $400 for any month after the effective date of this act.

Sixth. Repealing work restriction on survivors working outside United States: Under present law, a deduction is made from the annuity paid to a survivor until the total deductions equal such individual's annuity if such individual worked for 7 or more days in a calendar month in noncovered remunerative activity outside the United States.

The reported bill would make the work restrictions applicable to a survivor who worked outside of the United States the same as for those individuals who work in the United States. This change would permit the survivor to earn as much as $1,200 a year without loss of retirement benefits.

II. AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

Benefits payable under the Railroad Retirement Act are financed by a payroll tax payable by the employee and the employer, alike, collected under the Railroad Retirement Tax Act. The tax is 6¼ percent of each employee's compensation up to $350 a month. Each employee representative pays a tax of 12½ percent on his compensation up to $350 a month.

The reported bill would increase the tax rate on employees and employers from 6¼ percent to 6¾ percent on compensation earned on or after the effective date of this act and before 1962, and to 7¼ percent on compensation earned thereafter and make the tax applicable on the employee's compensation earned up to $400 in any month beginning on or after the effective date of this act. This tax rate would be increased, on a contingent basis, with respect to compensation paid after December 31, 1964, by the same number of percentage points—or fractions of percentage points—by which the then current social security tax rate exceeds 2¾ percent.

Thus, assuming that the social security tax rate increases as scheduled under present law, the railroad retirement tax rate would increase, under the provisions of the reported bill, to 8 percent in 1965, 8½ percent in 1966–68, and 9 percent beginning with 1969 and thereafter, on employee and employer alike.

The tax rate on employee representatives would be increased from 12½ percent to 13½ percent on earnings on or after the effective date of this act and before 1962, and to 14½ percent on later earnings, and the monthly limit on taxable compensation would also be raised to $400 on or after the effective date of this act. The tax rate would also be increased contingently with respect to compensation paid after December 31, 1964, just as in the case of the employer and employee tax rates, but this increase would be by twice the number of percentage points—or fractions of points—that the then current social security tax rate exceeds 2¾ percent.

III. AMENDMENTS TO RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

First. Maximum creditable and taxable compensation: The maximum amount of compensation for a month, for which credit would be given and contributions required, would be increased from $350 to $400 a month, effective with respect to compensation paid for service rendered on or after the effective date of this act.

Second. Increased daily benefit rates: A new schedule of increased daily benefit rates for both unemployment and sickness would apply, ranging from a minimum daily benefit rate of $4.50 for annual compensation of $500 to $699.99 to a maximum daily benefit rate of $10.20 for annual compensation of $4,000 or more. The proposed daily benefit rates range up to $1.70 higher than present scheduled rates. The minimum daily rate payable would be increased from the present 50 percent to 60 percent of the daily rate of compensation—with a maximum of $10.20 per day—for the employee's last employment in which he was engaged for an employer during the base—calendar—year.

These provisions would become effective with respect to benefits accruing for registration periods which begin on or after the effective date of this act, namely, the first day of the first calendar month beginning more than 45 days after the date of enactment of this act.

A comparison of the daily benefit rates under present law and under the reported bill is shown in the following tabulation:

Comparison of benefit rates in schedule under Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act with proposed schedule

Range of base-year compensation	Daily benefit rate		Percent increase
	Present act	Proposed schedule
$400 to $499	$3.50
$500 to $699	4.00	$4.50	12.5
$700 to $749	4.00	5.00	25.0
$750 to $999	4.50	5.00	11.1
$1,000 to $1,299	5.00	5.50	10.0
$1,300 to $1,599	5.50	6.00	9.1
$1,600 to $1,899	6.00	6.50	8.3
$1,900 to $1,999	6.00	7.00	16.7
$2,000 to $2,199	6.50	7.00	7.7
$2,200 to $2,499	6.50	7.50	15.4
$2,500 to $2,799	7.00	8.00	14.3
$2,800 to $2,999	$7.00	$8.50	$21.4
$3,000 to $3,099	7.50	8.50	13.3
$3,100 to $3,499	7.50	9.00	20.0
$3,500 to $3,999	8.00	9.50	18.8
$4,000 and over	8.50	10.20	20.0

NOTE.—Since the compensation ranges of the 2 schedules differ, it was necessary, for this comparison, to divide some rate groups into 2 parts.

Third. Temporary extension of unemployment benefits: Extended unemployment benefit periods beyond the 130 days of normal benefits now allowed by present law would be provided to any employee who has, after June 30, 1957, exhausted his rights to unemployment benefits under present law. Such employee would receive additional temporary unemployment benefits for days of unemployment not exceeding 65 days occurring in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before April 1, 1959. This provision would take effect on the date of enactment of this act.

Fourth. Increasing the minimum qualifying base year compensation: The minimum earnings in a base—calendar—year which would qualify an employee for benefits in a benefit year—year beginning July 1 immediately following the base year—would be increased from $400 to $500.

Fifth. Sundays and holidays made compensable days: Under present law, an unemployed railroad worker may not claim a Sunday or a holiday as a day of unemployment unless such day is preceded by and followed by a day of unemployment or unless the Sunday or holiday is the last day of a registration period. In the latter case it need only be preceded by a day of unemployment.

Under the reported bill, Sundays and holidays would be compensable days of unemployment, just as any other day, whether or not such Sundays and holidays are preceded and succeeded by a day of unemployment.

Sixth. Disqualification for unemployment benefits in case of discharge or suspension for misconduct: Under present law an employee discharged or suspended for misconduct can claim unemployment insurance benefits on the same basis as if he were involuntarily unemployed.

Under the reported bill, an employee could not claim any days of unemployment beginning with the day with respect to which the Railroad Retirement Board finds that he was discharged or suspended for misconduct related to his work. In the case of discharge, the disqualification would end with the 20th day thereafter with respect to each of which he shall have earned compensation in the employ of a railroad or another employer covered under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. In the case of suspension the disqualification would end when the period of suspension ends.

Seventh. Disqualification for unemployment benefits for voluntary leaving work and for failure to accept suitable work: Under present law, an employee first, who leaves work voluntarily without good cause; second, who fails, without good cause, to accept suitable work offered to him; or third, who fails to comply with instructions from the Railroad Retirement Board requiring him to apply for suitable work or to report to an employment office, is disqualified from claiming unemployment insurance benefits for a period of 30 days from the date on which the enumerated action occurred.

Under the reported bill, the employee would be disqualified for any of the days beginning with the day on which the above-mentioned enumerated action occurred and ending with the 20th day thereafter with respect to each of which the Railroad Retirement Board finds that he has earned compensation in the employ of a railroad or another employer covered under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Eighth. Repealing provisions with respect to maternity benefits: Under present law, maternity benefits are payable to a qualified woman employee for each day of sickness in a maternity period except that, as for unemployment and other sickness benefits, the total amount of maternity benefits cannot exceed the employee's total creditable compensation in the base year. The maternity period begins 57 days before the expected date of the birth of the child and usually extends for 116 days. Under some conditions it can last longer but in these cases no more than 116 days of the maternity period are compensable. The daily benefit rate is the same as for other benefits payable under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. However, benefits are payable at the rate of 1½ times the regular daily benefit rate for the first 14 days of the maternity period and the first 14 days after the birth of the child. Thus the maximum amount of maternity benefits payable is the same as for unemployment or other sickness.

Under the reported bill the above-mentioned provisions with respect to maternity benefits would be repealed. The effect would be that female employees would not be eligible for benefits by reason of maternity, as such, but they could, although pregnant or having given birth to a child, receive sickness benefits to the extent they meet the conditions specified in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Ninth. Disqualification for sickness benefits for voluntarily leaving work, for failure to accept suitable work, and so forth: Under present law an employee who is sick can, nevertheless, claim sickness benefits even though, first, he may have quit his job voluntarily without good cause or; second, he may have failed, without good cause, to accept suitable work offered to him or; third, he may have failed to comply with instructions from the Railroad Retirement Board requiring him to apply for suitable work or to report to an employment office.

Under the reported bill an employee cannot claim sickness benefits for any of the days beginning with the day on which the above-enumerated action occurred and ending with the 20th day thereafter with respect to which the Railroad Retirement Board finds that he has earned compensation in the employ of a railroad or another employer covered by the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Under present law, a sick employee may claim sickness benefits even though he is unemployed because of an "illegal" strike, that is, a strike commenced in violation of the Railway Labor Act or in violation of the established rules and practices of a bona fide labor organization of which he was a member. The reported bill provides that even though the employee is sick, such day shall not be considered as a day of sickness if, except for the sickness, he would have been unemployed due to an illegal strike. This disqualification would not apply if an employee is not participating in, directly interested in, or helping to finance the strike, and he does not belong to a grade or class of workers which some members are participating in, interested in, or helping to finance the strike.

Under present law an employee can claim sickness benefits up to a maximum of 130 days during a benefit year even though he may have left the railroad industry and established himself in a nonrailroad job. The reported bill provides that an employee would be disqualified for sickness benefits for any day which occurred more than 90 days after the last day with respect to which he earned compensation in the railroad industry. There would be excluded from such 90 days any day in which the Railroad Retirement Board finds that the employee was unemployed due to a stoppage of work as a result of an illegal strike, and any day in such 90 days in a registration period which begins, or in a continuous series of registration periods the first day of which series begins, before the expiration of such 90 days. For this purpose, a "registration period" would be deemed to be continuous with the preceding registration period if established within 10 days after the last day of such preceding registration period.

Tenth. Sickness benefits waiting period: Under present law, sickness benefits are payable for each day of sickness in excess of 7 during the first registration period—consisting of 14 days—within a benefit year in which an employee will have had 7 or more such days of sickness.

The reported bill would make sickness benefits payable for each day of sickness in excess of 9 days during the first registration period. It would also prevent the payment of any sickness benefits for days in a subsequent registration period—now payable after a waiting period of 4 days—by requiring that the employee should have had in that registration period, or in the next preceding 14-day period, not less than 7 days of sickness or unemployment or both. The bill also provides that a day of sickness, to be considered as such, must be a day on which the employee would have been available for work except for the fact that he was sick.

Eleventh. Increase in tax base and tax rate: Funds to support the railroad unemployment and sickness benefit programs are obtained from taxes collected by the Railroad Retirement Board from railroad employers. Employees do not contribute to these funds.

To provide funds for financing the additional benefits recommended in the reported bill, and to take care of existing needs, the bill provides for an increase in the monthly limit on taxable compensation from $350 to $400 a month for each employee, effective with respect to compensation paid for services rendered in calendar months which begin on or after the first day of the first calendar month which begins more than 45 days after the date of enactment of this act.

A comparison of the present tax rate schedule and the tax rate schedule proposed by the reported bill is shown below.

Schedule of present contribution rates

If the balance to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account as of the close of business on Sept. 30 of any year, as determined by the Board is—	The rate with respect to compensation paid during the next succeeding calendar year shall be—
$450,000,000 or more	½ percent.
$400,000,000 or more but less than $450,000,000	1 percent.
$350,000,000 or more but less than $400,000,000	1½ percent.
$300,000,000 or more but less than $350,000,000	2 percent.
$250,000,000 or more but less than $300,000,000	2½ percent.
Less than $250,000,000	3 percent.

Schedule of contribution rates proposed by reported bill

If the balance to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account as of the close of business on Sept. 30 of any year, as determined by the Board is—	The rate with respect to compensation paid during the next succeeding calendar year shall be—
$450,000,000 or more	1½ percent.
$400, 000, 000 or more but less than $450, 000,000	2 percent.
$350, 000, 000 or more but less than $400,000,000	2½ percent.
$300,000,000 or more but less than $350,000,000	3 percent.
Less than $300,000,000	3½ percent.

The balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of September 30, 1958, was $135,443,000. Therefore, the current tax rate is 3 percent. Upon enactment of this legislation the tax rate would increase to 3½ percent on compensation paid for services rendered on or after the effective date of this act.

Twelfth. Borrowing authority to finance railroad unemployment and sickness insurance programs: The Railroad Retirement Board, railroad management, and railroad labor organizations are in agreement with respect to the need for authority to permit the Board to borrow money from the railroad retirement account in order to pay railroad unemployment and sickness benefits. The balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of February 28, 1959, was $50 million, which is a dangerously low level, and the balance may be insufficient to pay the benefits due in the months ahead.

Accordingly, the committee has provided in section 310 of the reported bill authority for the Railroad Retirement Board, whenever it finds that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be insufficient to pay benefits due, to request the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the railroad retirement account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account such moneys as the Board estimates would be necessary for the payments of such benefits, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to make such transfer. The moneys borrowed would pay 3 percent interest.

This provision of the bill would take effect on the date of enactment of this act.

PRINCIPAL DIFFERENCES BETWEEN H.R. 1012 AND H.R. 5610

The reported bill, H.R. 5610, differs from the bill as introduced, H.R. 1012, in the following major respects:

First. With respect to amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act the only major difference between the two bills is the effective date provision. The reported bill, H.R. 5610, provides that these amendments, with minor exceptions, shall become effective on the first day of the first calendar month which is more than 45 dayes after the date of enactment. Hence, the effective date would be no less than 46 days but could be as much as 75 days after the date of enactment. H.R. 1012 provides for an effective date of January 1, 1959.

Second. With respect to amendments to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, the only major difference between the two bills is, again, the effective date provision. This difference is the same as for the Railroad Retirement Act shown in paragraph 1, above.

Third. With respect to amendments to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, the major differences between the two bills are as follows:

(a) The reported bill, H.R. 5610 provides that these amendments, with minor exceptions, shall become effective on the first day of the first calendar month which is more than 45 days after the date of enactment. Hence, the effective date would be no less than 46 days but could be as much as 75 days after the date of enactment. H.R. 1012 provides for an effective date of January 1, 1959.

(b) H.R. 5610 makes no change in existing law with respect to the number of compensable days of unemployment for which unemployment benefits may be paid in the first registration period in a benefit year (i.e., unemployment benefits may be paid for only 7 of the 14 days in the first registration period).

H.R. 1012 provides that the number of compensable days of unemployment for which unemployment benefits may be paid in the first registration period in a benefit year shall be 10 days.

(c) H.R. 5610 provides that the number of compensable days of sickness benefits for which benefits may be paid in the first registration period—consisting of 14 consecutive days—in a benefit year shall be 5 days. With respect to subsequent registration periods, the number of compensable days for sickness for which benefits would be payable would be 10 days but this payment would be conditioned upon the claimant having no less than 7 days of sickness or unemployment, or both, either in such subsequent registration period or in the 14 days immediately preceding such subsequent registration period.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law with respect to the number of compensable days of sickness for which benefits may be paid. These are 7 days in the first 14-day registration period in a benefit year and 10 days in all subsequent registration periods.

(d) H.R. 5610 provides that all railroad employees who have, after June 30, 1957, exhausted their rights to unemployment benefits under present law, would receive additional temporary unemployment benefits for days of unemployment, not exceeding 65 days, occurring in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958 and before April 1, 1959.

H.R. 1012 provides that such temporary extension of unemployment benefits described above would apply with respect to employees with less than 10 years of railroad service. Employees with 10 but less than 15 years of railroad service, upon exhaustion of their rights under present law to unemployment benefits in a given benefit year would be entitled to an additional 65 days of unemployment benefits in an extended benefit period of 13 weeks. Employees with 15 or more years of service, upon exhaustion of their rights under present law to unemployment benefits in a given benefit year would be entitled to an additional 130 days of unemployment benefits in an extended benefit period of 26 weeks.

(e) H.R. 5610 provides for the repeal of a provision in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act having to do with the payment of maternity benefits.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law with respect to the payment of maternity benefits during a maternity period.

(f) H.R. 5610 provides that an employee, in order to be eligible for sickness benefits, must have been available for work except for the fact that he was sick.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law which provides that an employee need not otherwise be available for work in order to obtain sickness benefits.

(g) H.R. 5610 provides that an employee who leaves work voluntarily without good cause, who fails without good cause to accept suitable work offered to him, or who fails to comply with instructions from the Railroad Retirement Board requiring him to apply for suitable work, would be disqualified for unemployment or sickness benefits until he has returned to work for a railroad and has worked at least 20 days.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law which disqualifies an employee from claiming unemployment insurance benefits for a period of 30 days from the date on which the above-mentioned action occurred. After the expiration of the 30-day period he can claim unemployment benefits if he is still unemployed. Existing law does not disqualify an employee for sickness benefits even though he leaves work voluntarily without good cause, and so forth.

(h) H.R. 5610 provides that an employee would be disqualified for unemployment, but not for sickness, benefits if he was discharged or suspended for misconduct related to his work. In the case of discharge the disqualification would end when the employee has returned to work for a railroad and has worked at least 20 days. In the case of suspension the disqualification would end when the period of suspension ends.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law under which an employee discharged or suspended for misconduct can claim unemployment insurance benefits on the same basis as if he were voluntarily unemployed.

(i) H.R. 5610 provides that an employee cannot claim sickness benefits if, except for the fact that he was sick, he is unemployed because of a wildcat strike. This disqualification would not apply if he is not participating in, directly interested in, or helping to finance the strike and if he does not belong to a grade or class of workers of which some members are participating in, interested in, or helping to finance the strike.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law under which an employee who is unemployed because of a wildcat strike may, nevertheless, claim sickness benefits if he is sick during this period.

(j) H.R. 5610 provides that an employee cannot claim sickness benefits for any period which is more than 90 days after the day on which he last worked in the railroad industry. There are certain exceptions to this provision.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law under which an employee who has left the railroad industry may, nevertheless, claim sickness benefits during any part of the benefit year if he is otherwise qualified.

(k) H.R. 5610 provides that the Railroad Retirement Board may borrow money from the railroad retirement account for the payment of benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act with interest at 3 percent.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law under which there is no authority to borrow money from the railroad retirement account for the payment of benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

NEED FOR LEGISLATION

The need for increasing retirement and survivor benefits is obvious in the light of the fact that living costs have increased significantly since the last 10-percent increase in benefits was provided in 1956 in Public Law 1013, 84th Congress. The 10 percent increase recommended in the bill will undoubtedly help to alleviate the hardships of annuitants and pensioners who are trying to live on a fixed income. The committee feels that the increase proposed in the bill is very modest and should be granted.

There was general agreement until recently that the railroad retirement system was virtually without peer among plans of its kind. However, with the passage of the 1950 and later amendments to the Social Security Act, including those enacted in 1958 providing for a general increase in benefits of 7 percent, and the gains made in the past several years by employees in many industries through the adoption of private supplemental pension plans, the railroad retirement system has fallen behind. Recognizing this problem, many Members of Congress have introduced bills proposing to improve the benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, and this committee has held hearings on these bills and considered them very carefully.

In the consideration of all these bills, however, the committee has placed great emphasis on the effect of the proposed amendments on the financial soundness of the railroad retirement system. The committee is unanimously of the opinion that, regardless of the desirability of certain proposals for the liberalization of benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, no amendments to the law should be made which would jeopardize the financial soundness of the railroad retirement system. This principle is accepted by all the standard railway labor organizations and by railroad management as well.

This committee has every desire to be helpful to retired railroad workers and their dependents. We are also mindful of our grave responsibility toward the currently active railroad workers and those who will follow and who will retire in the future. We must make certain that when they retire from the railroad industry the reserves in the railroad retirement account plus the income into the system will be adequate to pay the benefits due them.

We must also be mindful of the financial condition of the railroad industry and its ability to share the burden of the increases in taxes which the reported bill would impose upon them. However, we feel that, aside from the temporary decline in business and revenues which the industry has recently experienced but from which the railroads are now recovering, the industry is able to support the modest program proposed in the bill.

The option granted to women employees with less than 30 years of service and to spouses to retire at age 62 on a reduced annuity is similar to the provisions now contained in the Social Security Act. The granting of this option to accept reduced benefits would not add significantly to the cost of the system.

The amendment changing the earnings limitation for disability annuitants to $1,200 a year instead of $100 a month is designed to eliminate discrimination between a disability annuitant who may earn a little over $100 a month in several months and, therefore lose, under present law, his annuity for all such months, and another disability annuitant who may earn the same total amount as the first annuitant but whose earnings pattern may be such that he is required to give up only 1 month's annuity.

The amendment with respect to survivors who work outside of the United States is designed to place such survivors on an equal footing with survivors working in the United States so far as the earnings limitation is concerned.

The amendments proposed to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act—namely, increasing the maximum taxable earnings base to $400 a month, and increasing the tax rate—are necessary to pay for the retirement benefits proposed by the bill and to eliminate for all practical purposes the existing actuarial deficiency in the railroad retirement account.

The amendments proposed to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act are necessary to meet the increase in the cost of living, to provide for a temporary extension of unemployment benefits as in the case of industry generally, to correct certain inequities in the system, and to provide for sound financing.

The increase in daily benefit rates for unemployment and for sickness proposed by the bill ranges from 7.7 percent for the base year compensation range of $2,000 to $2,199 to 25 percent for the base year compensation range of $700 to $749. The increase is 20 percent for those who have a base year compensation of $4,000 or more. The minimum daily benefit rate payable would be increased by 20 percent; that is, the eligible employee would be entitled to 60 percent, rather than 50 percent of his daily rate of compensation—with a maximum of $10.20 per day—for the employee's last employment in which he was engaged for an employer during the base year.

The present schedule of daily benefit rates was enacted in 1954. In view of the rising wages and costs that have occurred during the last 5 years, these rates are inadequate today reasonably to compensate unemployed railroad workers for the loss in wages which result from their unemployment. The committee believes that the schedule of daily benefit rates proposed in the bill is justified and should be enacted.

The temporary extension of unemployment benefits provided in the bill would extend to unemployed railroad workers protection similar to that accorded to unemployed workers outside of the railroad industry pursuant to the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 (Public Law 85-441). Unemployed railroad workers who have exhausted after June 30, 1957, their benefit rights under existing law would be entitled to a temporary extension of their unemployment benefits for unemployment in the general period included in the legislation for other industry, namely, unemployment occurring in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before April 1, 1959. The maximum number of days for which extended benefits would be paid is 65 days and the daily benefit rates to be paid would be those in effect before the effective date of this act.

Employment in the railroad industry has declined very drastically in recent years, and it has now reached about the lowest level ever recorded. Six years ago there were over 1,200,000 employees working for class I railroads. This number dropped to 986,000 in 1957 and and to 810,000 in January 1959.

Some 112,000 unemployed railroad workers received unemployment benefits as of June 30, 1958. The amount of benefits paid during this month was $16,651,000 and the total amount paid in the first 6 months of 1958 was $121,224,000. From January 1 through June 1958 approximately 63,000 claimants had exhausted their benefit rights under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. The Railroad Retirement Board estimates that almost as many claimants will have exhausted their benefit rights in the benefit year beginning July 1, 1958, and ending June 30, 1959. The Board has estimated that the total amount which would be payable under the temporary extension of unemployment benefits would be approximately $20 million.

The amendment providing that Sundays and holidays could be compensable days of unemployment just as any other day, whether or not such Sundays and holidays are preceded and succeeded by a day of unemployment, is necessary to rectify a condition which discriminates against certain categories of employees who, because of the manner in which their employment is scheduled, are unable to qualify for unemployment benefits.

The amendments providing for disqualifications against the payment of unemployment and sickness benefits to employees who are discharged for misconduct related to their work, who leave work voluntarily and who refuse suitable jobs, would merely reflect the principle that an employee should not be insured against wage loss resulting from his own voluntary act. These amendments would make the railroad unemployment insurance system conform to State unemployment insurance systems generally in those respects.

The present Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act does not bar the payment of unemployment benefits to persons who are discharged and may be guilty of misconduct related to their work, such as drinking on the job, pilfering, or otherwise violating rules designed to protect passengers, crew members, the general public, and railroad property and freight.

The disqualification against the payment of unemployment benefits to employees discharged for misconduct related to their work would restore a misconduct provision that was in the original Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act and which was removed by a bill enacted in 1939, at the request of both railroad management and the railway unions. The proposed amendment in the reported bill would vary from the misconduct provision of the original law only in one respect. Instead of the original 45-day period after discharge for which no benefits would have been payable, the period under the amendment provided by this bill would be extended until the discharged employee will again have had 20 days of railroad work.

The disqualification against the payment of unemployment benefits to an employee who leaves railroad work voluntarily without good cause, or fails, without good cause, to accept or to apply for suitable work, is designed to cope with the situation where many employees leave the railroad industry for one reason or another, and after a short waiting period, become eligible to receive unemployment benefits if they are still unemployed. Many of these individuals are women who leave railroad work to keep house. Many younger employees leave to return to school. Under present law all of these ex-employees could claim unemployment benefits if they earn as little as $400—$500 under the reported bill—in railroad employment in the appropriate base year. It is important for the effective functioning of the unemployment insurance system that individuals who have voluntarily left the railroad labor market for all practical purposes no longer be eligible to receive unemployment insurance benefits until they have again returned to the railroad industry.

The redefinition of sickness, which provides that a day of sickness shall include only days for which the individual can show that he would have been available for work except for his sickness, is designed to exclude persons who would not be working in the railroad industry and would suffer no loss of railroad wages because of their illness.

The disqualification against the payment of sickness benefits to an individual who has not worked in the railroad industry within the last 90 days prior to his sickness, is designed primarily to exclude an individual who became sick after he has left the railroad industry and has established himself in nonrailroad work. This amendment recognizes that individuals previously in railroad work may be out on strike or may be unemployed and registered for railroad work, and these periods are excluded in the computation of the 90 days.

The amendment providing for the discontinuance of maternity benefits would also make the railroad unemployment insurance system conform to provisions of the State unemployment systems generally. The record of our hearings indicates that only Rhode Island pays benefits in maternity periods and in this State the entire cost is paid by employees and such payments are limited to 12 weeks. California and New Jersey and New York have established sickness benefit programs but not maternity benefit programs, as such.

The Railroad Retirement Board has informed the committee that it needs authority to borrow money from the railroad unemployment insurance acaount to administer the provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. In support of this position the Board advised that by the end of February 1959 the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account had fallen to $50 million. The decline may not continue at such a rapid pace in the next few months because 55,000 unemployment beneficiaries and 15,600 sickness beneficiaries had exhausted benefit rights for the current fiscal year by the end of February. However, it is impossible to predict unemployment precisely and the balance in the account is at such a low point that even a minor dislocation in the railroad industry could cause enough unemployment to use up the available funds.

It is estimated that benefit payments for the current quarter will total about $70 million. This will be the fifth consecutive quarter in which benefit payments have been substantially above $50 million, the balance in the account at the end of February. A continuation of such a rate of expenditure would exhaust the funds available for payment of benefits within the next 6 months. Provision of borrowing authority is needed to prevent collapse of the program if this should occur.

IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS IN H.R. 5610 TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

The bill proposes to increase retirement and survivor benefits by 10 percent effective on the first day of the calendar month which is more than 45 days after the enactment date. For the purpose of these estimates, the effective date is assumed to be July 1, 1959.

EMPLOYEE ANNUITIES

An estimated 364,000 employee annuities, averaging $118, in course of payment on July 1, 1959, would be increased by 10 percent to an average of almost $130.

For an employee retiring on July 1, 1959, the maximum annuity that could be paid would rise from about $186 to $205. Subsequently, after the new $400 ceiling on taxable earnings goes into effect, the maximum would rise slowly up to the end of 1966. Thereafter, the maximum will rise more rapidly since more than 30 years of service will become creditable toward annuities.

An estimated 44,500 retirement annuity awards, averaging about $140, would be made in fiscal year 1959–60. These figures include about 500 awards to women employees aged 62 to 64 who would elect to accept a reduced annuity.

SPOUSE ANNUITIES

An estimated 133,000 spouses on the rolls on July 1, 1959, would also have their annuities increased by 10 percent. The average spouse annuity in currrent-payment status on that date would be increased to about $57. The estimated 16,000 unreduced spouse annuities to be awarded in fiscal year 1959–60 would average $58. The new maximum spouse annuity would be $66.60 in July 1959 and $69.90 in February 1960.

There are an estimated 36,000 spouses aged 62 to 64 who could elect to receive reduced spouse annuities. In the absence of specific experience and for the purposes of this report, it has been arbitrarily assumed that about three-fourths of them or 27,000 would choose to accept such reduced benefits. The reduced benefits would average about $51.

PENSIONS

An estimated 1,200 pensioners on the rolls on July 1, 1959, would receive 10-percent increases, bringing their average benefit to about $90 compared with the average of $82 under the present law.

SURVIVOR ANNUITIES

The estimated 244,700 survivor benefits in current-payment status on July 1, 1959, would be increased at least 10 percent. The maximum basic amount possible on July 1, 1959, under the new formula would be $80, while the maximum family benefits would be $193.60 and $279 under the railroad retirement and social security guarantee formulas, respectively.

An estimated 18,000 insurance lump-sum benefits would be paid in fiscal year 1959–60. The average lump sum would be $560.

DISABILITY WORK CLAUSE

The immediate effect of the change in the disability work clause would be comparatively small. About 1,000 annuities are withheld each month under the present provision and the amount of annuities withheld in a year totals about $1 million. The proposed change in the disability work clause is estimated to reduce the amount withheld in the first full calendar year after the effective date by about $200,000.

TOTAL BENEFIT PAYMENTS

Total benefit payments under the provisions of the bill in fiscal year 1959–60 are estimated at about $928 million, or $98 million more than would be payable under the present law. Of the additional $98 million, $83 million is attributable to the 10 percent increase in monthly and lump-sum benefits and the remaining $15 million to the new benefits for women employees and spouses aged 60 to 64.

TABULAR SUMMARY

The two following tables illustrate the effect of the proposed amendments. Table 1 shows the effect on benefits in course of payment on July 1, 1959, and table 2 covers benefit awards in fiscal year 1959–60.

Since the bill provides, in effect, a blanket 10-percent increase for all monthly benefits, including those calculated under social security formulas, it does not affect the distribution of monthly benefits awarded or being paid according to the formula under which they are computed.

Residual payments	6,500	1,700.00	6,500	1,600.00

[1] Assumed to be July 1, 1959, to June 30, 1960.
[2] There will be an estimated 36,000 spouses of retired employees, and 1,000 women employees with less than 30 years of service, aged 62 to 64, eligible to elect reduced annuities. It is assumed that ¾ of the spouses and ½ of the women employees would make such elections.

IMMEDIATE EFFECT OF AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

The bill proposes to amend the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, effective on the first day of the calendar month which is more than 45 days after date of enactment, by raising the monthly limit on taxable earnings from $350 to $400, and by increasing the combined rate of tax from the present 12½ to 13½ percent from the effective date through calendar year 1961 and to 14½ percent in 1962–64. In addition, the combined rate of tax in 1965 and thereafter would be increased by the excess of future actual social security combined rates over 5½ percent.

Assuming that the railroad industry will be recovering from the low level of activity experienced during the 1957–58 economic recession with a consequent gradual increase in railroad employment and assuming the effective date of the amendments to be July 1, 1959, the effect of the proposed legislation on railroad retirement taxes in fiscal year 1960 would be as follows:

[Millions]

Item	Present law	Proposed law
1. Taxable payroll	$4,600	$5,100
2. Taxes at 12.5 percent	575	638
3. Taxes at 13.5 percent		689
4. Total additional taxes		114
(a) Due solely to higher tax base		63
(b) Due to higher tax on old base		46
(c) Due to higher tax rate on addition to old base		5

It should be emphasized that the above figures pertain only to the first year effect of the monthly limit and tax increases. The long-range estimates are shown elsewhere in this report.

ACTUARIAL EFFECTS ON RAILROAD RETIREMENT SYSTEM OF H.R. 5610

The Chief Actuary of the Railroad Retirement Board has estimated that the proposed amendments pertaining to the retirement and survivor programs would increase the cost of benefits by about $146 million a year on a level basis. It is further estimated that the additional immediate and deferred taxes would bring in about an extra $57 million in 1959, an average of $115 million in each of the years 1960 and 1961, and $174 million a year in 1962–64. In 1969, if the contingent increase in taxes becomes effective, as scheduled after 1964, the amount would reach about $370 million a year. A year-by-year estimate of the additional taxes on both employers and employees is shown in table 3. Of the $114 million in additional taxes—$57 million to be paid by the employers and an equal amount by the employees—in fiscal year 1959–60, $63 million would be due to taxing compensation between $350 and $400 a month at the rate of 12½ percent; and the remaining $51 million a year would be due to the additional 1 percentage point of tax on the total estimated taxable payroll of $5.1 billion for the year. The rise in 1962 would result mainly from the additional percentage point in the combined tax rate with similar situations occurring in later years.

Considering both additional outgo and additional income, the estimates indicate that the added revenues would exceed the added disbursements by about $179 million a year on a level basis, which is equivalent to 3.20 percent of a $5.6 billion taxable payroll. Since the actuarial deficiency for the present law, calculated as of December 31, 1958, is estimated at 3.81 percent of that payroll—adjusted from 4.18 of a $5.1 billion payroll—the enactment of the amendments would leave the railroad retirement system with an actuarial deficiency of 0.61 percent of payroll—3.81 minus 3.20—or about $34 million a year. The derivation of the above actuarial deficiency figure is shown in table 4 together with a breakdown of the major cost figures for the proposed program by source of cost or of savings, as the case may be.

(e) Actuarial deficiency (excess of net costs over total future tax income)	.61	34

[1] Includes 0.08 percent of payroll for benefits payable with respect to dependents of disability annuitants under the social security minimum provision.

[2] Excludes an estimated $325,000,000 accrued under the financial interchange for the period July 1957, to December 1958, but not yet received. Had this amount been included, the 1.96 would have been increased to 2.13 and the next figure of 1.12 would have been correspondingly reduced to 0.95.

An analysis of the cost effects of the proposed amendments considered by themselves is presented in table 5. As previously indicated, the total level additional disbursements are estimated at $146 million a year, or 2.63 percent of payroll.

[1] Equivalent to 4.18 percent of payroll with a $350 limit on monthly compensation. In both instances, this is equivalent to $213 million a year.

IMMEDIATE EFFECT ON BENEFICIARIES OF AMENDMENTS IN H.R. 5610 TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The immediate effect on beneficiaries of the proposals to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act may be illustrated by reference to the effect they would have had on payments for the 1957–58 benefit year. Each of the proposals is discussed in turn.

Comparison of benefit rates in schedule under RUIA with proposed schedule

Range of base-year compensation	Daily benefit rate		Percent increase
	Present RUIA	Proposed schedule
$400 to $499	$3.50
$500 to $699	4.00	$4.50	12.5
$700 to $749	4.00	5.00	25.0

$3,500 to $3,999	8.00	9.50	18.8
$4,000 and over	8.50	10.20	20.0

NOTE.—Since the compensation ranges of the 2 schedules differ, it was necessary, for this comparison, to divide some rate groups into 2 parts.

ELIMINATING OF THE SUNDAY AND HOLIDAY DISQUALIFICATIONS

The removal of the Sunday and holiday disqualification provision in the law would increase the number of compensable claims because, for a man normally working a 5-day week, after benefits have been paid for an initial registration period, any day of unemployment in a workweek could be a compensable day. Thus, in addition to increasing the number of compensable days in some claims, it would make other claims compensable for which no payment could be made under the present law. The wage contracts for nonoperating employees now provide payment for holidays. Nevertheless, in the course of a year there will be a substantial number of employees who will not get paid for one or more holidays for one reason or another. It is estimated that this change would have increased benefits for unemployment in 1957–58 by about $3,400,000.

DISQUALIFICATIONS FROM UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

The proposed modification of the disqualifications for unemployment benefits in cases of voluntary quits, and failure to accept suitable work or failure to report for work or to an employment office, would have extended the disqualification period of those who were disqualified under sections 4(a–2) (i) and 4(a–2) (ii) in 1957–58 and caused the disqualification of many other beneficiaries. The proposed section 4(a–2) (iv) disqualifying those who were discharged or suspended would have prevented payments to thousands of other beneficiaries. Altogether it is estimated that nearly 20,000 unemployment beneficiaries would have received $10,800,000 less in 1957–58 if these provisions had been in effect. In the majority of cases all of the payments they received would have been prevented.

TEMPORARY EXTENSION OF DURATION FOR EMPLOYEES

Additional benefits would have been paid to about 60,000 1957–58 beneficiaries who exhausted benefit rights for that year under the temporary provision extending their duration of benefits a maximum of 13 weeks, but the average amount per beneficiary would be small because if they were unemployed most of them have received benefits in the current year. Nearly as many 1958–59 beneficiaries would also receive additional payments from this change, and these would be more substantial. It is estimated that the total amount payable under the provision would be about $20 million.

WAITING PERIOD FOR SICKNESS

The change which would pay benefits only for days of sickness over nine in the first sickness registration period instead of all days over seven would have reduced by two the number of compensable days for all beneficiaries who did not exhaust benefit rights. The other change in the sickness benefit formula, which would require that in order to pay benefits for a subsequent registration period there must be at least 7 days of sickness or unemployment in the period or in the 14 preceding days, would have had no significant effect on the benefits paid. Only a small number of claims would have been denied. The combined effect of the two changes would have reduced benefits to 125,000 beneficiaries by about $1,800,000.

DISQUALIFICATIONS FROM SICKNESS BENEFITS

It is not possible to estimate exactly the effect of the various proposals which would change the eligibility requirements and the disqualification provisions for sickness benefits, since they cover situations with which no experience has been had, such as the requirement of being otherwise available for work in order to get sickness benefits, and the disqualification of employees who have been out of the railroad industry more than 90 days. It is estimated, however, that the combined effect of these, and the application to sickness benefits of the disqualifications that have previously affected only unemployment benefits, would have reduced payments in 1957–58 by more than $5 million.

ELIMINATION OF MATERNITY BENEFITS

Elimination of maternity benefits would not have prevented the maternity beneficiaries from receiving regular sickness benefits while pregnant if they could have met the eligibility conditions. Thus, sickness benefits would probably have been paid to most of the 3,900 maternity beneficiaries in 1957–58 even though the $3,707,000 paid for maternity would not have been payable.

It is not clear what effect the various restrictions on payment of sickness benefits would have had on payments to them. For the purpose of these estimates it is assumed that the sickness payments would have been about half of the amount that was paid for maternity. This would have reduced benefits for the year by $1,800,000.

Estimates of the effect of the different provisions of the bill are summarized in the following table.

Provision	Unemployment		Sickness (including maternity)
	Amount	Percent	Amount	Percent
Total benefits, present law [1]	$175,723,000	100.0	$56,960,000	100.0
Decreases in benefits:
1. Due to $500 qualifying earnings	1,632,000	.9	191,000	.3
2. Due to changes in disqualifications and eligibility conditions	10,800,000	6.1	5,200,000	9.1
3. Due to change in waiting period			1,800,000	3.2
4. Due to elimination of maternity benefits			1,800,000	3.2
Increases in benefits for eligible employees:
1. Benefit rate schedule (including effect of $400 a month maximum creditable earnings)	14,552,000	8.3	7,948,000	14.0
2. 60 percent benefit rate proviso	19,925,000	11.3	4,326,000	7.6
3. Removal of Sunday and holiday disqualifications	3,403,000	1.9
4. Temporary additional duration for employees who exhausted benefit rights	[2]	[2]
Net increase	25,448,000	14.5	3,283,000	5.8

[1] Net benefits payable for year, which differ slightly from published figures of actual amounts paid in the year.
[2] $20,000,000 in 1 year only; not included in totals, because not a cost factor for later years.

EFFECT ON BALANCE IN THE ACCOUNT

Under the present law, it is expected that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be reduced to a figure between $40 million and $50 million by June 30, 1959. Retroactive payments for the temporary additional duration provided by the bill would reduce this by $20 million, and if the bill should be enacted immediately, there might be some additional increase in benefits for June claims. Thus, the account would be reduced to a very low level at the end of the benefit year, with perhaps no more than $20 million remaining.

The effective date for an increased contribution rate would coincide with the effective date for increased benefit rates, but because of the lag in collection of contributions, the higher benefits resulting from the bill would be payable for 3 to 5 months before any added revenue would be received. Moreover, the current quarter, ending March 31, 1959, will be the fifth consecutive quarter in which benefit payments under the present law have been substantially above the balance now in the account—$50 million. A continuation of such a rate of expenditure would exhaust the funds available for benefits in a few months even without the proposed increase. Thus the borrowing authority provided in the bill is necessary to insure against a possible collapse of the program.

IMMEDIATE COST TO THE RAILROADS

The bill would provide a maximum contribution rate of 3.5 percent and maximum taxable earnings of $400 a month, both of which would become effective 1½ to 2½ months after enactment. Under present law, which would not be changed, the effective rate for 1959 is based on the balance to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account at the close of business on September 30, 1958. Because that balance has already been determined and proclaimed by the Board to be less than $300 million, the amendment providing that the effective rate would be 3.5 percent when the balance is under $300 million would apply on the general effective date of the bill. The rate for 1959 is 3 percent under the unamended law. Thus, the increase in rate would be only one-half of 1 percent for compensation paid in the balance of calendar year 1959, starting with the effective date. The average increase in costs accruing for the railroads for the next few years, as shown by the following table, would be over $40 million a year:

[In millions]

Calendar year	Contributions at 3 percent for present law, total	Contributions at 3½ percent, with $400 limit on taxable earnings
		Total	Increase over present law
1959	$138	[1] $158	[1] $20
1960	141	182	41
1961	147	189	42
1962	153	196	43

[1] Assuming a July 1, 1959, effective date.

NOTE.—Figures are estimates of contributions that would be payable on compensation paid in these years

Since the estimated future cost of the program, as shown below, is substantially less than the amount that would be provided by a 3.5 percent rate, there should be some future years in which the contribution rate will be 3 percent rather than the maximum of 3.5 percent. In such years, the increase in cost, above the present law, will be limited to the amount of contributions at 3 percent on the increase in taxable payroll resulting from the $400 limit on taxable earnings, or about $15 million.

FUTURE COSTS

According to the latest estimates that have been made, benefits under the present provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act will average about $145 million over a period of years, $94 million for unemployment and $51 million for sickness, including maternity. The estimate of taxable payrolls is $5.1 billion a year. Including administrative expenses, the total cost of the present program is estimated at 2.9 percent of the taxable payroll.

For the proposals contained in the bill it appears reasonable, and in accordance with a desire for sound financing, to assume for the future an increase of about one-fifth in the average amount of unemployment benefits and an increase of one-tenth in the amount of sickness benefits. This results in an average annual benefit cost for the future, if the bill should be enacted, of $170 million, of which $114 million would be for unemployment and $56 million for sickness. At the same time, the $400 limit on creditable earnings would, it is estimated, increase the taxable payroll to $5.6 billion. Including an allowance of 0.20 percent of payroll for administration and deducting 0.10 percent for interest on the balance in the account, the total cost of the program would then be about 3.15 percent of payroll. Costs for the present law and with the bill are summarized in the following table:

Item	Present law	With proposed changes
Average benefits, total	$145,000,000	$170,000,000
For unemployment	94,000,000	114,000,000
For sickness	51,000,000	56,000,000
Taxable payroll	5,100,000,000	5,600,000,000
Benefits as percent of payroll	2.85	3.05
Administration costs as percent of payroll	.15	.20
Allowance for interest on balance in account (minus)	—.10	—.10
Net total cost as percent of payroll	2.90	3.15

These cost figures are, of course, only an approximation based on what appear to be reasonable interpretations of available data, and on forecasts of the future of the railroad industry. With somewhat different assumptions, which may be just as reasonable, a variation of as much as one-fourth of 1 percent of payroll in either direction might be obtained. The figures can thus be interpreted as indicating that the cost of the benefit program under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, if the bill is enacted would be somewhere between 2.9 and 3.4 percent of payroll.

FINANCING

The bill provides the following schedule of contribution rates:

If the balance on Sept. 30 in the railroad unemployment insurance account is—	The contribution rate for the next calendar year shall be—
$450,000,000 or more	1½ percent.
$400,000,000, but less than $450,000,000	2 percent.
$350,000,000, but less than $400,000,000	2½ percent.
$300,000,000, but less than $350,000,000	3 percent.
Less than $300,000,000	3½ percent.

The balance in the account on September 30, 1958, was $135 million. Thus, the maximum rate of 3½ percent would become effective on the general effective date for the bill. It appears, in view of the cost estimates, that the maximum rate of 3½ percent provided by the bill would be adequate to finance the benefits.

I urge the House to pass the committee bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas has consumed 38 minutes.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. YOUNGER].

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, our distinguished chairman has given a very lucid explanation of the bill. I do want to cover two or three items which I think are important. I think, first, we ought to go back into the history of railroad retirement a bit.

First, in 1935, a railroad retirement bill was passed which was later contested and declared unconstitutional. In 1937, the President called the railroads and the brotherhoods together and asked them to agree on a program of retirement which neither of them would contest in the courts. That was done. There was little change made in that program until 1946. Since 1946 we have had nine public laws passed on railroad retirement and unemployment insurance, all of them in the form of increasing the benefits. Undoubtedly, when Railroad Retirement was passed in 1937 there were very few retirement plans in industry, and there was a need for it, and there was a need for putting this program under the Federal Government. However, since then approximately all retirement and unemployment coverage has been granted throughout all industry, and today we find the Federal Government confronted with the program of retirement and unemployment insurance for only one segment of our interstate commerce. We have nothing to do with the airlines, we have nothing to do with the retirement in regard to motor carriers or buses.

Ever since I have been a member of this committee I have felt that the program should be returned to the railroads and to the employees, and that full social security coverage should be given to every railroad employee, and they should negotiate on the fringe benefits and supplemental pensions just the same as employees of other industries.

I say so for this reason: When you look at the history of this program and all of the hearings we have had, you will find that Congress is called upon to sit at the bargaining table between the railroads and the employees. Frankly, Congress is not equipped to do that job. As you know, everything that comes to us—we must be frank about it—is political. It becomes political; it cannot be helped. That is one of the reasons why this program is in the shape that it is today. Unfortunately, my observation is—and I am sorry to repeat this, because I have many very fine friends in the Railway Labor Executives Association—but the tendency is to come to Congress repeatedly and say, "This is the program. Take it or leave it." Legislation, as we know, is not accomplished in that way. No legislation that we pass ever satisfies the extremes on either side. If it does it is not as a rule good legislation. It is always a matter of compromise. We have had this demand repeatedly. We had it last year. They came to us with a program for an increase of 10 percent. The committee had hearings and worked its will. We decided that the increase should be along the social security increase of 7 percent, and the committee passed a 7 percent increase. Immediately we were told "10 percent or nothing." They went to the other body and got a 10 percent bill, and as a result we got nothing.

The chairman has already pointed out the extent to which this retirement fund is in a precarious position. May I say in my opinion it will be in a precarious condition just so long as the condition exists where the Congress has to make the determination.

I want to correct one of the chairman's figures. I refer now to the testimony of the Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board in answer to a question by Mr. ROGERS of Texas. He said:

> We are operating right now on an actuarial deficiency of about $213 million a year on a level cost basis.

That is the rate at which the deficit is running right now; it is what the deficit was last year. It increases, of course, every year. Every time you fail to act on this measure you increase the deficit. And may I add that in my opinion that does not tell the whole story, because this tax is based on a million employees in the railroad industry paying into this fund. There is not one piece of evidence in these hearings showing that we can reasonably expect to have 1 million employees back on the railroads. The best estimate that any witnesses gave us—employers, employees, Mr. Schoene, representing the Executives Association—all stated that 900,000 employees was about the maximum anybody could predict; and yet the estimate to bring this fund into an actuarially sound base is predicated on a tax on 1 million employees.

So, in my opinion, even though this fund is increased by raising the employee and employer contribution to 6½ percent each, unless you increase the number of employees on the railroads, you are going to have this same question before the Congress again and you will have to increase the taxes again if you want to make this fund actuarially sound. This year we are confronted again with the same policy of take it or leave it. You too must have had all these telegrams. Every one of them urges your support of the bill H.R. 1012 without amendment. In my opinion that is no way to legislate, and it is no way to approach this problem. I do not care who comes to this Congress with a bill, we as Members of this Congress are entitled to listen to the testimony, to listen to the opinions of others, to the statistics that are given to us and make up our own minds. We certainly have a right to amend these bills. There is nothing sacred about any bill. Any time we have to yield to that kind of propaganda, so far as I am concerned I do not want to be persuaded by such argument or to be a Member of this House under such conditions; and I am sure that you are not going to yield to such pressure, that you are going to support the committee in their action.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNGER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. I just heard the gentleman refer to a telegram urging that H.R. 1012 be voted in as a substitute without amendment. I wonder if the gentleman would like to comment just briefly on what would be the result if such a thing were to take place?

In the first place, because of the fact that it is retroactive on some 850,000 employees, $12 per employee retroactive tax on every person and assessing an additional comparable retroactive tax against the railroads. This is assuming H.R. 1012 might be effective July 1, 1959.

Further, the unemployment insurance fund as of February 28 was down to $50 million. There is no provision in H.R. 1012 for the Railroad Retirement Board to transfer retirement funds on a loan basis into the unemployment insurance fund, and I am informed, I think on good authority, that if that fund is exhausted that we will have no more unemployment insurance benefits to any railroad employee. So I am wondering if members signing the minority report really want H.R. 1012 passed without amendment.

Mr. YOUNGER. The gentleman is correct. That was referred to time and again; in our deliberations when we were in executive session considering this legislation. We were implored to pass this bill without amendment. In other words, we were to disregard any judgment that we might exercise after hearing the testimony and the information furnished at the hearings, and the facts that were given to us.

The unemployment insurance feature has troubled me during the hearings and if you will read the questions I asked you will understand my concern from that standpoint.

Mr. Chairman, may I read from a brochure which we all received from the American Enterprise Association commenting on the bill before us:

> Railroad employees, like other employees, were initially covered by State unemployment systems. The theory of their coverage under a separate system by Congress in 1938 was to provide protection under a system better adopted to the interstate character of their employment, rather than to provide them higher benefit rates, additional types of protection and other advantages over that afforded by State systems.

That undoubtedly was the intent in 1938. I have great difficulty myself in passing benefits on to employees of railroads which are not benefits given to employees covered under the various State unemployment insurance acts. It was that reasoning which prompted my rating and I think it was somewhat the same reasoning that caused the committee again to exercise its judgment as a result of these hearings and to take out certain benefits that were on the fringe. Bear in mind, if you will go into the committee hearings you will find that on investigation by the Railroad Retirement Board of claims that were filed, 20 percent of them were found to be fraudulent claims. What we are attempting to do here in the committee bill is to take out those marginal items which creates the possibility for all of these various claims that were found to be fraudulent.

Mr. Chairman, the committee has done a good job. It is not the same bill that I would like, it is not the same that the railroads want, it is not the same bill that the railway labor executives want, it is not the same bill that the shippers want. You have heard from all of them. Frankly, I think because of that, we have brought to this floor a bill which is in the keeping of the fine traditions of this House; namely, the committee has worked its will. We have not satisfied all those concerned, but we have presented a good sound bill that if put into effect will give adequate unemployment compensation and will keep the retirement fund on a more nearly actuarially sound basis than it is at the present time.

I certainly hope that the House will support the committee. There are only 11 of the 31 who have dissented. Twenty-two apparently have said, "OK." I listened rather intently when the vote was cast in committee on this bill—no one asked for a rollcall—and personally I did no hear a negative vote cast against the bill when the vote was taken in committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. POFF].

Mr. POFF. Mr. Chairman, by reason of the shortness of time available, I cannot at this point undertake to deliver the speech I have prepared in its entirety.

Mr. Chairman, the Members of the Committee of the Whole are confronted with a rather confusing situation. Spokesmen for the railroads have painted an alarming picture concerning their present financial status and future economic prospects and they have registered unqualified opposition to H.R. 1012 which I understand will be offered as a substitute to the committee bill, H.R. 5610.

Spokesmen for the brotherhoods, on the other hand, have registered their unqualified opposition to H.R. 5610. The conflict of conviction would, at this point, appear to be irreconcilable.

It occurs to me that, in the midst of this conflict and confusion, it might be prudent to pause and inquire how those who help finance the railroad retirement fund, namely railroad workers, individually and collectively feel about legislation concerning their fund. If the entire matter were submitted by popular referendum to railroad employees, including those active, retired, and unemployed, how would they vote? In attempting to answer my own question I base my conclusions first on the results of a poll which I conducted last year concerning H.R. 4353—which is substantially identical to the railroad retirement provisions of both H.R. 1012 and H.R. 5610—second, on the sentiments expressed in an unusually heavy volume of daily mail; and third, on personal conversations with a host of railroad workers and their families whom I am privileged to count as personal friends. It would be inaccurate to say that there is unanimous agreement, but it is entirely accurate to say that the great majority of those who have communicated their views to me would favor the following in preference to either of the bills presently under consideration.

First. Unemployed railroad workers feel that they are entitled to an extension of unemployment benefits for a period certainly no shorter than that granted other jobless workers under the temporary unemployment compensation bill recently passed by the House. As of last January there were more than 200,000 railroad workers unemployed involuntarily. Over 40,000 of them had exhausted all of their unemployment benefits. More than 35 percent of those who were unemployed during 1958 were over the age of 45 years, and at that age it is common knowledge that an unemployed worker has virtually no opportunity to obtain employment in any other industry except that in which he is experienced. Surely, this Congress, having already answered the pleas of unemployed workers in other industries, cannot now turn a deaf ear on the pleas of unemployed railroad workers. The burden they suffer is no less acute than that of their neighbors across the street who work for other employers.

Second. Both active and retired railroad workers would, I am convinced, favor a repeal of the antique test period of 1924–1931 and the establishment of the 5-best-years rule, under the application of which the retirement benefits of workers—both active and retired—and their dependents and survivors would be substantially increased. Although the actuaries seem to be in some dispute among themselves, it does not conclusively appear that this method of increasing retirement benefits would be any more expensive than an across-the-board percentage increase.

Third. Most railroad workers currently employed would further favor (a) a reduction in the voluntary retirement age, (b) a repeal of the so-called last-employer clause, under which presently a worker loses his retirement benefits if, at the time he retires, he is holding some little side job—such as secretary or treasurer of a civic or fraternal organization—to earn a little additional income; and (c) repeal of the dual-benefits restriction on wives of retired railroad workers.

Mr. Chairman, railroad workers are reasonable men and women. They realize that any additional benefits awarded by Congress this year will require additional revenue to the fund. They know that the current operating deficit has been aggravated by the steep increase in unemployment. An unemployed worker necessarily can pay nothing into the retirement fund and his employer pays nothing on his behalf so long as he remains unemployed. In summary, the more workers unemployed, the less revenue and the less revenue, the greater the deficit in the fund's operation.

If additional revenue is essential to compensate for the revenue loss resulting from unemployment and if the workers are compelled to choose between an increased tax rate and an increased tax base, I am satisfied that a majority of the workers in my district would choose the former. Although such a plan is unavailable to many railroad workers in other sections of the country, many of the workers in my district are eligible for participation in a supplemental railroad retirement program to the extent that their wages exceed the taxable base established in the Railroad Retirement Act. Obviously, every time the taxable base in that act is increased, it adversely affects both eligibility and benefits under the supplemental retirement program. I understand that the increase in the tax base provided in the pending legislation is considered justified under the so-called interchange provisions of the law. That is a debatable argument.

It begins to appear that a monumental parliamentary snarl will develop when debate is concluded and the bill is read for amendment. At this point, it is uncertain which if any of the amendments previously referred to could be favorably considered on the floor. The uncertainty is complicated by the fact that, although independent bills embodying those provisions were pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that committee failed to incorporate them into the bill which was finally reported. Moreover, rumors are extant to the effect that the adoption of those amendments on the floor would ultimately kill the entire bill unless those amendments collectively became a substitute for instead of additions to the committee bill. As a practical and parliamentary proposition, such a substitution is obviously impossible, and failure to pass any legislation—thereby denying unemployed railroad workers the extention of benefits previously granted workers in other industries—would be unthinkable.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the conflict and confusion surrounding this situation should serve as a valuable object lesson. I believe all will agree that all of the confusion and most of the conflict could have been avoided had retirement legislation on the one hand and railroad unemployment compensation legislation on the other hand been considered as two separate bills. In the present state of things, the only realistic hope the workers have is that somehow during the future legislative process the snarl can be unraveled and agreement can be reached upon a fair compromise acceptable to all parties concerned. Of course, a compromise means that the bill finally voted upon will not completely satisfy any individual Member of Congress. If all of the 436 Members were granted authority to do so, each would write a somewhat different bill. However, those who are disappointed in the final version can take solace in the knowledge that there will always be another day and another opportunity to consider additional and different legislation. Such is the way of our American democratic process of lawmaking.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSEN].

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee I must compliment our chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], for the conscientious, studious, and honest job that he has done relative to this legislation. I should also like to say that in the many years that I have served in legislative bodies I have never seen a committee that has worked so conscientiously and carefully, disregarding party lines, to find an answer to a very serious problem.

Mr. Chairman, throughout all of these hearings I have visited with many men concerned with this legislation. Many have been in my office, and I want to compliment them. All of them have been very fine and very fair. However, to each of them I said this: The bill that has resulted from the deliberations of this committee is, in my opinion, the kind of a bill that I would want if I were a railroad worker about to retire. We have what I believe to be a bill that emphasizes the retirement feature, which is of importance, and we have tried to come up with an unemployment feature that is actuarily sound. We have tried to do the best we could with a very complex subject. As has been mentioned, the railroads feel that they were not given the right kind of a bill. There are some railroad workers who feel that they did not get the kind of a bill they wanted. But, we did our best to go down the middle with a bill that has the right economic stability and is in the best interests of those whom we represent.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I arise in support of H.R. 1012 which amends the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts.

Frankly, I am reluctant to support H.R. 5610 because it is a modified version of H.R. 1012 which is nearly identical to the bill passed by the Senate last year and which died on the floor of the House in the closing minutes of the 85th Congress.

As many of you know, both the Senate and House committees held extensive hearings in 1957 on H.R. 4353 and Senate bill 1313 and I committed myself to that bill from the day the 85th Congress adjourned last year. I looked forward to fulfilling my promise that I would support similar railroad retirement legislation which is now embodied in the provisions of H.R. 1012.

For the information of the committee, I have received hundreds of letters in support of H.R. 1012 and only five letters in opposition to it.

In this connection, I do not wish to convey the impression that there is not a division within the ranks of active and retired railroaders regarding approval of H.R. 1012 because there is.

However, I am convinced that the great majority of active and retired railroaders in my congressional district favor the provisions of H.R. 1012.

On February 3, 1959 I testified in favor of the enactment of H.R. 1012 before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and again committed myself to work for the approval of such a bill.

Therefore, speaking frankly since I am committed to work and vote for H.R. 1012 I cannot in good conscience accept a watered-down version of H.R. 1012 as represented by H.R. 5610.

Mr. Chairman, I am supporting H.R. 1012 because I think it is a step in the right direction in recognizing the urgent need for amending the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts.

It is not my desire to take up the time of the committee in discussing the principal provisions of H.R. 1012 and compare them with the provisions of H.R. 5610 which has been ably done by Chairman HARRIS and other members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

It so happens that I represent one of the largest railroad populations in the country both active and retired.

The 10 percent across the board increase in railroad retirement benefits will be very helpful to my people since the increased cost of living when coupled with a 49-cent dollar is working real hardship on them.

Living among these people as I do, the hardships that result from trying to live on a fixed monthly income are well known to me.

In all seriousness, let us ask ourselves if we could live on the average monthly benefits paid to beneficiaries under the railroad retirement system which are as follows:

	Average annuity	Average age
Retirement annuitants	$117.70	71.6
Spouse annuitants	51.60	71.0
Pensioners	81.70	73.0
Survivor beneficiaries	57.50	----------

These figures that I have mentioned represent the amount of monthly benefits that these good Americans are trying to exist on in face of the inflated cost of living.

Should either H.R. 5610 or H.R. 1012 be enacted into law these benefits will be increased by 10 percent.

However, the increase under H.R. 5610 will not become effective until 45 days after the bill becomes a law. On the other hand, under H.R. 1012 the benefits will be retroactive to January 1, 1959.

At this point let me remind the committee that many of us interested in this legislation are committed to the date of January 1, 1959 simply because the 85th Congress increased social security benefits effective on that date.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on the provisions of H.R. 1012 which amends the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

At the present time there are some 7,000 idle railroaders in my congressional district with most of them residing in the communities of Altoona, Tyrone, Du Bois, Clearfield, and Osceola Mills.

Out of this some 7,000 unemployed, about 2,000 have exhausted their eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits and as the months go by others will suffer the same fate.

These unemployed railroaders with years and years of employment in the industry are today depending upon public assistance benefits from the State of Pennsylvania only after they have given the State a lien on any real estate they may own.

In addition, they are forced to liquidate their life savings before they are eligible for public assistance benefits.

Yes, these unemployed railroaders are also trying to exist on surplus commodities and it is a pathetic sight to see enginemen, firemen, and mechanics with many years of seniority in the railroad industry standing in line to receive surplus food.

It may be of interest to the committee to know that 22 percent of the residents of my congressional district are today receiving surplus commodities and many of them are my neighbors and unemployed railroaders.

Many of you will remember the great anxiety demonstrated by Congress last year in extending State unemployment compensation benefits 13 weeks and only a few weeks ago we extended the period of eligibility for such an extension to June 30 of this year.

Meanwhile, no action was taken on extending railroad unemployment insurance benefits although some of us pleaded for such action.

While it is true that H.R. 1012 and H.R. 5610 provide extended unemployment benefits beyond the 130 days of normal benefits now allowed by law, H.R. 5610 differs from H.R. 1012 by drastically restricting unemployment and sickness benefits which have been part of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act since their adoption in 1938 and 1946.

In addition H.R. 5610 ignores languages now in H.R. 1012 concerning unemployment benefit periods which would be extended for workers with 10 or more years of service by 65 to 130 days depending on length of service beyond the 130 day maximum provided in the present law.

In a few words, H.R. 5610 while granting the extension of the benefit period to those whose eligibility expired actually takes away certain unemployment and sickness benefits that are now in the law.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with the cost of H.R. 1012 and H.R. 5610 they would both require the same increase in payroll taxes and broadening of the tax base, yet H.R. 1012 is more liberal in its benefits.

Then, in addition, the increased income will place the retirement system on a sound financial basis.

As many of you know, the retirement fund's deficit has been of great concern to everyone since the system is now operating with a serious deficiency of $213 million per year on a level cost basis.

In connection with financing increased benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, H.R. 5610 increases the present tax now paid entirely by the railroads from 3 percent to 3½ percent, while H.R. 1012 will require an increase of the tax to 4 percent.

When you take into consideration the more liberal benefits provided for H.R. 1012 the one-half of 1 percent differential in tax between H.R. 5610 and H.R. 1012 in my opinion justifies enactment of H.R. 1012.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning of my remarks I am supporting H.R.

1012 because I committed myself to its provisions last year.

Furthermore, I think H.R. 1012 is a step in the right direction in our efforts to liberalize the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts to meet the needs of active and retired railroaders of the Nation.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that there was a half of one percent differential in the tax provisions in the two bills?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Yes, the difference between 3.5 and 4 percent.

Mr. AVERY. I do not quite believe that is the case. To which bill did the gentleman allocate which percentage provision?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. We are talking now about the Railroad Unemployment Insurance?

Mr. AVERY. Yes.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. And we are talking about the tax.

Mr. AVERY. I believe the gentleman will find the tax requirements are the same in both bills.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I might put it this way: It is a fact that both bills will increase the tax to 3.5 percent, but, if my memory is correct, the Chairman of the Railroad Retirement Board when appearing before the committee said the 3.5 percent would not finance the increases and it would take 4 percent. That was the basis of my statement.

Mr. AVERY. I quite agree with the gentleman, but the tax rate requirement in the bills are identical.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS].

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, first I would like to speak to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AVERY] to tell him that when the substitute is offered, the objections that he raised in relation to the tax provision will be taken care of, and that the effective date will be after the enactment of the bill, if that is one of his main objections. I assure the gentleman, it will be taken care of.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. I appreciate the gentleman's statement. It surprises me so because we have had all of these urgencies from the various States and the various districts telling us to vote for H.R. 1012 without amendment, and now the gentleman comes on the floor and says that he is going to vote for it.

Mr. STAGGERS. Did you get all these urgencies or did you hear of them by rumor?

Mr. AVERY. No, sir; I have a lot of them in my office, and I will be glad to show them to the gentleman.

Mr. STAGGERS. Is the gentleman referring to urgencies?

Mr. AVERY. Yes; to vote for H.R. 1012 without amendment.

Mr. STAGGERS. All right; we will not argue about that. By voting for H.R. 1012 with some of these things, you will get a better bill.

Mr. AVERY. I did not say that the gentleman who is now speaking was going to vote for H.R. 1012.

Mr. STAGGERS. I did not think you would be, but I do know that that was one of the things you were interested in in the comimttee.

Mr. AVERY. That is right.

Mr. STAGGERS. I tried to help the gentleman on that, and it will be taken care of in this bill. Another objection was raised, and I would like to have any objections you gentlemen have to the bill so that we can think about them a little bit—about the ability to borrow which will be included also in H.R. 1012 out of the railroad retirement fund, in emergencies, for purposes of the unemployment and sickness insurance fund.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. Well, it would sound to me as if the gentleman was getting around to the point where he believes the bill, H.R. 5610, is a pretty good bill.

Mr. STAGGERS. With the exception of four of the most vicious things against the working people of the country that I have seen in a long time.

Mr. AVERY. Can we conclude that if the gentleman had a little more time to study the bill, H.R. 5610, he might be in favor of it in its entirety?

Mr. STAGGERS. No; but I believe if the gentleman from Kansas will pay attention for about 10 minutes, he will change his opinion a little bit about H.R. 5610.

Mr. AVERY. I assure the gentleman that I will pay attention.

Mr. STAGGERS. I am sure you will.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the Members of the Congress know this, that the railroad workers are treated differently from any other worker in America since and even before the passage of the Railway Labor Act in 1926. I am sorry that more members of the committee are not here, but I do see some who are present that I wanted to hear this because I have been a member of the committee for 9 years, and many things were said in the committee during the consideration of this bill which at that time I took at their face value, and now I wish to explain to the committee that those were just not the true facts—not that anybody, of course, tried to misrepresent the facts, but people just believed a certain way.

I believe that some of the members of the committee will vote differently when we vote on this bill.

I was explaining that the railroad worker is different from other workers in American industry. The railroad industry is a vital public utility, it is essential to the economic welfare of America, and it is essential to the defense of America in time of war. That has been proved in the past. That was one of the reasons the Railway Labor Act was passed in 1926. That act affected drastically the rights of railway workers to bargain and to strike. The Congress was later asked to legislate on railroad retirement and unemployment insurance matters, and it did legislate in these fields for the railroad worker. Since then they must come to the Congress to tell their story.

The substitute, H.R. 1012, is essentially the same as H.R. 4353 that was voted out of the committee last year and that passed the Senate. Someone said on the floor that the railroad industry could not stand the cost of the increased unemployment benefits. If you will follow the figure in the Senate last year, the committee reported a bill out, S. 1313, that carried twice the unemployment benefits that the Senate actually passed. This bill was approved by a substantial majority of the committee after 4 months of hearings. But because they wanted to get a bill passed, the chairman of the subcommittee came to the House during the Senate debate and talked to the chairman of the committee on this side, and they reached an agreement on the bill that they thought could be passed. They cut the extended unemployment benefits in half, because they tried to get the bill through in the closing days. The Senator in charge of the bill over there stated that such an agreement had been reached.

As has been explained by the chairman, the parliamentary procedure prevented that bill from being brought to the floor for passage.

When the President signed the bill to give increased retirement benefits to railroad workers in 1956 without financing provisions, he requested that legislation be enacted to make up this difference. There is no difference in the benefits or cost of the retirement provisions of H.R. 5610 and H.R. 1012, with the exception of the effective date. This will be taken care of by the substitute bill so that there can be no objection in that regard.

Now we come to the parts of the bill that are in disagreement. That disagreement is on the unemployment and insurance provisions. The chairman told you that in the last 10 years approximately 600,000 railroad workers had been furloughed. I think that figure is a little excessive, but we will take that figure. Now the contention is that by expanding the benefits more men are going to be furloughed and we will drain this fund. I say the workers are furloughed down to the hard core; men who have been in the railroad industry. Before a railroad can hire a new man, according to the prevailing seniority systems, on railroads, they must first rehire their unemployed workers.

One thing that has never been explained about the bill: When a railroad worker was hired by a railroad he was led to believe that part of the pay package would be the unemployment insurance which he would receive if he was laid off. That has been in the act since 1938. That was part of his pay that he expected to get all through the years.

Here we come now and say, "We are going to cut your pay. Not only that, but you who are employed are going to be taxed to pay for the increased retirement benefits to men who are retired."

Is that fair to the workers of today? Of course not.

Another thing which has not been explained is the way the "benefit" year and the "base" year work. The base year is the calendar year, January to December. And the benefit year in which he can draw benefits deriving from his base year earnings—and these must be at best $400 for the base year under present laws. He must wait 6 months to be eligible for benefits based on the base year and then only if he has worked for the required minimum earnings. He cannot draw his benefits immediately that first year unless he has a previous base year with qualifying earnings. It has been said in committee that a great many men went to work for 2 or 3 months during the summer, then drew unemployment benefits. That is not so, for they could not get their benefits until July in the year following unless they had an earlier qualifying base year.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman has presented a very interesting point that the membership of the House should in my opinion understand.

Mr. STAGGERS. I think it is very important.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the question of the base year which entitles an employee to benefits; then there is your benefit year. Is it not true that if a man is entitled to unemployment insurance during the base year, which might be the year before, and if it is, then he is entitled to benefits at that time in that benefit year.

Mr. STAGGERS. If he has built that up over the past preceding years. I am going on to explain that. It has not been explained before.

Mr. HARRIS. If the gentleman will permit me to continue I will yield him additional time.

Mr. STAGGERS. I thank the gentleman. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. As a matter of fact, talking about these seasonal employees, that is a matter that has caused a lot of concern in this industry. During certain times of the year it is necessary to have additional employees for certain purposes such as for maintenance of rights-of-way, and so forth. If unemployment occurs, for example, in the year 1957, then beginning in July of 1957 he would be entitled to his unemployment benefit based upon the base year of 1957 and for the earlier part of the year 1957 his benefits would be based on the calendar year 1956. Is that not true?

Mr. STAGGERS. That is true.

Mr. HARRIS. Then after July 1 of 1959 he would be entitled to the benefits that he would get from the previous calendar base year of 1958. Now, that is true; is it not?

Mr. STAGGERS. I was going to go ahead and explain it because it has not been brought out. The railroad workers have been led to believe over the years that unemployment benefits and sickness insurance were part of their pay. The employee certainly does not expect the company to come along later and say it is going to cut down his pay a little. These benefits are what the employees expect as part of their pay; they have worked for it the year preceding; it has built up a "benefit year." It is not right to come along now and say, "We are going to cut you out of part of your pay." I do not see how you can explain that to the railroad workers in this day and age. They have had these unemployment benefits for 20 years and sickness insurance for some 12 years as part of their pay, the benefit of partial compensation during periods of unemployment and sickness. Are we, through this act, going to take away from the railroad workers what has been rightfully theirs?

Cost has been talked about quite a little, that the costs of the amended bill will be $45 million. Let me tell you that even including the additional extended benefits we are talking about, the bill, as we would amend it, will cost no more than about $14 million more for unemployment and sickness than H.R. 5610. Certainly the Congress of the United States should act intelligently on this matter.

Then there are some questions of maternity benefits, as well as the matter of firing for cause and voluntary quits. The women railroad workers of this country were hired under certain definite understandings of what they could expect should they get married, or if they were already married and a child should come along. They were to get retirement, unemployment, sickness, and maternity benefits in accordance with existing law, and the railroads knew it. These women have coming to them for periods of maternity leave the 130 days of sickness that every other railroad worker in America has today. Most of the women who are now employed are older women.

Referring back to the extended benefit periods and these seasonal workers who are hired and have no seniority, I point out that the railroads cannot hire these workers until after they take back the people who are on furlough. We are now getting down to the hard core of workers, men and women who have reached the age of 40 and 45 years, with families. They are highly specialized people. They cannot get jobs elsewhere. We have 5 million unemployed in America today. All we are trying to do is to take care of the older ones just a little bit.

We agree it is going to cost a little bit more, but do you know that that additional cost goes into the operating expenses of the railroads and they deduct these costs for income tax purposes. They pay an income tax only on net income. The cost of the unemployment insurance program is, as I say, deducted as a business expense.

I want to be fair to the railroads. Any time any legislation has come up here to benefit the railroads I have voted for it. There is not a representative of any of the railroads can say differently. I was for the Transportation Act. I talked for it, I argued for it, and I spoke to one or two railroad presidents and asked them what I could do.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred ninteen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with maternity benefits I only want to say one additional thing and I shall close. Most of the women who are employed in the industry today are older women who were hired with the full knowledge of those who employed these women that they were under this act. Now, then, there are those who want to come back and renege upon the understanding had with these women and to say that the contract is void and that Congress should do something about it. They are not younger women who are being employed. They are the older ones, the same as the men who are in the industry.

I do not think we can afford to do what is proposed here. For the bill does not allow to those women who are pregnant the benefits they were led to expect and which should be theirs under the law. There is not any more compensation.

We come, now, to the voluntary quits. Here are men and here are women who built up, they thought, rights in an unemployment insurance fund and been led to believe through the years to expect to receive a benefit from it. It may be that some quit to take a better job someplace else, and they are told: "Well, you quit; you went over there to take another job." And, probably they did. For the time they work, of course, they are not eligible. But then they are laid off from that new work; maybe they are fired. Under the present law they have every right to believe that they can come back to obtain their share of the unemployment fund that has already been paid for them. The money is already there. And yet under H.R. 5610 they cannot come along now and collect. There are a lot of people who cannot work because of sickness, and when the time comes that they are ready to return, they say "You were not here; you just voluntarily quit, and you are not entitled to sickness compensation." Now, I only want to be honest about this thing and not say anything that is wrong. I have always said that as far as freedom of speech is concerned, any man ought to be able to make a statement that he can defend. Many men make statements that they cannot defend, but I will defend each one I make.

Now, on this proposal to disqualify a worker for unemployment benefits because of a firing for cause. Let me give you a personal example. I worked for the railroad one time. I was a brakeman on the Mountain Division of the B. & O. Railroad, a fine, high type of railroad. I have no quarrel with them. One evening, on a dark and dreary, rainy evening, I was the middle brakeman. There was an emergency stop. The flagman had to go back a little further than usual in order to protect the train. What the emergency was I do not remember. And, there was a 17-mile grade. And, the engineer blew the whistle and started the train, and I could see the rear flagman running with his lantern in the distance, in the fog and the rain, and he ran as hard as he could to catch up. He kept falling further away. I decided I would get that flagman on. I pulled the air on the air brakes. The conductor had gone to the head of the train to talk to the engineer when it happened. Of course, my action stopped the train. The conductor then came back and told me, "For doing that, I am going to have you fired." And, do you know, I did not ride on the caboose the rest of the time; I rode on the engine. When I got back to my home base he had an investigator come to my home to talk to my mother and dad and did everything he could to show that maybe I was not of age, although the company knew when they hired me that I was not of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. STAGGERS. At the caprice of one conductor I could have been fired. But, I was not fired because after that summer I had enough sense to know that I should get on to school and do something else; that railroading was not for me. That is just an incident. I could, however, have been blacklisted from that time on by that railroad and most other railroads if I had been fired because they thought I had done something wrong. I was only doing what was human; here was a man left out 10 miles from civilization, almost, in between the mountains, and I got him aboard. It did not hurt the train a bit. But it hurt the conductor. He said it almost threw him into the firebox. Now, that is an example of a possible firing for cause at the caprice of anybody who does not like you. Maybe you do not walk right or you do not wear the right clothes and they fire you for cause. Of course you have the right of appeal. But that appeal will take some time, maybe 2 years or more. Meanwhile here is a family with five or six children with nothing to eat, and the unemployed worker is trying to fight his case in court. What about his family? Here is a fund that, in effect, he has paid into, although not directly, that he has a right to expect benefits from, and his family has nothing to eat. We would take that right away from him by this bill, H.R. 5610. It is not fair, and I believe you will agree with me that it is not fair.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. STAGGERS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. AVERY. I recognize the gentleman's sincere interest in the welfare of the railroad employees.

Mr. STAGGERS. Not only the railroad employees, but the railroads and the people of this country.

Mr. AVERY. Yes; of course, it is a public interest.

Mr. STAGGERS. Certainly, it is; it is yours and mine, too.

Mr. AVERY. Of course. Now with respect to the statement the gentleman has made on several occasions, that when a railroad worker goes to work for a railroad, they assure him that his unemployment compensation will be part of his pay——

Mr. STAGGERS. I did not say that. He knows that is part of it. That is the law of the United States. Both understand the law; they do not have to tell him that.

Mr. AVERY. If the gentleman will permit me to ask the question, the gentleman stated on two other occasions this: That the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Fund was part of his money, had been taken out of his pay.

Mr. STAGGERS. I did not say that; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The railroads pay it. They pay it into the fund. I would not have anyone think that I said that any railroad worker pays it directly. The gentleman either was not listening attentively or, if I did say it, I am sorry. If the gentleman will permit me to continue, maybe I can clear that up.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. STAGGERS. And then, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman, if he has any other question.

The only thing the railroad worker pays into directly is the retirement fund. He pays into that equally with the railroad. But the other is paid by the railroad. That is part of the law of the United States. The money is paid into that fund. The money is put into the fund for them, as part of their insurance; unemployment insurance it is called.

Does that answer the question? I want to make that clear. They do not pay it, but the railroad is assessed, when the man works. The railroad says, "We will deposit that into the fund." That is what they do, do they not? They do not wait for years afterward to pay it into the fund.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. This gets to be rather a technical matter. We are directing our remarks to the unemployment insurance fund, is that right?

Mr. STAGGERS. Yes.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman is aware, I am sure, that there is also a sliding scale. It depends upon what the balance is on September 30 of each year.

Mr. STAGGERS. If the gentleman will let me explain that, I would like to do so.

Mr. AVERY. I think that might clear the matter up.

Mr. STAGGERS. I can explain that. When the balance goes up the tax rate goes down. Did the gentleman know that they declared a moratorium on this fund, I think it was about 1948, and they did not pay more than at the one-half percent rate until about 1955? There was almost $1 billion in the fund and then we let it go down to a certain point before we started paying again.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. STAGGERS. I yield.

Mr. YOUNGER. Those figures were some $950 million, in round figures, and last year it dropped to $85 million.

Mr. STAGGERS. The railroads had not been paying in at the full rate for a number of years. Now they have found that they have to pay more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has again expired.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he will yield for a clarification.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to yield to the Chairman.

Mr. HARRIS. I think this should be well understood.

Mr. STAGGERS. The gentleman knows that I do not want to leave any wrong impression.

Mr. HARRIS. I know the gentleman does not want to do that, and I do not, either.

Mr. STAGGERS. I know the gentleman does not.

Mr. HARRIS. The gentleman was discussing the provision of this bill which says that anyone who is discharged for his own misconduct would not be eligible. Some might get the idea from the discussion today that this bill would make anyone who was discharged for cause ineligible. The committee very meticulously, very carefully distinguished the difference between misconduct and discharge for cause. I am sure the gentleman will agree with reference to the incident that he related a few moments ago, that that discharge would have been for cause, and would not have been prohibited by this bill.

Mr. STAGGERS. I will agree with the gentleman. But who is going to tell him that it is for cause? The men who do the firing. And then it has to go to an appeal. We know what are the whims of men, of human beings. You have to have a rock bed when you are traveling, you have to know what you are doing.

I should like to explain one thing further, and that is this 90 days restriction in H.R. 5610 on sickness benefits, that after a man has been away from his railroad employment for 90 days not counting time for which he is eligible for unemployment and sickness benefits, and then gets sick, he cannot draw sickness pay. Yet I say that is part and parcel of his pay, that when he went to work for the railroad, he began to build up in his working years—the base years—eligibility for sickness pay if he got sick.

The other day, I think it was the bill H.R. 4601, you put back on the retirement rolls, the annuity rolls, hundreds of men in America who had committed acts against this Government and other wrongdoing. You put them back on the rolls and said, "We are going to give you your benefits." You did it almost unanimously, 367 to 9. Are you today going to say to the railroad worker who has been fired, ostensibly for cause, by some man who perhaps does not like him, "We are going to take away your benefits"? I do not think you are, because the working men of the Nation are just as good as white collar workers you gave back benefits to. He should get the same just dues. Under the "Hiss Act" you took away from these other men these benefits, yet the other day you said you had made a mistake, even though they had done some of the worst things on earth. You let them come back. I am certain you do not want to discriminate just because a man is a railroad worker.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the original Harris bill, H.R. 1012. As Members of the House know, a strong effort will be made by a group of members on the Interstate Commerce Committee to substitute this bill for H.R. 5610.

The bill as reported by the committee contains many inequities and would do great damage to the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Systems. I believe strongly that we must not permit retrenchment in the area of retirement legislation. We must continue to improve our programs as our economy expands.

In the years that I have served in Congress I have been proud to support the legitimate efforts of the railroad brotherhoods to make their retirement and unemployment systems more effective. The original Harris bill, H.R. 1012, does exactly that. I believe that a majority of the House will agree with me when I say that we must not enact legislation here today that will take away from railroad employees benefits that they have enjoyed for many years. It is for this reason that I intend to support a move to substitute H.R. 1012 for the committee bill.

Mr. Chairman, our country has become the great Nation it is, respected throughout the world, because it was founded, and has continued to act, on the basic principle that human values come first. We believe in action for the benefit of people, individual human beings, and we believe that the good of the people is superior to that of any special interest.

The choice which now confronts the House between H.R. 5610, the bill reported out by a majority of the committee, and H.R. 1012, the original compromise measure, is, as I see it, a choice between human, social values as represented by the Harris-Bennett bill, and retrogressive, special interest legislation proposed by H.R. 5610. H.R. 1012 proposes to help our needy aged and retired and unemployed and sick railroad workers and members of their families. H.R. 5610, on the other hand, would take away from these people benefits which they have been entitled to since the beginning of the railroad retirement and railroad unemployment insurance system. H.R. 5610 would take this action, moreover, at a time when unemployed railroad workers are desperately in need of help—not repressive legislation.

Many of you may have been persuaded by the railroads that they are in a poor financial state and that the provisions in H.R. 5610 are therefore necessary. I say without hesitation that this is certainly not the case. In the first place, there is no basic difference in the rates which would be imposed by H.R. 1012 and H.R. 5610. Whatever benefits the railroads would derive from the latter would come solely through the money they would save by denial of unemployment insurance payments to workers who would be denied such benefits because of H.R. 5610's new and stringent limitations up such benefits.

But the railroads now are enjoying a period of net income near their peak earnings. Railroad workers on the other hand are confronted with the worst unemployment crisis their industry has ever seen. The railroads, on the other hand, last year were given substantial help by this Congress. The benefits from this legislation to aid the railroads will continue throughout the years ahead. Railroad employees, however, got no help from Congress last year, although 300,000 of them became unemployed and over 70,000 exhausted all railroad unemployment insurance benefits. The need, at the present time, is for help to the railroad workers.

H.R. 1012 has already been greatly compromised from the original railroad retirement and railroad unemployment insurance legislation which was introduced to meet the problem of higher living costs and record railroad unemployment. I am certain that, in shaping H.R. 1012 to its present form, the fact that the railroads were suffering from a recession last year when this legislation was being drafted resulted in severe cutbacks in the original proposals. The railroads have now recovered from the recession, but their workers are still suffering drastic unemployment. In such circumstances, I remind you of the great tradition of this country that human values must come first. I am confident that, if the Members of this body remember that principle they will be true to it. You will show that the House of Representatives is concerned about the welfare of railroad workers, as human beings, by voting to substitute H.R. 1012 for H.R. 5610. Do not, I beg you, cut the very heart out of these workers who have served the Nation so well by imposing upon them new restrictions upon unemployment insurance at a time when they need the benefits they have earned so desperately.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, few major bills, I daresay 1 out of 50, ever gets through committee without amendments. Regardless of how vocal or how adamant the supporters of any bill might become, and regardless of the pressures that are brought to bear either by the proponents or the opponents of any bill, the members of every legislative committee must maintain their right to exercise their best individual and collective judgment on any legislation it reports to this House. Those who feel there is no room for compromise within these legislative deliberations, those who arbitrarily say, "We are 100 percent right, and we want everything we ask, nothing less," I think are taking an approach that is inclined to be a little destructive of the best interests of the normal legislative process. I submit that this would be the case whether it would be management, labor, or any other group.

The bill before this House today represents many hours of hard work, careful study, and, I am sure, unbiased deliberation on the part of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Let us remember that the amendments adopted in the committee were bipartisan in their nature.

After the majority of the members of this committee, both Republican and Democratic, exercised their best judgment, the committee was accused in a press release and in congressional communications by the railroad labor organizations of callous disregard for the plight of the railroad worker.

Whether or not this charge was in poor taste is of secondary concern, but I do believe it is an affront to the majority of the members of this committee who worked diligently on this bill.

H.R. 5610, the bill we have before us today, provides for a 10 percent increase in the railroad retirement and survivors' benefits.

H.R. 5610 provides for an average increase of 20 percent in the daily benefit rates for unemployment and sickness.

H.R. 5610 provides for a maximum tax rate of 3½ percent of payroll up to $400 per month for each employee to finance the unemployment and sickness insurance benefit program, which is one-half of 1 percent more than is required under present law.

The tax is paid only by the railroad industry.

If the substitute bill, H.R. 1012, had passed in its original form, as was pointed out previously, it would have been necessary to increase the payroll tax for unemployment insurance and sickness benefits to 4 percent.

In view of these basic provisions in the bill, passed by the committee, can anyone here honestly conclude that it represents a callous disregard of the plight of the railroad workers? Granted, it may not have everything requested in the original bill, but I repeat, it certainly does not represent any callous disregard on the part of any member of the committee. I, and every other member of the committee, are vitally interested in the welfare and well-being of the railroad workers and, particularly, the pensioners across the country. The fact of the matter is that Congress has a responsibility in dealing with the future soundness of the railroad employees and retirees' fund. Congress is also charged with the responsibility of making certain that the railroad retirees of today and tomorrow are given some reasonable guarantee that funds will be available to meet their anticipated needs. To ignore these basic responsibilities or succumb to demands for sheer expediency would not be prudent nor right, in my opinion. Certainly, we cannot be oblivious to the financial conditions of the railroad industry at the present time nor to the trend that stares the future of the industry squarely in the face. The history of the railroad industry in the past few years is certainly evidence of that. To ignore the fiscal condition of many railroads today is in the long run a reflection of disregard for the railroad workers too.

There are several railroads in the country today that we all know are operating in the red. Is there anyone here who can give me, or any other Member of this Congress, the assurance that these conditions are going to improve in the years ahead?

I would like to tell you a little story of a bus line in my district because I think it is pertinent, and I think certainly if for no other reason, regardless of whether you agree or disagree with the stand I take on this legislation, it is something that we ought to think about. In my district there has been a bus line in operation as a commuter service, for many, many years. For the past several years, it has been operating in the red. They had, and I think in good conscience, attempted to meet the demands of the workers of the bus line, the drivers and the repairmen and so on. But be that as it may, the fiscal condition did not improve. This year, additional demands were made upon the firm. I do not say that the demands may not have been in order, but the fact remains that you cannot get 3 pounds of rice out of a 2-pound bag. So—what happened to the bus line? It folded up lock, stock and barrel. It is no longer in business. There are some 200 bus drivers out of work. I simply present that because I think we may well be faced with the same situation in the railroad industry. Again, I say, no one can offer any guarantee as to whether or not this trend in the railroad industry is going to continue as it has in recent years. I again say we must be certainly conscious of this fact, and we must be aware of these things if we are to look after the best interests of the workers and particularly the pensioners in the years ahead. In conclusion, I submit that this bill is a compromise. It may not be everything we would like it to be, but I do think it is rational and I do think this is a sensible approach to the problem. Certainly, it is not a step backward. I think today we ought to pass the bill which the committee adopted and reported to the House. I think it is a sensible thing. It is certainly not a step backward but instead a step in the right direction.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MACK].

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat confused as to why we are having this big argument this afternoon. For some 3 years the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been working on this particular railroad retirement and unemployment insurance legislation. During the last Congress our committee reported a bill H.R. 4353 which I believe is identical with H.R. 1012, which was introduced this year, with the exception that H.R. 4353 provided for a 7-percent increase in retirement and survivor benefits instead of a 10-percent increase in such benefits which H.R. 1012 provides. This bill was approved in its entirety last year by our committee. It came out in the closing days of the session and did not have an opportunity to be passed by the House.

During the last Congress the other body reported out a bill almost identical with the bill introduced this year. It was passed by that body and sent to this House in the closing days of the last Congress. I took that to mean that the committee and the Congress last year wholeheartedly approved the provisions, certainly our committee approved of the provisions, of this legislation. So, at the beginning of this year I joined with my distinguished chairman [Mr. HARRIS] and other Members of Congress in reintroducing H.R. 1012. I think it contains all of the results of the activities of the past 3 years. It represents a compromise and a fair bill, and I think it should be considered and adopted. That is the reason I am supporting the bill today and supporting any move to substitute H.R. 1012 for H.R. 5610.

I introduced H.R. 3736 an identical bill to H.R. 1012, and I was joined by several colleagues who felt this was the right approach to this problem. I would like to take the time to read the names of the Members who introduced substantially identical bills this year: Mr. BENNETT of Michigan, Mr. VAN ZANDT of Pennsylvania, Mr. PORTER of Oregon, Mr. ZELENKO of New York, Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER of California, Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania, Mr. LOSER of Tennessee, Mr. O'NEILL of Massachusetts, Mr. FRIEDEL of Maryland, Mr. STAGGERS of West Virginia, Mr. BAILEY of West Virginia, Mr. FOLEY of Maryland, Mr. MCDOWELL of Delaware, Mr. VAN PELT of Wisconsin, Mr. FLYNN of Wisconsin, Mr. BROYHILL of Virginia, Mr. TOLLEFSON of Washington, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. BLATNIK of Minnesota, Mr. MACDONALD of Massachusetts, Mr. REES of Kansas, Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania, Mr. PERKINS of Kentucky, Mr. MCGOVERN of South Dakota, Mr. BARING of Nevada, Mr. FLOOD of Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE of West Virginia, and Mr. TELLER of New York.

I think that indicates that there was substantial support for this legislation when it was introduced this year. As I said before, I joined with the chairman in the introduction of this legislation, and I believe the chairman fully supported the bill at the time it was introduced. I understand his position probably has been influenced somewhat by the fact that a majority of the members of our committee amended this bill and reported out H.R. 5610.

I would like to take the time today to let the membership know what we are trying to do for the railroad workers of America. Therefore, I want to quickly review what is included in H.R. 1012, which I believe will be introduced as a substitute under the 5-minute rule this afternoon. If it is, I think it should be supported and adopted in lieu of H.R. 5610.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 1012 would amend the Railroad Retirement Act, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. This bill would provide for a 10-percent increase in retirement and survivor annuities. It provides that women and spouses could elect to retire at age 62 at a reduced annuity. It also provides that disabled annuitants would earn up to $1200 a year instead of $100 a month under present law. It would increase the creditable compensation from $350 to $400 a month.

The Railroad Retirement Tax Act would be amended as follows:

Effective on January 1, 1959, the maximum taxable base would be increased from $350 to $400 a month per employee. Beginning with January 1, 1959, and continuing through December 31, 1961, the employer and employee tax rate would be increased from the present 6¼ percent to 6¾ percent each. Beginning with January 1, 1962, the employer and employee tax rate would be increased again to 7¼ percent each. In addition, the employer and employee tax rate is scheduled to increase again after 1964 by a number of percentage points equal at any given time to the number of percentage points by which the rate of tax under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act—for social security purposes—at that time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of section 3101 of the Federal Insurance Contributions Act as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956—such rate being 2¾ percent.

The increase in the tax base and contribution rates proposed by the amendments to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, I am happy to state, will produce sufficient revenue for the retirement system to pay for the 10-percent increase in benefits proposed by this bill, and to virtually remove the actuarial deficiency which now exists, thereby placing the railroad retirement system in a sound financial condition.

H.R. 1012 would amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act to provide that unemployment benefits be paid for days of unemployment in excess of 4 days in the first registration period in a benefit year. Under the present law these benefits are not payable during the first registration period within any benefit year for days of unemployment in excess of 7. This bill provides for a new schedule of increased daily benefit rates ranging from a minimum daily rate of $4.50 to a maximum daily benefit rate of $10.20. The minimum daily rate payable would not be less than 60 percent of the daily rate of compensation for the employee's last employment in which he was engaged for an employer during the base or calendar year, providing this does not exceed the maximum amount of $10.20 per day.

Extended unemployment benefit periods beyond the 130 days allowed by present law would be provided as follows:

First. An employee with less than 10 years of service who has after June 30, 1957 exhausted his rights to unemployment benefits under present law would receive additional temporary unemployment benefits for days of unemployment not exceeding 65 days which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958 and before April 1, 1959.

Second. An employee with 10 but less than 15 years of service, upon exhaustion of his rights to normal unemployment benefits under present law in a given benefit year would be entitled to an additional 65 days of unemployment benefits in an extended period of 13 weeks on a permanent basis.

Third. An employee with 15 or more years of service, upon exhaustion of his rights to unemployment benefits under present law in a given year would be entitled to an additional 130 days of unemployment benefits an extended period of 26 weeks on a permanent basis.

This bill would provide that Sundays and holidays could be compensable days of unemployment whether or not Sundays and holidays are preceded and succeeded by a day of unemployment.

To finance these increases in unemployment and sickness benefits the tax base would be increased from $350 to $400 a month and the tax rate would be changed from a minimum of 1½ percent to a maximum of 3½ percent depending on the balance of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Account.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, H.R. 1012, which, as I said, will be offered as a substitute this afternoon is being supported by all 11 Members who signed the minority report, and it is being supported by a substantial number of Members who are familiar with the problems of unemployment in the railroad industry.

The unemployment features of this bill are, in fact, identical with the bill approved by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee last year, and they are identical with the features of the bill which was approved by the other body during the last Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to present the features of H.R. 1012 because I am proud of that bill and I am proud to have associated my name in the introduction of this legislation. I believe it is the right kind of bill to be passed here this afternoon. It is not a discriminatory type of bill. I believe that there are certain features in H.R. 5610 that are unworkable and that would merely sabotage the operation of the unemployment compensation features of this program.

The objectionable points that would cause this difficulty have been mentioned. I know they will all be covered. There is one point on voluntary quits that I would like to mention.

If I am working for a railroad and I have an argument with my boss and he says, "You are fired," and I say, "You can't fire me; I quit," then under H.R. 5610 I would deprive my family of any unemployment compensation. That just should not be.

There is another sleeper in this bill that you want to be concerned about and that you should look into. That is to be found on page 18 of H.R. 5610. You should read this section with considerable caution. You also want to look into the report to see how they tried to explain that section.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if you will look at the report which covers this particular section, page 41, you will see that they do not quite explain the provision concerning the 90-day limitation on eligibility for claiming sickness benefits. Here is how that will affect workers in the railroad industry.

This portion of the bill would eliminate any person who tries to do a good job, who tries to comply with the requirements of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act by seeking a position in other industries. As you know, they are required to seek employment when they are laid off by the industry before drawing unemployment compensation. If they go ahead and take a job in some other industry, only temporarily, they are penalized. Many employees of a railroad may be laid off, even senior men may be laid off, for extended periods of time in the winter months and during the bad weather seasons. If they are laid off for 3 months and they take a job in another industry and keep that job for 90 days they deny themselves sickness benefits.

What that provision means, in practical effect, is that a railroad employee, of no matter how many years of service, who is displaced permanently from railroad employment will lose all rights to sickness benefits if he works a temporary outside job for 90 days.

The supposed justification for this provision is that the railroad industry should not continue to be responsible for wage losses due to illness of people who have left the industry. But this theory does not fit the facts. We know that today, and for several years past, employees with long years of service are being laid off. If they want to protect their seniority rights they must be available for any railroad work to which they might be recalled. At the same time, they must take any temporary suitable work in other employment that is available to them—otherwise they would be disqualified for unemployment insurance benefits. Now H.R. 5610 would say to them that if they work such a temporary job for 90 days, all rights they have earned by way of protection against loss of wages when sick or injured are gone.

Such a proposal cannot be defended. This is another example of long established benefits destroyed by H.R. 5610.

I say this is only one instance in this bill where you have a sleeper which will sabotage the operation of this whole program. Therefore, I appeal to you to vote for the bill that was considered during the past year, a bill that is supported and sponsored by the railway employees themselves. I hope you will support the move to substitute the bill H.R. 1012 this afternoon for the present bill.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BROYHILL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the need for equitable railroad retirement and unemployment legislation which would be accomplished by the enactment of H.R. 1012 and wish to speak in protest against the grievous wrong this Congress would be committing if it agrees unquestioningly to passage of H.R. 5610, as recently reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

This bill, though ostensibly generous in nature, in fact takes us back rather than forward in our attempts to solve the problems which now exist under our railroad retirement and railroad unemployment insurance laws. It represents an unreasonable violation of the rights and needs of a group of our most important citizens.

When Congress passed the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, now an act of more than 20 years' standing, it assumed responsibility for maintaining an adequate and equitable railroad workers' benefits system. This responsibility is not one we can afford to ignore. Thousands of people—railroad workers and their families—can suffer, or prosper, according to our action.

These people have had reason to believe that we would not let them suffer, that we were alert to their problems and would act to alleviate them. There is little question that appropriate legislation would have passed the 85th Congress if it had not been lost in the scramble for adjournment.

A bill relating to railroad retirement and unemployment insurance was introduced to the 86th Congress at the beginning of the session. This was H.R. 1012 and similar bills, one of which I introduced, which included substantially the same provisions as a bill which passed the Senate last year. It was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and extensive hearings were held on it this spring. I had the privilege of testifying at that time on my bill and H.R. 1012.

The next stage in the history of the bill is well known to all of us. It was relentlessly cut back by amendments adopted by the committee, and has emerged, virtually unrecognizable, as H.R. 5610.

I am happy to say that a large minority of the committee agrees with me that this reported bill is unacceptable, and that it is necessary for us to support instead the passage of H.R. 1012, as originally introduced to the House. Badly as we need legislation in the field of railroad retirement and unemployment insurance, we cannot be swayed by accepting the expediency of passing a badly conceived bill, which is what I consider the reported bill to be.

Both bills contain highly important provisions for 10-percent increases in railroad retirement benefits, and for increasing the tax rate and the tax base for financing these benefits. Both also include provisions for bringing the present railroad legislation into line with recent liberalizations and improvements in the social security system, such as making it possible for women employees of long standing to retire at age 62 with appropriately reduced benefits. Both bills also authorize increases in the daily unemployment and sickness benefit rates, which take into consideration the increased cost of living in recent years.

All of these provisions are desirable and fair. But aside from these similarities, there are critical differences in the bills. As the result of omissions and additions, the character of the reported bill is very different from that of H.R. 1012 as originally presented. Consider, for example, the omission of one vital provision which would extend the duration of unemployment benefits for long-term employees. Under H.R. 1012, railroad workers who had more than 15 years' service would be granted an additional 130 days of unemployment benefits. Workers with more than 10 years of service, but less than 15, would receive an additional 65 days. The bill would thus help to solve one of the major problems in the railroad unemployment insurance program. It would recognize that technological changes are constantly and permanently displacing veteran employees whose opportunities for other employment are severely limited. The existing insurance benefits of 26 weeks are totally insufficient to care for the needs of these workers or to compensate them for years of dedicated service. There can be no doubt that a person who has spent 10, 15, or more years in railroad employment does not remain unemployed through any fault of his own, but through factors peculiar to the railway industry which he cannot control. Under these circumstances, I believe the omission of these proposals in the reported bill is wholly unjustified.

I take issue, too, with the provision in H.R. 5610 which would eliminate benefits for persons who have voluntarily left employment or failed to accept what could be arbitrarily called suitable work. The present law already disqualifies these persons for a reasonable but limited period of 30 days. By this law it is recognized that an employee cannot casually stop or refuse work and expect to draw unemployment benefits instead. But it also recognizes that other pertinent factors may be operating which should not be ignored.

An employee, for example, may quit an apparently suitable job with the prospect of getting another better one. The second job may not materialize, and the employee may be unable to find other suitable employment for a considerable period of time. An employee may find himself physically unable to continue in his present job, although he may not technically be considered unfit or disabled. Under the present law, such contingencies as these are recognized and accounted for. Under the reported bill, however, there would be a continuing disqualification for all these people until they managed to find another job and worked at least 20 days for a railroad employer. The financial hardship which they and their families may suffer before this time are blissfully ignored.

I venture to say that injustice will also result from the provision in H.R. 5610 which establishes the same 20-day employment requirement for persons who have been discharged for misconduct relating to their work. On the surface, this, like several other proposals in the bill, appears to be a reasonable safeguard against unfair collection of benefits. The problems it will cause are not readily apparent. But consider for a moment what could, and undoubtedly will happen. If discharged employee applies for benefits, the Railroad Retirement Board will have to determine whether he is entitled to receive them by deciding on the propriety of the discharge. If it refuses to pay benefits on the ground that the discharge was for adequate cause—and it is conceivable that this decision could be wrong—then it has virtually condemned the worker from the standpoint of future employment. Thus the Board's opinion becomes decisive not only on the question of limited benefit rights, but emerges as a judgment on the employee's work prospects for the future. This intrusion of the retirement board into the handling of grievances is undesirable for obvious reasons, and was recognized as such when a provision very similar to the one in the reported bill was removed from the original railroad legislation in 1939, at the request not only of labor, but also of management and the Railroad Retirement Board itself.

There are other equally arbitrary provisions in H.R. 5610, particularly on the question of sickness benefits, which I strongly oppose. The bill would eliminate benefits which have existed for many years, and which are clearly necessary and desirable in terms of providing a responsible benefits system. I oppose the elimination of sickness benefits for persons who have voluntarily left their jobs, for the reasons which I have already given. I oppose the elimination of maternity benefits, an area where considerations of health and welfare should be of foremost importance. In short, I oppose all of the amendments which have been superimposed on H.R. 1012 to change it from an equitable and humane bill into one which would work hardship on our railroad workers throughout the country.

These workers are important to all of us. We cannot separate their welfare from considerations of our industrial well-being or from our national security. When we jeopardize their security, we take a fateful, backward step with endless repercussions. I believe the bill which the committee has reported is this kind of backward step. As such, I cannot support it. We do, however, have great need of progressive legislation to improve our railroad retirement and unemployment insurance systems. I believe that H.R. 1012, as presented to this Congress in its opening days, will fill this need.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I favor the bill H.R. 1012 as it has been amended and which will be offered as a substitute for the committee bill this afternoon. The reason I support it is because it presents a better all around, more equitable, and fair program than the bill which the committee reported to the House. Furthermore, the substitute which will be offered is essentially the same bill that our committee reported practically unanimously toward the end of the last session, with the exception that the bill last year provided a 7 percent increase in retirement benefits, while the bill this year provides for a 10 percent increase in those benefits. Also the substitute is essentially the same as the bill that was reported unanimously by a committee of the other body having charge of this legislation a few days ago. So I think all in all it presents a fair and equitable program and I hope when the substitute is offered at the conclusion of general debate today it will be adopted by the Committee of the Whole. The amendment which will be offered to the bill H.R. 1012 contains the following five changes:

First. Changes in effective dates: (a) The 10 percent increase in retirement and survivor annuities is made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this act. The effective date for the 10 percent increase in pensions is changed accordingly; (b) the increase in tax rates for Retirement Act purposes, as well as the increase in the taxable and creditable monthly compensation base, is also made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month; (c) the increase in lump sum payments is also made effective prospectively, that is, with respect to deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this act.

The effective date with regard to the work restrictions on disability annuitants, and survivor beneficiaries working outside the United States, and the inclusion of social security wages for the purpose of computing survivor benefits, are not changed—effective for calendar years beginning with the calendar year 1959—because they all require computation on an annual basis.

Second. Changes in the maximum contribution rate for unemployment insurance: In view of the testimony in the record of the hearings that the maximum contribution rate provided in H.R. 1012 of 3½ percent would be inadequate to retain the railroad unemployment insurance account on a sound financial basis, the maximum contribution rate in the newly proposed table for unemployment insurance contributions is changed from 3½ to 3¾ percent, but this table, as well as the increase in the monthly taxable base from $350 to $400 a month, is made effective with respect to compensation paid in months after the month of enactment of this act for services rendered after such month.

The provisions for increasing and extending benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act and the effective dates of such increases and extensions are not changed.

Third. Conferring authority upon the Board to borrow money from the railroad retirement account: In view of the low balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, as shown in the record of the hearings, my amendment includes a new amendment to the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act which confers upon the Railroad Retirement Board the authority to borrow from the railroad retirement account for the payment of benefits and refunds under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, on a reimbursable, and 3-percent interest basis.

Fourth. Extending to July 1, 1959, the period for the payment of temporary unemployment insurance benefits: The provision in the bill for the payment of temporary unemployment compensation to employees with less than 10 years of service up to a maximum of 65 days, but not later than April 1, 1959, is extended to July 1, 1959, in order to conform, as nearly as possible, to the provisions in Public Law 86–7 which was approved March 31, 1959, extending the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 to July 1, 1959.

Fifth. A technical amendment with regard to subsidiary remuneration: My amendment includes also a technical amendment to section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Under present law, if an individual's base year's earnings are insufficient to make him a qualified employee but for the inclusion of subsidiary remuneration, no day on which he earns such subsidiary remuneration is a day of unemployment although otherwise it may be. In view of the proposed increase in the qualifying earnings from $400 to $500 in the base year, section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500".

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLYNT].

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FORAND). The Chair will count. [After counting.] One-hundred and seventeen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 5610, a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act so as to provide increases in benefits, is a bill which is designed to increase benefits to retired railroad employees who are presently receiving retirement benefits under this act; it is a bill to establish tables, scales, and rates to be received by railroad employees presently employed who have earned their rights under the bill and will some day retire under the provisions of this act. In order to do this, of course, it is necessary to increase the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act to provide the revenues and the funds with which to pay these increased benefits. It makes certain changes in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chairman, it is well for us to bear in mind and it is well to repeat here that these benefits are paid out of a trust fund; a trust fund, if you please, which has been created over the period of the last 21 and a fraction years during which the railroad employees have paid into it sums amounting to literally billions of dollars in the expectation that this fund would remain solvent and that it would provide the funds and the revenues from which their benefits will be paid, benefits which many of them have earned by as much as 43 to 45 years of continuous employment by the railroads of this country. It would be an easy thing to do; it would, indeed, be the popular thing to do, to double the benefits that are paid to annuitants. It would also be an easy thing to cut the taxes that provide the trust fund from which these benefits are paid half in two. But, Mr. Chairman, if these were done, it would destroy the real benefits which railroad employees have earned over a period of 40 to 45 years.

It would be awfully easy to increase these benefits, to reduce the tax requirements, but at the same time you would break faith with every railroad employee who has ever contributed to this fund in the expectation that the benefits which he or she received upon retirement would provide at least a modicum of that which is necessary to meet increased costs of living.

Mr. Chairman, the real issue in this bill here today is not one of whether we favor the enactment of an increase in railroad retirement benefits. The real issue here is whether it is the purpose of this Committee of the Whole House to preserve inviolate and intact the trust fund which has been created by contributions paid in by railroad employees and by railroad employers alike during the entire period since the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 was enacted.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to give some figures just to show what is happening to these two trust funds. First, I shall deal with the trust fund which provides for payment of benefits to annuitants, to retired employees, and to surviving spouses of retired railroad employees. The amount that has been paid into the Railroad Retirement Fund since the creation of the fund by the act of 1937 rose at an almost constant rate of between $250 and $400 million a year during a period of time that the number of employees of the railroad stood at a higher level than it does today. Today, Mr. Chairman, instead of being increased by that same figure of between $250 and $400 million a year, it has reached the point where about all that can be done is to try to stabilize it and to keep it from being reduced from one calendar year to the next.

The Unemployment Compensation Fund, which is the other trust fund administered by the Railroad Retirement Board in accordance with the provisions of the Railroad Retirement Laws at one time stood at a figure in excess of $958 million, or nearly $1 billion. On the 1st of February of this year that amount had been depleted from approximately $1 billion to less than $50 million. And according to a projection furnished by the Railroad Retirement Board, there is a strong probability that the entire fund will be depleted prior to June 1 in the absence of the borrowing provision which is contained in the committee bill, H.R. 5610.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLYNT. I am glad to yield.

Mr. STAGGERS. I would like the committee to know in relation to that point that a reduction was made in the tax in 1949 until 1956, and only one-half of 1 percent was paid into this fund, because it had been so high. They wanted to get it down, or at least they did let it get down to where it is now, and the result is that now it is so very low. And that is because they have only been paying one-half of 1 percent for a period of 7 years.

Mr. FLYNT. That is correct. I will say to the gentleman from West Virginia that I hope it will become high again, because I do not ever want to see the time come when a person drawing benefits from this fund will receive a notice from the Railroad Retirement Fund that the money is gone instead of receiving his regular annuity.

Mr. STAGGERS. Will the gentleman agree that if the tax rate in effect prior to 1949 had been continued, the fund would not be down to where it is now?

Mr. FLYNT. I think that is true. And I want to see to it that it never goes down, and is never depleted to where it is in such a precarious position where it will be necessary for the Railroad Retirement Board to send out a notice that the money is all gone.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. FLYNT. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AVERY. I thought it might be well to point out that we should not leave the impression with the members of the committee that this is a matter of option on the part of the employers as to how much money they pay into this fund. The formula is written into the law. The determination based upon that formula is made by the Railroad Retirement Board on the 1st of September each year as to what the percentage will be for the following employment year.

Mr. FLYNT. According to a formula laid down by an act of Congress.

Mr. AVERY. Passed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FLYNT. And that the amount paid into the trust fund, from which these unemployment benefits are paid, is determined by the level of the trust fund on September 1 of a given year.

Mr. Chairman, in the absence of provisions which are contained in the committee bill H.R. 5610 it is not only possible, it is very probable, that the entire trust fund, from which unemployment compensation benefits are paid, will be depleted not later than the month of June in this very calendar year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, it is the purpose of those of us who constituted the numerical majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the consideration of the amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act to give, and the committee bill does give, the same 10 percent increase in railroad retirement benefits which would be provided under the substitute, which originally bore the number H.R. 1012. There is a unanimity of opinion that the only difference in the railroad retirement provisions of this bill now under consideration is the effective date these increased benefits will take place. The substitute, which it is reported will be offered, would provide retroactive benefit payments and retroactive tax payments to January 1, 1959, regardless of the date of final enactment and approval of this measure. The committee bill provides that the increased benefits amounting to exactly the same percentage points and exactly the dollar and cents figure will go into effect only after the bill has been finally enacted into law. The reason for that, and I think it is well to set forth the reason for that thinking and logic and reasoning behind the majority of the committee on this point, is that it would be virtually impossible to go back and impose a retroactive tax on employees and employers alike and to collect the taxes due in many instances from people who are no longer for one reason or another employed in the railroad industry.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLYNT. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. STAGGERS. The gentleman from Georgia is debating a point which will not be at issue in the substitute.

Mr. FLYNT. Based on what we were told prior to today, that was the only difference in the section relating to retirement and it was the primary issue.

Mr. STAGGERS. One of the great objections I have heard from most Members of Congress, is this very thing. It will be taken care of in the substitute as now written, that will be offered a little bit later today.

Mr. FLYNT. In reply to a few statements made by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia when he related an incident which happened to him when he was a very young employee of the Mountain Division of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, I want to say, and I think he will agree with me, that under the provisions which are contained in the committee bill, H.R. 5610, under no circumstance could the actions described by him have been classified by anybody as misconduct. It might have been listed as cause. The gentleman will recall very clearly the long and extended debate of the committee on the question of whether this language should read "discharged for cause" or "discharged for misconduct." I think the gentleman will bear me out that there was unanimity that the only reason for disqualification from receiving unemployment compensation under any circumstance of discharge like that was if there should be a discharge for misconduct.

I wish that the word "willful" had been added before the word "misconduct." But, I do believe the solvency and the fiscal soundness of this trust fund, in which all railroad employees have an interest and a right, should be protected against improper invasions and inroads made on it by persons who might be discharged for reasons of drunkenness on the job, or assault and battery on a member of the public or a fellow employee or a supervisor, or for willful destruction or theft of property belonging rightfully to the employer or to a fellow employee.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLYNT. I yield.

Mr. STAGGERS. Who is going to determine what is willful misconduct or just cause?

Mr. FLYNT. I think the gentleman knows that there are avenues of appeal where almost invariably in cases where there is any doubt on matters of discharge for misconduct, the question is resolved in favor of the employee.

Mr. STAGGERS. Referring to the question of willful misconduct, does the gentleman know how many employees have been fired for misconduct or just cause, and how many have been reinstated after an appeal has been taken?

Mr. FLYNT. If the gentleman has the information, I would be happy if he would supply it at this time for the information of the committee.

Mr. STAGGERS. A great many of the decisions have been reversed when an appeal was taken, and meanwhile the families that were expecting the unemployment compensation, and who had a right to that unemployment compensation, would be denied that compensation.

Mr. FLYNT. Is it not true that many more employees have been reinstated than have been finally discharged?

Mr. STAGGERS. That is correct.

Mr. FLYNT. Yes; more employees have been reinstated than not reinstated.

Mr. STAGGERS. And we know, taking into consideration the human element, there is a question of who is going to determine what is willful misconduct or just cause.

Mr. FLYNT. I think the last statement made by the gentleman from West Virginia bears out my original statement on this point, that the rights of the employee are protected and held inviolate where there is any basis upon which to sustain the position taken by him.

Mr. Chairman, with reference to the question of maternity benefits, I will devote a few minutes to this question. This is a provision which I sincerely feel is very greatly needed in the readjustment of the provisions of the unemployment compensation insurance provisions of this act, and the sickness benefits under this act. Under the existing law, an employee of the railroad company who becomes pregnant can ordinarily claim 116 days of benefits whether or not there is any disability brought on by the pregnancy. There is an added provision that during the 14 days immediately prior to the birth of the child and the 14 days immediately following the birth of the child that time and one-half benefits are provided, which in effect give 130 days of maternity benefits to any person filing a claim for benefits under the provisions of this act. That might be all right for a prosperous fund but it is not proper for a rapidly depleting fund.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to close with a statement of the comparative costs of these two proposals which are before the Committee of the Whole today. On the retirement part of H.R. 5610, the added cost is estimated by figures which were available to our committee staff to be $146 million increase each year on a level basis. Under the provisions of H.R. 1012, the estimated cost is $147 million. The difference there is almost negligible. The great difference is provided for in the place where we need to reappraise and make a readjustment, if necessary. All this is on pages 18, 23, 92 and 98 of the committee report. Under H.R. 5610, the added cost of the unemployment insurance compensation benefits of the committee bill would be $25,448,000 annually. The added sickness benefit cost would be $3,283,000 annually or a total of $28,731,000 increase by the very terms of the committee bill itself. This does not include an additional $20 million, payable for 1 year, for the temporary extension of unemployment benefits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FLYNT] has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of H.R. 1012 the additional cost to unemployment compensation insurance provision would be $59,172,000. The increased cost for payment of sickness benefits would be $12,543,000 or a total of $71,715,000 increased cost, which represents a figure of between $43 million, the difference in the cost of the two bills. Also the cost of the temporary unemployment benefits under this bill would be an additional $15 to $18 million for 1 year. This difference must come from one place and one place only, and that is the trust fund from which every railroad employee has a right to expect that he may receive his unemployment and sickness benefits when he becomes unemployed or sick and the other trust fund from which he may expect retirement benefits when he becomes old enough to retire. It is to protect the earned benefits of annuitants who are presently drawing from this fund, as well as the right of present employees who some day expect to retire, that we, a majority of the committee, seek to maintain the financial fiscal solvency of the retirement fund and of the unemployment insurance fund rather than let them depreciate so that instead of receiving regular benefits provided under the two systems those in charge of these funds will say of one or the other fund: "We are sorry, but the money is all gone."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute measure, H.R. 1012. I do so very gladly because I join with my distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas, who urged the passage of H.R. 1012 back in January. The reason that I do so is very simple. Anyone on either side can talk about the technicalities involved and the estimated costs of the various bills, but there is one thing about which needs no estimate. That is the hard fact that unemployment among railroad workers is here and is here to stay. Two hundred thousand railroad workers were unemployed in January, when more than 160,000 of them were drawing unemployment insurance. Of this number over 40,000 had exhausted all payments available to them under the present Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act during January.

During the fiscal year 1957–1958 more than 300,000 railroad workers, representing 21.2 percent of the qualified work force, drew unemployment compensation. Of that number, 74,100 exhausted their benefit rights. My own State of Massachusetts has been very hard hit. As a matter of fact, New England leads the entire Nation in the dubious distinction of having the highest percentage decrease in railroad employment over the past 10-year period. There has been a 45-percent decrease in employment among railroad workers in New England.

These statistics, of course, cannot begin to indicate all the human suffering that went into their making. Each one of the 74,000 units in last year's total number of exhausted benefit rights represents a human being, plus in most cases at least one or two other members of the family dependent upon his earnings. Each of those human beings, jobless so long that even their inadequate unemployment insurance income was exhausted, means an unemployed railroad worker who has literally come to the end of his rope. Almost every one of those 74,000 human beings behind that statistic represents exhausted savings, foreclosures and repossessions, poverty, even hunger, although these idle workers were part of a labor force which, Labor Department figures show, last year gave its employers the benefit of the greatest rise in output per man-hour of any group of workers in the entire Nation. These are also workers whose outstanding performance enabled the railroads to earn a total net income, after taxes, of over $600 million in 1958, despite the recession which had such a severe effect throughout American industry.

Although the income of the railroads has rebounded to peak levels in the first quarter of this year, unemployment in the industry in January 1959 fell to 110,675 individuals, the lowest level of employment during the 20th century.

Clearly the soaring productivity of railroad workers since the end of World War II and the great technological progress of the industry have created a situation in which rail unemployment appears almost certainly destined to remain severe even after railroad earnings again have soared.

We are confronted in the railroad industry with a continuing unemployment crisis, not just a temporary setback that will be overcome through normal business recovery. Ironically, the great increase in efficiency of railroad workers, which has given the railroads a tremendous earning advantage over other industries, is the major cause of the unemployment and suffering now confronting one out of every five of the employees the industry had last year.

Employees with 20 and even 30 years of seniority have found that their skills are no longer needed or that they are needed only in greatly reduced numbers.

Of the more than 300,000 workers unemployed in the railroad industry in 1958, and that is 36 percent of the total working force, were over 45 years of age, and an additional 11½ percent were between 40 and 45. These displaced workers do not find that their special railroad skills can be readily transferred to other industries. Generally, they are not old enough to retire, and their present duration of unemployment benefits is completely inadequate to meet their needs.

In essence it has been voluntarily accepted by the railroads themselves under the Washington job protection agreement, which provides up to 5 years protection to employees displaced as the result of savings the railroads make through merger or consolidation of two or more carriers that these employees should be cared for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman from Michigan yield me any time?

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, when the railroad unions first proposed the legislation we are considering today, they asked that the railroad unemployment insurance benefits for older workers be extended for up to 5 years to veteran workers to conform to this agreement which they had arrived at with the railroads through collective bargaining.

Last year, both the House and Senate committees which considered this legislation agreed that there was a valid and pressing need for extended benefit periods for the long-service employees who are being displaced by technological progress and rising productivity of their colleagues who remain on the job. Both committees, however, sharply reduced the period of protection recommended by the unions. The Senate committee recommended 26 weeks of extended benefits to railroad workers with 10 to 15 years of service and 52 weeks for employees with 15 or more years of service. Our House committee, however, recommended only half as much; and the Senate, with the clear understanding recorded in the record of the debate that the provision in the House bill would have the committee's support in the House, conformed its bill to the lower recommendations. H.R. 1012 provides only for the extended protection at this minimum.

Surely, under the circumstances, the already greatly reduced provisions of H.R. 1012 in regard to extended benefits are the very minimum protection this House should accept. The plight of veteran railroad employees who have been displaced from their jobs is totally ignored in H.R. 5610, although this measure does not hesitate to propose that workers who are still on the job should assume a much heavier burden in higher retirement taxes to pay the cost of improved benefits to workers already retired. In this connection, it must not be forgotten that railroad workers are already paying a heavy burden of taxes to finance benefits to retired workers who originally were covered by pension plans financed entirely by the railroad industry. When the railroad retirement system was set up, the railroads saved many millions of dollars when their employees agreed to assume payments to cover the converting of such plans into railroad retirement benefits. In addition, the railroads have saved over $1 billion in unemployment taxes through the railroad unions' agreement to reduce the original railroad unemployment tax when there was no need for this money in days of full employment.

It does not seem unreasonable to ask the railroads to share some of its huge savings with their unemployed employees in the form of extended benefits, now that these workers are facing poverty and need.

It is important to note that the extended protection proposed by H.R. 1012 would operate only while an individual is actually unemployed. If permanent suitable work can be found for him, either in or out of the industry, his benefits cease immediately. Even temporary work would interrupt benefits for the duration of such employment. The provision of the kind proposed would, I believe, serve a useful social purpose by creating an incentive for the railroads to stabilize their employment in order to effect savings in unemployment taxes. In this connection, one must not forget the shocking fact that during this period of chronic unemployment of railroad workers, the carriers have refused for over 2½ years even to bargain on stabilization of unemployment proposals submitted by the railroad unions.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues in the House to adopt the bill originally introduced by the very distinguished chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], supported by the ranking Republican minority member the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT], that will do justice to the many railroad workers of the country.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KEITH].

Mr. KEITH. Mr. Chairman, first, I would like to commend the previous speakers who have helped us in defining the issues that are before the House this afternoon. I have been particularly attentive to the remarks of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle and I must say that I agree with their leadership but that the old bill 1012 needs the changes that are contained in 5610.

As has been mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT], I am from Massachusetts and, prior to coming to the Congress, served in its State senate. We went through a similar and very trying session in the adoption of some improvements to our employment insurance laws.

Massachusetts had exactly the same problems on a statewide basis that we are facing here in the railroad industry. By tightening up our unemployment insurance law we in Massachusetts were able to provide the workingmen and women of Massachusetts with one of the most liberal of all unemployment insurance laws in the country. And yet the law we passed in Massachusetts provided benefits that were much more modest than those contemplated in either of those bills which are before us today.

These bills are generous. They must have adequate premiums and they must have sound underwriting. The committee bill, H.R. 5601, has provisions for sound administration of the unemployment insurance program. It will therefore cause less of a drain on the retirement fund and less of a burden on the railroad industry.

This bill is better for the people in my district where we now have a railroad, the Old Colony, which is subsidized by the towns of southeastern Massachusetts. Its deficit would be increased if H.R. 1012 were substituted. The towns would have to pay more of a subsidy or the railroads would have to abandon the service. The employees and the public would be hurt badly by the substitute bill because of excessive cost of paying for these benefits which are way out of line when compared with Massachusetts industries.

We, in the Congress, are in effect trustees for these retirement funds. We should act prudently and protect the general welfare of all of the parties involved. We should support, therefore, the committee report.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss].

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very complex piece of legislation. You will find very few provisions where any two reasonable men examining them will come up with the same precise definition or agreement as to the cause or perhaps the effect. The bill, H.R. 5610, however, reported by the committee, is, in my judgment, a long, long step backward.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-nine Members are present, not a quorum.

The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 32]

Andersen, Minn.	Diggs	Patman
Barden	Dorn, N.Y.	Pillion
Barry	Downing	Powell
Bolling	Durham	Ray
Bonner	Garmatz	Rivers, S.C.
Brademas	Glenn	Rodino
Buckley	Hoffman, Mich.	Tollefson
Bush	Kilburn	Van Pelt
Casey	Lindsay	Weaver
Celler	Metcalf	Westland
Davis, Tenn.	Miller, N.Y.	Whitten
	Multer

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NATCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5610) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he directed the roll to be called, when 394 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. Moss] has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, I stated that H.R. 5610 is a long step backward. In making that statement I want to point out that in most respects H.R. 1012, the bill originally introduced by the distinguished chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], and H.R. 5610 are almost identical; but in at least a half dozen very substantive areas they are sharply different. The fact that there are just approximately these half dozen areas of difference undoubtedly led my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. YOUNGER], to observe that in committee he could not recall any negative votes when the bill was reported out. While I do not think that is exactly the fact, nevertheless, whether or not we voted on that point, a number of us expressed our sharp disagreement with amendments which had been included in this bill. I am going to concern myself primarily with two amendments which change very radically the present rights of railroad workers, and in discussing them I am going to direct my discussion to railroad unemployment insurance.

I would suggest that each member of this committee acquaint himself fully with the fact that we are talking about two separate funds, and they are easy to confuse: One is the railroad retirement fund, which is contributed to by the employee and the employer on a fixed rate of contribution. The other is the unemployment insurance fund which is contributed to by the employer at a variable rate depending on a number of important factors. The fact that only the railroad employer contributes in this instance does not mean that it is its personal property; it is a trust fund to be administered for the benefit of the employees; it is part of the total package of compensation.

The difference is that for the first time we are going to impose on the railroad worker who voluntarily leaves his employment, a permanent disqualification unless he leaves it for good cause. We do not define "good cause," and we do not provide any means of appeal. The provisions of H.R. 5610 are silent as to the type of appeal provided.

The second thing is that we give to the employer almost a right to permanently disqualify any employee who is fired for cause. This was a point of considerable controversy in committee, and the committee acted without knowing what it was doing on at least one occasion.

I would point out that I have before me the original draft of the language saying:

> Any of the days beginning with the day with respect to which the Board finds that he was discharged or suspended for misconduct as defined by the uniform code of rules of the railroad industry applying to his work.

The reason we could not adopt this as the final language of the amendment was because we discovered that there is no uniform code of rules. In fact, we do not know what constitutes discharge for misconduct connected with his work. We do know there are a great many railroads in this country that have a number of crafts and a great number of working agreements and that each of these agreements on the various railroads deals with the matter of discharge for cause or misconduct connected with the work of the employee.

Then we have a very complex appeal machinery, starting down between the worker and his employer and working through his union repesentatives. Ultimately this man's case gets to some governmental board, where it takes about 2 years to get a decision. You can imagine how very different it is going to be if all of the cases involving some kind of disciplinary cause for discharge are referred to an inadequate machinery for determination. There are very few of them considered at the present time, but even those few take up to 2 years to get a decision. Now we are going to increase no one can estimate by how many hundreds or thousands the workload of this appeal machinery.

This is a step back to 1937. The original law provided for substantially the same sort of punitive treatment where a man voluntarily quit or was discharged for cause connected with his work. Before the act became operative, on petition from the railroads and the workers that provision was repealed. It was deemed to be far too cumbersome and too difficult to administer. So this is in fact a real step backward.

I would point out that the substitute which will be offered is going to be modified to overcome the objections as to retroactivity and those of us who support that would point out to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AVERY], that we also supported it in committee as being sound procedurally. So we are not retreating, we are not abandoning principle. We are being consistent.

It improves the bill and we are anxious to improve it. We also improve the provision which would permit one trust fund to borrow from the other over a period of temporary fund shortage. Again this is not an inconsistency, this is not retreating. It is further evidence of the desire of those who signed the minority views to make the bill as good as possible.

But the other differences take away in every single instance. We take away rights which have been a part of this package for many years. In doing that, this committee should consider very carefully the fact that this is a different type of industry. Here most of the employees are not covered by supplemental contracts negotiated with their employer as is typical of most large industrial employee groups today. This is the principal package the railroad employee may look to. He does not have, for instance, any sick benefits, a separately negotiated package apart from the rights covered by law. These are all against. He does not have the supplemental retirement. I mention that even though retirement is not part of the issue or controversy in the discussions between H.R. 1012 and H.R. 5610.

We are dealing with a different type of employee group than characterizes American industry. We are dealing with people who must come to the Congress because of the law under which they operate. We impose by law many requirements on the railroad worker which are not imposed on other groups of employees. We recognize the national interest in whether or not he be permitted to strike and place far more onerous requirements on the employee of the railroad industry before he can finally take his issue on strike and try to bargain to bring about improvements in his working conditions. All of these things should lead you to give careful consideration, and I am sure if you do you will vote for the substitute.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that I am one of those Members of the House who joined in filing the minority report urging enactment of H.R. 1012 in lieu of the measure reported by the committee, H.R. 5610. There are many reasons for this, and I would refer my colleagues to the minority views which you will find in the back of the committe report.

Now, I would like to first limit the issue briefly. H.R. 1012 is the same measure which our committee reported out last year, with very, very minor exceptions. H.R. 1012 is the same bill, as a matter of fact, that was introduced by the distinguished chairman of our committee. Last year the identical bill was worked out very carefully after conferences involving the railroad brotherhood, Members of the other body, Members of this body, and after some consultation, indeed, with members of the railroad industry. So, it is not a new bill; it is not a measure which was not carefully thought out.

First, I would like to refer my colleagues to one very important factor. The differences over this measure do not have to do with retirement. They have to do, as my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss] said, with the unemployment compensation features of this bill. I would like to dwell on the same points that my colleague from California mentioned to this committee. I would like to treat with the provisions requiring forfeiture of unemployment benefits for those who voluntarily quit and forfeiture of unemployment benefits for those who are fired for cause. And, the first I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues is this: There is no clear definition in either case as to what constitutes voluntary quitting or what constitutes being fired for cause. In no case is there in the bill any procedure for appeal from loss of benefits. These two sections can cost any worker up to $2,200, with no appeal.

Now, we have heard it said that this business of unemployment compensation is something which is owned or which is contributed to solely by the railroads. This is not true. The railroads in their negotiations with the brotherhoods have at all times regarded the unemployment compensation payments which they make as an additional factor in the hourly wage. It is so computed, and when they sit down and bargain with the brotherhoods they say, "We pay so much basic wage; we pay so much sickness benefits; we pay so much vacation time; and we pay you this much for unemployment compensation and retirement." And, they figure the whole thing out as an hourly wage.

I would refer you to page 18 of the document entitled "Report to the President by the Emergency Board Created December 28, 1953, Pursuant to Section 10 of the Railway Labor Act (N.M.B. Case A–4336)":

> In the financial operation of railroads and other types of business, the costs of certain fringe benefits such as paid vacations are included in wages as such. Certain other fringe benefits to the extent they are paid for by the employer normally involve costs in addition to wages as such.

I am sure if you read the transcript of this particular case before the Board you will find that the railroad specifically referred to their contributions into the unemployment compensation fund as additional compensation to the workers.

I ask anyone here to define to me or to anyone else what constitutes a voluntary quit or what constitutes firing for cause. Indeed, there will be many differences. Indeed, the two cases will overlap.

We received some estimates that say that the voluntary quit provisions and firing-for-cause features will save the fund some $6 million a year. That is not a reliable figure. In fact I was advised in the last few days that this saving to the railroads and to the fund will not necessarily equal this amount.

That figure is not based on experience. There is no experience presently available. In the past the law provided that when a cessation of employment occurred under these circumstances the worker went into a waiting period and at the conclusion of that waiting period he drew his full benefits.

If H.R. 5610 is passed, we will find this is not so, each and every one of these cases will be litigated to the fullest before the Railroad Retirement Board. Remember, the Railroad Retirement Board administers the Railroad Retirement Fund and the funds of the unemployment compensation program for railroad employees. Its administrative costs will be borne by the fund and by the railroads through their contributions. This will require a substantial increase in staff. Experience shows that the other agency which handles adjustment of grievances, the Railroad Adjustment Board, handles cases of this sort over a period usually up to 2 years, but in many cases the period for solving the procedure has taken up to 5 years. Men fired for cause, or allegedly voluntarily quitting, may well wait for 5 years for adjudication of their case.

If these two provisions alone become law, the man who works for the railroad and who either quits or is fired for cause will have to wait to have his problems and to have his interest adjudicated, for a period of up to 2 to 5 years. During this waiting period there will be no income to his family. Subsequently, if, as in many cases it works out, the man is reinstated with wages back, he will still have undergone a substantial period of hardship with no unemployment compensation whatsoever, through no fault of his own.

Let me remind the House of Representatives of one thing—and I want to stress this. These very same provisions were in the original law but were removed within 1 year. And they were removed because the railroads and the brotherhoods agreed that the removal of unemployment compensation benefits for voluntary quitting or for firing for cause was not in the interest either of the railroads, of the brotherhoods, or of the employees; and indeed was not in the interest of the integrity of the fund. They found that cost of the administrative handling of this would be too burdensome to the fund, and that it would be cheaper and better merely to pay unemployment compensation to those voluntarily quitting and being fired for cause than to litigate each case arising under such provisions.

As a result it was removed.

H.R. 1012 should be substituted for H.R. 5610.

I wholeheartedly support the proposal to substitute the original bill, H.R. 1012, in substantially the same form as this legislation passed the Senate last year, for the bill reported out by the committee. It is hard for me to believe that the majority members of the committee were fully aware of the effect and implications of what they were doing in amending H.R. 1012 as they have done. On the one hand, by keeping certain features in the original bill, the majority of the committee have indicated that they, too, recognize the basic need for, and justice of, improvements at this time in railroad retirement and railroad unemployment insurance. Yet by adopting the amendments to H.R. 1012 which are incorporated in the bill reported to the House they have at the same time struck undeserved and harsh blows at the railroad workers who are or may become the victims of unemployment.

In effect, by adopting H.R. 5610 which retains the proposals for increased unemployment insurance benefits and certain other improvements contained in H.R. 1012, the committee majority has said, "Yes; we recognize that the unemployment situation on the railroads today is worse than at any time since the turn of the century and the workers must have relief." But, then, by adopting the amendments to H.R. 1012 which constitute the committee bill, the committee majority, to all intents and purposes, goes on to add: "Even though railroad workers today have increased their productivity faster than any other group of workers in the Nation and are suffering one of the most severe unemployment problems of any group of workers as a direct result of the greater output they have given to the railroads, nevertheless we are going to reward this outstanding group of workers by taking away from them—while they are unemployed solely because they have helped their employer benefit from their greater output—unemployment insurance protections they have had since the beginning of the railroad unemployment insurance system. More than that, we are going to reward railroad workers further by placing upon them stricter restrictions for eligibility for unemployment insurance than have been placed upon workers in other industries, even though these other workers have by no means benefited their employers as much as the railroad workers have in terms of increased output per man-hour."

That, although the committee report uses different words to express it, is precisely what the amendments in H.R. 5610 would do. Let me cite only one of the provisions in H.R. 5610 which is a case in point. I am particularly concerned about the unreasonable provisions which the committee bill would establish concerning the payment of unemployment benefits to railroad workers who voluntarily quit their jobs or fail to accept suitable work. H.R. 5610 proposes—with no justifiable reason—to apply even stricter disqualification provisions to railroad workers in these categories than are applied to workers in other industries. This fact in itself makes the committee bill sufficiently unfair and unreasonable to merit rejection and the substitution of H.R. 1012. The injustice of this proposal is compounded, and cries out for support of H.R. 1012, by being proposed at the very time when unemployment on the railroads has reached chronic proportions and the unemployed workers of this industry are in desparate need of help, a fact which even the backers of H.R. 5610 do not dispute.

The contradiction of H.R. 5610's retention of H.R. 1012's helpful provisions, while at the same time it strikes unjust blows at human beings suffering the pangs of hunger and poverty, leads me to believe that the sponsors of this legislation were not aware that the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, like most State unemployment compensation laws, already disqualifies an employe for benefits for a reasonable time if he voluntarily quits his job without good cause or fails without good cause to accept available suitable work. This provision, I repeat, is already in the law. Railroad workers are already disqualified for a period of 30 days from drawing unemployment benefits which they have earned from their prior service if they voluntarily leave suitable work, or if they refuse to accept such work when it is offered. This existing provision is generally comparable with similar disqualifications in the State unemployment insurance laws.

These disqualifications recognize that a worker should not have a completely free choice to stop working or to refuse work and draw unemployment insurance benefits instead. On the other hand, by putting a reasonable limit on the period of disqualification, they also recognize that it would be socially unwise and morally unjust to permanently disqualify unemployed workers from benefits they have earned over years of service. Practically all people who depend upon wages for their livelihood want to keep working and to find jobs when they are unemployed. They do not quit jobs or turn down suitable employment opportunities on a mere caprice. Workers quit jobs for many reasons. Perhaps a better job is offered but then does not materialize. Perhaps a worker may find himself physically no longer able to cope with the job he has been holding, although technically he may not be considered disabled for the job. Perhaps his boss does not like him and makes his employment so miserable that he quits. Does a worker who voluntarily quits his job in such circumstances commit so heinous a wrong that Congress now wishes to deprive him, as H.R. 5610 proposes, in many instances permanently, of protections he has earned through his previous work for the railroads? I cannot believe even a strong minority of this great 86th Congress would take so backward a step.

The present provisions, providing for 30 days of disqualification for any benefits, are certainly a reasonable balancing of the various considerations. No case of any kind has been made to support the committee's bill's harsh proposals. H.R. 5610 would establish a continuing disqualification for unemployment benefits applying to all employees who quit work or fail to accept work until they can again get a railroad job and work in it at least 20 days. Given the present high unemployment situation in the industry, this would often have the effect of being a permanent disqualification. This is an entirely unjust penalty, which would often rest upon questionable and dubious interpretations of some government official as to just what constitutes "suitable work" and "without good cause."

H.R. 5610, by proposing such a penalty in the circumstances at hand, loses sight of the basic function and social purposes of unemployment insurance. We must aid the jobless, not deprive them without valid reason of existing benefits they have worked—in the case of currently unemployed railroad workers—for as long as 20 and 30 years, to earn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK].

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, a year ago, upon the combined plea of the railroad industry and railroad labor, I supported the Transportation Act of 1958, under which the railroad industry was provided with broad authority to effect economies and more profitable operation. I supported this legislation with reluctance because I feared an extensive cutback in railroad employment, adding to the national unemployment problem.

Last year the Congress reduced the excise tax on freight transportation. I opposed this legislation because it eliminated a freight excise tax on all forms of freight transport, including truck and pipeline transport and would provide no special assistance to the railroad industry. I feared that the elimination of this tax would result in no reduction in freight rates, no savings to the consumer and a substantial loss to the defunct Federal Treasury. My fears have been well founded. Railroad, truckline, and pipeline managements gained a tax cut bonanza—the public gained an increased tax burden.

Last year we increased social security benefits and provided unemployment compensation extensions. The railroad employees were overlooked. Although it is true that railroad retirement benefits and railroad unemployment benefits are better than those under the social security system, it must be remembered that railroad labor has been in the vanguard with respect to this legislation. Railroad labor has provided the crucible for the testing of improvements and betterment in retirement and unemployment program. Benefits and contributions have been higher to provide a better system. The experiences of railroad legislation are used to establish standards and actuarial experiences for the benefit of all American labor.

We have drastically improved the plight of the American railroads. It is only fitting that we now seek to improve the plight of railroad labor.

Last year the managers of the railroad industry told us that if we enacted legislation improving pensions and unemployment insurance for railroad workers, the carriers would be forced to lay off thousands more of their employees. Although we did not enact this legislation, thousands of railroad employees were laid off anyway. More than 200,000 railroad workers were laid off in the 12-month period ending June 30, 1958. Regardless of what we do here, the railroads will employ as few workers as possible. But there are some basic facts about the financial conditions of the American railroads that we should all know, especially in view of the familiar cry of "poverty" of railroad managements.

RAILROADS MAKE FINE RECOVERY

The railroad industry has made a splendid recovery from the 1957–58 recession. No additional carriers have fallen into receivership. In the final accounting at the close of 1958 only 17 railroads failed to earn their fixed and contingent charges for the year. From September through December 1958 total net railway operating income for all railways was $368,932,000, 20 percent above the same period of 1957 and only 6 percent under the same period of the more prosperous year of 1956, when railway net operating income exceeded $1 billion.

DEBT POSITION IMPROVED

The debt position of the railways has greatly improved. In prewar years, debt constituted about half of total railroad investment. At the end of 1957 it was less than one-third. Prior to the war, interest alone sometimes claimed as much as 18 percent of total yearly railroad revenues. In 1957 interest required less than 4 percent.

Speaking of interest, when this administration instituted its tight-money policy, adding billions of dollars of costs to all of us, including the railroads, we heard no complaint from railroad managements. It is only when employees ask for improved wages or working conditions that carrier managements begin to cry.

RAIL COSTS MOST FAVORABLE

Improvements in the railroads' financial structure have been accompanied by enormous expenditure for additions and betterments. The industry has almost completely converted to economical diesel operation. The overall age of its equipment shows significant improvement over past years. Unit costs of railway operation have not increased in pace with other increases. Since the end of the war, total railway costs per gross ton-mile have increased by only 42.6 percent. In the same period consumers' prices have risen 60.6 percent and the wholesale price index by 73.3 percent. Comparisons based on earlier years reveal similar trends.

Thus, actual costs of providing railway service have risen less than the general price level, in spite of increases in wages and prices of materials and supplies. Again, by their phenomenal increase in productivity, fewer employees producing more revenue, rail employees may take great credit for this significantly favorable position of the railway industry.

IMPROVED RAIL PROFITS

These favorable conditions have paid off in rail profits. Annual operating profits of rail carriers have remained close to $1 billion throughout the postwar years. Prior to World War II the net railway operating income frequently dropped well below $500 million. Since 1949 it has not dropped below $750 million. Net income has also been extremely stable.

A most reliable manner of measuring railway earnings is the return earned in relation to common and preferred stock in the hands of the public. In 1957, the latest year for which figures are available, the railways earned 12.8 percent on their outstanding equity capital. The rate of return on capital stock in the hands of the public, not held by railway companies, in recent years is: 1950, 12.2 percent; 1951, 10.8 percent, 1952, 12.8 percent; 1953, 13.5 percent; 1954, 10.2 percent; 1955, 14.1 percent; 1956, 13.8 percent; 1957, 12.8 percent.

The fact of the matter is that today rail stocks and debentures are among the more promising areas of investment.

FAVORABLE FUTURE PROSPECTS

These vitally important facts give us a right to expect continuing improved conditions. No industry is more responsive to general conditions than the railroads. No production, no transportation. The Regional Shippers Advisory Boards, as reported by the Car Service Division of the Association of American Railroads, estimated a 5.9 percent increase in carloadings for the first quarter of 1959. The efficiency of railway employees is now at its alltime peak; the current rate of productivity progress in the American railroad industry is the highest in its history.

VITAL NATIONAL CONCERN

We must do what we can to keep it that way in this vital "backbone" industry of America. Certainly denying just pension benefits and improvements in the railroad unemployment insurance act is a most ungrateful way to reward such faithful service. Many thousands of these faithful employees have been separated from the industry. Adequate unemployment insurance in this industry is of vital national concern. Many of these employees are in most hazardous occupations. In 1957 there were 12,448 employees killed and injured on American railroads. In 1958, with approximately 144,000 fewer employees, there were 13,086 employees killed and injured on the American railroads. In 1958 American railroads paid $129,300 in fines for violating Federal safety laws.

It is an urgent necessity that this Congress enact improvements in railroad unemployment and sickness insurance and railroad pensions. We must not break faith with a group of employees who have a notable record of productivity, efficiency and faithfulness. Not only will such legislation fill vital human needs, but it is important to note that in these times when effective mass purchasing power is so desperately needed, pension payments and unemployment and sickness insurance payments immediately find their way into the flow of consumer purchasing power. While increasing the wealth of the Nation, they compensate those among us who are most in need.

Finally, we must consider that increased retirement benefits create important incentives for retirement. Every person induced to retirement from an essential job, releases that job for another. In present times, when the work force faces the massive effect of automation and mechanization along with an increment of one million additional workers each year, job creation becomes a national cause of primary importance. This legislation, as submitted in the substitute bill, is completely in the national interest. I urge its adoption.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, listening to this debate this afternoon, I fear we have strayed far afield from what we set out to do just a year ago. If you will remember, a year ago we were talking about increasing the railroad retirement benefits and extending the period of unemployment insurance benefits to unemployment railroaders.

But the debate this afternoon seems to have become an argument over whether a mother about to have a baby deserves any sickness insurance and whether a man who has been furloughed for 89 days should get any sickness insurance while a man who is furloughed for 90 days should not.

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if we are not trying to settle too many problems at one time here, or at least are we not trying to settle prematurely some problems that should be aired more thoroughly by the industry itself before the Congress arbitrates.

I respectfully suggest that we get back to the original point. Do we increase railroad retirement benefits and extend unemployment compensation over a longer period for some worthy unemployed railroaders or not?

Apparently, there is a rather general agreement that we should increase railroad retirement benefits. We increased retirement benefits for Federal employees and for social security retirees and everybody else who comes under Federal jurisdiction last year. We are going to vote railroad retirees a 10 percent increase this year. That seems to be agreed.

Now what about extending unemployment benefits for a longer period? Last year we tried to do that for other industries. We said to the unemployed in the textile industry and in the automobile plants and others, "Now, this is an unusual situation. We are going to lend you a helping hand. We are going to help you out by helping the States to provide you unemployment compensation for additional weeks." We did not say to them, "We are going to provide you with additional benefits for additional weeks provided you give up some of the sickness or maternity benefits that you negotiated at the bargaining table." We did not put any proviso or make any sweeping changes in the program at all. We extended it without any strings attached.

But under H.R. 5610, look what a different treatment we are trying to give the railroad industry. If this bill becomes law, we would be using a promise of an increase in retirement and unemployment compensation benefits as a carrot to entice railroad employees to give up certain benefits that they have had since 1938.

That is wrong. That would be adjudicating here, as a part of this matter, controversies that are of long duration and controversies which should be more thoroughly aired between management and labor before the Congress arbitrates.

Now, it is said that if we do not make these controversial changes, there will not be money to pay these additional benefits. I think one gentleman took the floor here and said that the original Harris bill will cost some $45 million more than this Harris bill No. 2, H.R. 5610, if we do not change some of these rules on sickness insurance and unemployment benefits.

Now, just a minute—think about this a second. Actually, how much money will be saved, if you tell the mothers in the railroad industry that they do not get sickness insurance for pregnancy?

How much are you really going to save in the unemployment compensation fund if you say a man who is fired for misconduct cannot have unemployment compensation? How many are there of those? Has the personnel department of the railroad companies made so many mistakes in hiring untrustworthy personnel that there are thousands being fired for misconduct? And how about people who quit voluntarily? How much money are you going to save if you deny them unemployment benefits?

The truth of the business is the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Fund is unsound today and has been for some time, not because of any so-called abuses. The real reasons are these: First, there is a tremendous technological revolution that is going on in this industry; and, second, the railroad industry for many years got real shortsighted about putting money into the fund—adding only one-half of 1 percent per year. They were looking through rose-colored glasses, thought the smaller contribution would be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN] has expired.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. The unemployment insurance fund in the railroad industry would be some $1 billion sounder today if somebody had not been quite so shortsighted.

The fact is that the railroad industry, in the period 1948 to 1958, paid less money in annual contributions to the unemployment insurance fund than other industries paid into such funds. In fact, for the last 20 years the railroad contributions have averaged 1.85 percent, while other firms have paid 2 percent under the State law.

So, the truth is that a technological revolution and this shortsightedness in contributions into the fund have brought us to this crisis. Let us not kid anybody that it was because some mothers are getting some maternity benefits and that there are some people who are drawing unemployment benefits who were fired for misconduct or who quit voluntarily. I think the chairman was right when he introduced H.R. 1012. I support that bill. He has had some second thoughts about it, I am sure, but I suggest that every Member of this Congress go back to the chairman's original thinking and substitute H.R. 1012 for this boobytrap bill.

Harris bill H.R. 1012 has a pretty good arrangement on extending unemployment compensation benefits, it seems to me. It would differentiate between newcomers and employees who have devoted more than 10 years of their lives to railroading.

The oldtimer who gets laid off has a much harder time making connections with some other industry. He also wants to stay available for any call that might come from the railroad, because he has his seniority at stake. Railroading is his career. He is not trained for anything else and has not enough active years left to learn a new trade or profession. Why not give them special attention in unemployment compensation?

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee agreed to this arrangement last year. Why is it not just as good today as it was then?

In fact, why did not the committee stand by the compromises they hammered out last year all along the line, compromises expressed in Harris bill H.R. 1012? Surely, if it was satisfactory 9 months ago, it could not be so awfully bad now.

Now we are told that the big reason for substituting Harris bill H.R. 5610 for Harris bill H.R. 1012 is that it involves additional cost.

But now Congress should be consistent. Lots of employers and employees are paying increased costs of social security contributions and unemployment insurance today, maybe when they cannot really afford it; because it was decided that it had to be done; and it is the law.

Yet we are told that railroads should be accorded special consideration, different from other industries.

No thinking person wants to be a party to bankrupting anybody or any business.

But tough as it is to pay additional costs, the railroad companies will surely find a way to do it.

I do not mean to imply that they are rich. I know they have had their troubles.

I made a speech on the floor of this House in support of the Smathers bill last year providing loans and relief from regulatory restrictions for suffering railroads. I want a healthy railroad industry; and I feel the Government should make every reasonable effort to help keep it healthy.

Well, we passed the Smathers bill, but the last time I checked, not one railroad had requested a loan under the new law. Obviously, the health of the patient improved dramatically overnight.

In fact, if the figures supplied me are correct, the rebound from the depths of the 1957–58 recession has been startling in most of the railroad companies.

And apparently, business is good enough that many of the companies are increasing salaries for officials and increasing numbers of top-level executives.

Surely, that is a sign of prosperity. And I want to see more signs. I hope every railroad in this country makes more money every year, so their officials and their employees and stockholders can share in the fruits of a thriving industry.

I believe in the free enterprise system.

But any company which can afford sizable raises for officials would surely not plead poverty as a reason for not wanting to provide for its unemployed and retired.

In the period 1955 to 1957, executive salary increases and additional executives jumped the cost of supervision from 8 percent to 124 percent per employee in the railroad industry.

If these increases were within the budget, surely some way could have been found to pay more into the unemployment insurance fund during that period. Then, everybody would have been better off.

But it was not done. Now, we must take emergency action to correct the mistake.

Railroad retirement benefits and unemployment insurance benefits must be modernized. We all agree on that.

Harris bill H.R. 1012 will modernize them the way we modernize them for employees in other industries, with no strings attached, no debatable conditions stipulated, no taking away of rights or privileges hammered out years ago.

Harris bill H.R. 5610 would modernize unemployment insurance programs for railroaders provided certain changes were made in sickness insurance programs, maternity benefits, and so forth—a proviso that Congress asked of no one else in any other industry.

I think the people who make railroading a career deserve, at least, the same treatment Congress has already granted people in other industries. Railroaders are first-class citizens and should not be treated as second class.

I urge the House to pass the original, the genuine Harris bill, and not accept any substitute, especially this boobytrap H.R. 5610.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. I think I just heard the gentleman say that the reason the unemployment compensation fund was different was on account of the shortsightedness of the railroad employers.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I said of the industry.

Mr. AVERY. Does the gentleman know just exactly how that is?

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I am sure that the industry decision involved decisions agreed to by management and employees, and even the Government was a part of it, but it still does not alter the fact that there was shortsightedness. Let us not blame it on the mothers who got some time off just to have a baby.

Mr. AVERY. The Congress of the United States set up that provision. That is in the statute. That is not a matter of negotiation. It is firmly planted there on the basis of the formula set up by the Congress as to what the tax should be. So if there was some shortsightedness it would be on the part of some of the previous sessions of the Congress.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. It was a combination of the industry and the economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. YOUNGER. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. AVERY. The gentleman has made some reference as to mothers receiving sickness benefits. If the gentleman will read the bill he will find that we have not taken any sickness benefits away, as such. This bill will call for the expenditure of $3½ million more for sickness benefits. We have deleted some maternity benefits, as such, but I point out that even though the maternity benefits have been eliminated, sickness due to pregnancy will be allowed in the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Under this bill, as I read it, any single girl working for the railroad industry must take an oath that she is not pregnant before she can get sickness benefits.

Mr. AVERY. That is not the case.

We even today propose to reduce the benefit by increasing the time to 9 days instead of 7; and there are other instances. This bill goes backward instead of forward.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I have a conflict of interest with respect to this legislation: My dad, after 45 years on the railroads, retired in January. I also have a concurrence of interest because I have, as most of you have, thousands of railroad men, retired and present employees, who are deeply concerned about what we are doing here today.

We are not arguing, I am glad to say, as to whether the benefits should be increased or not. Some of us would hope they could have been increased more, but I have not heard an argument to the effect that they should not be increased. Instead we are arguing about conditions of employment, changes which have been made in the second bill, presumably to correct certain abuses which must have existed for a good while. I want to talk about those presumed abuses and in particular with respect to a letter which was sent to every Member of the House by Daniel P. Loomis, the president of the Association of American Railroads.

Under date of April 9, 1959, Mr. Daniel P. Loomis, president of the Association of American Railroads sent to every Member of the House of Representatives a four-page letter in which he set forth a comparison of H.R. 5610 with H.R. 1012, from the railroads' viewpoint. Mr. Loomis did not hesitate to emphasize and I quote his letter—that from the railroads' point of view "H.R. 5610 is obviously to be preferred over H.R. 1012."

Clearly, where there is a basic difference in viewpoint concerning legislation as marked as that confronting us here, a letter written from such a premise must almost inevitably represent a one-sided analysis which is his privilege. Mr. Loomis' letter, accordingly, cannot be taken as telling the full story, or even enough of the full story to afford a sound basis upon which to reach a decision with respect to action on the legislation before us.

Actually, analysis of the AAR letter shows that it is little more than a restatement of the arguments which the railroads presented to the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee during the recent hearings on this legislation. Most of those arguments were overwhelmingly rejected by the committee, but the changes it made in reporting out H.R. 5610 show that a majority accepted some of these arguments as the basis of the amendments to H.R. 1012 which are incorporated in the Committee bill.

I do not believe that even the portions of Mr. Loomis' letter which deal with these changes offer sufficient justification for their retention and I commend the minority of the committee for seeing through their flimsy tissue and making the strong fight they are making here today for retention of the original bill.

In their minority report, which is attached to the Committee Report on H.R. 5610, these members of the committee have stated the chief ways in which H.R. 5610 is a backward step in social insurance legislation. I will not repeat those arguments here, but I again bring them to your attention—page 115–122 of the report—as offering what I regard as full and complete refutation to the statements made by the Association of American Railroads in support of the changes made by H.R. 5610.

On the last page of his letter, Mr. Loomis listed six alleged "abuses and unwarranted payments" to unemployed railroad workers which he says H.R. 5610 is intended to correct. I would like to look at each of these, and call to your attention the spurious nature of Mr. Loomis' arguments concerning them.

First, Mr. Loomis says that H.R. 5610 would eliminate the retroactive lump sum payments which H.R. 1012 proposed for past unemployment, sickness and retirement benefits.

Let me point out that no provision for such retroactivity would now be necessary except for the failure of the House to take action last year on the bill passed by the Senate. Had the bill reported out by the committee last year come to a vote, there is little doubt but that such benefits would now be in effect as the law of the land.

We must not, therefore, in justice to the unemployed railroad workers who are presently in need of such help, deprive them of these benefits which they would have received had the House not failed to act on this bill in the closing days of the last Congress.

If retroactive payments of temporary extended unemployment insurance benefits are not made, railroad employees will be deprived of such benefits although the last Congress provided them for employees in other industries. Moreover, when the period for such benefits expired on April 1, this present Congress recently extended them in other industries to July 1, 1959. Thus, if extension of unemployment benefits for rail employees of over 10 years of service are not also made retroactive, these displaced veteran workers will be discriminated against.

Insofar as retirement benefits are concerned S. 226 has been amended by the Senate Committee to eliminate retroactivity and it is likely that H.R. 1012 also will be conformed to this amendment either on the floor or in conference, so that increased retirement benefits will be paid on a prospective basis only.

Second, Mr. Loomis charges that under H.R. 1012, and I quote him:

> Women could receive maternity benefits at fantastic rates of as much as $51 per week, if unemployed or sick—and sick benefits even while in jail for their misconduct.

This statement, to my mind, is so misleading and distorted that it casts doubt on all of the other of Mr. Loomis' arguments. Actually, H.R. 1012 proposed absolutely no changes whatever in the qualification or duration of maternity benefits which have been in effect under this law for 13 years.

This argument was advanced by the railroads in opposition to the maternity provisions even prior to their enactment 13 years ago, and they are still arguing what theoretically could happen. We have, however, now had over a decade of experience under this law. This practical test shows that the maternity provision in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act has worked extremely well in meeting a valid social need.

The railroads have been unable in all this time to produce any evidence that the theoretical abuses Mr. Loomis cites have occurred except rarely, and then certainly not to any extent that would warrant taking this protection away from women railroad workers.

As his third and fourth objections, Mr. Loomis complains that persons who are discharged for cause or who voluntarily quit or refuse railroad jobs can immediately draw unemployment insurance benefits.

Concerning the first of these, his letter does not disclose that the present provision for payment of unemployment insurance benefits to persons discharged for cause are there as the result of a joint recommendation from railroad management and labor.

The fact is that the original act as passed in 1938 provided a disqualification for discharge for causes related to the employee's work, similar to the one which now would be imposed by H.R. 5610. When study showed that it was impractical to administer this provision, which cuts across the procedures set up by the Railway Labor Act for handling grievances, this disqualification was removed in 1939, on the joint recommendation, I repeat, of the Railroad Retirement Board, the railway labor organizations, and railroad management. After 20 years of experience under the present law, H.R. 5610 would put this disqualification back in much more drastic form.

Although Mr. Loomis' letter repeats what the railroads constantly point out, that theoretically a person discharged from work could get sick benefits while in jail, throughout all the years of testimony on this legislation, no one has produced a single instance of anyone drawing railroad unemployment benefits while in jail.

The other provision to which Mr. Loomis objects, the present disqualification for 30 days for voluntarily quitting a job or refusing to accept suitable work, has been in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act since its inception. Moreover, it is substantially comparable to the disqualification in most State unemployment insurance laws. H.R. 5610 would impose a much more stringent disqualification that would, for all practical purposes, permanently disqualify such employees for any benefits. To adopt this provision would further discriminate against railroad workers unfairly and in their hour of greatest need for these protections.

As a fifth objection, Mr. Loomis says that unless H.R. 1012 is amended as proposed by H.R. 5610—

> Persons who have not been in railroad work for as long as 2 years could collect sickness benefits from the railroad fund.

Note that word "could" again. This, again, is the railroads' familiar theoretical argument of alleged abuses that possibly could arise under the present act. But the need for this amendment is not borne out by 13 years of experience while the present law has been in effect.

Furthermore, to correct this nonexistent abuse, H.R. 5610 proposes to take away from all employees protection which they have had for 13 years. Under H.R. 5610 a furloughed employee of the railroads, who must be constantly available for recall at any time upon only a moment's notice in order to protect his seniority, but who works at a temporary job in another industry for 90 days and then becomes sick, would be cut off from any benefits for unemployment due to sickness. Such a provision, with its patent injustice, could only encourage employees not to take temporary work in other industries and would be a backward step.

Finally, Mr. Loomis lists the objection that under H.R. 1012 as originally introduced, a retroactive tax would have to be collected, whereas such retroactivity on taxes is eliminated by H.R. 5610. In his letter Mr. Loomis makes much of the unjustifiable effective dates proposed in H.R. 1012. I note that roughly one-quarter of his letter is devoted to this matter. Of course, this is entirely a misleading argument, because the effective date on tax increases is not a major issue here. The Senate committee has amended S. 226 to make all tax increases become effective in the future. Moreover, we may assume that H.R. 1012 would have been conformed in this regard by a majority of the House committee had it been reported out instead of H.R. 5610. Certainly, if this had been the only change made, it would have been accepted by all supporters of H.R. 1012.

In summary, the railroads have shown no valid justification for the new restrictions which H.R. 5610 would impose.

So we have an attempt to correct theoretical abuses in this second bill; we are not arguing about the increase of benefits here, but we are arguing about whether we should change longstanding conditions of employment on the basis of theoretical entirely unproved abuses. In my opinion we should adopt the substitute bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding this time to me and I want to say that I am in support of the Staggers substitute which will shortly be offered. The amendments which he will also offer as a part of that substitute will bring the two bills closer together.

The reason I am speaking today in the well of the House, and I speak very seldom on legislation, is because the central railroad yards in Los Angeles happen to be in my district. I have many thousands of railroad employees in my district. A number of them have written me letters and they have all been in favor of H.R. 1012. None have supported H.R. 5610.

I have studied to find out the difference between these two bills. I have studied each of them carefully and it seems to me H.R. 1012 retains many of the proven features which are in existing law, while H.R. 5610, the committee bill, takes out some of those proven benefits, fringe benefits which have been considered by the employees to be part of their compensation. In several instances H.R. 5610 cuts down the fringe benefits. That is very important to people who plan their life career on contractual benefits.

We are talking about two things, as I see it, the unemployment fund and retirement benefits. We want to keep in mind the fact that the retirement benefits comes from a fund which is mutually contributed to by the employer and employee. On the other hand, the compensation for unemployment and sickness benefits comes from a separate fund to which only the employer contributes. This is not a factor of benevolence on the part of the employer. That is mandatory under congressional legislation.

And let us keep in mind that the amount that goes into that fund is a part of the basic cost of the operation of the railroad. It is deductible for tax purposes. It is also part of the basic expenses upon which the rate structure is founded. So it is not an action of benevolence on the part of the railroad. It is part of the law, it is part of the rate structure itself.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman has touched on what I think is a very interesting point and I would like to make this observation. The fact of the matter is whatever the railroads contribute has to be made up by any rates that the railroads charge. The gentleman said that, if I understood him correctly. Now, who pays those rates?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. The public.

Mr. HALLECK. The shippers using the railroads, the farmers and others and the cost of shipping is determined by those rates. I do not care whether it is contributed by the employee or employer, ultimately it comes out of the pockets of the people who use the railroads.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. That is true.

Mr. HALLECK. That is where the benevolence is.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. We have no quarrel on that point. The gentleman realizes what I have said is a fact. It is a part of the rate structure and the rates are based upon the cost of operation which includes this fund.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLIFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. An interesting point about that, though, is that when the contributions on the part of the companies into the fund were going down the rates to the public were going up.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Yes. For the approximately 10 years from 1947 to 1956 the percent of contribution to this fund was lowered by act of Congress, undoubtedly with the agreement of both employer and employee. The railroads were given that reduction privilege but it was not reflected in reduced rates. The rates of the railroads have continually gone up.

I supported, as many Members of the House did, some legislation last year which provided some $600 million of aid to the railroads. Are we going to take it out of the hides of the employees in order to make up the benefits that we extended to the railroads last year?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, we have no additional requests for time and yield the chairman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand that that then concludes debate on your side?

Mr. YOUNGER. Yes. We have no other speakers on this side.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I am about to make as well as those I made earlier this afternoon, and I also ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Chairman, I find a number of things to approve in the committee bill, H.R. 5610, but I hope that we can substitute H.R. 1012. There are provisions for increasing railroad retirement benefits, its necessary adjustment of the tax rates, and the increase in the daily rate of unemployment benefits in H.R. 5610. These things are largely the same as in the original bill introduced by many of us at the beginning of the session.

Where H.R. 5610 goes astray, in my views, is in cutting back on certain existing unemployment and sickness benefits—and, most especially, in dropping the proposal for regular extended unemployment benefits for the many senior employees now laid off by the railroads.

That is why I urge a vote for the substitute motion. Like the original bill that went into the committee, the substitute motion would provide a 13 or 26 week extension of unemployment benefits for these unemployed long-service railroaders.

Mr. Chairman, let us not forget that this is above all a human problem. There can hardly be a Member of this House who does not know at least a few of the railroaders who work in his district. We know the railroaders are good people. They are respected and responsible people. Many are highly skilled men. They have devoted years to acquiring their skills—as locomotive engineer, conductor, brakeman, station agent, telegrapher, signalman, and a score of other occupations.

But many of these skills are not easily transferable to other occupations. And that is part of the tragedy now facing many thousands of veteran railroaders.

For a number of years the railroads have been reducing their forces. In the past 2 years alone, they have let out over 170,000 men. This has particularly hurt our railroad workers in West Virginia. Partly this was due to the general recession. And H.R. 5610 wisely—though tardily—provides temporary emergency benefits to meet that immediate recession crisis.

But, Mr. Chairman, the railroad workers' crisis antedates the recession. It will continue long after the recession is over. We see that when we note how railroad traffic has picked up strongly in recent months, but railroad employment has risen hardly at all.

This continuing crisis can be summed up in one word: automation; or more broadly, technological progress. The Department of Labor announced the other day that productivity per manhour on the railroads rose by 55 percent between 1947 and 1958. Few other major industries can boast of more.

This record of increased efficiency on the railroads is a proud one. It is good for the railroads. It is good for the country. But what does it mean for the railroaders themselves? In all too many cases it has meant economic tragedy.

Most other industries over the years have found expanding markets. By that means, they have kept their labor force employed over the long run despite the rising productivity. But not so in the coal industry or on the railroads. Their markets, the demand for their service, has lagged behind the rest of the economy. So the railroad employees' increased productivity has meant more layoffs for themselves.

Year after year the railroad layoffs have grown, mounting higher and higher up the seniority rosters. Now we find thousands upon thousands of these highly trained railroaders, men with 10, 15, 20 years of service, discharged from their work and with no hope of regaining it.

Mr. Chairman, the substitute motion, unlike the committee bill, makes some small effort to help these long-service furloughed employees. The help offered is pitifully small, considering what these men have given the railroad industry and considering the readjustments they and their families must now go through. This, surely, is the least we can do for them.

Now, it will be said this is not only a human but also a financial question. And so it is. The few million dollars charged for these extra benefits will be paid by the railroad industry these men have served. Let us look at that aspect a moment.

Last summer, when the committee first reported out a bill like this one, the railroads were hard-pressed financially. The industry certainly let us know about that. And we in Congress acted to help the railroads. But at that same time, this bill as reported out by the committee last summer contained the extended unemployment benefit provision.

Now what do we see? The railroads today are in far better shape. Their operating profits in the last 4 months of 1958 rebounded to a yearly rate of more than a million dollars. So far this year, their profits are if anything still higher.

But what has the committee majority now done to the extended benefits for these hard-hit long service railroaders? It has dropped them. It has dropped them completely.

Last year, when the railroads were pinched, the committee voted for these benefits. This year, when the railroads are flush, the committee drops the benefits.

Mr. Chairman, this does not make sense, either humanly or financially. I urge a vote for the substitute motion, and this means a vote for H.R. 1012—a bill which will do justice to the railroad workers of West Virginia and of America.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that Congress will take some action in the field of railroad retirement and unemployment legislation during this session. I hope very sincerely, however, that the action that is taken will be responsible and fair, and will reflect the careful consideration which our railroad workers deserve.

The bill introduced in the 86th Congress which best reflects this kind of consideration is H.R. 1012, which was introduced in the early days of the session. It is a bill that meets the just needs and demands of our railroad workers, and one which would lead to a well-balanced retirement and unemployment system.

This, to me, is ample reason for favoring passage of H.R. 1012 over H.R. 5610, the bill that has been reported out to us by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, against the objection of a sizable minority of the members.

This reported bill, which does take into account certain basic needs of the railroad workers, fails completely in meeting other needs which are just as essential and just as pressing. If H.R. 5610 were passed, the railroad employee could look forward to having increased retirement benefits in his later years. He could also look forward to having slightly larger benefits when he is unemployed or sick. In these respects, the committee bill does have something to offer him. Unfortunately, this is not the whole picture. The increased unemployment benefits which I have mentioned, for example, can only be drawn for a very brief time. This arrangement may afford some consolation to the person who suffers a very temporary layoff, but it offers little comfort for the longstanding employee who loses his job for a very basic reason, such as technological advancement.

It is this employee, the worker who has devoted 10, 15, or more years of dedicated labor to the railroad industry, who I feel deserves some very special consideration from us. H.R. 5610 does not recognize the problems of the displaced worker. H.R. 1012, however, does have a provision which would help to protect him. The former bill would not grant him one additional day of unemployment benefits, regardless of the fact that long-term unemployment is a recognized problem of the railroad employee, who not only has to face the frighening increases in the cost of living that we all must face, but must also struggle against the insurmountable problem of employment fluctuation which exists in the railroad industry. H.R. 1012, on the other hand, would grant unemployment benefits for an additional 13 weeks for workers with 10 to 15 years of service, and 26 weeks for employees with 15 or more years of service.

There is no question in my own mind that this minimum protection should be given our veteran railroad workers. We owe them this protection, as does the railroad industry, itself. It is only fair that they be compensated in some way for the sacrifices they have made in their years of dedicated effort.

The omission of extended unemployment benefits for employees of long service is, then, a most serious defect of the bill reported to us by the committee. But there are a number of provisions included in the bill which evoke equally indignant criticism. These provisions are unreasonable and inappropriate, and in some cases constitute a 20-year setback for the railroad employee.

I refer especiallly to the elimination of benefits for persons who voluntarily quit their jobs or fail to accept suitable work, or who are discharged for misconduct related to their work. The supporters of these provisions have found it all too easy to give them a kind of righteous aspect, without really pointing out the grave injustice they may mean for many, many persons. It is clear to me that under H.R. 5610, which requires that an employee earn at least 20 days' compensation in the railroad industry before again becoming eligible for benefits, many workers could be permanently disqualified for benefits through no fault whatsoever of their own.

There are also a number of provisions relating to sickness benefits which are equally objectionable. Under the reported bill the number of compensable days of sickness would be reduced and restricted. The establishment of an arbitrary time limitation on the compensability of days of sickness is another serious injustice in the bill, as is the elimination of maternity benefits and the establishment of several irrelevant and unfair disqualifications for sickness benefits.

I think we might all agree with the great words of Voltaire, who said: "Labor is often the father of pleasure." But whatever the inherent value of work, and regardless of the spiritual satisfaction which it gives us, I believe we must recognize that honest toil deserves its own compensation. I fear that the railroad worker would not be justly compensated, nor his rights sufficiently recognized, if this Congress passes the bill given us by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I urge, therefore, prompt and wholehearted support of H.R. 1012.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, I join in support of enactment of the substitute proposal because, after careful consideration of its provisions and those provided in H.R. 5610, I honestly believe it more nearly answers the needs of railroad workers. This is not to imply that there are not similarities in the two approaches, but there are important points of differences.

However, I do not rise to direct my remarks to a comparison of the two proposals, because this is being ably handled by my colleagues who have been associated with the work of the committee.

My purpose in rising is to urge that in the discussion of the specific matter before this body, certain misrepresentations should not be allowed to detract our attention from the issue before us; that is, should or should not benefits to railroad workers be improved? I believe if the discussion is channeled in this direction, and all the facts pertaining thereto are laid on the table, that this body will support improvement which present economic conditions warrant.

It would be unfortunate to entrap our consideration of this legislation before us by some of the extraneous propaganda that has been circulated by those opposed to any improvement in the retirement and unemployment and sickness benefits for employees of the railroad industry.

One would indeed be naive to think it merely coincidence or happenstance that the industry's "featherbedding" charges have been made in recent weeks. Nor should we accept fiction for fact regarding the profits of the railroad industry. By bringing in the claim that its earnings do not warrant increased benefits, I think the spokesmen for the industry will find themselves hoist by their own petard. By stressing this point, they have caused many of us to check into the actual facts, including the salaries and pensions allotted to their top officials.

I shall discuss the profit situation shortly, but at this point I do want to say that, in trying to defeat the legislation we are considering, the railroad industry latched on to the charge of "featherbedding" by railroad workers.

The Lincoln Star, a Nebraska paper, in refusing to accept as gospel the propaganda about alleged "featherbedding," gets to the heart of the matter. The editor points out that the railroad industry has made much of the "mileage" basis of pay under which "operating" employees can earn a so-called "day's pay" for 100 miles of travel. I now quote the editorial reaction to this:

> Mighty unfair, you are likely to surmise. That is the way the railroads would like to make it look.

The editorial goes on to note:

> But they neglect to point out that in the course of a week's work at such short runs, a train crew will be away from their families for up to 100 hours a week. Thus, the employee has not given just 8, 10 or 12 hours a week to the railroads, but 100 hours. He does this because his run ends away from home and he remains at this place until he takes a run back home.

And the editorial concludes:

> In all, the railroads are not presenting the entire picture or a true picture. Until they do this, their motives in this field of labor relations will and should be held suspect.

Now, as for the matter of profits of the railroad industry, I think it should be emphasized that while the industry claims it cannot afford additional benefits for ts workers, management costs per employee have risen. Between 1955 and 1957, 190 new officials—for the industry as a whole—were added, although the number of other employees declined from 1,041,792 to 969,737. During this same period, the total outlay for officials' salaries increased by more than $21 million, reaching the impressive total of over $180.9 million annually. These figures are based on the earnings of the top five officials and others earning over $20,000 a year.

The real burden of the recession has fallen on the workers in the industry. While industry representatives have cited monthly deficits in early 1958, it should be pointed out that in the latter months of that year most of the carriers overcame these deficits and net profits were realized for the entire year. In the final accounting, only 17 railroads failed to earn their fixed and contingent charges for 1958.

The point that should not be overlooked, Mr. Speaker, is that almost all individual railways have shared in the industry-wide comeback since the early months of 1958. Earnings of most carriers are above the last months of 1957 and close to the high of 1956, with some carriers actually surpassing the 1956 level.

Yet, in spite of this pickup, which I certainly do not begrudge, but am pleased to see—we are still faced with heavy layoffs of workers. This makes the need for strengthening the unemployment program for railway workers a most necessary responsibility of this Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not recite the profit figures for the industry because I am aware of the fact that virtually every Member of this body has been furnished, through one source or another, with the statistics. But I shall attach at the end of these remarks the record of one railroad in my part of the country which speaks for itself.

May I conclude by mentioning that a comparative study shows that the railroad industry's allegation that the Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Systems are the most generous in any industry and are the most costly to any industry, does not jell with the facts. Mr. Speaker, I believe the facts in the case are on the side of the employees of the railroad industry and I urge my colleagues to support a realistic and justified approach in this matter.

FACTS AND INCOME OF SOUTHERN PACIFIC TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

The Southern Pacific System had outstanding, as of December 31, 1957, 9,047,122 shares of stock with 71,873 stockholders.

In 1957, the system earned $5.16 per share and paid in dividends $27,141,366.

The company had a 2 for 1 stock split, effective August 8, 1952. The dividends paid per share of stock in 1952 after the split was $1.50; in 1953 and 1954, $3; in 1955, 1956, and 1957 was $3, and $3 in 1958. The price range of the stock in 1957 was a high of $46⅞ to a low of $33.

The system had in 1957 a net income after all charges of $46,645,377.

Though 1958 was a recession year, the Southern Pacific System had a net income of $47,100,000; earned $5.20 per share and paid $3 dividend per share.

The total assets for the system operating in the United States were in 1951, $1,973,682,511 and in 1957, the assets had increased to $2,298,198,134.

The system operated 13,621 miles of track in 1957 and the net income per mile of track was $3,768, as compared to $3,102 in 1958.

The net income record for the system for the years 1949 to 1958, inclusive, is as follows:

Net income

Year:	Million
1949	$30.5
1950	50.8
1951	46.0
1952	61.9
1953	57.9
1954	44.4
1955	51.6
1956	46.5
1957	46.6
1958	47.1

The system earned per share of stock in 1949, $3.61 as compared to $5.20 in 1958.

The net income for the months of January and February 1959, was $7,591,880, as compared to $6,984,233, for the same period in 1958.

Carloadings for 3 months of 1959 are up 10.9 percent over 1958.

In 1957, the system had 645 executives and 53,389 employees; an increase of 32 executives and a decrease of 11,165 employees as compared to 1948.

Income accounts of the Southern Pacific system

Total operating revenue	$663,492,930
Total operating expense	532,130,718
Net railway operating revenue	131,362,212
Federal income tax	5,732,895
Payroll tax	23,148,740
Other railway taxes	25,798,452
Railway operating income	76,682,124
Net equipment and facility rents	22,847,119

Income accounts of the Southern Pacific system—Continued

Net railway operating income	$53,835,005
Other income	22,368,031
Gross income	76,203,036
Miscellaneous rents	76,177
Miscellaneous tax accruals	1,023,348
Miscellaneous charges	3,352,574
Balance for fixed charges	71,750,937
Fixed charges:
Interest on funded and unfunded debt, etc., total fixed charges	25,105,560
Net income	46,645,377

The total operating expense of $663,492,930 includes $37,321,458 depreciation allowance which is charged against operating revenue and is available to company for any purpose.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, in rising to urge passage of the substitute motion on H.R. 5610, I want to stress above all one thing: This substitute is a very moderate measure,

It is moderate in the sense that it gives far less than the railway brotherhoods were asking us for last year. It is moderate in comparison with other measures being requested by organized labor. It is moderate in that the railroad industry can surely afford it. It is moderate in the sense of wise statesmanship, of calming in advance what might develop into a cause of industrial strife.

The substitute measure differs chiefly from H.R. 5610, the committee bill, in two things. First, the committee bill rips out or cuts down various long-established benefits in the railroad unemployment and sickness insurance system. The substitute leaves these benefits unchanged.

Second, the committee bill provides for no regular extended unemployment benefits for long-service railroaders. The substitute does so provide. It would give unemployed railroaders with 10 to 15 years of service an extra 13 weeks of benefits, and those with 15 or more years of service an extra 26 weeks—but only, of course, if they have been unable to find work.

In contrast, the bill urged on us by the railway brotherhoods last year would have provided extended benefits for as long as 4½ years in some cases. Thus the present substitute is far more moderate.

Moreover, can anyone among us dispute the real need for such extended benefits? These veteran railroaders laid off due to the technical progress in their industry surely deserve sympathetic attention and help as they and their families strive to find new and different work.

This provision for extended benefits is moderate also, I say, if you compare it with the standards being asked of us by organized labor in the general Federal-State unemployment insurance setup. There, as Members know, the demand is for uniform Federal standards of 39 weeks of benefits for nearly all of the unemployed.

For the railroad workers, this substitute would not provide anything like that. The great bulk of the unemployed railroaders—those dropped first, the ones with less than 10 years' seniority—would get no regular extended benefits. Only those with 10 to 15 years' seniority would get the regular 39 weeks of unemployment benefits. And only those with 15 years or more of seniority—who tend to be the most desperate cases because of their age, their family responsibilities and their specialized experience—would draw any further benefits beyond that. Thus this substitute measure is tailored to need—and very moderately so.

As for the railroads' ability to pay, I find one thing rather odd. Last summer, when many of the railroads were suffering financially from the recession, the committee reported out this bill with the same extended unemployment benefits now contained in the substitute. Clearly, the committee then felt the railroad indusry could afford to pay.

But what do we see now? In recent months, with the economic recovery, the railroads' operating profits have soared to a rate of more than a billion dollars a year. The profits now are far higher than last summer. And these profits, let me remind you, are being made very largely through the same technical advances that have caused the layoff of so many veteran railroaders. Certainly, out of a billion dollars a year profits, the industry can afford to pay the $25 million or so needed for these extended benefits to their veteran employees.

Let me now turn very briefly to the question of statesmanship. The mark of statesmanship is to look ahead. In the present case, it appears quite clear that if we in this House do nothing about extended unemployment benefits for the railroaders, this issue will inflame labor-management relations in the industry. As we know, the labor contracts on the railroads will be reopened next November 1. I know all of us here hope there will be a peaceful settlement. By our action in this House today, I feel we can in some measure contribute to that.

For all these reasons, I suggest that the course of moderation, of prudence and of justice is to pass the substitute motion.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it was a great disappointment to me when an objection voiced by one Member of this body in the closing hours of the 2d session of the 85th Congress prevented the doing of simple justice to the great army of railroad workers of the United States, those in retirement after long years of service and those still at work.

With many other Members I left the Chamber of the House on the adjournment of the 85th Congress with the firm resolution that come the 86th Congress, and very early in the session, justice and decency would be done these railroad workers.

During recent weeks I have received hundreds of letters on the subject from my constituents, and to each letter I have replied that I regarded it as the decent and the right thing to do when this proposed legislation reached the floor of the House to vote for an amendment substituting H.R. 1012 for H.R. 5610 and then to vote for the bill thus amended.

I am voting for the substitute in the Committee of the Whole. I am certain that the amendment substituting H.R. 1012 will be carried because I think I know the sentiments of the great majority of my colleagues and that it is not in their hearts to turn thumbs down on the men and women who work on our railroads.

Mr. Chairman, this is legislation long overdue. I am certain the Committee will amend the bill as it should be amended and then the House will pass the measure by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman, the needs of the Nation's hardworking and loyal railroad workers have been ignored and shunted off to the side long enough. Today we have the opportunity to make up to them the great disservice done them last year by the failure to enact the type of bill before us today. Failure to increase railroad retirement annuities and extend unemployment benefit payments last year was especially unfair when you take into consideration the fact that social security benefits were increased, regular unemployment compensation benefits extended, and, ironically enough, the railroad industry itself was given substantial assistance under the Transportation Act of 1958.

I recall the many letters, postcards and telegrams I received from laboring railroad men and women in support of legislation to provide assistance for their industry from the Federal Government. They pitched in when they were needed by railroad management and then watched while their own small requests for a better life were ignored and finally defeated. We have a great deal to make up to these people and we can do it today by restoring the original language of H.R. 1012 as a substitute for H.R. 5610.

The argument has been made, and I am sure will be heard again, that the differences between the two bills are slight. The first two sections of the bill are, for the most part, identical, it is true. They both increase annuity benefits by 10 percent. They both increase the wage base to $400 per month. They both increase the tax rate to finance the system. However, H.R. 1012 makes these increases retroactive back to January 1, 1959. H.R. 5610 contains no such retroactive feature. Actually, Mr. Chairman, I believe these benefit increases should be made retroactive back to the day this House failed to pass a similar bill last year because of the objection of one Member of this large body. Because of a parliamentary maneuver thousands of people were denied increased annuity benefits and extended unemployment benefits which were so badly needed during the winter recession of 1958. Why should they be penalized as they are under H.R. 5610? Three months of additional benefits is not a small thing to many people. By adopting the provisions of H.R. 1012 as a substitute for H.R. 5610 we would assure that the railroad worker would not bear the full brunt of our failure to enact this type of legislation last year.

The main differences between H.R. 5610 and H.R. 1012 occur in section 3, dealing with the unemployment and sickness insurance programs. The provisions of H.R. 5610 are totally inadequate and callously disregard the needs of the railroad worker. The more liberal provisions of H.R. 1012, on the other hand, represent a realistic attempt to help and improve the lot of the railroad worker. The extension of temporary unemployment benefits of 13 additional weeks to all employees, as provided in H.R. 5610, is totally inadequate. It ignores the problems of automation and the older employees. I agree wholeheartedly with the minority report on H.R. 5610 which states that the provisions of H.R. 1012 with regard to extended periods of unemployment insurance protection "represent the very minimum of extended benefit protection that is required." And this is especially true of the veteran employee with many years of service who suddenly finds, as pointed out in the minority report, that his particular skills are no longer needed or needed only in greatly reduced numbers. The Congress faced the fact that peculiar problems of the railroad industry justify Federal assistance that is not made available to many other industry groups. We must also face the fact that railroad employees, too, have peculiar problems requiring specific treatment by law. H.R. 1012 meets this need by providing a temporary extension of benefits of 13 additional weeks to employees with less than 10 years of service, a permanent extension of 13 weeks to employees with 10 to 15 years of service, and a permanent extension of 26 weeks to employees with 15 or more years of service. This difference between the two bills is another reason why H.R. 1012 should be enacted rather than H.R. 5610.

There are other differences also, Mr. Chairman. The elimination of maternity benefits under H.R. 5610, the reduction in the number of compensable days of unemployment due to sickness and other backward-moving, untimely changes in the Railroad Retirement System which are not contained in H.R. 1012. These differences are substantial. They cannot be passed off as mere minor differences. To adopt H.R. 5610 would be unconscionable. I urge the House instead to substitute in its stead the provisions of H.R. 1012.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Chairman, I am the sponsor of H.R. 4935, a measure identical to H.R. 1012. It was the original bill before the committee, calling for improved railroad retirement benefits. It is my earnest hope that the Congress will accept this legislation as a substitute for the subsequent committee bill now pending before us. It seems to me that H.R. 1012 and the similar measures introduced by myself and other Members of the Congress will give much-needed protection to the railroad workers of the Nation.

Last year, we moved to give substantial benefits to the railroad industry as a whole. We failed in our efforts to pass needed improvements in the railroad retirement program. I hope that we will delay no longer the passage of this legislation, which is designed to bring a greater measure of security to the working men and women and their families in our railroad industry.

Because of its more realistic and more helpful range of benefits to the men and women of railway labor, I urge the passage of H.R. 1012, the substitute measure now being offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS].

I am pleased to learn that the other body has acted favorably on similar legislation.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I join with those of my colleagues who are today waging this militant effort to substitute H.R. 1012 for the bill affecting the Railroad Retirement Act recommended by the commitee to this Congress.

I have studied the committee's bill, H.R. 5610, and find that it will not bring the desperately needed help which this Nation's thousands upon thousands of railroad workers so urgently need if they are to survive in this great wave of inflation.

I am certain that enactment by this House of H.R. 1012 will go a long way in helping not only the retired railroad worker, but also the thousands of railroad employees whose jobs are being cut out from under them through ever-increasing automation of the railroads.

The arguments of those who oppose H.R. 1012 are most unconvincing when you consider the great misery which is being suffered, particularly by those Americans who are being eliminated from their work by the railroad industry. Opponents of this measure claim that it will bring undue financial hardships on the Nation's railroads, but this claim is not consistent with the profit reports of the Nation's railroads.

I think that we must all face up to the bitter truth that when a railroad employee is severed from his job because of automation, his chances of obtaining employment in other industries is virtually nonexistent. The railroad worker is trained for a specific job in the railroad industry and his chances to find similar employment in other industries are practically nil, particularly since most of those being eliminated from their jobs are older people.

It is for this reason that I strongly urge upon this Congress the extension of unemployment compensation payments provided in H.R. 1012.

Unless we help the retired railroad worker as well as those faced with elimination of their present jobs because of automation, we will be placing a large number of our American citizens into the untenable position of not being able to survive. It is for this reason that I join in supporting the substitution for the committee's recommendation, and urge adoption of H.R. 1012.

Mr. KASEM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to H.R. 5610 offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS]. I would like to urge all of my colleagues to heed the extremely discerning remarks of my colleague and good friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD] and adopt them as my own.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, first I want to commend the gentleman from Arkansas for his leadership as Chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, which considered this legislation. As a member of that Committee I have always found the gentleman to be fair, considerate and cooperative.

He introduced the original bill on this legislation, H.R. 1012, and I intend to vote for that bill as a substitute for H.R. 5610, which seriously weakened his original proposal.

Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House, I believe, feels that improvements in the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act are long overdue. Our Committee has held extensive hearings on this problem in recent years.

Evidence presented in the last three Congresses clearly shows that retirement benefits have lagged behind the cost of living, forcing many thousands of retired railroad workers, their spouses, and dependents to reduce their standard of living.

Unemployment in the rail industry has likewise imposed severe economic hardships on railroad employees, many of whom have been unable to obtain even part-time work because of overall unemployment and job discrimination based on age.

Two years ago our committee considered legislation—H.R. 4353—to improve this situation. Spokesmen for the railroad industry opposed enactment of bills to liberalize the present Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts on the grounds that it would be too costly in view of their weak economic position. Action on H.R. 4353 was delayed by our committee because of certain amendments it would make in the Railroad Retirement Tax Act. These sections were subsequently considered separately by another committee having primary jurisdiction.

Meanwhile, Congress took up the bill to provide Government-guaranteed loans to the railroad industry for capital expenditures and maintenance operations. Amendments to the Interstate Commerce Act were also proposed to help the railroads achieve a better competitive position with other forms of transportation. With the help of railway labor, this measure was enacted as the Transportation Act of 1958. The 3 percent Federal excise tax on freight was also repealed by the 85th Congress to bring direct assistance to the rail industry.

The industry opposed the retirement bill when it was subsequently reconsidered, despite the assistance they received from railroad employee unions and retired railworkers in helping to pass the Transportation Act. The retirement and unemployment insurance bill was killed in the final hours of the last Congress after a series of complex parliamentary moves failed to bring the measure before the House for action.

Early this session new bills were introduced to provide these long needed improvements in the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts. Identical bills, H.R. 1012 and S. 226 were introduced and brought to early hearings in both our committee and the Senate committee.

This bill did not cover new ground, nor did they contain provisions beyond the scope of what previous hearings showed was necessary and equitable. It would increase all monthly retirement benefits by 10 percent, retroactive to January 1, 1959. This was the date on which the bill in the last Congress would have become effective. Women employees and the wives of retired railroaders would have the privilege of electing to receive an annuity on a reduced basis at age 62, a provision already in the social security law. Two one-half percent increases in the tax rate on both employers and employees—on January 1, 1959, and January 1, 1962—would assure that the retirement system was continued on a sound actuarial basis.

It would also bring unemployment compensation provisions up to a realistic level by extending duration and benefit rates, while adjusting the tax rate to balance the railroad unemployment insurance account.

Despite their vastly improved economic position, the railroads continue to oppose this legislation. During committee consideration of H.R. 1012 certain amendments were adopted which I feel do grave damage to the present unemployment insurance system. The bill before us today, H.R. 5610, contains these drastic backward steps which eliminate many benefits in effect for many years. It also eliminates the retroactive payment of the increased retirement benefits.

Mr. Chairman, I opposed these weakening amendments in committee and when they prevailed, joined in signing the minority report. H.R. 5610 is not an adequate approach to the needs of retired railroad workers, their families, and survivors. Nor does it treat fairly the unemployed rail workers, who are bearing the brunt of employment cutbacks in the industry. Total employment on class I railroads has dropped from 1,043,477 in 1956 to less than 840,000 today—a decline of some 200,000 workers in little more than 3 years.

Much of the argument against the original bill—H.R. 1012—is based on the alleged "poverty" of rail carriers in this country. But a look at their financial structure in reports to their stockholders shows a much different picture.

An Associated Press story on April 10, 1959, quoted the Association of American Railroads estimate that net income of class I rail carriers for January and February 1959 was $40 million. The AAR said that in these first 2 months of the year, operating revenues rose 4.1 percent, while operating expenses increased only 0.3 percent.

As was pointed out in testimony before the committee, estimated net income for class I railroads for 1958 was almost $600 million, despite the lingering effects of the business recession. This is more than their income in 21 of the 38 years since 1920, which, of course, includes the World War II years.

Moreover, the "poverty" plea is more than somewhat dimmed by an analysis of the pyramiding payroll of railroad executives during the 1955–57 period. While the total railroad employment was declining by 72,000 during this period, railroads were adding more than 200 executives and total management pay increased by almost $22 million.

The president of one railroad will receive more than $63,000 a year in pension when he retires. Retired presidents of three other railroads now receive pensions of $36,851, $25,000, and $28,813. All are paid by the carriers. These carriers oppose improvements in the railroad retirement system, although they meet only half the cost of the average yearly benefit of $1,440 now being paid their employees.

We hear much these days from industry sources to the effect that higher wages or fringe benefits for workers should be accompanied by increased productivity.

Only last week the U.S. Department of Labor released its official findings concerning productivity gains in various industries which show that railroad labor's output has increased faster in recent years than that of workers in any other industry. If increased productivity were the only basis on which improved retirement benefits and unemployment insurance benefits were to be based, the Labor Department report alone is justification for enactment of the original provisions of H.R. 1012.

Mr. Chairman, only by voting to substitute the original language of H.R. 1012 for the bill as reported by our Committee can we keep faith with the retired and unemployed railroad workers of this Nation. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support efforts that will be made to substitute H.R. 1012 for the committee bill.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposed railroad unemployment insurance program as proposed in H.R. 5610. At this time of heavy unemployment a majority of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has seen fit to vote a number of crippling amendments to the Harris-Bennett bill which was introduced at the beginning of the session for the purpose of providing long overdue relief to unemployed and retired railroad workers and their families. Amendments made by the committee have been declared entirely unacceptable by 23 standard railway labor organizations.

I further state that the amendments made by the committee are a radical assault upon basic principles of social insurance which, in some cases, have been accepted as national policy since the enactment of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Principles which have prevailed for as long as 20 years clearly should not be wiped out without cause and no adequate reason for this action has been advanced.

The need today, when so many railroad workers are unemployed, is for legislation which will improve not decrease aid to the unemployed and ill among railroad employees. Instead the committee proposes to take away from these unfortunate many of the social insurance provision they now have.

The committee bill, I say, will eliminate entirely provisions in H.R. 1012 for extended unemployment insurance benefits for veteran railroad workers who are being displaced permanently through technological changes and changes in operating methods.

These workers, including many with 10, 20, and even 30 years of service, cannot readily get other employment. The modest proposals made in the Harris-Bennett bill to extend the time they are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits already represents a great compromise on the part of the railway labor organizations which agreed to accept them in the hope of expediting action to relieve the growing distress of railroad workers and their families at this time when record unemployment has hit the industry.

Other provisions of H.R. 5610 would eliminate or drastically restrict existing benefits both with respect to ordinary unemployment and unemployment due to sickness that have been available under existing law for from 13 to 20 years. These retrogressive steps must be prevented so that needy railroad workers will get additional not less help at this time of higher living costs.

H.R. 1012 is the identical bill which passed the Senate last year. It must be remembered that in failing to complete action on this legislation last year, Congress has already unfairly discriminated against the needy of the railroad industry, since it did not neglect to pass special legislation to aid unemployed and retired workers in other industries while voting no aid to railroad workers facing unemployment at one of the highest levels in the history of the industry. This is all the more unjust to these workers because Congress last year did find time to enact legislation giving considerable financial and other aid to the railroads which employ them. We must not forget that people should come first.

The disqualification provision and other changes which the committee wrote into the legislation this year would cost the railroad workers an estimated 30 million annually in benefits provided in H.R. 1012.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Chairman, there are several sections in the bill before us, H.R. 5610, which I heartily endorse. But there are other sections in this measure which seem to me nothing more than a slap in the face to a group of highly worthy people. I refer to the railroad workers of America.

Turning to the railroad retirement sections of this bill, I think most of us in this Chamber would support them. The increase in benefits are urgently needed by these good folks. The tax aspects will provide the required financing both for the present increase and for an increase voted 3 years ago. These parts of H.R. 5610 are both socially desirable and financially sound.

So too, I believe, are the provisions for raising the ceiling in the daily rate of unemployment benefits for our railroad men and women. With the general rise in prices and wages in recent years, the existing ceilings have fallen far behind the times.

So much for the good sides of this bill. But what else do we find in it? We find some most extraordinary provisions which would deprive various sick and unemployed railroad men and women of certain benefits they have long enjoyed.

Gentlemen, these benefits have been written into the law in some cases since 1946, in some cases since 1938. Yet the measure here before us would cast them out.

When we look over the length and breadth of our land, when we think each one of us of the fine railroaders we personally know, when we consider that fully 170,000 of these good people have been thrust into unemployment in the past 2 years alone—then can we here truly intend to cut back, to curtail, to abolish certain of their long-held benefits.

Now, it is said abuses are possible under some of these established benefits. Railroad lawyers before the committee presented lots of technical arguments. And who could deny that a few small cases of abuse are possible under any legislation that we here in Congress have passed?

That is not the crucial question here. The crucial question is, Shall we tell railroaders now walking the streets unemployed, "You counted on these benefits. They have been in the law for years. But now you shall not have them"?

No; I urge you, gentlemen, let us not do that. And further, let us do at least something positive for the tens of thousands of long-service railroaders now thrown on the technological scrap heap due to their own industry's progress.

Let us say to the railroad industry: "We salute your technical progress. It is a fine thing. But you should also meet at least a small part of the human cost of this progress by paying reasonable unemployment benefits to your laid-off, long-service employees for a short additional period."

This is a moral charge on the profits of the railroad industry, gentlemen. Should it not be, in some slight degree, a financial charge as well?

It will be said that my friends and I are arguing against these parts of the committee bill. So we are, against this year's committee majority bill. But last year, gentlemen, the committee reported out a bill that did just what we are now urging. Last year's committee bill did not cut back existing benefits. Last year's committee bill did provide for modest extended unemployment benefits, as we now ask.

Yet last year, when that committee bill came out, the railroads were showing sharply lower profits. Recently, in contrast, their operating profits have been running at many more thousands of dollars a year.

I urge upon you that the need is great. Let us here modify H.R. 5610, as I have suggested. Let us help bring joy, not sorrow, to the railroad homes of America.

Mr. KARTH. Mr. Chairman, there can hardly be a Member of this House who does not have at least several hundred railroad workers and railroad families living in his district. Most of us, I think, know personally at least some of those railroad folks back home. They are by and large fine people. They are pillars of their communities. And judging by my mail and that of other Members, I can well believe that 99 percent of these good folk are intensely interested in the legislation before us today.

Why is that? Basically, it is because the railroaders for several years have been undergoing very tough times. Several hundred thousand retired railmen and their wives find themselves ground between their modest retirement annuities and the rising cost of living.

Over the past 2 years more than 170,000 railroaders have been laid off from their jobs—and virtually none have been rehired. Meanwhile, the 860,000 railroaders still at work ask themselves, Will I be next to go? Because the crisis in railroad employment, gentlemen, is not a matter of the recession alone. It is a matter of long-term technological trends. In a word, of automation.

As for the railroad companies, a year ago the profits of many of them were down sharply. They appealed to Congress for help. Congress gave them help. By the end of 1958, however, with rising traffic, the railroads' earnings had rebounded so sharply that their operating profits were running at over a billion dollars a year.

Last year Congress gave help to the railroads. Now finally, with H.R. 5610, we turn to the question of help for the human side of the industry. And how well does H.R. 5610 provide that?

In providing for increased retirement benefits, I think most members will agree that H.R. 5610 does what it should. It also provides the needed retirement financing. Another good aspect, is the long-overdue rise in the daily benefit ceiling for railroad unemployment benefits.

But what about the other things in H.R. 5610? First, we find that it would cut back, curtail, and even abolish certain types of unemployment and sick benefits long written into the law. For example, it would abolish completely the 13-year-old system of maternity benefits for women railroad employees.

Now is that not an astonishing thing? We set out to help the human side of the railroad industry—and believe me, gentlemen, hundreds of thousands of them desperately need our help. But instead this bill proposes to hurt, not help, many of them.

The second astonishing thing I find is something left out of this bill. It was not left out of the bill reported by the committee last year. It was not left out of the bill passed by the other body last year. It is not left out of the bill now being debated, I understand, in the Senate chamber. It is left out of the measure here before us today.

I refer to the provision for a regular extension of unemployment benefits for long-service laid off railroaders, for maximum periods of 13 or 26 weeks. That provision is no longer in the bill. And it should be. It most certainly should be.

We now have tens of thousands of these veteran railroaders thrown out on the sidewalks. They have no hope of getting back in their industry. They are skilled men, but their skills are railroad skills. These are not the young footloose fellows we are proposing to help. These are not the fellows who may enjoy being jobless a while. These are veterans workers, fathers of families, men with 10, 15, 20 years seniority, trained in the railroad industry. Now they are thrown aside, due to the rising productivity of their own industry. I agree every American is not entitled to inherent economic security, but he is entitled to a job to provide his own economic security.

Do the railroads have no responsibility to help these men in their readjustment? Must the full cost of technical progress be borne solely by the employees?

The railroads do have a responsibility. And they can well afford the slight extra cost of the modest extension of benefits proposed for these discarded veteran railroaders. Only a tiny portion—perhaps $25 million a year—is involved in this proposal, out of the railroads' billion dollar a year profits.

Let us restore these parts of the bill to the way the committee reported them last year. Even then, the measure would be modest enough. But it would then be a real help, not a disappointment, to the human side of the railroad industry.

If, however, the railroad industry should need additional help—and I agree this is logical and perhaps necessary—I will be most happy to join hands with those who seek to enact reasonable legislation designed to accomplish this end, if it not be at the expense of the employees.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Chairman, we are called on to choose between the committee majority's bill, H.R. 5610, and the substitute motion offered by my friend, the gentleman from West Virginia. One of the chief differences between the two measures, as others have pointed out, lies in the question of extended unemployment benefits for long-service railroaders.

The committee bill omits such benefits completely. The substitute would provide them, but in sharply reduced fashion from what our friends in the railway brotherhoods were asking for last year. The railroad workers are not getting all they wanted in this substitute. I would like to bring that out.

The original bill the brotherhoods were asking for in 1957 and 1958 provided extended benefits, for long-service unemployed railroaders, of up to 4½ years. The present substitute provides just 13 weeks of extended benefits for jobless railroaders with 10 to 15 years of service, and just 26 weeks for those with 15 or more years of service. That is quite a comedown from 4½ years. This substitute proposal is a very moderate proposition.

Gentlemen, there is no doubt of the need, the crying need for these benefits. You know and I know what type of men these long-service railroaders are. They are not the fly-by-night type of young fellow who flits from one job to another. They are fathers of families, homeowners, the solid foundation of our communities around this Nation.

And now scores of thousands of these long-service railroad workers, through no fault of their own, find themselves thrown out of their long-held jobs and with very little prospect of getting them back. Somehow they must readjust. Somehow they must retrain themselves, find other work. If they can do this within 26 weeks, the present maximum for unemployment benefits—why, fine. They then would draw no more benefits in any case.

But where the new job takes longer to find, then we, by this substitute motion, say to the railroad industry that it should pay extended benefits for a short additional period to these jobless men who have served the railroads so long.

Now, there is talk that these extended benefits are nothing more than a disguised form of severance pay. Why do not the railway brotherhoods go to the railroads and bargain for severance pay, as happens in other industries, it is asked.

Let me assure you, these extended benefits are no severance pay. And here are some of the differences: Severance pay is a matter of right, on leaving a job. The worker gets it no matter what he does afterward. It does not depend on his finding or not finding another job. But these unemployment benefits cease the moment the recipient finds new work.

Second, severance pay is usually paid out in a lump sum. Unemployment benefits are paid from week to week. Third, severance pay is tied to service with one company and is paid directly by that company. Unemployment benefits are not. There are other differences, too. But these major distinctions make it plain that the extended unemployment benefits in this motion have nothing to do with severance pay.

Now, what about this advice that the railroads apply directly to their own industry for these extended benefits? Superficially, this is a plausible idea. Unions in the auto industry, the steel industry, and others have won supplemental unemployment benefits by doing that very thing. But how did those unions win their benefits? By a strike, or the threat of a strike.

In the railroad industry, on the contrary, it has been the policy of Congress to put special blocks in the way of railroad strikes ever since we passed the Railway Labor Act back in 1926. We have imposed on the railway brotherhoods a whole series of special delays, meditations, emergency factfinding boards and so on, to avoid railroad strikes. We have imposed these restrictions on economic conflict in the railroad industry for a good reason. We know a nationwide railroad strike would soon slow our economy to a standstill.

What would it mean, then, if we now say to the railroad workers: Do not look to Congress to give you any extended unemployment benefits. Imitate your brothers in autos, in steel. Go after these benefits directly from your industry.

Gentlemen, that would be nothing less than an invitation to a railroad strike. It would be a reversal of our whole national policy for 33 years. Because it is most abundantly clear that the railroad industry would resist such a demand. They are resisting it here in this House. They would resist it over the bargaining table.

This substitute motion, I repeat, is a very modest measure. It gives no more than simple justice. Indeed, it gives less. It is a measure of the wisest policy. I urge its adoption.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, to some few in America inflation is still a meaningless thing talked about by economists and politicians. By some, inflation is used for personal or partisan advantage as a political football. To a great many thinking Americans, inflation presents a potential danger to their Nation's future. But, Mr. Speaker, to a small group, those who must live on a fixed income, inflation is a terrible burden which accompanies them to bed at night and causes a restless sleep, which awaits them upon awakening and which sits beside them throughout the dreary days. To these, inflation is a nightmarish reality, and one which presses them close to the point of desperation.

It is for these people, or, at least a portion of these people, that we act today. It is for these people who have lived with inflation, or, perhaps I should better say, who have existed with inflation, I plead today.

The men and women who, for most of their useful lives, have worked on our railroads, and who retired some years ago to enjoy their declining years, need our help. The money which has so long been set aside under the Railroad Retirement Act is no longer adequate to care for their needs.

These people have come to us to ask our help. The railroads which employed them have agreed unanimously that their need is desperate and should be considered. I have not heard one man, either working on the side of management or on the side of the railroad workers, say that there is no need for a pension increase. Only the vehicle by which it was to be provided has come under question. Those questions, for better or worse, are now resolved. The only question remaining before us is whether or not to provide the 10 percent increase in pensions these men and women need and so fully deserve.

I ask all Members of this House to support this legislation. I most strongly urge its passage.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think we have had a very hearty and helpful discussion on this subject. As I tried to point out earlier, it is a highly complicated problem to understand. I appreciate the way that this debate has been carried on. Only in one or two instances has there been just barely a small flareup. It has been a very healthy debate on the subject.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that we could say that any Member of this Congress wants to take anything away from anybody. I think the effort has been made by most everybody to try to work out something that will give benefits to those railroad workers who are entitled to them. I point out again that there is no controversy over the retirement provisions. Everyone is agreed on those. I do not know just what the substitute is going to include. I did not seem to get much out of the debate thus far, but the best information I have is that the retirement benefits and the increase in the amounts to be paid by employer and employee into the retirement fund are generally in accord. So, that leaves only in controversy the unemployment features of the bill. Now, I tried to point out to you earlier the five principal differences between what the original bill, H.R. 1012, included and what this bill, H.R. 5610, includes. The committee turned down, I suppose, some 12 or 15 rather important and major amendments that were proposed at that time. So, I think it is a very healthy thing that we have this matter narrowed down to this point. Each one of us has to decide in our own mind what we think is right. It is your own conscience and mine as to what we decide on this particular problem. We have to decide whether or not we are going to increase, again, the unemployment taxes to be paid by the railroad industry and thus, ultimately, by the people of the country. To me there is a limit. If you look at the experience of the unemployment insurance fund in the last few years you will, as I, have a very uneasy feeling that something is about to happen.

As I tried to point out this morning there is less than $50 million in the fund now and I understand the fund will have between $30 and $40 million within a very short time at the rate at which it is being depleted.

In the estimates given us it is said that the situation is stabilizing now. I do not know whether that is so or not. The experience is a turnover in employment of 20,000 a month. Just as surely as I am speaking now, we will not have enough money in this unemployment fund to meet the demands on it unless something is done. That is my concern, Mr. Chairman. I do not want it said, when the unemployed find that the money is not there, that, "You were responsible for the fact I could not get my money." That is the issue. We put it up to you today, and it is your decision to make.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, to a country boy from Iowa all this oratory could be a wee mite confusing. It seems to me mighty significant if we check the record to see who the friends of H.R. 5610 and H.R. 1012 really are. It is easily apparent from what has been said here today that the employers, the Republican policy committee, and their agents here are supporting H.R. 5610. A few moments ago, the president of the Republican policy committee admitted that a confidential report had been issued to all the Republican Members subsequent to the meeting in the White House in which the Republican policy committee reports that the administration and the Republican Party are supporting H.R. 5610.

On the other hand, it is clearly apparent that the employees of the railroads, together with their supporters here, are definitely for H.R. 1012.

This might not be so significant if the arguments that they are using were valid. However, through the whole tone of the arguments presented by the opponents to H.R. 1012 this afternoon are the same arguments that were put forth by the railroad employers 13 years ago, when the employees first sought the benefits which H.R. 5610 takes away from them. These arguments are the same kind of arguments that were advanced when the first employees sought a fairer share of the benefits from our economic power in the days of Samuel Gompers. These arguments leave me cold, and I want to announce here and now that I am going to vote for H.R. 1012.

There have been five amendments to H.R. 1012 which make it identical with the bill that has just passed in the Senate and which take all the wind out of the sails of those who are supporting H.R. 5610 and opposing H.R. 1012. The first four amendments to H.R. 1012 as now being submitted are in H.R. 5610. They are:

First. The first amendment provides that the 10-percent increase in the retirement annuity applies only to annuities that accrue after the month of enactment of this act. This is the feature of the original H.R. 1012 which increased the cost to the railroads to $45 million and created the most objectionable feature.

Second. The increases in the retirement tax will not take place until a month after the enactment of this bill.

Third. The increase in the lump-sum payments is made only with regard to deaths occurring after the month of the passage of the bill.

Fourth. The maximum rate of contributions into the fund were increased from 3.50 percent to 3.75 percent.

Fifth. The Retirement Board during this emergency period in which we had so much unemployment is given power to borrow from the retirement fund for unemployment and sickness payments, and it will be repaid to the retirement fund, together with 3 percent interest.

H.R. 1012 with these amendments retains the present benefits that have been granted to the employees and at the same time grants them the increases to which they are entitled.

In comparing the fringe benefits to be received by the 700,000 employees of the railroads of America under this law with the fringe benefits being obtained by the employees in other transportation areas not covered by the law but obtained by contract, we find that the railroad employees still are not receiving as much as they should have. In view of all these considerations, it is easy to see why I am going to support the substitute bill, H.R. 1012, and vote in behalf of the workingmen of this great country. It is between you and your conscience whether you shall support the employers or the workingman, but there isn't any particular point in your claiming that by supporting H.R. 5610 you are supporting the workingman, because that bill takes the benefits away from the working people that they now have.

Mr. MORRIS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I first wish to say that I have a very high regard and sincere respect for the great committee handling this bill, including of course its great chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS], but I believe that the Staggers substitute which in substance is H.R. 1012, is preferable to the committee bill, H.R. 5610, for the reason that although both bills provide for certain benefits for railroad employees and retirees, yet the committee bill would, as I view it, deprive them of certain other benefits that are protected in the Staggers amendment or substitute.

The arguments that have been made that these benefits that are retained for them in the Staggers bill will put too great a burden on the railroads, I believe, is not good reasoning to justify passage of the committee bill in preference to the Staggers bill.

I realize fully that the railroads are essential to the welfare of our Nation, and I certainly am willing and anxious to do every proper and reasonable thing I can as a Member of Congress to help pass legislation that will give the railroads a fair and reasonable opportunity to operate efficiently and enjoy just and fair profits, and I am perfectly willing to help pass further sound and reasonable legislation if necessary toward this end. But I do not believe that the railroads should be helped at the expense and burden of the employees and retirees alone as provided in the committee bill, but that such burden if justified should fall on all the public and not just on this comparatively small group. I therefore will vote for the Staggers amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Railroad Employees Benefits Act of 1959."

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"PART I—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937

"SECTION 1. (a) Section 2(a)3 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended to read as follows:

"'3. Individuals who will have attained the age of sixty and will have completed thirty years of service or, in the case of women, who will have attained the age of sixty-two and will have completed less than thirty years of service, but the annuity of such individual shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that he or she is under age sixty-five when the annuity begins to accrue.'

"(b) Section 2(d) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'If pursuant to the third sentence of this subsection an annuity was not paid to an individual with respect to one or more months in any calendar year, and it is subsequently established that the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year as determined in accordance with that sentence (but exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) did not exceed $1,200, the annuity with respect to such month or months, and any deduction imposed by reason of the failure to report earnings for such month or months under the fifth sentence of this subsection, shall then be payable. If the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year (exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) is in excess of $1,200, the number of months in such year with respect to which an annuity is not payable by reason of such third and fifth sentences shall not exceed one month for each $100 of such excess, treating the last $50 or more of such excess as $100; and if the amount of the annuity has changed during such year, any payments of annuity which become payable solely by reason of the limitation contained in this sentence shall be made first with respect to the month or months for which the annuity is larger.'

"(c) Section 2(e) of such Act is amended by striking out 'than an amount' and inserting in lieu thereof 'than 110 per centum of an amount'.

"(d) Section 2(g) of such Act is amended by inserting after 'wife under age 65' the following: '(other than a wife who is receiving such annuity by reason of an election under subsection (h))'.

"(e) Section 2 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(h) A spouse who would be entitled to an annuity under subsection (e) if she or he had attained the age of 65 may elect upon or after attaining the age of 62 to receive such annuity, but the annuity in any such case shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that the spouse is under age 65 when the annuity begins to accrue'.

"SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(a) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended (1) by striking out '3.04', '2.28', and '1.52' and inserting in lieu thereof '3.35', '2.51', and '1.67', respectively; and (2) by striking out '$200' and inserting in lieu thereof '$250'.

"(b) Section 3(c) of such Act is amended by inserting after 'or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954,' the following: 'and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended,'.

"(c) Section 3(e) of such Act is amended (1) by striking out '$4.55', '$75.90', and 'his monthly compensation' and inserting in lieu thereof '$5.00', '$83.50' and '110 per centum of his monthly compensation', respectively; (2) by striking out 'is less than the amount, or the additional amount' and inserting in lieu thereof 'is less than 110 per centum of the amount, or 110 per centum of the additional amount'; (3) by inserting after 'age sixty-five,' the following: 'women entitled to spouses' annuities pursuant to elections made under subsection (h) of section 2 to be entitled to wife's insurance benefits determined under section 202(q) of the Social Security Act,'; and (4) by striking out 'such amount or such additional amount' and inserting in lieu thereof '110 per centum of such amount or 110 per centum of such additional amount'.

"SEC. 3. (a) Section 5(f)(2) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended by striking out 'and 7 per centum of his or her compensation after December 31, 1946 (exclusive in both cases of compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, and in the latter case in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954),' and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'plus 7 per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1946, and before January 1, 1959, plus 7½ per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1958, and before January 1, 1962, plus 8 per centum of his or her compensation paid after December 31, 1961 (exclusive of compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, and in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954, and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended),'.

"(b) Section 5(h) of such Act is amended by striking out '$33', '$176', and '$15.40' wherever they appear and inserting in lieu thereof '$36.30', '$193.60', and '$16.95', respectively.

"(c) Section 5(i)(1)(ii) of such Act is amended by striking out 'or in which month he engaged on seven or more different calendar days in noncovered remunerative activity outside the United States (as defined in section 203(k) of the Social Security Act)' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'or, having engaged in any activity outside the United States, would be charged under such section 203(e) with any earnings derived from such activity if it had been an activity within the United States'.

"(d) Clause (A)(i) of section 5(l)(9) of such Act is amended by striking out the word 'and' appearing after 'July 1, 1954,' and by inserting after 'June 30, 1954,' the following: 'and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and any excess over $400 for any calendar month after the month in which this Act was so amended,'.

"(e) Clause (A)(ii) of section 5(l)(9) of such Act is amended (1) by inserting 'and before 1959' after '1954' where it first appears; (2) by inserting after '$4,200' where it first appears the following: ', or for any calendar year after 1958 is less than $4,800,'; (3) by striking out '$350' and inserting in lieu thereof '$400'; and (4) by striking out 'and $4,200 for years after 1954, by' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: ', $4,200 for years after 1954 and before 1959, and $4,800 for years after 1958, by'.

"(f) Section 5(l)(10) of such Act is amended by striking out '44', '11', '$350', '$15.40', '$36.66', '$27.50', and '$14.66' wherever they appear and inserting in lieu thereof '49', '12', '$400', '$16.95', '$40.33', '$30.25', and '$16.13', respectively.

"SEC. 4. All pensions under section 6 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, all joint and survivor annuities and survivor annuities deriving from joint and survivor annuities under that Act awarded before the month next following the month of enactment of this Act all widows' and widowers' insurance annuities which began to accrue before the second calendar month next following the month of such enactment, and which, in accordance with the proviso in section 5(a) or section 5(b) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, are payable in the amount of the spouse's annuity to which the widow or widower was entitled, and all annuities under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, are increased by 10 per centum.

"SEC. 5. (a) The amendments made by section 1 (other than subsection (b) thereof), by subsections (a) and (c) of section 2, and by subsection (b) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities (not including annuities to which section 4 applies) accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendment made by subsection (b) of section 1 and by subsection (c) of section 3 shall be effective with respect to annuities accruing during the calendar year 1959 and subsequent calendar years. The amendment made by subsection (a) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(2) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendments made by subsection (f) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act and lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(1) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. Section 4 shall be effective only with respect to pensions due in calendar months after the month next following the month of enactment of this Act and annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act.

"(b) All recertifications required by reason of the amendments made by this part shall be made by the Railroad Retirement Board without application therefor.

"PART II—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

"SEC. 201. (a) Section 3201 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3201. Rate of Tax.

"'In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of every employee a tax equal to—

"'(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"'(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961, as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"(b) Section 3202(a) of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended (1) by striking out 'after December 31, 1954' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'; (2) by striking out '$350' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof '$400'; (3) by striking out 'after 1954' and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'.

"(c) Section 3211 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3211. Rate of Tax.

"'In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of each employee representative a tax equal to—

"'(1) 13½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"'(2) 14½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961,

as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to twice the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"(d) (1) Section 3221 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended by striking out 'In addition to' and all that follows down through '$350' the first time it appears, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'(a) In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on every employer an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ, equal to—

"'(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

"'(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after December 31, 1961, as is, with respect to any employee for any calendar month, not in excess of $400'.

"(2) Such section 3221 is further amended (A) by striking out 'after December 31, 1954' and 'after 1954' wherever they appear in that section and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'; (B) by striking out '$350' wherever else it appears in that section and inserting in lieu thereof '$400'; and (C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(b) The rate of tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3111 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3111 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"SEC. 202. The amendments made by section 201 shall, except as otherwise provided in such amendments, be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid after the month of such enactment, for services rendered after such month of enactment.

"PART III—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

"SEC. 301. (a) Section 1(i) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the proviso in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof ': Provided, however, That in computing the compensation paid to any employee, no part of any month's compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954, and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended, shall be recognized'.

"'(b) The first proviso of section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500".'

"SEC. 302. (a) Section 2(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the language between '(i)' and '(ii)' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'for each day of unemployment in excess of four during any registration period, and'.

"(b) Section 2(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out columns I and II and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Column I Total Compensation	Column II Daily Benefit Rate
$500 to $699.99	$4.50
700 to 999.99	5.00
1,000 to 1,299.99	5.50
1,300 to 1,599.99	6.00
1,600 to 1,899.99	6.50
1,900 to 2,199.99	7.00
2,200 to 2,499.99	7.50
2,500 to 2,799.99	8.00
2,800 to 3,099.99	8.50
3,100 to 3,499.99	9.00
3,500 to 3,999.99	9.50
4,000 and over	10.20'.

"(c) The proviso in such section 2(a) is amended by striking out '50' and '$8.50' and inserting in lieu thereof '60' and '$10.20', respectively.

"SEC. 303. (a) Section 2(c) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu of such period a colon and the following: 'And provided further, That, with respect to an employee who has ten or more years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, and who had current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment in a benefit year but has exhausted such rights, the benefit year in which such rights are exhausted shall be deemed not to be ended until the last day of the extended benefit period determined under the following schedule, and the maximum number of days of, and amount of payment for, unemployment within such benefit year for which benefits may be paid to the employee shall be enlarged to include all compensable days of unemployment within such extended benefit period:

" 'If the employee's "years of service" total—	The extended benefit period shall begin on the first day of unemployment following the day on which the employee exhausted his then current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment and shall continue for successive fourteen-day periods (each of which period shall constitute a registration period) until the number of such fourteen-day periods totals—
10 and less than 15	7 (but not more than 65 days)
15 and over	13

but no such extended benefit period shall extend beyond the beginning of the first registration period in a benefit year in which the employee is again qualified for benefits in accordance with section 3 of this Act on the basis of compensation earned after the first of such successive fourteen-day periods has begun. For an employee who has ten or more years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, who has fourteen or more consecutive days of unemployment, and who is not a "qualified employee" for the general benefit year current when such unemployment commences but is or becomes a "qualified employee" for the next succeeding general benefit year, such succeeding benefit year shall, in his case, begin on the first day of the month in which such unemployment commences.'

"(b) An employee who has less than ten years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, and who has after June 30, 1957, and before April 1, 1959, exhausted (within the meaning prescribed by the Railroad Retirement Board by regulation) his rights to unemployment benefits, shall be paid unemployment benefits for days of unemployment, not exceeding sixty-five, which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before July 1, 1959, and which would not be days with respect to which he would be held entitled otherwise to receive unemployment benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, except that an employee who has filed, and established, a first claim for benefits under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 may not thereafter establish a claim under this subsection, and an employee who has registered for, and established a claim for benefits under this subsection may not thereafter establish a claim under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958. Except to the extent inconsistent with this subsection, the provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act shall be applicable in the administration of this subsection.

"(c) The Secretary of Labor, upon request, shall furnish the Board information deemed necessary by the Board for the administration of the provisions of subsection (b) hereof, and the Board, upon request, shall furnish the Secretary of Labor information deemed necessary by the Secretary for the administration of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958.

"SEC. 304. Section 3 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out '$400' and inserting in lieu thereof '$500'.

"SEC. 305. Section 4(a-2) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out subdivision (iv), and by striking out the semicolon at the end of subdivision (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

"SEC. 306. Section 8(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it first appears the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month paid by him to any employee for services rendered to him after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (2) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it appears for the second time the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and to not more than $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (3) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it appears for the third time the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or less than $400 if such month is after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (4) by striking out 'December 31, 1947' in paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof 'the month in which this Act was amended in 1959'; and (5) by striking out the table (except the column headings) in such paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

	Percent
" '$450,000,000 or more	1½
$400,000,000 or more but less than $450,000,000	2
$350,000,000 or more but less than $400,000,000	2½
$300,000,000 or more but less than $350,000,000	3
Less than $300,000,000	3¾'.

"SEC. 307. Section 8(b) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by striking out '3 per centum' and inserting in lieu thereof '3¾ per centum'; and (2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and as is not in excess of $400 paid to him for services rendered as an employee representative in any calendar month after the month in which this Act was so amended'.

"SEC. 308. (a) Subsection (d) of section 10 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to read as follows:

" '(d) Whenever the Board finds at any time that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be insufficient to pay the benefits and refunds which it estimates are due, or will become due, under this Act, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account such moneys as the Board estimates would be necessary for the payment of such benefits and refunds, and the Secretary shall make such transfer. Whenever the Board finds that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, without regard to the amounts transferred pursuant to the next preceding sentence, is sufficient to pay such benefits and refunds, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to retransfer from the railroad unemployment insurance account to the credit of the Railroad Retirement Account such moneys as in its judgment are not needed for the payment of such benefits and refunds, plus interest at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, and the Secretary shall make such retransfer. In determining the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of September 30 of any year pursuant to section 8(a) of this Act, any moneys transferred from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account which have not been retransferred as of such date from the latter account to the credit of the former, plus the interest accrued thereon to that date, shall be disregarded.'

"(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

"SEC. 309. The amendments made by section 301(b) shall be effective with respect to days in registration periods beginning after June 30, 1959. The amendments made by sections 302, 303(a), and 305 shall be effective with respect to benefits accruing in general benefit years which begin after the benefit year ending June 30, 1958, and in extended benefit periods which begin after December 31, 1957. The amendment made by section 304 shall be effective with respect to base years after the base year ending December 31, 1957. The amendments made by clauses (4) and (5) of section 306 and clause (1) of section 307 shall be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid for services rendered in calendar months after the month in which this Act was enacted."

Mr. STAGGERS (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and inserted in full in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the author of the substitute if this is identical with H.R. 1012, and if copies are available.

Mr. STAGGERS. It certainly is not. There are five amendments which I shall explain, which have been talked about in the committee. I think there will be no question about them.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would the gentleman consider——

Mr. STAGGERS. It is all right with me to have the amendment read.

Mr. FLYNT. I am not suggesting that the amendment be read, but I was going to ask a question so that the members of the committee will know what the amendments are.

Mr. STAGGERS. I am going to explain them; they are very short. I have already talked about them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS] be recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I object to any extensions.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, before I explain the amendments, I would like to say this. This bill is identical with a bill which will be considered this afternoon, I understand, in the other body, and probably will pass. It came out of the Senate committee by a vote of 14 to 0. It is the same bill which passed the Senate last year with a vote of 80 to 2, and if brought to this floor would have passed, I am sure.

Before going into an explanation of the amendments, I would like to say, as I said when I started my talk, that I have voted for every bill that was intended to be helpful to the railroads. The time now has come to help the railroad employees. I voted for the Transportation Act of 1958. It came out of my committee. I worked for it and helped to get it through. It helped the railroads of the country. Money was made available to help the railroads of the country.

Last year I was one of those who voted to repeal the excise tax on freight rates. This helped the railroads.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAGGERS. No; I want to explain my amendments. I will not have enough time to yield unless the gentleman withdraws his objection to my getting extra time.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield just for a correction?

Mr. STAGGERS. No.

The first amendment would be that the 10-percent increase in the retirement annuity is not made retroactive; that is, the increase applies only to annuities that accrue after the month of enactment of this act. The increase will not take effect until the month following the enactment of this act.

With relation to the retirement tax, the increases in tax will not take place until the month after the enactment of the act. The question of effective date of the tax has been one of the points of opposition to the substitute bill. We are eliminating that.

The increase in the lump-sum payments is made only with regard to deaths occurring after the month of passage of this bill.

The chairman, in his last appeal, said he did not want the unemployment fund to be destroyed. We are increasing the maximum rate of contributions into the fund by the amount that the actuaries suggested before our committee would make the system sound. That is to 3.75 percent. We are putting the maximum rate at 3.75 percent, one-quarter of 1 percent more than H.R. 5610.

Also, we are giving power to the Retirement Board in this emergency period in which we have had so much unemployment to borrow from the retirement fund for the unemployment and sickness payments. It will be with interest being charged; there will be no controversy on that.

Those are the five perfecting amendments which makes this substitute bill the same as the bill the Senate is considering, which passed out of the committee by a vote of 14 to 0. I am sure it will pass the Senate this afternoon or tomorrow. It passed the Senate last year.

There has been some talk about these extended unemployment benefits. I should like to read for the benefit of the House the Washington agreements which were entered into by the railroads and the unions in 1936, under which men thrown out of work because of mergers or coordination of railroad facilities would be given coordination allowance, that is, unemployment compensation. The younger men, who had been employed for a period of 1 year, would be given a special allowance, with the allowances and periods covered increased by steps, depending on the amount of service. Men with as much as 20 years' service for instance, would be given regular coordination allowances—unemployment pay—for as much as 5 years. All this was accomplished by mutual agreement between the railroad and the employees. We are asking here only to extend unemployment payments for 13 weeks for those older men that have worked between 10 and 15 years, and to extend them for 26 weeks for men with 15 years' service or more. Older men in the railroad industry have a hard time getting jobs elsewhere because of the lack of need for their special experience. The ranking Republican member of the committee last year, Mr. Wolverton, was for those amendments and worked for them, and an agreement was made at that time for extended benefit provisions such as the substitute bill contains.

I believe this bill is fair to the working people of the Nation, I believe it is fair to the railroads, and I belileve it is only keeping an agreement which the Congress made 20 years ago, keeping faith with the working railroadmen of America. If we do not pass this bill, we are taking away some benefits we gave 20 years ago. I see some of the Members are shaking their heads as if they do not believe that.

Mr. YOUNGER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have here a very typical example of what happens when you try to write a technical bill on the floor. I know the gentleman from West Virginia did not intend to say it but he did say that the tax which was cut from 20 to 10 percent gave a rebate to the railroads. He knows that that was no rebate to the railroads just as well as the rest of us know it. All that happens is that the railroads will not collect as much taxes for the Government as they did before.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNGER. No; I cannot yield.

It would seem to me that the fair and the wise thing to do in the case of legislation of this kind of a technical nature is to go to conference. You have the bill from the other body which is similar to H.R. 1012. Take H.R. 5610 and let our conference committee sit down with the members of the conference committee of the other body and in a deliberate and sane way try to write a technical bill. But, if you are going to try to write this bill on the floor of the House with some new amendments, which you may or may not understand, we are going to make mistakes and you are going to conference with a bill that the majority of the committee does not want to go to conference with. I would say that if you were to do anything with the bill, the best thing to do would be to send it back to the committee and let them work it over again rather than to try to eliminate items here which the committee has, after their deliberations, agreed upon and which they can take to the conference table and work out with H.R. 1012, which is a bill, as I understand it, which the other body has and will in all probability pass. To me, that seems to be the sane and intelligent way to approach this problem. Again I appeal to you that the committee has worked over these various amendments. We have a bill here which a great majority—two to one—agreed on in the committee. They heard all of the testimony for several weeks. Now let us go to conference with that bill so that we can have a proper adjustment with the ideas that the committee has. Then, if something needs to be worked out along the line of H.R. 1012, I have confidence enough in our chairman that we will see to it that those ideas are worked out in conference and worked out intelligently with the advice of counsel, which cannot be done by adopting amendments on the floor of the House in a technical bill of this kind. You have here a tax bill. Had this bill come out of the Committee on Ways and Means, you would not have been able to amend it and, yet, you have a tax bill which is just as technical as a tax bill that comes out of the Committee on Ways and Means. I think we ought to go to conference and I do not think we ought to attempt to write a bill of this nature here on the floor of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the substitute which has been offered for the committee bill is essentially H.R. 1012, as it was originally introduced.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. I would like to point out that the gentleman, the author of the substitute, has just announced to the House that the substitute that he has offered is virtually the bill that has been reported by the committee of the other body which is different from H.R. 1012 in five instances.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. STAGGERS. There has been a great deal of talk of differences. Four of the amendments that I offered are in the bill H.R. 5610. There is no doubt about that. The gentleman from California made quite a to-do about a lot of amendments that are different. They are in H.R. 5610. The reason we have this is because there have been a lot of objections, and we put them in to make it a better bill. We think we have a far better bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman this question, and this is the point I am getting at—how much more would the gentleman's bill cost as compared to H.R. 5610?

Mr. STAGGERS. There have been different estimates on that. I do not believe anybody can definitely say. According to my figuring, I say it would be $13 million or $13 million and some odd for the extended benefits and $400,000 for the sickness benefits.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On what does the gentleman base that estimate?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, I think we had better understand what we are doing here. The gentleman said what it would cost and just now he has presented me with a recapitulation sheet, and according to that it would increase the amount of the payroll tax which the railroad industry would pay from 3.5 percent to 3.75 percent and, therefore, it is one-fourth of 1 percent of the payroll tax of the railroad industry.

Mr. STAGGERS. I am talking about known factors. I am trying to make it actuarially sound, one-fourth of 1 percent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. H.R. 1012 would be offered, I was told, as a substitute for the committee bill. I am certain that those who have given consideration to the possibility of supporting H.R. 1012 will be surprised to find that they will not have an opportunity to choose one of the two alternatives we have been told would be presented to us.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. AVERY. If the bill of the gentleman from West Virginia is fundamentally the same as H.R. 1012, then there would be about $50 million difference in the cost.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Going on that assumption, it would appear to me to be an unwise thing to tax the railroads an additional $45 million at a time when they are finding it necessary, because of their present economic situation, to abandon stations and services all over the United States and to lay off employees to keep themselves operating. It just seems to me that to increase this tax all out of proportion to the committee bill would certainly be detrimental to the public interest.

Now when the committee began to hold hearings on H.R. 1012 it soon became apparent that the tax provided in that bill would not be sufficient to defray the expenses of the additional outlay provided in the bill, particularly with respect to the unemployment insurance feature. The committee readily accepted the provisions of the retirement sections of the bill, and very properly so, but when we reached the unemployment compensation section we found that we were faced with several alternatives, if we were to apply any degree of fiscal responsibility, and be completely fair with the railroad employees by keeping the insurance fund solvent.

We found it would be necessary to increase the tax above that provided in H.R. 1012, if we were to grant the extra benefits, and preserve the integrity of the fund.

In lieu of increasing the tax so as to provide the necessary additional revenues, of course, the committee might have reduced the schedule of increased benefit payments to bring them into conformity with the anticipated revenues. Another alternative would have been to disregard our legislative responsibilities, follow the easy road and enact the bill as originally proposed and permit the fund to be depleted.

Instead, the majority of the committee felt that it would be much better, and fairer to the employees and the program to eliminate, instead, some of the abuses that had been written into the unemployment insurance program over the years, and to use these savings to ensure the soundness of the fund.

Now, we have heard a lot of arguments to the effect that the committee bill takes away many of the hard won rights of the employees, and that seems to be the chief issue between the two bills.

Both bills provide for the same increases in retirement benefits; both bills provide for the same increases in unemployment payment rates.

Just what are these things that H.R. 1012 confers and the committee bill denies? It has already been explained that the committee bill, rather than reducing the level of payments in the sickness and unemployment categories, actually provides the same percentage increases as are provided in H.R. 1012. However, the committee bill does amend the unemployment law by rendering ineligible for benefits those who voluntarily walk off the job, and those who are discharged because of their own personal misconduct.

If I understand the philosophy of our unemployment compensation program, its purpose is to provide a measure of assistance for those employees whose employment is terminated through no fault of their own, and under circumstances over which the individual has no control. Here, it should be remembered that the employee contributes not a dime to his unemployment benefits, and these benefits are, in this sense, at least, a gratuity paid exclusively by his employers.

As a matter of simple justice to the railroads, as well as those who become unemployed through layoffs and for other reasons over which they have no control, it appears to me to be proper that the employee be expected to exercise some responsibility over his own welfare. Have we reached the point in this country where a person's employer must be held accountable to his employee for the employee's decisions with respect to his own welfare? Surely, when an employee is caught stealing from his employer and is discharged as a result, there is no moral obligation on his employer to pay him a bonus in unemployment compensation as a reward for his own misconduct. Yet that is one of the so-called rights that supporters of the Staggers substitute bill hope to restore.

Mr. Chairman, when a person separates himself from his employment by his own choice and through his own volition, it must be assumed that he knows what he is doing. Is it unfair to expect him to do so at his own peril? Or must we hold his employer responsible for it, and penalize his employer for it? Here, again, is one of the rights that supporters of H.R. 1012 hope to restore.

The committee has considered this legislation very thoroughly and meticulously, and has worked its will on this legislation. It has not acceded to pressures from outside, but has worked diligently and with a serious sense of responsibility toward the end that a fair, equitable, sensible, and reasonable bill could be passed, which would provide very necessary increases in retirement and unemployment benefits to the railroad workers of America. It has kept in mind the fiscal soundness of both funds, and has written legislation designed to grant these necessary increases in benefits and, at the same time, to preserve the integrity of the respective funds. It has discharged its legislative responsibility, and should the House decide to act otherwise, the committee cannot be held accountable for what might ensue.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will act with wisdom and responsibility, and not yield to the pressures of high powered lobbying tactics, intended to obscure the true issues involved here. In the interest of nearly a million railroad employees—many of whom may become unemployed during the next few years—I hope the House and the Congress will act to keep the fund sound and solvent by adopting the committee bill and rejecting the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I must object.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

I said during the general debate, Mr. Chairman, that this is one of those complex bills where few men will agree on any of the claimed facts in connection with it. I think the debate as it goes along will support that contention.

I would like to deal with the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that if we adopt the substitute we are going to bring about widespread layoffs. That is not so. The people who run the railroads are good managers. They will employ every man they need to do the job, and not one more. If they do less than that they would not be discharging their duties to their stockholders. So let us not say it will result in less jobs. It will not stop the passenger trains running across the country. The Congress gave the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction last year. Nevertheless, these trends will continue. There is nothing in this resolution which will accelerate it.

Now, as to what it costs: This is one of those areas of controversy. It costs whatever the immediate statistician or actuary comes up with as a figure; that is what it costs. It actually costs one quarter of 1 percent more on the total payroll of the employer under H.R. 1012 as amended.

In reference to the remarks of my colleague from California [Mr. YOUNGER] I submit that every man is subject to some responsibility. The responsibility of legislating is enjoyed by the few who may be privileged to sit as Members of the Congress. I do not think it is proper to say this is a difficult subject and therefore being too complex for my understanding I am going to delegate my responsibility to a conference. Let us face up to it, we still have to ratify the action of a conference although it is a little more difficult to isolate the discussion, but it is still our responsibility.

If the test of sound hearing is approval here I would point out that after the complete committee concluded its hearings it made substantive changes, far-reaching changes, in this legislation without granting any public hearings to those who would be most affected. It did not give any opportunity for hearing to the employees who are going to be permanently barred from rights they have long regarded as part of their legitimate entitlement in their overall contract with their employer. We did not give them hearings.

Also, I point out one instance where the committee acted without sufficient facts to make a sound judgment. I read you one example of that action where we adopted an amendment and had to come back and rescind our action because we referred to a code of rules which was nonexistent. We went on the assumption that there was a uniform code governing the question of disqualification for cause and we were amazed to discover that there were not such rules at all.

We are dealing with variables here; it is a cumbersome piece of legislation we are trying to replace with one which was the only compromise we could arrive at. The chairman of the committee introduced H.R. 1012 as a result of a compromise, a good bill.

There were two statements a few moments ago, and I would like the chairman to listen very carefully. This bill will not cause the fund to be any more insolvent than it is at the present time.

Both H.R. 5610 and the substitute authorize the unemployment fund to borrow from the retirement fund, and authorize its repayment with interest. That in all probability is just what is going to occur and is going to be necessary regardless of what we do today.

Sure, it is going to cost more. I am not here to tell you it will cost less. As the minority leader pointed out, this is something the people are going to have to pay, the users of the railroads. They pay every item of expense; they pay for the private pension funds for the officials of the railroads; they pay every benefit which the railroad has to underwrite. The only place the railroad can go for its revenues is to the public, just as the only place we can go for revenue is to the taxpayers.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short statement?

Mr. AVERY. Reluctantly, I will yield for a 30-second statement.

Mr. STAGGERS. I thank the gentleman from Kansas.

On the question of the matter of cost, counsel for the committee computes that to make this fund actuarily sound it will cost $14 million.

I also want to say that what we are trying to do is to keep faith with something we have done through the years.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that we have changed any votes during the debate here this afternoon, but I do think that many Members will know more about the Railroad Retirement Act than they have known for some time.

There are 4 particular points I want to address myself to in this debate today. The first point is that the Railroad Retirement System and Railroad Unemployment Compensation program are the most liberal of any in the industries in the United States. I might add, as an illustration of that fact, that the high pay for unemployment compensation under any of the States systems is $6.13 a day, compared with $8.15 under the present Railroad Unemployment Insurance schedule, which will go up to $9.40 under 5610 that is before the Committee this afternoon. In addition, may I say that the highest rate of any State is in the State of New York where the rate of unemployment compensation is $6.92 per day.

One of the items in this bill that I know had the sincere interest of the members of the committee signing the minority report was the section that gave preferential unemployment compensation benefits to senior employees of the railroad systems. I might add that I asked every witness who appeared before the committee if there was any precedent in any industry whereby an employee that was temporarily furloughed would receive unemployment compensation based on the length of his employment, and not one witness could respond that there was any such precedent or any pattern for such in any of the industries that had unemployment compensation programs.

With respect to voluntary quits and discharges for cause, may I say that it was discussed in the committee as to what was fair and we agreed what was right could be patterned on what the employees have done for themselves, what the brotherhoods have done for themselves in writing seniority agreements with the railroads. We used in that connection a pattern established by the Brotherhoods governing seniority rights.

With respect to rules, the gentleman from California said there were no rules in existence, no pattern of agreements on appeals on decisions of the railroads for discharge. There are many rules created by agreements. I might say that these seniority rules are primarily established by the brotherhoods themselves and are not negotiated.

Under the rules in a matter of a voluntary quit, the railroad employee immediately loses all of his seniority. So, actually, we are treating him better under this bill for unemployment compensation, because when he quits all he has to do is to return to work for 20 days and his full unemployment compensation is restored to him. About the same thing applies when it involves a discharge for cause. That is about the same as any suspension. These rules that have been drawn up, largely by the Brotherhoods, provide that if an employee is suspended for cause and if his suspension is not upheld by the Railroad Retirement Board, the railroad company, his employer, must compensate him for full pay while he was under suspension. Unless suspension is rescinded within a stated time, he loses his seniority.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVERY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MACDONALD. Are the rules governing the employment of people prescribed by the railroads?

Mr. AVERY. It is my understanding that as far as seniority is concerned that is pretty much a matter for the Brotherhoods.

Mr. MACDONALD. Do the railroad companies have any say in that matter?

Mr. AVERY. As far as the claims of an individual employee, based on seniority, they have only a responsibility to abide by the rules to which they agree.

Mr. MACDONALD. I know that the gentleman is waiving what he says are rules or regulations. Are those agreements not collectively arrived at between the unions and the railroads?

Mr. AVERY. After they are agreements they become rules.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is it not a fact that the railroads have something to say as to what is to be done?

Mr. AVERY. They have on certain matters, but as far as seniority is concerned, that is left to the Brotherhoods as to how they would prefer to establish relative seniority.

In almost any legislation that comes on the floor of the House there are three legislative positions. There are usually two economic groups with opposing viewpoints and then there is a much broader viewpoint that is frequently overlooked and that is the public viewpoint. It was in support of the public viewpoint that the committee wrote certain provisions into H.R. 5610 that is before the House today. Although no opposition to 5610 was recorded on final passage in the committee, we are presented today with some adamant opposition to the measure.

In my legislative experience, it has been my observation that except in extreme cases no one gets everything they want. And further, it is only natural for any economic group to ask for more than they expect to finally receive. This legislation is an example of a legislative compromise that is the normal result of a democratic procedure.

The basic objective of the committee bill is to reasonably improve the economic security for the bona fide and regular railroad employee and to eliminate fringe benefits that had been available to the casual, part-time, and itinerant railroad worker.

What about this compromise?

There are 17 changes to the basic act, the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937. The railroad industry was basically opposed to 16 of the 17 amendments. The industry did agree that the imbalance in railroad retirement fund created by the 10-percent increase in annuities granted by the 84th Congress should be corrected. The retirement fund is presently out of balance by $213 million annually. By contrast, the Railroad Brotherhoods proposed that the 17 changes contained in 1012 to improve the economic status of the railroad worker should be endorsed by the committee without amendment and almost without question. The committee went along with the recommendation of the Brotherhoods on the provisions they had placed in top priority, that of a straight 10-percent increase in annuities to retired railroad employees and an increase up to 20 percent in unemployment compensation and 10 other changes. There is disagreement on four provisions. If members of the committee will reflect on their mail they have received over the past 2 years, those are the items mentioned, particularly the item of increased annuities.

To my knowledge there is no opposition to part I of the bill which provides the needed increase in annuities that are estimated to increase the benefit cost of the retirement program by $147 million per year to the 364,000 annuitants, 133,000 spouses, 1,200 pensioners, 244,700 survivor beneficiaries. There is an immediate increase of the retirement tax of one-half of 1 percent to 6¾ percent on both employer and employee and then to 7¼ percent in 1962, and would increase by the same percentage points as social security after that date.

On part II of the bill, there are several points in controversy. Let me remind the Members that here again the item of top priority by the brotherhoods is included in the committee bill, that of raising the rate of unemployment compensation from 12½ percent in the lower brackets to 20 percent in the higher brackets. This increases cost to railroads for unemployment insurance by $25½ million. There is no opposition of record to this section although some members of the committee wonder if the low-pay bracket employee should not have received the larger percent of increase and the high-bracket employee the smaller percent if we are going to apply the rule of need in establishing entitlement rates for unemployment. In this respect, however, we accepted the formula of the Brotherhoods.

There are five principal provisions of disagreement in the bill.

Probably the strongest objection among the members signing the minority report is based on the committee's decision to eliminate a rather complex formula contained in the original bill to provide additional unemployment benefits for employees based upon years of service. In addition to the 130 days of unemployment compensation allowable under present law, 1012 had proposed an additional permanent benefit extension of 13 weeks to employees with over 10 years of service and then still an additional 13 weeks to the employee with over 15 years of service. The objective of this provision is meritorious but there was no evidence presented to the committee to support such a proposal, either by precedent in the railroad industry or by comparison with other industries. Such a provision would cost the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Fund an additional $13½ million per year in addition to the $175¾ million for unemployment benefits.

Railroad unemployment benefits are now higher than in any other industry and we are raising them in this bill, the committee bill, by 20 percent. We felt that was as far as we could go in increasing benefits to unemployed railroad workers. In September 1958, the average daily unemployment benefit under State law was $6.13 a day compared to $8.15 average daily benefit to railroad workers. Under this bill the average rate will be $9.40 for unemployment daily benefit. The highest paid by any of the States was $6.92, paid by the State of New York.

There was no evidence presented to the Committee that there was any precedent in any industry preferential treatment among employees for unemployment benefits.

To balance this program with other unemployment insurance programs, the committee did add the 13 weeks temporary benefits to treat railroad employees the same as other employees were treated by the Congress in 1958. These benefits will apply retroactively and will cost the railroad approximately $20 million paid to approximately 60,000 employees.

Another provision in controversy is the elimination of unemployment benefits for voluntary quits, discharge for cause, failure to accept suitable work, or failure to report for work. It is estimated that 20,000 beneficiaries would have received $10 million less in benefits if this provision had been in effect. Present law provides an employee would be suspended for 30 days and would then be eligible for unemployment compensation.

It was the belief of the committee that employees out of work for those reasons should not be eligible for unemployment compensation. In adopting that provision it is in keeping with provisions in labor agreements between the railroads and the various brotherhoods. These are the agreements largely written by the brotherhoods themselves, especially the provision governing seniority. These agreements generally provide that a worker voluntarily leaving the employment of the railroad forfeits his seniority rights. That is in effect what we are saying in this bill. The agreements further provide that if an employee is suspended, his seniority shall be restored if he is reinstated in 1 year's time. We are saying if he comes back to work for 20 days, his unemployment benefits shall be restored even if he was discharged for cause or voluntarily left the employ of the railroad.

The third difference is disqualification for sickness benefits. The committee felt some limitation should be placed on this provision since it is possible under present law for a casual employee of the railroad to be employed in another industry for a year and still draw sickness benefits from his previous employment by the railroad. Since the railroad bears all the cost of this program, a reasonable limitation seemed in order. The average cost of a sickness benefit under this bill is $9.74 per day. The committee bill provides that employee must have been employed within the last 90 days to be eligible. Under present law, for example, a college student may work for a railroad for summer employment and receive free medical care up to the amount of his earnings 1½ years later.

The employee would also be disqualified for sickness benefits if he leaves railroad employment voluntarily, fails without good cause to accept suitable employment, or fails to report to employment office. His sickness benefits may be reestablished after he has returned to work for the railroad for a period of 20 days, the same as unemployment insurance.

Sickness benefits are not denied an employee who is discharged for cause.

A further difference is in maternity benefits. Maternity benefits as such are eliminated from the bill, but sickness benefits are still payable to a pregnant female if she is sick and otherwise available for work. Despite elimination of maternity benefits, the cost of sickness benefits in the committee bill is increased over present law by $3¼ million.

The remaining difference in controversy in the two bills is the waiting period for sickness benefits.

H.R. 5610 provides that the number of compensable days of sickness benefits for which benefits may be paid in the first registration period—consisting of 14 consecutive days—in a benefit year shall be 5 days. With respect to subsequent registration periods, the number of compensable days for sickness for which benefits would be payable would be 10 days but this payment would be conditioned upon the claimant having no less than 7 days of sickness or unemployment, or both, either in such subsequent registration period or in the 14 days immediately preceding such subsequent registration period.

H.R. 1012 makes no change in existing law with respect to the number of compensable days of sickness for which benefits may be paid. These are 7 days in the first 14-day registration period in a benefit year and 10 days in all subsequent registration periods.

It was the feeling of the committee that the employee should bear the cost of the first week of sickness.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOULDER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Is the substitute presented by the gentleman from West Virginia essentially the compromise bill that this committee hammered out during the closing days of the last session?

Mr. MOULDER. That is correct.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. At the close of the last session was not the railroad industry experiencing the 1958 recession?

Mr. MOULDER. That is true, in my opinion.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. If the railroad industry could afford this compromise measure at that time, does the gentleman feel that the financial condition of the industry today makes it more able to afford it now?

Mr. MOULDER. I think the financial reports show they are far more able today than they were at that time.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Is this substitute not essentially the original Harris bill, introduced at this session of the Congress?

Mr. MOULDER. It is, yes.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MOULDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1012. As stated by my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROWN], this is the original Harris bill. I want to pay tribute to our distinguished chairman for his outstanding ability in the presentation of this bill during the hearings before our committee. At all times throughout the hearings before the committee he vigorously opposed all of the changes that are now included in H.R. 5610. He gave support to his own bill and loyally and effectively opposed many amendments that were proposed. I am in favor of the substitute bill for many reasons. First, because I am aware of the fact railroad unemployment is still at the most severe level in history, although railroad business and profits have rebounded from the recession even faster than most other industries and are now approaching a new all-time peak. In such a situation, it seems to me clear that justice requires that Congress act to aid the hundreds of thousands of railroad workers and their families who are now suffering untold demoralization, hunger, and poverty as the result of technological advances which have enabled the railroad industry to maintain a high level of profits even during the severe 1957–58 recession we have just weathered.

I do not believe that any Member of this Congress would deliberately put corporation profits before aid to the Nation's railroad workers. Yet last year, when the railroads came to us and said that they were on the verge of bankruptcy, Congress responded by voting immediate aid, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars in annual benefits. At the same time, railroad workers, who came to us and asked for legislation to aid their needy retired and unemployed brothers, did not have their request passed by this body. What we have before us today, therefore, is legislation to complete a two-step program which all of us envisioned when we voted aid for the railroads themselves. We must act today to help the workers of the industry which we helped so well last year.

I say that we helped the railroads very well when we enacted the Transportation Act of 1958, as is clearly shown by their earnings records since that time. The aid which we gave the railroads last year is continuing, and it will provide them material benefits in the years to come. In the last 4 months of 1958, the railroads of this country reported earnings at the rate of more than $1 billion a year in net railway operating income, which I remind you represents the operating profits after taxes.

Meanwhile, in the first 4 months of 1959, railroad profits have continued to rise and are rising today. Now, this is not a line of argument as to the merits of the legislation, but it does clearly show that the hue and cry that the railroads are on the verge of bankruptcy and cannot continue to participate in this program of aid to their workers who created these profits is not a sound argument.

Recently the Wall Street Journal conducted a survey of how the big corporations of this Nation were recovering from the slump. It showed that railroad profits had rebounded faster than those of other industries. Profits of major firms in other industries in the last quarter of 1958 were found to run about 2 percent above those of a year earlier, but class I railroads reported their profits had increased by 23 percent.

Clearly, the railroads no longer are in need of emergency help. In saying that, I do not mean to rule out further aid to restore their competitive position with other forms of transport, should the need for such legislation be demonstrated, but I want only to stress that the railroads today are not in the relatively poor financial position they were in when H.R. 1012 was first drafted. Their condition at that time unquestionably was taken into account and H.R. 1012 represents a compromise that included severe cutbacks in the original proposals based upon the economic condition of the railroads when the bill was being prepared.

Even in those days, let me point out, neither committee of the Congress which considered this legislation in both the House and the Senate regarded any of the retrogressive amendments proposed by H.R. 5610 as either necessary or desirable. Yet today, when railroad earnings are running at a higher level than in most of the postwar years, H.R. 5610 proposes to take away from railroad workers—who, I remind you, have not benefited by the railroads' economic recovery but are still suffering from record highs in unemployment—benefits they have earned and received for as long as 20 years under the present act.

The railroads can well afford the modest increase in benefits which H.R. 1012 proposes—and proposes, incidentally, at the identical tax rate contained in H.R. 5610—without the need for chopping away piecemeal at the existing benefits through the imposition of new restrictions and limitations proposed by the committee bill.

Other speakers have already told you of the statistics of railroad unemployment and the hardships they represent for workers in an industry which today is prosperous, with favorable prospects of continued prosperity for many years to come. Fortunately, today, the earnings picture of the railroads is such that we no longer are confronted with the need to make a choice between profits and human need. The railroads clearly will have their profits, at near-record or new record levels, even after the enactment of H.R. 1012. What confronts us now, therefore, is a choice between fair, progressive aid to unemployed railroad workers, as provided by H.R. 1012, or backward-moving and retrogressive cutbacks in benefits to those workers in their time of greatest need. That is why I am opposed to most of the provisions of H.R. 5610 and urge the substitution and adoption of H.R. 1012 which was approved by the committee last year and which was approved by the Senate by an overwhelming vote and, I understand, will be approved by the Senate today.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I served on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for a long time. When I became majority leader in the 80th Congress I was second on the committee and gave up my position on it at that time. I think it is one of the greatest committees in the House. I have never seen partisanship divide that committee. I am sure it is not dividing it now and by my speech here I would not want anyone to assume that I was injecting any partisanship into this discussion.

Reference has been made to some of the actions of the committee in executive session. I have sat for days and days and days in executive sessions of that committee when there have been hammered out the provisions of these complicated measures, and I have always felt that when that great committee reached a conclusion, particularly by a vote of 2 to 1, the House of Representatives could well follow its direction.

Having said that about my service on the committee, let me go on to a few other matters. Something was said here about the recession of last year and the bill that was alleged to have been worked out at that time. I would just like to remind the Members that if the additional charges proposed by that bill had been put upon the railroads at that time, many of them here in the East would have been going into receivership, and you could have triggered one of the greatest depressions this country ever saw. That is the reason the bill was not acted on. That is the reason we moved to provide some relief for the railroads.

I happen to believe that we need the railroads. But I must say to you that when I discover that the Monon Railroad, that runs from Chicago to Indianapolis, which, when I was a boy, had passenger train after passenger train moving every day, now has abandoned them all; when I see the two other roads running from Chicago to Indianapolis petitioning for the abandonment of their trains, I say to you the railroads are in trouble.

The committee has hammered out a bill that everyone admits will add additional costs to the railroads in the sum of over $100 million a year. According to the people on the committee who ought to know say, the substitute bill will add something like $45 or $50 million additional. Why is it not fair to go along with the committee with the benefits that are provided in the committee bill? The matter is always within the bosom of the Congress. Any time anything further needs to be done, it can be done. But I must say that once you reach a fair position then that ought to be enough.

A couple of years ago a responsible transportation official predicted confidently that in 10 years there would not be a single passenger train left in the country except commuter trains. I could not believe it. But the happenings of the last 2 years have made me wonder if that might not become true.

Last summer we moved to help the railroads. May I say to you that there are great railroads right here in the East who were confronted with a very difficult situation at that time.

You talk about technological advancement in the railroad industry. The abandonment of these trains is not merely a matter of technological advancement. It is largely a matter of competition that is putting them out of business, competition from other types of transportation.

So if the Congress in its wisdom sees fit to make some provisions that will enable the railroads to improve their position, why do that with your right hand and then turn around and with your left hand take all of the benefits away?

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say further that in my service on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and here in the House of Representatives I have voted time after time after time for legislation of benefit to the railway employees.

I know the men and women who work on the railroads in my district. Let no one say I am not solicitous for their welfare, because I am, and I have proved that year after year by my record. But I say to you that in this matter, even as in many other matters involving the very vital economy of the country, we ought to stop, look, and listen before we go too far. In my opinion, the committee bill goes far enough at this time and ought to be adopted by this committee and by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from South Carolina will yield, I should like to get some indication about how much time may be necessary on this substitute amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this substitute amendment conclude at 5:15.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the reason I rise today is that, like so many Members here, especially those of us who have not previously been on the committee, this year was my first time to have any acquaintance with the railroad retirement law. I know that is true of many of the new Members of Congress, who have been besieged in recent weeks by certain propaganda.

Mr. Chairman, I did not know anything about railroad retirement until this committee began to have hearings. After we had the hearings, this committee very carefully went into the railroad retirement law, because in 1956 there had been an obligation to fund it up, and there were certain improvements which we felt were necessary. But lo and behold, after we had come out with a railroad retirement bill with all the good features in it we were propagandized by not only railway labor but railway management saying the Retirement Act was slaughtering them.

Who has been slaughtered, and who has been kicking about it? Stand up and be counted. By refusing a retroactive feature which would cause a tax situation unfair and which could not be administered, who has been slaughtered? Then by putting on a necessary tax so that the funds can be balanced, who has been slaughtered? No, the only possibility of slaughter is for you to vote for this amendment instead of for the work of the committee.

Let me tell you why. We seek to remove, because we think it will make unsound the unemployment compensation features and cost the railroads more than they can financially stand, the 52-week permanent extended benefits. Who has been slaughtered when those who expect to get the benefits are protected by the work of this committee, realizing that the railroads cannot stand the rate unless the public expects to pay more for the freight? Are you going to sacrifice the public—are you going to stand up to your obligations here in the Congress?

Then we put a provision in that a man who says, "I won't work, I voluntarily quit," shall be like every other American worker. Every other American worker that voluntarily quits has to suffer some penalty, and well he might, because in the employment relation when a man just gets up and says, "I won't work and I don't want to," how in the world are we going to justify giving him any money? There are today millions of Americans paying taxes to support a program where men voluntarily quit, many with neither intention nor desire to go back to work. They are working—he owes them some obligation.

The Good Book says that a man must work for his bread. Heaven knows, in America today we do not need to encourage idleness. We went one step further. We said, "If you are guilty of misconduct—if you are drunk, if you violate the rules, if you do something to a passenger or to somebody else, you cannot draw your money." Do we not owe some obligation to the American people? Do we not owe some obligation to say that if a man is drunk on public transportation, he has to suffer some penalty? Heaven knows, I would hate for some of my family to be exposed to somebody who is drunk on any form of public transportation—railroads, airplanes, bus, or any other type.

If the employee is guilty of violating the rules, which have to do with the safety factor, which we expect in our transportation, is there anything wrong with saying, "If you cannot live by the rules, there must be something that you can expect?"

No, my friends, what you are being asked to do today is not even to vote for H.R. 1012 that they propagandized you about. You are being asked to vote for a substitute and you do not even know what is in it because the gentleman who proposed it a few moments ago, the distinguished and wonderful gentleman from West Virginia, himself, did not have time to explain it and it has not been explained. And, yet, you do not even know what you are voting for.

The able gentleman from West Virginia is to be complimented not only on his knowledge of this legislation, and his sincere preparation and knowledge of the substitute, but on a magnificent example of leadership. He—Mr. STAGGERS—is a skillful advocate of his cause, and his heart is in it.

I want to compliment my chairman, the great and lovable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] for the great labor and effort he has put into getting a good bill. The American people are fortunate in having him head this great committee. He is the fairest man in or out of committee, for he gives head and time to the opposition at all times.

For some reason very few people contacted me on this legislation. Some retirees came and asked only that I vote the retirement. This I am doing. Some few workers asked that the cost to them be considered, and it was. Nobody has said they were unwilling to have the inequities of the unemployment compensation adjusted. I just want to be sure the railroad employees are protected, and they are better protected by H.R. 5610.

Now remember, we are not voting on H.R. 1012, as the substitute is not H.R. 1012. Will you vote in the dark?

The railroad industry is a great industry. Already it is suffering from too much unemployment. Last year we had to bail them out of one hole. If they cannot afford the 52 weeks, who will bail them out, who will insure employees the compensation they will expect if we pass the substitute? Three hundred and eight thousand drew unemployment compensation in 1958. Multiply that by 52 weeks and then by an average of $30 per week. See page 121 of the hearings to verify that figure.

H.R. 5610 is good for everybody. It is good for employees, labor and management. It is best for the American people—that is why I am for it.

I urge the defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD].

Mr. COAD. Mr. Chairman, I regret taking even the 3½ minutes that have been allotted to each Member at this time. The hour is late and I know we have a great deal to do. But, I would like to answer or at least try to reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] who came to the well of the House a few moments ago and was pleading generously on behalf of the American railroads because of the fact that they were taking so many trains off of the railroads, and he was speaking in particular about passenger trains. I would like to relate what has happened to my entire psychology and thinking in regard to the American railway system. I have a very soft spot in my heart for the American railway system—first of all, because of the need of it for our national defense; and second, for the benefit of our welfare. But, I would like to say this. In my hometown, we have the main line of one of the strongest, or at least in former years it was one of the strongest of all the railway systems in the United States. We used to have many passenger trains coming through there every day. But, the management of this line has taken off passenger train after passenger train—not because there was an actual decrease in the number of people who were riding the trains, but because it was a deliberate policy on the part of the management to do away with the passenger-train service. I personally pleaded with the president of this railway company to leave at least one train on this line a day that had a pullman car. But my plea was to no avail. I understand now even the mail car is going to be taken off. There is now only one, single passenger train a day on the tracks of the Chicago, North Western Railroad which extends from Chicago to Omaha. This train is a night train but it has no sleeping car. So after the pullman car was taken off, one night I rode all night in a passenger car from Boone, Iowa, to Chicago, Ill., and when I arrived in Chicago I felt exactly as if I were destined for the livestock market as a result of the kind of service I received on that train.

I say it is this kind of thing that has taken away travel on American railroads. It is the determination of the management of these railways that they want to do away with passenger service.

Not long ago I was snowbound at Fort Dodge, Iowa. I knew because of the storm that the planes would not take off. The highways were blocked, and I have been so schooled in the idea that there is no passenger-train service that it was 9 o'clock that night before it dawned on me that there was still a railway that did have a pullman car on it so that I could get to Chicago. The Illinois Central Railway had a night train with a sleeper and I took it because I had to return to Washington without delay.

This kind of public attitude is detrimental to the American railway system but the railways have brought it on themselves. There are many people in this country who do not want to fly. They get sick when they fly. But what kind of service are the American railways giving to this clientele? I say the American railroads can do much if they will improve their service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, there has been some question as to the precise nature of the substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS]. For the purpose of clearing up the record, I want to state categorically the provisions of the substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia are precisely the same as H.R. 1012. Anyone in this House who wishes to support H.R. 1012 may support the provisions of the substitute offered by the gentleman from West Virginia without any qualms whatsoever.

The two provisions are in all ways identical except for the following changes which I will mention to you. Each of the changes embodied in the proposal of Mr. STAGGERS are included in H.R. 5610, but each of those changes are in no way incompatible with the views of those who have joined in signing the minority report on this bill, urging substitution of H.R. 1012 for 5610.

The tax feature for payment into the unemployment compensation fund is raised from 3½ to 3¾ to conform with the actuarial needs of the fund, as recognized by the committee and as embodied in H.R. 5610.

Second, the Staggers substitute provides for the borrowing power for the unemployment compensation fund as included in H.R. 5610 to tide it over the anticipated rough spots which will occur during August and September of this year as a result of the railroads having taken a free ride on the unemployment compensation fund for 5 or 10 years.

Third, it will permit railroad employees to take advantage of the temporary unemployment compensation law changes which were just enacted by this House and the Senate and signed by the President since the Easter holidays.

The last change embodied in the Staggers proposals is purely a technical change which will raise the figure for computing the base year from four to five hundred a year. Those are the only changes which are made. Aside from this, H.R. 1012 is offered to you to vote on at the time the vote will be cast on the Staggers substitute. The Staggers substitute is H.R. 1012, with the exception of those simple changes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BENNETT].

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BALDWIN].

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the substitute bill. In my opinion this substitute provides better protection of the rights and benefits of railroad employees and retired railroad employees. I therefore urge that the substitute bill be adopted.

I am glad that both the substitute and the committee bill provide for a 10 percent increase in railroad retirement benefits. This increase is urgently needed by the thousands of retired railroad employees throughout this country.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. WIDNALL].

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1012 and urge rejection of the amended form of this bill which was reported to the floor by a majority of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

I regret that I must take this stand, because I respect the action of a committee of the House on the principle that its members have given the matter before it extensive study and have, therefore, based their recommendations on detailed knowledge of the provisions of a legislative measure. Therefore they usually are in a better position to judge the merits of what is proposed than most Members of the House. In the case of H.R. 5610—the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance amendments now before us—however, I do not believe that this situation applies.

In the first place, H.R. 1012 is not new legislation, in the customary sense, but rather it is a long-studied and much-overdue measure that in itself represents major revisions and cutbacks in the proposals originally brought before the Congress. Last year, the Senate passed a bill that was almost identical to H.R. 1012, and the record of debate shows that it did so with the clear understanding that the legislation, in this compromised form, which conformed to the wishes of the House committee, would be acceptable to that committee. All of us who served in the last Congress need to remember this fact, I think, because there was little room for doubt that if the bill in this compromised form had been put to a vote, it would have passed this body by an overwhelming margin.

H.R. 1012 as introduced this year is basically the same legislation. I can see no reason why legislation that was acceptable last year should be any less acceptable now. Remember that in shaping this legislation into the form of H.R. 1012, the last Congress held even more extensive hearings than those held this year, since the original hearings were on the original and much broader proposals. No need for the changes proposed by H.R. 5610 was shown to exist at this earlier date, and, in my judgment, no need has been shown by the hearings held this year. Rather, developments since the original proposals were introduced seem to me to all point logically in the other direction.

When the bill we now know as H.R. 1012 took shape last year, the financial condition of the railroad industry was certainly more precarious than it is today. The railroads have recovered at least as fast as any other industry from the effects of the recession which prevailed when this legislation was first proposed. In the last 4 months of 1958, net railroad operating earnings averaged over $1 billion a year—a rate better than they earned in most postwar years and close to their top earnings during this period. This pickup in business has carried over into 1959, so that today the railroads' net earnings are running well ahead of 1958. Part of their high earnings, let us not forget, have been made possible by the help which Congress gave to them by adopting the provisions of the Transportation Act of 1958 last year. I voted for that assistance to the railroads. The railroads clearly are in a much better shape financially to afford the provisions of H.R. 1012 than they were when this legislation was originally prepared.

On the other hand, although business has picked up on the railroads, unemployment among railroad workers remains excessively high and a serious national problem. Over 200,000 railroad workers were unemployed in January of this year, when total employment in the industry dropped to 810,000, the lowest point since the turn of the century. More than 40,000 of these unemployed railworkers had exhausted all railroad unemployment insurance benefits. Because of technological advances and the big increase in the productivity of railroad workers in recent months, the prospect is only for continued high unemployment of extensive duration and many exhaustions of benefits among railroad employees who become unemployed. The critical nature of this unemployment is dramatized by the fact that workers with 20 and even 30 years of service have lost their jobs. Such workers, possessing skills not readily transferred to other industries, are truly today's dispossessed, and unfortunately, they are victims of the great increase in output per man-hour which railroad workers are now contributing to their industry.

In such circumstances, it seems to me to be both inexcusable and socially unwise to kick the workers who have helped their industry the most in terms of man-hour output at the very time they are in need of help. H.R. 5610, by proposing new restrictions upon unemployment insurance which these workers have earned for as long as 13 to 20 years, does just that.

If there were no need for such restrictions last year, when the railroads were much worse off financially, there is certainly no need for them now. The railroads needed help last year, and Congress gave them that help. Railroad employees also needed help critically last year, but Congress postponed final action until now. In my judgment, this delay in acting to meet the needs of railroad workers was, in light of action to aid the industry, inexcusable and in itself an unfair penalty. To now add further to this injustice by weakening the unemployment insurance protections these workers have enjoyed since the beginning of the act, as H.R. 5610 would do, seems to me to be an unconscionable proposal. I therefore urge substitution of the original compromise measure, H.R. 1012, for the unfair and unjustifiable provisions contained in H.R. 5610.

Mr. BENNETT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. As I said earlier, it is a reasonable measure. It is one which was passed by a practically unanimous vote in the committee, after long consideration during the last session of Congress, with the exception of the present increased retirement part of the bill. Otherwse, the measure which was passed at that time without hardly a dissenting vote is before the committee at the present time in the form of this substitute.

The difference in overall cost between the substitute and the committee bill is not great. The major difference between the two bills lies in whether you wish to recognize seniority and grant additional permanent unemployment benefits to people who have worked faithfully for railroads 10 years or more.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the substitute will be adopted because, as I say, it is a perfectly reasonable and fair bill taken in its entirety. It does justice to the retired railroad workers of this country and their dependents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. MACDONALD. Actually, Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time to direct a question to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], who spoke of there being no politics in this matter. I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS], who represents the Republican policy committee, at this moment leaving. May I direct a question to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS]? Does the gentleman support the position of his leader who states that there is no politics involved in Republican support of this bill?

Mr. ARENDS. Will the gentleman repeat his question?

Mr. MACDONALD. I shall be happy to. I ask if you support the gentleman from Indiana in his statement which he made here in the well of the House that there is no political implication, there are no political overtones, to either the defeat or passage of this bill?

Mr. ARENDS. I did not hear the gentleman from Indiana make the statement, but I would support him in that statement if he made it.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then may I ask you this question: Has the Republican policy committee put out any order about support or passage of this bill?

Mr. ARENDS. No; unfortunately, we cannot order our people around.

Mr. MACDONALD. May I rephrase that and ask if you put out a "quote—confidential—unquote" report which purportedly puts forward the position of the policy committee made on April 22, 1959?

Mr. ARENDS. I do not know if that was put out or not. I did not get one if it was, but if it was an official report, then that is that.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will the gentleman inquire of Mr. HALLECK——

Mr. ARENDS. As I said a moment ago, I will ask him when he comes back.

Mr. MACDONALD. This information is in what purports to be a confidential report dated April 22, 1959.

Mr. ARENDS. Where did the gentleman get it?

Mr. MACDONALD. That I will be happy to tell you. Labeled "Confidential report," dated April 23, 1959, it says:

Policy committee meeting, April 22, 1959.

(1) Report on White House leadership meeting of April 22, 1959:

(2) Railroad retirement and unemployment insurance, H.R. 5610.

Action taken by policy committee:

(1) Railroad retirement and unemployment insurance: Favors H.R. 5610 as reported by committee.

I see the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] is on his feet, and as his name appears on the heading of this document along with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], he probably can furnish me the information.

Mr. ARENDS. We will let the gentleman from Wisconsin answer it, then. Will you tell me just where you got the letter?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will be happy to tell you. Obviously it came from a member of the Republican Party to whom it was sent, and incidentally not a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair at this time recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. STAGGERS. I would like to announce to the House right now that the Senate has just now passed an identical bill. I think perhaps the messenger from the Senate has just brought it over, as he is standing back there. This is the bill we are considering now, the substitute that I am offering. If I am right this identical bill has been passed by the Senate and is now waiting to be announced to the House. It is the very substitute I am offering here. It was passed by a voice vote with no opposition from either side of the aisle.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from West Virginia. I ask the support of this committee for the substitute bill introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS] to the committee bill. H.R. 5610 is a revision of the bill agreed to last year.

Standing alone, this might not seem too important. However, the form of H.R. 5610 poses a completely new and difficult problem for this House. In addition to drastically revising the bill that was agreed to last year, the majority of our committee has attacked principles of social insurance that in some instances have been operable for over 20 years. The problem of persons who voluntarily leave their employment, and of persons discharged for cause by their employer, are handled, in my judgment, in a very poor manner by the committee bill. I believe that if the committee bill became law chaos would result in the railroad industry. I am convinced that our offices would be flooded with protests, and rightfully so, from railroad workers unfairly discriminated against because of the provisions of H.R. 5610 if they are permitted to stand. In many other areas the committee bill is inadequate. It does not provide the understanding treatment of unemployment that is so badly needed in this great industry. It is discriminatory and unfair.

I believe that the only fair thing that this House can do in justice to the railroad employees and to the great railroad industry, is to adopt the Staggers substitute.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, if we just gave a little bit of consideration to the human values recognized in the substitute, it would pass unanimously.

I hope the substitute will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. HOLIFIELD].

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in the closing hours of this debate before we take a vote on the substitute amendment, as amended by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS], may I say that it is a timely thing that the other body has passed a bill that not only includes amendments to the original 1012 by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS], but it also includes the 3¾ contribution, raised one quarter of 1 percent, which will make the fund a good fund and not a fund that cannot pay its bills.

Of course this House has to act upon its own responsibility. Every Member of this House respects the chairman of the committee and the members of the committee who took either side of this particular question. However, you are faced today with your own responsibility to 700,000 railroad workers in the United States who have signed negotiated contracts with their employers in connection with these fringe benefits. If the committee bill is agreed to, a number of fringe benefits will be taken away.

Do you want to go ahead with the Staggers substitute, which is the same as the committee bill in regard to the increase of 10 percent in retirement benefits, which is in line with action we have taken in other retirement funds, and is in line with the need for additional money to meet the purchasing power problems of the American people? Do you want to take away from them, while you are giving them a 10 percent increase, some of their unemployment compensation benefits they have had for as long as 13 years? Do you want to take away their sickness benefits? Do you want to make the period longer by 2 days in order for them to retain fringe benefits they have enjoyed for the past 13 or more years?

Those are the questions before the House today. We have our own responsibility. The other body has acted. This body should act responsibly, too, for the benefit of the 700,000 employees of the railroads of America.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VANIK].

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VANIK. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say this, that one Member of the House said that I did not know what I was talking about. I would like to tell the House this, that if there is any man in this House that knows any more about this legislation than I do, I do not know who it is. I have studied night after night in my office until 9 o'clock and then took the books with me to the hotel and studied until 12. I will not say I am the best informed man to answer all questions that may be propounded about railroad legislation. I believe the chairman of our committee is one of the best informed men on the Hill on railroad legislation, and I respect him for that. I think he has been entirely fair, and I certainly do not want to disagree with him. You know, it has been intimated that according to my statement they cannot fire a man. The only thing we insist is that he must have these unemployment benefits coming to him. We do not want any men working on the job when they are drunk. If he is drinking, he ought to be fired. But, if he has paid into this fund over the years and is unemployed, he should be able to look forward to getting the benefits of it. All we are trying to do is to keep faith with the men and women who work. Here we are trying to take away those rights. And, I say, we have to keep faith with them. And, before you vote to take away some of these things, you should examine the bill a little more closely, as well as your conscience. We are only trying to go forward and not backward.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I certainly hope that the substitute will be adopted by this committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, when the very able chairman of this Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce wound up debate, he mentioned the possibility of a catastrophe—that is, the suggestion that either one of the funds, the unemployment insurance fund or the retirement fund, might get into very serious trouble. It was not clear to me which one it was. Certainly this substitute does provide for actuarial soundness for both funds.

The issue here on the floor today seems to be whether or not we should change well-established, long-standing conditions of employment for railroad employees. Apparently it is considered necessary by the chairman and the majority of the committee on the ground that it will make the fund more sound. Yet, we have had no evidence on this floor of any great abuses, nor have we had set out before us the amount of money it will save.

If there is a catastrophe in the offing, then the people most concerned, the railroad unions and their members, certainly should have been in touch with us by now. They are personally and vitally concerned about these benefits, both unemployment and retirement. However, the fact is that they are for this substitute. They do not believe it will mean catastrophe, nor do I.

Now, I should like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS] a few questions. It seems to me that the bill, H.R. 1012, is entirely clear as amended, but I would like to have the gentleman state succinctly in the time remaining what is exactly before the House as the substitute to the committee bill.

Mr. STAGGERS. The substitute is H.R. 1012 precisely with five minor adjustments. Three of those have to do with moving up the date of the effectiveness of the retirement fund; the other is taxation, and the other is 10 percent on the lump-sum payment.

Mr. PORTER. Four of these are in the committee bill?

Mr. STAGGERS. Four of these are in the committee bill. One of them gives the Railroad Retirement Board the authority to borrow money from the retirement fund if it gets too low.

Mr. PORTER. The basic difference then is that we are not changing the long-standing conditions of employment?

Mr. STAGGERS. That is right. There is one basic fact in my amendment, and that is that we are raising the rate of interest one-fourth of 1 percent on the unemployment compensation fund.

Mr. PORTER. Which will make it actuarially sound?

Mr. STAGGERS. That is according to the actuaries that came before our committee and so testified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise informally for the purpose of receiving a message from the Senate.

Accordingly the Committee rose and the Speaker assumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 226 An act to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its sitting.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937, THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT, AND THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to this debate it sounds essentially as though this is a fiscal problem. I think the committee has done a very commendable job. We on the Committee on Ways and Means have a very similar problem on unemployment compensation and social security in trying to make these funds solvent. As I understand the bill that the committee has recommended, the committee essentially has tightened it up so that it will be in a little better shape.

I do want to make this comment, that in going over it I do not believe it has done violence to comparable unemployment compensation programs, various Federal and State compensation programs. There is one thing I am concerned about. Some remarks were made by those who are supporting the substitute indicating their feelings that the railroads are going to go on forever. I think the economic situation is serious. We have seen the interurbans go out of existence completely. We are now seeing the surface transits in the cities going out, and it is entirely possible because of the competitive situation that we might be looking for jobs for our 700,000 railroad employees, and any burden that is added onto the railroads is going to be passed on to the users of the railroads and that will put them in a more adverse competitive situation.

So I do believe that the committee, in my judgment at any rate, has done a very well-balanced job. I think we do have to consider the jobs of the 700,000 men, which jobs are dependent upon the health of our railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AVERY].

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Chairman, I just want to remind the committee in view of the remarks of my friend from West Virginia that H.R. 5610 takes something away from the railroad employees, that we increase the railroad retirement benefits by $147 million. To me that does not mean that we are taking something away. That is a plus item. Then, on unemployment compensation, we increase that by up to 20 percent, adding annually $25.5 million for the benefit of the unemployed persons in the railroad industry.

It has been said repeatedly that we are taking away sickness benefits. We are not taking away any sickness benefits as such. In fact, we are increasing them under this bill to the extent of $3½ million a year. If that is taking anything away from anybody, I wish someone would explain it to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, reference has been made to the report of the Republican policy committee. As chairman of that committee, I am very pleased to respond and say that the committee did put out advice to the Republican members that the committee was in support of H.R. 5610 as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We took action in support of the legislative committee and so advised our members.

Inquiry has been made as to whether this action by the Republican policy committee makes the issue presently before us a political issue. I would point out to the gentleman that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is under the control of the Democrats. They have 21 members of the committee. The Republicans have 12 members of the committee. If action by the Republican policy committee expressing support of the action of a Democrat-controlled committee makes the issue a matter of partisan politics, the gentleman is welcome to make the most of it. I would think, however, that the Democrats would welcome action by the Republican policy committee and the membership on our side in support of the legislative committees which you control.

I will point out further that we on the Republican side never at any time either in conference or otherwise attempt to bind our members. We do not, however, resist the opportunity to advise our members as to what the general feelings of the members of our policy committee are on any particular issue.

Mr. Chairman, I am no expert on this subject; in fact, there is no subject that comes before us on which I would consider qualifying as an expert. But I do not think one has to be an expert to be concerned about some of the basic issues involved in this legislation that is before us today.

If we were dealing with a healthy, thriving industry I would not be so concerned about the provisions of this substitute and the extents to which we might go in adding additional costs. I do not say I would not be concerned at all because I will always be concerned that we do not take a healthy thriving industry and put it into bankruptcy and sickness and death. But let us get one thing clear in this picture: We are dealing here with an industry that is not a healthy industry. We acknowledged that fact last year when we took action and enacted, on the basis of the economic condition of that industry, a transportation act. Is there anyone here that will contend that by that action last year we cured all the ills of the railroad industry, and that from here on it is going to be a thriving industry and you can do with it what you will? I do not think there is a member here that would make that contention.

Certainly, if I understood the chairman of this committee, who certainly is in a position to know more about it than any other single member of the committee, he did not give us the hope that we did not have to worry any more about the competitive position and the ability of this industry to serve us and to serve the people. That is fact No. 1. We are dealing with an industry that is in a difficult situation.

No. 2: Let us remember that this is a basic industry in this country. Your railroads fold up and your economy folds up, make no mistake about that. So one thing I would caution you no matter what we do or how we vote, let us be careful, let us recognize the problem that may be involved in the consequences of our act.

Also, Mr. Chairman, we have heard talk that corporate profits are involved in this controversy. To me, Mr. Chairman, the issue here is the issue of jobs. Is it a proper approach just to be concerned about what you are going to do with a man when he is out of a job? Should you not be concerned with what you can do to assure that jobs will be available.

I listened to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD] speaking about the Northwestern Railroad, that they did not have Pullman cars, that they were closing up shops and stations and taking off trains. Why? Because of economic difficulty. The elimination of cars, of shops, of stations, and trains eliminates jobs and produces unemployment.

I suggest that we had better make sure that in our desire to take care of the unemployed we do not so act that we encourage greater unemployment.

That, as I see it, is the issue raised by this substitute. The bill as reported by the committee will put an additional cost of over $100 million on the railroads. The substitute will increase this to around $150 million. I am most fearful that this additional $50 million could very well produce additional unemployment. I am sure this is not what is desired by the average railroad worker. I shall therefore support the committee bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think just about all the issues involved here have been very thoroughly discussed and explained. Everyone must know by this time what he or she is going to do in connection with this bill. I have already advised the Committee of the action of our committee, and how it worked its way and its will in bringing in the bill which the committee presented and which, at the direction of the committee, I introduced. We have it here today. Now we are told by the author of the substitute bill, our esteemed friend, the gentleman from West Virginia, a member of the committee, who offered this substitute, that there is a Senate bill which has passed the other body and which has been reported here. I do not know whether there is any difference or not between the bills. I do know that this substitute is not H.R. 1012. Everybody has been urged to support H.R. 1012.

You do not have H.R. 1012. You have the original bill with certain amendments, some of which are incorporated in H.R. 5610. And I believe there is a veterans' amendment in the Senate bill. It would seem to me, since we do not know what is contained in the bill which just has been presented to us, that the better thing to do would be to vote down this substitute and let the committee and the House work its will on the bill that is here before us, which we could then take to conference. In that way we can analyze what has been done and see whether or not it is in the best interest of the employees and the employers and the general public. As far as I am concerned, I am not willing to swallow whole, without the necessary explanation and itemization of a highly complicated and technical proposal such as we have here.

So are you going to do it? As for me, I want to see what I am doing? Therefore, I say to you that I believe the better wisdom here this afternoon is to let the House work its will on the bill that is before us. Our committee knows this subject. We have studied it. We have held hearings. We have heard testimony on the whole subject not one time, but many times. The better thing to do as I see it, and the better way to legislate and to shoulder our responsibility, is to let the House work its will on the bill that we have here instead of swallowing what has been given to us without an opportunity to know all of the facts and all of the problems connected with it, with apparently an effort to make it coincide with what has been done by the other body. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by a vote of practically two to one brings this bill, H.R. 5610, to you. Gentlemen, it is now your responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STAGGERS].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARRIS) there were—ayes 181, noes 91.

So the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. NATCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5610) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 248, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the railroad retirement bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to say that I am gratified that the Railroad Retirement Act, H.R. 1012, for which I voted, passed this body by a strong voice vote.

I am convinced that it would have been an injustice to the laboring men of the Nation's railroads to have enacted the alternative, H.R. 5610. While the latter embodied certain benefits for the people it was meant to help, it also threatened to erase certain gains which the same people already enjoy.

H.R. 1012 carried the benefits which H.R. 5610 contained without threatening other benefits as the latter did. For this reason, the Congress clearly took the stronger, better position in choosing H.R. 1012, and I reiterate my pleasure over its passage.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 226) to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Retirement Tax Act, and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, so as to provide increases in benefits, and for other purposes, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the provisions of H.R. 5610 as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"PART I—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937

"SECTION 1. (a) Section 2(a)3 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended to read as follows:

"'3. Individuals who will have attained the age of sixty and will have completed thirty years of service or, in the case of women, who will have attained the age of sixty-two and will have completed less than thirty years of service, but the annuity of such individual shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that he or she is under age sixty-five when the annuity begins to accrue.'

"(b) Section 2(d) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'If pursuant to the third sentence of this subsection an annuity was not paid to an individual with respect to one or more months in any calendar year, and it is subsequently established that the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year as determined in accordance with that sentence (but exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) did not exceed $1,200, the annuity with respect to such month or months, and any deduction imposed by reason of the failure to report earnings for such month or months under the fifth sentence of this subsection, shall then be payable. If the total amount of such individual's earnings during such year (exclusive of earnings for services described in the first sentence of this subsection) is in excess of $1,200, the number of months in such year with respect to which an annuity is not payable by reason of such third and fifth sentences shall not exceed one month for each $100 of such excess, treating the last $50 or more of such excess as $100; and if the amount of the annuity has changed during such year, any payments of annuity which become payable solely by reason of the limitation contained in this sentence shall be made first with respect to the month or months for which the annuity is larger.'

"(c) Section 2(e) of such Act is amended by striking out 'than an amount' and inserting in lieu thereof 'than 110 per centum of an amount'.

"(d) Section 2(g) of such Act is amended by inserting after 'wife under age 65' the following: '(other than a wife who is receiving such annuity by reason of an election under subsection (h))'.

"(e) Section 2 of such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(h) A spouse who would be entitled to an annuity under subsection (e) if she or he had attained the age of 65 may elect upon or after attaining the age of 62 to receive such annuity, but the annuity in any such case shall be reduced by one one-hundred-and-eightieth for each calendar month that the spouse is under age 65 when the annuity begins to accrue'.

"SEC. 2. (a) Section 3(a) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 is amended (1) by striking out '3.04', '2.28', and '1.52' and inserting in lieu thereof '3.35', '2.51', and '1.67', respectively; and (2) by striking out '$200' and inserting in lieu thereof '$250'.

"(b) Section 3(c) of such Act is amended by inserting after 'or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954,' the following: 'and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended,'.

"SEC. 4. All pensions under section 6 of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, all joint and survivor annuities and survivor annuities deriving from joint and survivor annuities under that Act awarded before the month next following the month of enactment of this Act all widows' and widowers' insurance annuities which began to accrue before the second calendar month next following the month of such enactment, and which, in accordance with the proviso in section 5(a) or section 5(b) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, are payable in the amount of the spouse's annuity to which the widow or widower was entitled, and all annuities under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1935, are increased by 10 per centum.

"SEC. 5. (a) The amendments made by section 1 (other than subsection (b) thereof), by subsections (a) and (c) of section 2, and by subsection (b) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities (not including annuities to which section 4 applies) accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendment made by subsection (b) of section 1 and by subsection (c) of section 3 shall be effective with respect to annuities accruing during the calendar year 1959 and subsequent calendar years. The amendment made by subsection (a) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(2) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. The amendments made by subsection (f) of section 3 shall be effective only with respect to annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act and lump-sum payments (under section 5(f)(1) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937) in the case of deaths occurring after the month of enactment of this Act. Section 4 shall be effective only with respect to pensions due in calendar months after the month next following the month of enactment of this Act and annuities accruing for months after the month of enactment of this Act.

"(b) All recertifications required by reason of the amendments made by this part shall be made by the Railroad Retirement Board without application therefor.

"PART II—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

"SEC. 201. (a) Section 3201 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 3201. Rate of Tax.

" 'In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of every employee a tax equal to—

" '(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

" '(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961,

as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"(b) Section 3202(a) of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended (1) by striking out 'after December 31, 1954' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'; (2) by striking out '$350' wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof '$400'; (3) by striking out 'after 1954' and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'.

"(c) Section 3211 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 3211. Rate of Tax.

" 'In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on the income of each employee representative a tax equal to—

" '(1) 13½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

" '(2) 14½ percent of so much of the compensation paid to such employee representative for services rendered by him after December 31, 1961,

as is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month: Provided, That the rate of tax imposed by this section shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to twice the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3101 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3101 as amended by Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"(d) (1) Section 3221 of the Railroad Retirement Tax Act is amended by striking out 'In addition to' and all that follows down through '$350' the first time it appears, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" '(a) In addition to other taxes, there is hereby imposed on every employer an excise tax, with respect to having individuals in his employ, equal to—

" '(1) 6¾ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959, and before January 1, 1962, and

" '(2) 7¼ percent of so much of the compensation paid by such employer for services rendered to him after December 31, 1961, as is, with respect to any employee for any calendar month, not in excess of $400'.

"(2) Such section 3221 is further amended (A) by striking out 'after December 31, 1954' and 'after 1954' wherever they appear in that section and inserting in lieu thereof 'after the month in which this provision was amended in 1959'; (B) by striking out '$350' wherever else it appears in that section and inserting in lieu thereof '$400'; and (C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

" '(b) The rate of tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be increased, with respect to compensation paid for services rendered after December 31, 1964, by a number of percentage points (including fractional points) equal at any given time to the number of percentage points (including fractional points) by which the rate of the tax imposed with respect to wages by section 3111 at such time exceeds the rate provided by paragraph (2) of such section 3111 as amended by the Social Security Amendments of 1956.'

"SEC. 202. The amendments made by section 201 shall, except as otherwise provided in such amendments, be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid after the month of such enactment, for services rendered after such month of enactment.

"PART III—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

"SEC. 301. (a) Section 1(i) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the proviso in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof ': Provided, however, That in computing the compensation paid to any employee, no part of any month's compensation in excess of $300 for any month before July 1, 1954, or in excess of $350 for any month after June 30, 1954, and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or in excess of $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended, shall be recognized'.

" '(b) The first proviso of section 1(k) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out "$400" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500".'

"SEC. 302. (a) Section 2(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the language between '(i)' and '(ii)' and inserting in lieu thereof the following: 'for each day of unemployment in excess of four during any registration period, and'.

"(b) Section 2(a) of such Act is further amended by striking out columns I and II and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Column I Total Compensation	Column II Daily Benefit Rate
$500 to $699.99	$4.50
700 to 999.99	5.00
1,000 to 1,299.99	5.50
1,300 to 1,599.99	6.00
1,600 to 1,899.99	6.50
1,900 to 2,199.99	7.00
2,200 to 2,499.99	7.50
2,500 to 2,799.99	8.00
2,800 to 3,099.99	8.50
3,100 to 3,499.99	9.00
3,500 to 3,999.99	9.50
4,000 and over	10.20'.

"(c) The proviso in such section 2(a) is amended by striking out '50' and '$8.50' and inserting in lieu thereof '60' and '$10.20', respectively.

"SEC. 303. (a) Section 2(c) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu of such period a colon and the following: 'And provided further, That, with respect to an employee who has ten or more years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, and who had current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment in a benefit year but has exhausted such rights, the benefit year in which such rights are exhausted shall be deemed not to be ended until the last day of the extended benefit period determined under the following schedule, and the maximum number of days of, and amount of payment for, unemployment within such benefit year for which benefits may be paid to the employee shall be enlarged to include all compensable days of unemployment within such extended benefit period:

"'If the employee's "years of service" total—	The extended benefit period shall begin on the first day of unemployment following the day on which the employee exhausted his then current rights to normal benefits for days of unemployment and shall continue for successive fourteen-day periods (each of which period shall constitute a registration period) until the number of such fourteen-day periods totals—
10 and less than 15	7 (but not more than 65 days)
15 and over	13

but no such extended benefit period shall extend beyond the beginning of the first registration period in a benefit year in which the employee is again qualified for benefits in accordance with section 3 of this Act on the basis of compensation earned after the first of such successive fourteen-day periods has begun. For an employee who has ten or more years of service, who did not voluntarily leave work without good cause or voluntarily retire, who has fourteen or more consecutive days of unemployment, and who is not a "qualified employee" for the general benefit year current when such unemployment commences but is or becomes a "qualified employee" for the next succeeding general benefit year, such succeeding benefit year shall, in his case, begin on the first day of the month in which such unemployment commences.'

"(b) An employee who has less than ten years of service as defined in section 1(f) of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, and who has after June 30, 1957, and before April 1, 1959, exhausted (within the meaning prescribed by the Railroad Retirement Board by regulation) his rights to unemployment benefits, shall be paid unemployment benefits for days of unemployment, not exceeding sixty-five, which occur in registration periods beginning on or after June 19, 1958, and before July 1, 1959, and which would not be days with respect to which he would be held entitled otherwise to receive unemployment benefits under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, except that an employee who has filed, and established, a first claim for benefits under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958 may not thereafter establish a claim under this subsection, and an employee who has registered for, and established a claim for benefits under this subsection may not thereafter establish a claim under the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958. Except to the extent inconsistent with this subsection, the provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act shall be applicable in the administration of this subsection.

"(c) The Secretary of Labor, upon request, shall furnish the Board information deemed necessary by the Board for the administration of the provisions of subsection (b) hereof, and the Board, upon request, shall furnish the Secretary of Labor information deemed necessary by the Secretary for the administration of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act of 1958.

"SEC. 304. Section 3 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out '$400' and inserting in lieu thereof '$500'.

"SEC. 305. Section 4(a–2) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out subdivision (iv), and by striking out the semicolon at the end of subdivision (iii) and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

"SEC. 306. Section 8(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it first appears the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and is not in excess of $400 for any calendar month paid by him to any employee for services rendered to him after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (2) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it appears for the second time the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and to not more than $400 for any month after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (3) by inserting after 'June 30, 1954' where it appears for the third time the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, or less than $400 if such month is after the month in which this Act was so amended'; (4) by striking out 'December 31, 1947' in paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof 'the month in which this Act was amended in 1959'; and (5) by striking out the table (except the column headings) in such paragraph 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

	Percent
"'$450,000,000 or more	1½
$400,000,000 or more but less than $450,000,000	2
$350,000,000 or more but less than $400,000,000	2½
$300,000,000 or more but less than $350,000,000	3
Less than $300,000,000	3¾'.

"SEC. 307. Section 8(b) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended (1) by striking out '3 per centum' and inserting in lieu thereof '3¾ per centum'; and (2) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ', and before the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was amended in 1959, and as is not in excess of $400 paid to him for services rendered as an employee representative in any calendar month after the month in which this Act was so amended'.

"SEC. 308. (a) Subsection (d) of section 10 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act be amended to read as follows:

"'(d) Whenever the Board finds at any time that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account will be insufficient to pay the benefits and refunds which it estimates are due, or will become due, under this Act, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account such moneys as the Board estimates would be necessary for the payment of such benefits and refunds, and the Secretary shall make such transfer. Whenever the Board finds that the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account, without regard to the amounts transferred pursuant to the next preceding sentence, is sufficient to pay such benefits and refunds, it shall request the Secretary of the Treasury to retransfer from the railroad unemployment insurance account to the credit of the Railroad Retirement Account such moneys as in its judgment are not needed for the payment of such benefits and refunds, plus interest at the rate of 3 per centum per annum, and the Secretary shall make such retransfer. In determining the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account as of September 30 of any year pursuant to section 8(a) of this Act, any moneys transferred from the Railroad Retirement Account to the credit of the railroad unemployment insurance account which have not been retransferred as of such date from the latter account to the credit of the former, plus the interest accrued thereon to that date, shall be disregarded.'

"(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

"SEC. 309. The amendments made by section 301(b) shall be effective with respect to days in registration periods beginning after June 30, 1959. The amendments made by sections 302, 303(a), and 305 shall be effective with respect to benefits accruing in general benefit years which begin after the benefit year ending June 30, 1958, and in extended benefit periods which begin after December 31, 1957. The amendment made by section 304 shall be effective with respect to base years after the base year ending December 31, 1957. The amendments made by clauses (4) and (5) of section 306 and clause (1) of section 307 shall be effective as of the first day of the calendar month next following the month in which this Act was enacted, and shall apply only with respect to compensation paid for services rendered in calendar months after the month in which this Act was enacted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill, H.R. 5610, were laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in three instances at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

MODERN ROADS AND HIGHWAYS—NEW FORMULA NEEDED

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, Congress has constantly recognized the fact that modernized highways are an indispensable part of our great national transportation system. Time and time again this House has enacted legislation to strengthen our highway programs throughout the Nation.

The basic legislation adopted which commits the Government to a huge, long-term highway building program will be of incalculable value to the several States and the Federal Government in setting up many modern roads that will more adequately serve growing needs for speedy highway transportation.

In recent years, there has been a tremendous increase in the number of motor vehicles traversing our highways and the number of people utilizing this mode of transportation for travel, recreational and business purposes.

The distinguished gentleman from Maryland, Mr. FALLON, one of the ablest Members of the House, and his able distinguished committee, has given painstaking attention to highway transportation problems and may well be proud of the results of their diligent, effective work.

Admittedly the problem of reaching a proper formula by which Federal funds are allocated is fraught with no little complexity and difficulty. It is very hard to write a formula that will precisely take into account all the factors incident to the construction of highways by the States and confer absolutely equitable benefits across the board. In a program of this magnitude there is bound to be some omissions and shortcomings.

I personally thought that the formula proposed in the Fallon bill would have been preferable to the one adopted. Certainly it would have given my State and region more equitable treatment. In fact, it would mean perhaps about $500 million additional in the 10 years following 1959. Since the cost of State highways will be increased by some 40 percent over the original estimates this figure might have gone over $700 million additional that New England would have received under the Fallon formula.

I do not want to burden the House with further statistics, but I do urge that the committee may continue to give attention to the revision of the formula under which Federal highway funds are granted. Since some $40 billion or more will be spent by the Government to complete our interstate highway system, it is very important in my opinion that, insofar as it can possibly be done, there should be equitable apportionments and allocations of available funds.

Toward this objective, it would be very helpful if a new formula could be worked out and adopted by the Congress that would take into account the serious problems of highly congested areas in connection with highway construction.

Any formula that does not put adequate emphasis upon this factor and carefully weigh the inevitable high and rising costs of construction in urban areas, land taking values and the like, is not operating so as to deal equitably and fairly with a large number of our populous States—States that pay huge tax revenues and are entitled to receive a much higher share from the Government.

For these reasons, I urge the committee to give consideration at an early date to the revision of the formula allocating highway funds, and I sincerely hope that, in the interests of justice, many States which are thickly populated and where highway construction is urgent, may be given consideration under the Federal program.

BETTER AIRPORTS AND FACILITIES

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, like many other Members of the House, I was gratified that the very able committee reported to the House for passage the bill providing needed help for airport development throughout the Nation.

American aviation has made tremendous strides in the past decade and is still moving forward at a very rapid rate. Much has been done to improve aviation facilities and air travel. Almost unbelievable improvement has been made in cutting down the time of flights between various points in the Nation and the world. Jet propulsion has brought truly revolutionary changes in air travel. It is now possible to have luncheon in Boston and dinner in Los Angeles and in the time to come flying time will be undoubtedly cut still further.

In the light of these tremendously noteworthy and vital technical developments and the rapid progress that has been made, it is extremely important that every measure possible be taken by the Congress to support new and better airports, landing facilities, safety devices, flying aids and other aids to air navigation, travel, and traffic. The Government has been very generous in making outlays for these purposes, but the progress being made and the very sizable needs that are developing make it a matter of great urgency that further support and assistance be rendered in the important work of building up and modernizing our airport network so that we may be sure it is the best in the world, entirely adequate for all our needs in this rapidly changing period of expansion.

From the beginning of my service in Congress, I have been deeply devoted to the great task of encouraging, supporting and developing civilian aviation and all its components. I have been not only interested, but actively engaged, in fostering by sound Government action navigation aids, safety devices and assistance, and the general cause of building the aviation industry in all its ramifications.

It affords me considerable satisfaction, therefore, to support the airport bill and to stand for generous, substantial Government outlays to insure the proper development of airport and related facilities. I believe that, in the name of progress as well as prosperity and national security, the Government must continue to render effective assistance in this vital area.

"PADRE OF THE AMERICAS"

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my deep appreciation to the very able and distinguished spiritual leader, Father Joseph F. Thorning, for the touching and most impressive prayer which he offered before the House on Pan American Day.

Father Thorning has had a most illustrious career and is an outstanding intellectual. He stands out in many fields. Above all, he shines brilliantly for his magnificant spiritual zeal, piety and good works. Humble and self-effacing, unalterably devoted to personal liberty, he continues day by day to make tremendous contributions, not only to his faith, but to the Nation and to the development of better human relations between all peoples whatever their race, color or creed.

Father Thorning has been especially noted for his interest in the Spanish-speaking peoples, and he has won the esteem, gratitude, and affection of the many who are genuinely concerned with his lofty objectives. Father Thorning has been well and appropriately named "The Padre of the Americas," and his ceaseless encouragement and effective promotion of the good-neighbor policy and friendly, realistic relations with our South American neighbors has been of inestimable benefit to our foreign policy as well as a great inspiration to all of us who are intent upon fostering cordial, constructive relations with our neighbors to the south.

In the press of great world questions which are testing our fortitude and resolution to preserve our blessed, American heritage, we must all recognize, as Father Thorning does, the invaluable contributions to freedom and democracy of our beloved neighbors of the Americas. Our esteem and love for them is great, because they are an integral, and vital part of our Western civilization, its ideals and aspirations.

We must ever nurture, warmly welcome and deeply appreciate their loyalty, devotion to ideals of freedom, community of spirit and wholehearted cooperation in the tasks that confront us in this generation of sustaining our security and freedom against the cynical forces of monolithic communism striving to conquer the free world.

Father Thorning's brilliant leadership in this cause aptly points the way by which, in the words of his prayer, "We may grow in Thy friendship and in our love for one another," and join hands to perpetuate the ideals of the good-neighbor policy, and bring even closer to our hearts the freedom-loving and God-fearing peoples of the Western Hemisphere and the Americas.

We may well be proud and grateful for Father Thorning's work in welding into an even closer union under the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man all those who are so intimately related to us in protecting the world against tyranny and preserving the priceless liberties of mankind.

DAIRY MARKETING ACT OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, never before has so much money been spent in the name of farm programs with so little benefit to farmers. During the first 6 fiscal years of this administration $30.3 billion has been spent by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. This compares with $5.9 billion spent during the 6 years before Secretary Benson took over.

In other words, Secretary Benson has spent $5 for every $1 spent by his predecessors during the same amount of time.

And what have we to show for this snowballing expenditure? Nearly 19,000 employees have been added to the Department of Agriculture payroll to handle a farm program that looks like nothing so much as grandma's patchwork quilt. And under this program—if it can be called a program—net farm income has fallen from $15.3 billion in 1952 to $13.2 billion in 1958.

One of the lowest men on the farm income totem pole is the dairy farmer. Since 1952 the price received by farmers for butterfat in cream has dropped from 75 cents a pound to 58 cents a pound. During the same period the price farmers got for milk for manufacturing purposes other than butter slid from $3.87 per hundredweight to only $3.12 per hundredweight for milk averaging 3.75 butterfat.

Mr. Speaker, in a time when prices farmers received for milk and butter have dropped by almost one-fourth, the prices farmers have to pay for production goods and services and family living items have gone up 6 percent. This has resulted in a devastating cost-price squeeze which has forced many hundreds of thousands of dairy farmers out of business.

Yesterday, my Wisconsin colleague, Congressman ROBERT KASTENMEIER, and I introduced in the House—and Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY of my neighboring State of Minnesota introduced in the Senate—the proposed Dairy Marketing Act of 1959 (H.R. 6750). Instead of picking at the problem piecemeal, this bill provides for a comprehensive, long-range income stabilization and improvement program for dairy producers.

This program would enable dairy farmers to assume responsibility for maintaining a sound and productive dairy industry which would, in turn, assure the consumers of the country an abundant supply of wholesome, nourishing dairy products. A self-regulating and largely self-financing program, it is designed to protect the public interest and at the same time avoid the present unfair situation under which dairy farmers are penalized for their efficiency and productivity.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a program of planned scarcity, it is a program of regulated abundance set up to benefit both consumers and producers. Regulated abundance would assure consumers an ample supply of dairy products at the fairest possible price. Consumers must remember that the alternative to regulated abundance is planned scarcity.

Regulated abundance is also the farmer's first choice. I know my farmers, and I know they do not care to guarantee their dairy prices and income by planned starvation of their city friends and neighbors. Farmers just want to make a decent living, and they do not intend to do it at the expense of somebody else.

The existing dairy support program, which provides supports at little more than $3 per hundredweight, cost the Government $404 million in 1956, $230 million in 1957, and $245 million in 1958. My bill would support dairy producers' returns at $4 per hundredweight. Even under adverse economic conditions, this program would cut the cost to the Government by better than half.

My dairy marketing bill is designed to provide for mandatory price supports through the marketing year ending in 1964 for milk used in manufacturing dairy products and for butterfat. This bill also aims at maintaining the productive capacity of our dairy farming industry, promoting the orderly marketing of an adequate national supply of milk and dairy products and encouraging the increased domestic consumption of dairy products in the interest of national health and security.

Mr. Speaker, here is a summary of the six major provisions of the bill:

First. It would establish the support level of 90 percent of parity for butterfat and manufacturing milk at less cost to the Government than the existing 75 percent of parity program;

Second. It would set up a system of marketing quotas geared to the degree to which the market price without a program would be below the support level under conditions of full employment;

Third. It would provide price-support deficiency payments directly to producers to make up for the extent to which market prices were allowed to drop below the support level, and it would set quotas to allow full-employment market supply to flow into the market even if the price was depressed by unemployment above the level of 3 percent of the labor force;

Fourth. It would require Government purchases to keep the market price of the different milk products in reasonable balance with each other;

Fifth. It would set up a system of marketing quota compliance deposits of between 25 and 50 cents per hundredweight. These deposits would be collected on all sales of milk but would be returned in full at the end of the year to producers who complied with their quotas; and,

Sixth. It would give milk producers a chance to vote on whether or not they want this program to go into effect.

Mr. Speaker, I have given the complex problem of dairy prices a considerable amount of study over a period of many years. Since I have been in Congress, I have worked in every way I could to preserve for dairy farmers the programs they have and to discover and support workable ways of bettering those programs for the benefit of dairymen, consumers, and the taxpayers of America.

The bill I am introducing today is the result of a long series of consultations with Senator HUMPHREY and with top experts in the fields of dairying and economics. Its provisions have been checked and rechecked to make sure they are practical, workable, and would not shortchange anyone along the line. I am sure that my colleagues, realizing the seriousness of the plight of the dairyman, will give my dairy marketing bill their serious consideration.

Opponents of this type of legislation have been saying that the dairy farmer does not want marketing quotas. I do not know from which crystal ball they got their information. The dairy farmers of this country have never had the chance to say "yes," "no," or "maybe" to a quota system.

I would be the last one in the world to foist off on dairymen a program they do not want. But I say let the dairy farmers decide. Under the provisions of this bill, dairymen would make the final decision, for the program could not go into effect until approved by a majority vote of all milk producers.

LAW DAY U.S.A.—PROTECTING THE RIGHTS OF THE INDIVIDUAL CITIZEN

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Speaker, May 1, 1959, has been proclaimed as Law Day in the United States. This is a fitting recognition of the role of law as the binding force of our civilization. In the proclamation the President called upon the American people to observe this day not only with appropriate ceremonies, but also by reaffirmation of their dedication to our form of Government and to the supremacy of law in their lives. A free people can assure the blessings of liberty for themselves only if they recognize that the rule of law shall be supreme and that all men shall be equal before the law. This Nation was conceived by our forefathers as a Nation of free men enjoying ordered liberty under law. The supremacy of law is essential to the existence of the Nation. Appreciation of the importance of law in the daily lives of our citizens is a source of national strength which contributes to public understanding of the necessity for the rule of law and the protection of the rights of the individual citizen. By directing the attenion of the world to the liberty under law which we enjoy and to the accomplishments of our system of free enterprise we would emphasize the contrast between our freedom and the tyranny which enslaves the people of one-third of the world today. In paying tribute to the rule of law between men, we will contribute to the elevation of the rule of law and its application to the solution of controversies between nations.

It is particularly appropriate that May the first be chosen for this Nation's rededication to its ideals of freedom and justice secured by law. That is the day the Communists celebrate their victories and boastfully parade the armed might by which they intend to enslave the world. For years Communists have held the spotlight on this day, with impressive parades displaying the force they have marshalled to crush the rights of men and nations. On every May day the air waves are filled with impassioned harangues prophesying the eventual downfall of what the Communists scornfully term decadent nations who cherish and protect the values of individual personality. Year after year they have served notice of what is in store for mankind if their system of government should prevail.

Law Day U.S.A. affords a fitting occasion to emphasize to all the world the fundamental difference between that system and ours—between the monolithic state in which the individual counts for nothing and has no rights whatever against the government, and a democracy in which individuals are endowed with certain unalienable rights, of which government itself may not deprive them. It is an opportunity to contrast the totalitarian doctrine that the individual is the mere pawn of the state, with our system whose prime objective is to preserve the rights of individuals and to afford each the chance to develop to the fullest the physical, mental, and spiritual attributes with which his Creator endowed him. It is an appropriate time to underscore the difference between the doctrine that might makes right and the concept that all men are equally subject to the law and that no man, however powerful, is above the law.

In paying tribute on that day to the supremacy of law and the concept of individual freedom under law, we will demonstrate that these ideals are as precious to us today as they were 170 years ago. By reaffirming our determination to preserve them, we will give renewed assurance that ours is the way of hope and not of fear; that our strength will be used only to preserve freedom, not to overthrow it. We will inspire those who have never known what it means to live under a government of law to seek the same rights for themselves. We will encourage them to join with us in a common effort to make law in the field of international relations an instrument for achieving an enduring peace.

But to attain these larger ends we must mark this day by something more than a reaffirmation of faith in lofty ideals, something more than a contrast between one philosophy of government and another. We must show as clearly as we can what our ideals mean as applied in the daily lives of ordinary men. We must make clear how our law protects every man, great or small, and guarantees that no man—not even one who despises our Constitution—may be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Only thus can we convince others that the rule of law in a democracy is in truth the affirmation of the God-given dignity of human personality, the recognition that government is the servant and not the master of the people, that the state exists for man, not man for the state.

We must also convince strangers to our way of life that ordered liberty under law is the handmaiden and not the foe of progress. We must make all men realize what it means for human beings—the ordinary folk by whose labors progress is achieved, to be released from the fear of the police-state methods—the spy, the informer, the knock of the secret police on the door, the mysterious disappearance in the middle of the night, the pretended trial, or the firing squad.

It is no accident that in little more than a century the United States was transformed from a small Nation of 13 impoverished colonies to that of the strongest Nation in the world. We know, and we should try to make other men understand, that the secret of this rapid progress lies in the simple fact that the energy and the imagination of our people have not been cramped by the fears and sense of insecurity which are ever present in the police state. If all people could be brought to an understanding of the great release of energies that follows the lifting of that pall of fear the day would soon dawn when the supremacy of law would be recognized throughout the world.

But it is not merely those who have never known what it is to live under a rule of law to whom the message of Law Day U.S.A. should be addressed. Our own people need to be reminded of the meaning of, and the reasons for, the supremacy of law as confirmed by the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. History has proved that there are some lessons that have to be taught over and over again to each generation. The corrupting influence of unrestrained power, even in the hands of good people, the truth that justice is indivisible, that it cannot long be enjoyed by the best and most law-abiding of our citizens if it is denied to the meanest offender, are chief among the lessons that each generation must learn anew.

It is the procedural safeguards imposed by law rather than its substantive guarantees that stand in greatest need of exposition and defense to our own citizenry. Americans are a freedom-loving, law-abiding people. They have inherited an innate sense of justice. They instinctively resent injustice when they are made aware that it is being perpetrated. There is little need to elaborate to them the importance of the guarantees of freedom of speech, and of the press, freedom of religion, and security from arbitrary deprivation of life, liberty or property. But to those who have never been arrested or tried on a criminal indictment, the wisdom of the great procedural guarantees of the constitution are not always so clearly apparent.

Many of the people who came to this continent in colonial times, like many of those who have come in our own day, were refugees from political and religious persecution in the Old World. They knew all too well the methods used by bigots and tyrants to crush the bodies and spirits of those who asked only the liberty to think and to worship as they pleased. They knew from bitter experience the dangers of arbitrary arrest, of unlawful searches and seizures, of confessions extorted by torture, of mock trials before judges who were but lackeys of the ruling power. They knew, too, the terrible cost, in blood and toil, of winning the right to live their lives under a rule of law. To them the guarantees of the right to a trial by a jury of one's peers, the right to confront one's accusers, to be represented by counsel, to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in one's favor, the privilege against self-incrimination, security against unreasonable searches and seizures, the assurance that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, and that no one shall be held to answer for an infamous crime except upon presentation by a grand jury, were much more than expressions of abstract theory. These were the most practicable safeguards experience had devised to prevent repetition of specific abuses our forefathers had suffered.

Foremost among the grievances set out in the Declaration of Independence were the acts of the King in depriving the colonists of trial by jury in many cases, and in making judges subservient to his will by controlling their tenure and emoluments.

Thus it is not surprising that the men who drafted the Constitution and the Bill of Rights sought to assure, as far as words in a written compact can, that there would be no repetition of these evil practices under the new government. Not one, but three different sections of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights confirm the right of trial by jury. Article III, section 2, of the original Constitution stipulated with unmistakable clarity that "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." To make assurance doubly sure, this guarantee was repeated and elaborated in the sixth amendment. "In all criminal prosecutions," it reads, "the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed." By the seventh amendment the right of trial by jury was preserved in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20.

Although many of our most cherished rights were first vindicated by courageous juries who defied the commands of judges, our forefathers knew that the supremacy of law could never be made a complete reality unless the courts that administered it were upright and independent. To assure this independence in the Federal judiciary, they provided in article III, section 1 of the Constitution, that Federal judges shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

These and all the other guarantees of the Constitution were the result of mature consideration by men who loved liberty and feared power, who knew that no matter how strong the constitutional affirmation of substantive rights, they would avail little unless suitable institutions were provided and clothed with ample power to see that these mandates were respected.

One hundred and seventy years of testing have vindicated the wisdom of these provisions. Nevertheless, both of these venerated institutions—trial by jury and the independent Federal judiciary—have come under attack from many quarters in the last few years. The most vocal criticism has come from persons who seem to have little accurate knowledge about the functioning of either. Almost without exception their detractors have forgotten their history and apparently have no comprehension of the dangers which would attend any alternative methods of bringing the power of the State to bear on individuals.

Reliance upon trial by jury for protection against oppressive or over-zealous prosecutors is so rooted in the traditions of our people that there is little danger that it could be overthrown by direct assault. From time immemorial, the plain people have regarded it as the bulwark of their liberties.

Out of centuries of trial and error the jury system was developed as the best possible instrument for harnessing the intuitive good sense and spirit of fair play of the ordinary men and women in the administration of justice. It is an ideal arrangement for keeping the development of the law in harmony with ideals and aspirations of the people whom law is intended to serve. Long experience confirms the conviction that there can be no greater assurance of justice than the judgment of 12 honest members of the community. To be sure, juries are not infallible, but 12 men are less likely to err in weighing evidence than one. Furthermore, when juries err, it is more likely to be on the side of mercy than of vengeance.

One of the most serious consequences of ill-advised attacks on juries and the disparagement of their role in the administration of justice is to make it seem unimportant in the eyes of those who are called upon to render this service to the community. If they are led to believe that it is of little consequence, they will be more inclined to seek excuses for evading this duty. This unfortunate trend can be observed in many parts of the United States today, especially in larger communities. There is no more important and honorable service a civilian can perform for his fellow men than by participating as a juror in the administration of justice. And there is no better school for citizen education than the jury. There men learn by applying it just what the law means in actual operation as it affects the lives and property of their neighbors. Any belittling of this service, which discourages men from undertaking it, is a grave disservice to that supremacy of law to which we are dedicated.

In recent years our courts, especially the Supreme Court of the United States, have also become the object of increasingly bitter attacks as a result of their faithful adherence both to the letter and to the spirit of the Bill of Rights. If James Madison or Thomas Jefferson could return to earth today, he would be amazed almost beyond belief to discover that the decisions which have evoked the sharpest criticism have been those which gave substance to the right of individuals to a fair trial. I cite in particular two cases which have occasioned criticism as widespread as it has been unjust: Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657, and Mallory v. United States, 354 U.S. 449, both decided less than 2 years ago.

The decision in the Jencks case has been so widely misinterpreted that it behooves us to look closely at its facts and to analyze the point actually decided by the Supreme Court.

There, as you will remember, Jencks, as president of a local union of the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, had filed a non-Communist affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board, pursuant to the Taft-Hartley Act. He was indicted on charges that he had sworn falsely in that affidavit that he was not a member of, or affiliated with, the Communist Party. The principal witnesses against him were one J. W. Ford and Harvey Matusow. Both Ford and Matusow were Communist Party members paid by the FBI to report on Communist Party activities in which they participated. They made such reports about activities in which Jencks allegedly took part, and testified at the trial about those activities.

Ford was a member of the Communist Party of New Mexico from 1946 to September 1950, and from 1948 was a member of the State board and a party security officer. He testified that Jencks was also a party and State board member. He related in detail the occurrences at five closed party meetings which he said Jencks attended in 1948 and 1949.

Matusow swore that in July or August 1950 he spent a 10-day vacation on a ranch in New Mexico with Jencks and others. He testified to a number of conversations with Jencks there. In one of these conversations, according to Matusow's testimony, Jencks told him of a program he was developing with leaders of the Mexican Miners Union to negotiate simultaneous expiration dates of collective bargaining agreements to further a joint action of Mexican and American workers to cut off production and slow down the Korean war effort. Matusow also testified that when he told Jencks he had joined the Mexican-American Association, Jencks told him that was proper Communist work because the association was a key organization, controlled by the party, for Communist activities in New Mexico, and that he, Jencks, was active in the association in the Silver City area.

Both Ford and Matusow testified that they had submitted oral and written reports to the FBI concerning the meetings Jencks was said to have attended, and to conversations had with him. After their testimony, Jencks moved for an order directing an inspection of the reports these witnesses had made to the FBI concerning the matters about which they had testified. The Government opposed these motions on the ground that a preliminary foundation had not been laid showing inconsistency between the contents of the reports and the testimony of Ford and Matusow. The trial court denied the motions. Jencks was convicted and his conviction was affirmed by the court of appeals.

The Supreme Court reversed this decision, thus halting a dangerous and indefensible curtailment of individual rights. It held that Jencks was entitled to inspect these reports to determine whether to use them in his own defense. The Court further held that when the Government thinks that disclosure of such reports would be contrary to the public interest it must dismiss the prosecution; that in criminal cases the Government can invoke its evidentiary privileges only at the price of letting the defendant go free.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that this decision does not give any general right to demand access to documents in the possession of the Government. It applies only to very limited classes of documents—reports made by persons whom the Government calls as witnesses to testify against the accused. If the Government does not call such persons as witnesses, this case does not apply.

Even if these two witnesses had been men of unimpeachable integrity, this decision would have been necessary to assure a fair trial to the accused. Inaccuracy of observation and the treachery of the human memory makes for a serious danger of error in the testimony of the most honest witness. To combat this possibility the accused must be afforded the fullest opportunity to impeach this testimony by every available means. No method of impeachment is more persuasive than a comparison of statements or reports made at the time of an alleged occurrence, and those made at a trial months or years later. That the reports Jencks sought to examine were potentially of great value to his defense could not have been denied.

The fact that one of the witnesses on whose testimony Jencks was convicted was the notorious Harvey Matusow greatly aggravated the unfairness of withholding the requested reports. Matusow was the informer who recanted much of the testimony he had given in several prosecutions of alleged Communists. Indeed, he recanted as deliberately false the testimony he had given at Jencks' trial. On the basis of this recantation, Jencks had moved for a new trial while his appeal was pending but the district court had denied the motion.

This Matusow episode is one of the sorriest chapters in the history of law enforcement by the Federal Government. Nothing could demonstrate more clearly the necessity of a courageous and independent judiciary to temper the zeal of prosecuting officers. I do not know whether Jencks was innocent or guilty of the charges made against him. But who of us could feel secure if on the basis of senseless fabrications by such an unstable character, we could be indicted and tried without the fullest opportunity to probe, and to reveal, the consistency or inconsistency of everything such a witness had said or done which had any bearing on his charges. I am confident that on sober second thought, our people will overwhelmingly approve of, and be grateful for, the decision of the Supreme Court in this case. I am equally confident that when they do fully grasp its import they will demand the repeal of the statute which Congress enacted in ill-advised haste, to restrict the application of the principles which it announced.

The Mallory decision has also been much misunderstood. Mallory was a 19-year-old lad of limited intelligence who had been convicted of rape in the District of Columbia and sentenced to death. The decisive evidence offered against him at the trial was his own confession. He had been arrested early in the afternoon. Despite the fact that there were numerous committing officers in the vicinity, he was not taken before any of them until the next morning. While detained at police headquarters, he was questioned intensively by police officers and given a lie-detector test. About 9:30 in the evening he confessed. During all the previous interrogating he was not advised of his right to a preliminary hearing nor of his right to have counsel. Neither was he informed that he had a right to refuse to answer questions or to take a lie-detector test. He was not warned that any statement which he made might be used against him. The Supreme Court set aside this conviction, holding that it violates the rule which requires arresting officers to take a person who has been arrested before the nearest available committing officer without unnecessary delay.

It should not be overlooked that this Mallory decision was handed down by a unanimous Court. From a tribunal which is sharply divided on so many issues, this high degree of agreement is itself a strong testimonial to the validity of the conclusions reached. But, in truth, the decisions in both cases are so intrinsically sound that they need no such tokens to vouch their worth. Both simply accorded to persons on trial for their life or liberty elementary protection against overreaching prosecutors. They simply assured these accused of rights you or I would want for ourselves if we should have the misfortune to be charged with crime. Surely there can be no justice in permitting the Government to withhold from a defendant information in its possession which he must have to be able effectively to cross-examine the witnesses it calls against him. Certainly it smacks of the police state to allow arresting officers to keep a suspect in custody for hours without taking him before a committing magistrate, and to question him relentlessly without advising him of his right to remain silent, or warning him that what he says may be used against him.

It is one of the glories of our legal system that it rests on the concept that it is better to let 99 guilty men go free than to subject 1 innocent man to unjust punishment. Neither the Jencks nor the Mallory decision can be expected to let any significant number of guilty men go free. At worst they may in exceptional circumstances frustrate the successful prosecution of a guilty man. But in the ordinary case they will simply require police officers and prosecutors to be more resourceful and alert in gathering and presenting evidence. The long-run consequences of these decisions will be not only greater protection for innocent persons who are accused of crime but also for the community itself. It must never be forgotten that when, by allowing police officers and prosecutors to take the easy way, an innocent man is convicted, the guilty person, the one who actually committed the offense, remains at large to continue his depredations against society. The self-interest of the community as well as the demands of justice are best served when the courts insist upon the most rigorous adherence to the requirement of fair and impartial trials. The very fact that cases like these should arise and be carried to the Supreme Court reminds us that oppression is not a foe that can be forever vanquished and laid to rest. It is a warning that we must not be lulled into complacency by any easy assumption that "it can't happen here"; that we, or some of us, are favorites of a gracious providence which will protect us from our own folly in spite of our indifference to the fate of those who are the first victims of encroaching tyranny. Wise men have warned us again and again that the greatest danger to liberty is not that it shall be wrested from us in a frontal assault by an avowed foe, but rather that it will be nibbled away by almost imperceptible degrees. The first inroads are usually made by good men who sincerely believe that they can more efficiently promote other lesser objectives they deem desirable if they are allowed to commit a few small trespasses on personal liberty. But if history teaches anything it is that powers thus acquired by well-meaning men will sooner or later fall into the hands of evildoers. These men will use these powers, not for the good of the people but to enlarge and extend their own authority, until they are so firmly entrenched that they can be dislodged only by another long and costly struggle.

The only defense against such encroachments is the unsleeping vigilance of a liberty-loving people. The men who founded our Government knew that there is no final victory in the war against oppression; that it is a struggle which must be waged anew by each generation. But by the clear and unambiguous mandates of the Bill of Rights, they prepared for us entrenched positions from which to repel assaults on our liberties. It is a far easier task for us to hold ground already won than it was for our forefathers to gain it. Far easier also than it would be to regain it if we allowed it to be captured by foes of freedom and justice. We who are the beneficiaries of this heritage of the supremacy of law are trustees of a sacred trust. We have a solemn obligation to preserve intact the legacy of freedom which our fathers bequeathed to us and to pass it on undiminished to our children.

This obligation rests with special force upon those of us who have the honor and privilege to sit as Members of the House of Representatives. The Bill of Rights, unlike the Contitution itself, was not formulated by the Constitutional Convention. It was initiated by the House of Representatives under the leadership of James Madison, then a Representative from Virginia. To be sure, this House did not originate the concepts embodied in the first 10 amendments. They were the outgrowth of the whole experience of our people. But whenever we are tempted to express impatience with the application of these principles in particular cases, let us recall that it was through the medium of amendments proposed in this House that the great guarantees which, in sum, assure the supremacy of law in this country were incorporated in our great charter.

To those of us in whom the people of the United States have confided the authority to make all laws necessary and proper to give effect to our Constitution, Law Day-U.S.A. is a reminder of our affirmative duty to play an active part in preserving the ideal of liberty under law. It is a reminder of the oath each of us took to support the Constitution of the United States, not one part or most parts, but every article and section of that venerable document. This means that each of us has an inescapable, personal responsibility to make sure that every bill we sponsor, every measure we vote for, is consistent not only with the letter but also with the spirit of the Bill of Rights. It means that our every utterance, on the floor of this House or elsewhere, should be in harmony with that spirit. We must be vigilant that no word of ours, anywhere or at any time, shall give aid and comfort to those who scoff at the rights and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

This responsibility to uphold the rule of law cannot be shifted or evaded. It will not do to say that if we pass a law which will deprive any person of his rights the courts will declare it unconstitutional. No doubt they will, but much mischief may ensue before the courts have an opportunity to set the matter to rights. Moreover, it is unfair to the courts to expect them to bear the whole burden of maintaining the supremacy of law. Especially is this true in times of tension, when popular feeling runs high and emotions blur the peoples' understanding of decisions which protect their rights. In times such as these we should be in the front ranks, sharing with the courts the task of repealing onslaughts against our rights and liberties. We should not only be the most vigorous defenders of decisions, however unpopular, which give reality to the ideal of equal justice under law. We should also be diligent to adopt any legislation which may be needful in promoting the same great ends the courts seek to serve by their decisions.

Only thus can we keep faith with ourselves and our posterity. Only thus can we fulfill the glorious mission we accepted when we became Members of the House of Representatives.

HON. JAMES G. POLK

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, it was with much sorrow that I learned of the death of our friend and colleague, James G. Polk.

Jim was a modest man and a friendly one. He had a rare courage and high principles and was both loyal and conscientious. His kindness, his courtesy, and devotion to duty made him loved and respected by Members on both sides of the aisle. He will long be remembered for these qualities which many strive for but few possess.

I have considered him a very dear friend ever since I first became acquainted with him back in 1949 when I first came to Congress.

I join with his many friends in paying tribute to Jim Polk, and extend to his widow and family my deepest sympathy.

CORN TASSEL AS OUR NATIONAL FLOWER

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I would like to include a poetry composition of Mrs. Harry N. Rosinos, 215 Lincoln Street, Edwardsville, Ill., in my congressional district.

Mrs. Rosinos was inspired by her interest in the movement to adopt the corn tassel as the official flower of the United States, and in the following poem entitled "Golden Fingers" she expresses "a sincere appreciation for the beauty of the corn and its additional virtue of providing food for man":

GOLDEN FINGERS

Golden fingers tipped with silver,
Hand uplifted to an azure sky,
Raising its emerald tower
Is the Prairie corn,
Borne from the earth's soft bed of brown.
"Maize" by the copper-tinted
Aborigines called,
Under the sun's torrid rays
It thrives,
And from the rain's glistening fountain
Does it drink.
In farflung fields across
The Prairie State
It grows, blossoms, and
In russet, golden ears
Gives forth its nutrient
Present to mankind.
No beauty here?
Ah! Mark the slender spearlike
Green of its scion's venturous blade.
Mark the straightness of its stalk
As it reaches to the sky.
Mark the blades to many Graceful, bending arches grown.
Then the golden-silver hand
Lets fall its speck of Fertilizing power,
'Til the moist, chartreuse silk
Receives its gladsome guest and
Sucks it to its hidden heart.
Sun, rain, humid heat perform their tasks
Until the autumn renders up the golden grain
To give to man its bounteous treasure
Of healthful, luscious sustenance,
Fit for any royal store.
That rose, violet, columbine,
Pansy, too,
All have their beauty
None can forsay.
A beauty to delight the eye alone.
Golden maize, the Indians' gift,
Has more than this to give
A native brave for its symbolic arms.
It has not only beauty for the eye,
But strength for body, too.
Take this great gift from
The Prairie State
And let it be the floral emblem of our land
To echo to the peoples everywhere
The beauty and strength
Which is America!

AMENDING FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and request a conference with the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. HARRIS, WILLIAMS, MACK of Illinois, ROBERTS, BENNETT of Michigan, SPRINGER, and BUSH.

FIDEL CASTRO'S THIRD ORDEAL

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, Fidel Castro has successfully undergone two ordeals. Now he faces a third. He led his scant forces to victory over Batista and his hoodlums. That was his first ordeal. Then, as his second ordeal, he came to the United States, faced the best interrogators in the land and convinced them of his good faith, and his determination on the side of democracy.

His third ordeal requires the same high degree of bravery, intelligence and patience. This is the ordeal of high public office. Like a character out of John Bunyan, Fidel Castro strides from one fearsome test to another. He has won control of Cuba. He has convinced fair-minded persons that his motives are good.

Now the question is, can he govern? Can Fidel Castro guide Cuba through a period of transition to free elections?

The task facing him is formidable.

TREMENDOUS PROBLEMS TO OVERCOME

Consider the tremendous problems:

New, predominantly untrained and inexperienced government leaders and employees; a huge debt resulting from Batista's follies and embezzlements; the strong wish for social and economic changes, particularly toward better educational and economic conditions for the people; and, in the middle, with money and know-how, to take advantage of the disorganization and ferment, the Communists and their dupes.

CUBANS DESIRE HONEST GOVERNMENT

There are positive factors, too:

The deep desire among Cubans for an honest and democratic government; the basic richness of Cuba's human and physical resources; the almost universal distaste for Communists and their teachings; and, finally, a factor now more appreciated by Castro and his colleagues, the desire and the ability of the United States to help Cuba attain not just a stable government, but democratic, honest, and solvent government.

One evening when he was in Washington I talked with Fidel Castro for more than an hour at the Cuban Embassy. He had just returned from his walk in Meridian Park. Among those present were two of his cabinet ministers, Lopez Fresquet and Regino Boti, both very able men; also his Ambassadors to the United States, to the United Nations, and to the Organization of American States, and a former Ambassador of Cuba to the United States.

I asked if it was true that Marxism was being taught under the direction of Raul Castro at Camp Libertad. This is what the State Department had told me. Teaching Marxism in college is one thing. Indoctrinating simple soldiers with class hatred is quite another.

Fidel denied the charge. He was incredulous. "Would I allow the Communists to destroy the army I have built?" he asked.

He went on to say that we in the United States would do better to attack communism at its social and economic roots. He pointed out that hysterical attacks and alarms by us only tended to strengthen it in Latin America.

ADMINISTRATORS AT WORK IN CUBA, CASTRO SAYS

"When does the speechmaking stop and the hard, detailed, and organized work of administering the country start?" I asked. He protested that he had good administrators in action right now and indicated his Minister of Finance, Lopez Fresquet, and others in the room. He admitted that he himself was disorganized but said that despite appearances he knew where everything was.

"It is like a room you live in," he said. "It may look mussed up, but you know where everything is." If he dies, he conceded, this does make a problem for his successor. He said he has to live in three or four houses because when people waited outside his house for a long time in order to have a word with him he could not pass them by.

I asked him why he criticized José Figueres, former President of Costa Rica and a democrat of great stature in this hemisphere. "Pepe thinks he is the dean of the revolutionaries," Castro said. "When he was in Havana he criticized my Government in a speech to the Cuban people. What would you think if I made a speech here criticizing your State Department?"

The Trujillo radio from the so-called Dominican Republic credits me April 22 with advising Castro not to give "imprudent replies." If so, I've done very well. He succeeded very well in reassuring 15 Senators at the Capitol in a closed meeting where, through the courtesy of Senator FULBRIGHT, I was present. The questions from the Senators were keen and to the point. The answers were the same. Not a harsh word was spoken.

HOW WOULD TRUJILLO FARE?

I wonder how well Rafael Trujillo, Dominican dictator, would have done under these circumstances? Or before the American Society of Newspaper Editors? Or before the outstanding reporters and columnists who make up the membership of the National Press Club? I really am not in doubt. He would fall flat on his face.

If Trujillo is willing, I'll be glad to try to make the arrangements, although I'll waive my rights to advise him. He will have to make his own "imprudent replies." Perhaps his son, Rafael, Jr., once a well-known raconteur, would help. Of course, for a price, he can always buy the devoted services of Washington lawyer Charles Patrick Clark, Trujillo's ex-employee, who still serves Franco, or Washington lawyer John Frank, another Trujillo ex-employee, or Washington public relations man John Kieffer, who may, however, be something of a Jonah, considering that Dictators Perez Jimenez and Batista, of Cuba, both were shot out from under him.

Castro received, on the whole, fair and friendly treatment from the press, as indicated by articles I shall append to these remarks.

He also received criticism, some good, some bad, which is normal and proper in any democracy. Time magazine and the Washington Post and the Washington Star used a picture of him shaking hands with the Soviet Ambassador at his reception for Washington officials. Menshekov was just behind me, my wife and my friend Sam Brown, of Tacoma. Defense Secretary McElroy was also in that line. Cuba still has no diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. Our Government, along with all responsible persons, does not believe Castro to be sympathetic with the Soviet Union but rather opposed to the Communist regime as a dictatorship.

A LACK OF OBJECTIVITY

The Washington papers did use other pictures during Castro's stay, but for Time magazine to use this as their only picture to illustrate their story of his visit in Washington demonstrates Time's lack of objectivity in this instance, to say it mildly.

Time magazine, on the whole, is a useful and positive force in our relations with Latin America. I shared and share many of their reservations and doubts with respect to Cuban affairs but not including any with respect to the good faith of Fidel Castro.

Also consider what Spruille Braden, former Assistant Secretary of State who served as U.S. Ambassador to Cuba, Colombia, and Argentina, said in the Oregonian, April 16:

> Castro and his rebel band are enemies of the United States and our democratic ideals. He is a pawn, wittingly or unwittingly, in the Kremlin's international intrigue, to bring Cuba under Communist domination.

Mr. Braden is out of touch. Fidel Castro is not an enemy of the United States. He is a friend. He is not opposed to our democratic ideals. He seeks to put them into operation and in doing so reminds many of us to cherish and, in some instances, to refurbish our own practicing of what we preach.

U.S. News & World Report, April 20, carried a piece entitled "Is Castro Linked to Communists?" They quote a "non-U.S., confidencial intelligence memorandum" stating, "There is nothing to indicate that Fidel Castro is, or has been, a Communist." Then they go ahead to make it appear he is surrounded by Communists. They use phrases which bring back McCarthyism.

For example, speaking of three highly placed Fidelistas, they say, "All three are outright Communists or ardent 'fellow travelers'." Whether a man is a Communist, especially an outright one, is a fact, but whether he is a fellow traveler, with or without quotation marks, and ardent or not, is largely a matter of opinion. The two phrases should not be linked.

In my opinion articles like this one can do a lot of harm. First, they confuse anti-Americanism with pro-Sovietism—that is, international communism—and, second, they build up the Communists in Cuba and elsewhere in Latin America by making them seem far stronger than they are, which can only help Communists there, and dismay and handicap anti-Communists both here and there.

The article in U.S. News & World Report May 4 was much better. The writers had in the meantime an opportunity to see Fidel Castro close up. Their conclusion was that it was "much more likely" that he was "incredibly naive" about communism rather than "under Communist discipline."

I would say rather he is "credibly naive" in terms of his background and the circumstances in Cuba at this time. There is some of the same confusion between the social justice Communists and the international conspiracy Communists in Cuba as exist to some extent in Venezuela and elsewhere in Latin America. Castro has to learn, as others have, that the latter invariably and inevitably overcomes the former.

HIS VISIT HERE WAS HELPFUL

Fidel Castro's visit contributed to better understanding on both sides. I think he now realizes much better than he did how much the U.S. Government and people here generally want to help him build a democratic and honest Cuba. And more North Americans realize better his good faith and determination.

Cuba needs the United States and the United States needs Cuba. More than that, we like each other and our peoples are natural friends.

I want to conclude by listing, with due respect and with no warranties as to infallability, several measures which I believe Fidel Castro should seriously consider adopting without delay. They are as follows:

SEVEN SUGGESTED STEPS TOWARD BETTER GOVERNMENT

First. Reduce speechmaking to no more than one oration a week. Sit down at his desk. Meet and work with his correspondence secretaries, including J. Ossorio, who handles letters from the United States. Get organized. Castro's own knowledge of military staff organization should be applied. In short, he should face up to this third ordeal and triumph gloriously as in the other ordeals.

Second. Bar Communists from holding executive or judicial offices in the Cuban Government or in labor unions. Of course I do not propose a witch hunt, but only that Castro recognize a Communist cannot be loyal to Cuba, and act accordingly.

Third. Castro should give his personal attention to the democratic organization of labor unions. See that Vincente Rubiera has a fair hearing with respect to his ousting as General Secretary of the Cuba Telephone workers. It is highly important that labor, both in and out of Cuba, work side by side with Castro in the economic and social changes which are in process.

Fourth. Stop the military trials of accused war criminals and turn these matters over to civil courts with instructions that prompt action be taken. Cases like Klawans and the editor of El Mundo need immediate attention.

Fifth. Call upon the U.S. Government for any necessary technical cooperation. Under our mutual security program we can and would gladly supply Cuba with experts in fields vital to the economy of Cuba.

Sixth. Ask that the American military missions be returned to Cuba. Castro has a new military force to train. Cuba is now clearly on the side of the free world against the Communists. I was emphatic in wanting us to withdraw the missions when Batista was in power. I am just as emphatic in wanting them returned now that Cuba is a democracy. I think it would be proper for Cuba to stipulate that the members of such missions be, as almost all Americans are, men who share the democratic ideals of our respective nations.

Seventh. Do not hesitate to enlist advice and aid from democratic friends here in the United States and elsewhere in the hemisphere. I refer especially to Gov. Muñoz Marín of Puerto Rico, former President José Figueres of Costa Rica, President Romulo Betancourt of Venezuela, and others like them.

Fidel Castro's courage, intelligence, and patience brought him through two ordeals—revolution and cross examination. Now he must again invoke those qualities as he settles down to face and, we earnestly hope, to survive the ordeal of high public office.

CASTRO REFORM PACE TUGS ECONOMIC ROOTS

(By Bertram B. Johansson)

HAVANA.—"In all my 35 years in Cuba," a U.S. businessman said to me as we sat at a sidewalk cafe where the sea breezes hiss through the palm trees, "I've never quite seen anything like this Fidel Castro government.

"Apparently, they're strictly honest as far as graft or corruption is concerned.

"They're thorough. The military executions are an example.

"They've got lots of good ideas for increasing Cuba's agricultural production, and for industrializing.

SEARCHING QUESTIONS

"But it seems to me they're moving too fast for their own good. And I have some reservations about whether leftists or Communists aren't infiltrating. I don't know who is influencing whom, Castro or the Commies."

This view, echoed in many layers of the Havana community by both Cubans and foreign observers, is a quick measure of the Castro independence movement as found in Havana today.

It expresses the sympathy most people have for the 26th of July movement, but the reservations and doubts, as well.

[Meanwhile in Washington Dr. Castro met at luncheon with Christian Herter, Acting Secretary of State. On April 15 the bearded Cuban Premier was greeted on his arrival in the capital with cries of "Viva Castro" from a crowd of flag-waving Cuban supporters.

[Dr. Castro said he hoped "in some way I can bring a better understanding of our program in Cuba to the people of the United States and that they will have a better understanding of our situation."]

The primary questions, still, in Cuba are:

1. Whether the Castro government is willing to adjust to the concept of a mixed economy and the fact of the one billion dollar United States investment in Cuba, as Gov. Muñoz Marin in Puerto Rico has, and as President Betancourt of Venezuela and former President Figueres have, in their own way.

WAVE OF REFORMS

2. What the outcome will be of the muffled behind-the-scenes struggle now going on within the government between moderates and the leftists who have stealthily worked their way into some posts. It is obvious that Communists are trying to take advantage of the flux of this period of transition, as they did briefly in Venezuela after the fall of Pérez Jiménez dictatorship.

On the outcome of this test of strength will depend the issue of whether the government's overall approach becomes a synthesis of moderate and radical views, or a primarily leftist policy.

The break with the past is producing its ferment. Three and a half months after the January 1 revolution, turbulent forces of freedom set loose by Cuba's revulsion with the Batista dictatorship have taken on the nature of a giant, onrushing tidal wave of political and economic reforms.

BUSINESSMEN ANXIOUS

Premier Castro says he is out to form one big middle class, bringing the rich down into it and the lower classes up. This is frightening to some people here, naturally.

As a result, Cuba's political scene is marked today by the fluidity and headlong motion characteristic of a tidal wave as these forces of reform conflict with the status quo.

Almost daily the Urrutia-Castro government issues fiats, regulations, and laws with Cromwellian zeal to purge the excesses of the Batista regime, to lower utility rates, slash rents, adjust charges for the space a small farmer might use in the Havana marketplace to sell his produce.

The impetus of these reforms is such that they could have either a positive, cleansing effect on Batista corruption or, if mismanaged, could head Cuba for catastrophe, it is agreed here.

Currently, though the mass of Cubans supports the Castro government, the business community is not quite sure what will happen next. There have been threats made in Revolution, the newspaper of the 26th of July movement, that some American sugar company lands may be expropriated for the agrarian reform program.

Conversely, there have been assertions Cuba is interested in more private investment capital. Most businessmen are sitting tight, awaiting events, not words.

Commerce is off, though tourism has begun to make a comeback. Both the El Nacional and the Havana Hilton Hotels report a slight increase in the number of guests.

Hotel occupancy is down to about 35 percent of capacity, when it ordinarily is at 65 or 70 percent this time of year when the tourist season is drawing to a close. The hotels are attempting to attract several conventions during the off season to help commerce here.

RENTAL SLASH DRASTIC

An illustration of the uncertainty—and elation—raised by some of the lightning swift acts of the government may be seen in the rental situation. Announcement of rent slashes several weeks ago produced near hysteria among property owners, many of whom supported the independence movement financially. Even Dr. Castro is believed to feel he has acted too drastically in this matter, though it is difficult to change position now without losing face.

Rent slashes, effective April 3, are as follows: rents up to $100 were cut by 50 percent; rents from $100 to $200 have been shaved 40 percent; those above $200 were dropped 30 percent.

For persons paying rents these reductions were naturally welcome, for, it is agreed here, rentals were much too high for the value received.

But there were other factors that apparently had not been fully considered. One Cuban family I know, with two children, has been paying $65 rental a month for their house—the downstairs area of a modern, quite new home.

HOMEOWNER SQUEEZED

The owner, who lives upstairs with his wife, had saved for years and years to build the $20,000 house as a social security investment against the future. Now, instead of receiving $65 a month in rental income, he will obtain only $32.50.

"Not a very good investment for my landlord, even though his mortgage interest will be reduced," said my friend who nonetheless is elated about his reduction in rent.

The effect of the rental fiat on the construction business was immediate. Work on nearly all large apartment houses has virtually stopped, partly because of the rent changes, partly because some of the financing for apartment construction was being supplied by Batista supporters who have fled.

The effect on other construction industries—such as cement manufacture, the steel rod reinforcement industry, trucking, etc.—is beginning to be felt. Some 120,000 partially or fully unemployed construction workers are putting pressure on the government by means of labor demonstrations. Dr. Castro, wary about adding to Cuba's unemployment problem, says he will start huge public works projects for making feeder roads in the farm areas of Cuba, and for draining the Zapata marshlands in central Cuba for growing rice.

RICE STUDY PUSHED

Netherlands drainage engineers are in the swamps now studying the problem, and 50 Japanese families have been invited to Cuba to show Cubans how to increase rice production.

Meanwhile, real estate owners and builders are, in effect, on strike against the government, in not finishing construction. Property owners are refusing to invest in real estate. This was the main aim of the rent slashes, aside from reducing rentals for city dwellers. Dr. Castro wishes to discourage investment in real estate and funnel it into industry to create more jobs.

But the government is learning it cannot be as drastic as it has been. It is believed Dr. Castro is seeing this now.

OBSERVERS BELIEVE CASTRO IS SEEKING U.S. TRADE FOR CUBA, NOT AID

(By John V. Horner)

Trade, rather than aid, is the subject being stressed by Prime Minister Castro in his discussion here.

This is the report today of persons who have had opportunities to confer privately with the visiting Cuban revolutionary leader.

One high-ranking official who talked at length with Mr. Castro said no mention was made of financial assistance but the Prime Minister is obviously concerned by Cuba's economic difficulties and hopes to stimulate the sale of such products as sugar.

Before leaving Havana, Mr. Castro was quoted as saying he hoped, during the visit here, to arrange for an increase in the Cuban sugar quota. But this cannot be done because quotas are fixed by law and no changes could be made except by action of Congress.

ECONOMY DETERIORATING

The Cuban economy has been deteriorating badly for several years, due in large part to a decline in sugar prices. Another factor was the heavy expenditure of the Batista regime for arms.

Since Mr. Castro overthrew the Batista dictatorship on January 1, the downward trend has continued. Tourism has fallen off sharply and investors worried about the political and economic uncertainties have withdrawn large sums of money.

So far, Mr. Castro has made the most favorable impression while relaxed in informal person-to-person conversation. In such situations he appears shy, talks in a soft, low voice.

"There is certainly no impression of a bloodthirsty revolutionist," said one observer.

SOMETIMES IRRITABLE

But in the midst of shoving crowds and inquiring reporters he sometimes appears irritable.

In the lobby of the Cuban Embassy yesterday morning, a reporter asked him, in the most courteous way, whether the newspapers in Cuba were free to criticize his government.

Mr. Castro bristled.

"Every newspaperman in the United States is invited to come to Cuba and see for himself," he replied sharply. "What puzzles me is that in this country such a question should be asked."

With that, the Prime Minister took one last hard look at the reporter, snapped his head upward and marched out of the front door. Thus ended an impromptu press conference.

EXPRESSES THANKS

A few minutes later, Mr. Castro was exchanging pleasant remarks with Acting Secretary of State Herter and other high ranking officials at a luncheon given for him at the Statler-Hilton Hotel.

The Prime Minister expressed thanks for the welcome and said he was glad to accept the honor on behalf of the Cuban people.

He spoke of the struggle in Cuba which he said cost thousands of lives for human rights, liberty and democracy, all of which had been nonexistent.

HERTER TOASTS CASTRO

He said he hopes that some day the people of the United States will recognize the whole truth of the revolutionary fight. And he said he wants to improve relations between this country and Cuba.

He declared there is no reason relations should not improve because the Cubans have a good feeling for the people of the United States. He then toasted the President.

Earlier, Mr. Herter had toasted the Prime Minister. The Acting Secretary said Cuba and the United States had cooperated in building and maintaining in the Western hemisphere "an impregnable bulwark of independence, of order, of freedom within the law." He said the countries stand together, likewise, in defending the integrity of the free world.

Mr. Herter said an exact expression of the feeling here for Cuba was made by the Cuban hero, Jose Marti when Marti spoke of the nations of this hemisphere as follows: "America must further everything that draws people closer together and abhor everything that separates them."

[From the Coos Bay (Oreg.) World, Apr. 17, 1959]

CASTRO AND THE COLD WAR

High hopes for fundamental reforms in Fidel Castro's Cuban revolution have been considerably dashed. Even those whose hopes were highest for establishment of a Democratic Government in the island nation which is snuggled against our Florida coast have had those hopes dampened.

We note that columnist Drew Pearson, who was high on the Castro-Government possibilities just before and immediately after Batista's fall, has since discovered things in the Cuban premier's background and recent actions to give him pause.

This also has occurred with many leading newspapers, such as the New Orleans Times Picayune.

And Congressman CHARLES O. PORTER, Democrat, of Oregon, who felt a surge of optimism for democracy in Cuba after Castro's revolt, is quoted this week by Time magazine as saying, "I don't think Castro is a dictator yet, but I do see an ominous trend." What PORTER feared early this year—that Castro was "young and naive in politics and government" and might thereby come a cropper—is the basis for the ominous trend."

Most worrying to U.S. officials is the apparently left-orientated trend to Castro's dictatorship, if it is a dictatorship. The United States tends to see every action by anybody, anywhere, as favoritism of either the United States or the Soviet Union. We have a habit of contending that everybody is either for us or againts us. We are joined in that attitude by Russia.

Thus it's difficult for us to truly see where Castro's government is headed, left or right. Either kind of dictatorship is undesirable.

If Castro is leaning toward "neutralism" as between the United States and Russia, or even leaning toward Soviet sympathies, there is a partial logical explanation in historic Cuban fears of the Big Brother to her north, and also in that Big Brother's attitude toward the Castro revolution itself.

The U.S. Government gave every appearance of backing Batista's rightist dictatorship in order to protect American investments and the U.S. foreign sugar supply right up until the State Department embargoed shipments of arms to Cuba a scant few weeks before Batista fled.

Even after the embargo, actions of the U.S. envoy in Havana could hardly be construed as anything but American support for the repressive, brutal, bloody Batista dictatorship.

All that is past history. What matters today is Castro, whose policies are still being swept along on the popular enthusiasm of a majority of Cubans.

His policies, young, and naive perhaps, are not pro-United States. The United States has a difficult job ahead of it in changing Castro's attitude. The job may be impossible. If it is, the blame is not all Castro's.—FWA.

CASTRO IS LUNCH GUEST OF HERTER ON FIRST DAY OF VISIT

WASHINGTON, April 16.—Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba was a luncheon guest today of Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter. Dr. Castro flew to Washington last night to begin an 11-day speaking tour of the Eastern United States and Canada. The purpose of his tour, he told reporters, is to improve Cuban-United States relations. This was the theme of the toast the young revolutionary leader made today in reply to one from Mr. Herter. There is no reason, Dr. Castro said, why relations between the two countries should not be improved. Premier Castro has charged frequently that the U.S. press has distorted the facts in reporting the revolution against the regime of President Fulgencio Batista and the subsequent military trial and execution of many Batista followers.

In his toast Dr. Castro intimated that press reports were responsible for the misunderstanding between the two countries. He expressed the hope that one day the people of the United States would recognize the whole truth of the revolutionary struggle in Cuba.

As he left the Cuban Embassy this morning for the luncheon, a reporter asked him whether newspapers in Cuba were free to criticize his regime. The question apparently angered him.

"Every newspaperman in the United States is invited to come to Cuba and see for himself," he replied. "What puzzles me is that in this country such a question should be asked."

CASTRO WEARS UNIFORM

Twenty-five United States and Cuban officials attended the luncheon, held in the Statler Hotel. Premier Castro wore his green army fatigue uniform. Before the luncheon, he and Mr. Herter sat on a sofa and conversed.

The State Department gave out no information on what subjects had been discussed.

Dr. Castro said later that in his speech tomorrow before the American Society of Newspaper Editors he would answer allegations that his government had been infiltrated by Communists.

The society reversed today its decision not to permit television and radio coverage of the Castro address and the question and answers following it. This decision, announced earlier by George W. Healy, Jr., of the New Orleans Times-Picayune, president of the society, had brought sharp protests from broadcasting representatives.

At a conference of these representatives with Mr. Healy today, it was agreed that there would be a pooled film, which would be made available to all television services for later broadcast, and a pooled recording for radio networks.

Dr. Castro brought with him to Washington three financial experts, Rufo Lopez Fresquet, Minister of the Treasury; Dr. Regino Boti Leon, Minister of the Economy, and Dr. Felipe Pazos, president of the National Bank of Cuba. These officials are expected to have exploratory discussions at the International Monetary Fund on a program to stabilize the Cuban economy.

Dr. Castro has already indicated that he would like U.S. credits. The U.S. position has been that the Cuban Government should first discuss its situation with the International Monetary Fund. This has been the procedure followed with several other Latin American countries that sought U.S. help for their balance-of-payments difficulties.

CUBAN TROUBLES CITED

There is general agreement here that the Cuban economy is heading into trouble. At the end of 1953, Cuba's dollar reserves were about $500 million. In the next 5 years, the balance of payments deficits totaled $414 million. It is estimated here that gold and dollar reserves are now about $80 million.

The accumulating deficits under the Batista regime were brought about by the decline in sugar prices, heavy purchases of arms and the flight of capital from Cuba.

In the first 5 months of the Castro regime, the reserves have continued to fall as a consequence of a further drop in sugar prices, the decline of tourism, and a removal of investment by industries worried about the political and economic course of the regime.

Furthermore, the budget is running into a deficit as the Government has started up projects to soak up unemployment.

COSTA RICAN RED HAILS CASTRO

SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA, April 16.—Manuel Moya, leader of Costa Rica's outlawed Communist Party, praised Premier Castro in a radio broadcast here last night as a "man of profound culture, brilliant talent and a true revolutionary."

The speech was in reply to one by José Figueres, a former President of Costa Rica, last Sunday, in which Señor Figueres assailed Dr. Castro.

CASTRO FACES QUIZ ON IRON-RULE AIMS

(By William H. Stringer)

WASHINGTON.—Cuban Premier Fidel Castro, bearded, open-shirted, and a photogenic romantic in appearance, is finding he must answer two grim charges on his American tour:

1. That the large-scale executions following his triumph over Fulgencio Batista were brutally excessive and decided by rump-court justice.

2. That he is closely linked to the Communists.

Dr. Castro is telling his luncheon hosts, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, April 17, that he is not tied to the Communists, and that they have not "moved in on" his revolution.

Dr. Castro likewise is telling Washington, through repeated sidewalk interviews and hasty comments at the Cuban embassy, that the executions involved only "assassins," and that the Cuban people's faith that the Batista leaders would be punished "prevented great bloodshed in the final days of the revolt."

CONTROVERSIAL FIGURE

But this revolutionary hero remains a controversial figure, and further siftings will be necessary to unravel the whole picture.

Meanwhile, Dr. Castro is seeking United States credits to bolster a Cuba where the decline of sugar prices and the unsettlements of war have caused a sharp decline in dollar reserves. He has brought with him three economic and financial experts, who will explore prospects at the World Bank and International Monetary Fund for quick action to stabilize the Cuban economy.

There's a long road uphill ahead for the hard-fighting, idealistic-but-impractical Cuban political leader who April 16 had lunch with Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter, Jr., and said then that the purpose of his tour was to improve Cuban-United States relations.

What about the charges of Dr. Castro's procommunism?

The weekly magazine U.S. News and World Report, the columnist Drew Pearson, and others have charged that while Dr. Castro is not and never has been a Communist, nevertheless the Communists have made their way into his regime and some close associates are Communists or ardent fellow travelers. The Christian Science Monitor's Latin-American affairs correspondent, Bertram B. Johansson, reports from Cuba that there are apprehensions among the lawyer class that Communists and extreme leftists may have infiltrated the Castro regime.

GOOD RELATIONS SEEN

On a visit to the Capitol, Dr. Castro was quoted as telling Senators that communism does not have a chance in Cuba if he can feed his people. He also said, according to reports, that he does not contemplate confiscation of American interests in Cuba.

Dr. Castro is expected to have something further to say about charges when he addresses the American editors.

Moscow would like nothing better than to have a base and a regime on the doorstep of the United States, and close to the Panama Canal.

Meanwhile the young bearded revolutionary told Acting Secretary Herter at their luncheon he saw no reason why relations between the United States and Cuba should not be "the best."

Answering repeated street-corner questions about the executions which have been continuing at La Cabana fortress—with more than 500 Cubans estimated to have been shot by firing squads after brief military trials—Dr. Castro said:

"The executions are a lesson that never again can the people in power rob and torture and murder and hide their crimes and escape punishment."

AIDES PACK VERBAL ARMS—CASTRO PRIMED ON U.S. VISIT

(By Bertram B. Johansson)

HAVANA.—Premier Fidel Castro, who has taken off for speeches and public appearances in the United States, has been armed by government officials not with rebel guns and Molotov cocktails but with numerous speeches, facts, and figures on sugar quotas, loans, and United States-Cuban relations.

He is to arrive in Washington late April 15 and will be accorded the treatment due the Cabinet chief of a friendly nation, officials there said.

But at this end elaborate, almost frantic preparations have been made for the Premier's trip.

It is not that Dr. Castro is incapable of speechmaking. Quite the contrary. As one observer here has said, he speaks compulsively.

His speeches to the Cuban public last sometimes for four or five hours. One recent Castro appearance on the Cuban television version of "Meet the Press" started at 10 in the evening and wound up after 2:30 in the morning. It will be quite an experience for the Cuban Premier to have to limit his remarks.

His prepared speeches will be given in English, though his press conference answers are expected to be rendered in Spanish and then translated.

Premier Castro is said even to fish compulsively. Recently, on visiting a Cuban lake, far distant from the cities, about which few people know, he hauled in more than 300 large bass in one sitting, one after another.

DIFFERENT FROM FRONDIZI

As an unofficial visitor, the Castro tour to the United States differs in several respects from that of President Frondizi of Argentina in January.

The Argentine President was invited to the United States, officially, soon after he entered office in May 1958. He did not accept immediately, however, and stipulated he would not accept until he had his government and economic situation either well in hand, or at least launched and given direction.

Thus, when President Frondizi visited President Eisenhower in January of this year, his economic policies had been enunciated. It was clear that Argentina welcomed private foreign investments, despite the cries of Peronists and nationalists to the contrary.

President Frondizi had had more than one showdown with Peronist labor unions and had established the political fact that he had the strong backing of the Argentine military forces so that he dared to leave Argentina even at the time of some labor difficulties.

The Castro government, on the other hand, only a 3½-months-old political youngster, is still in the awkward, troublesome throes of forming its economic program, of recovering from the shock of revolution, of transforming destructive acts into constructive administrative procedure, recovering stolen funds with which Batista officials had lined their pockets and safety deposit boxes.

The government is still dismissing excess or disloyal government personnel and introducing new government workers, who in their inexperience, do not always contribute to still chaotic operation. Government and business are having troubles with labor unions where Communists are endeavoring to infiltrate and take over important posts.

Thus, the frenetic, anxious atmosphere of the preparation for the United States-Canada trip has spread throughout the government. Ministers who before were difficult to reach are now even more difficult to find. Many of them are spending time with the Premier, often staying up all night long, briefing him, working out as yet unformed policies.

PRESS REACTION AWAITED

Cuban Ambassador to the United States Ernesto Dihigo who is quite pro-United States in viewpoint, recently spent some 10 days here in Havana conferring with Dr. Castro and U.S. Government officials about the coming visit.

It is not known how discreetly Premier Castro will speak in the United States on United States-Cuban relations. He has spoken often, here in Cuba, with extreme acrimony of the U.S. policy, until last April, permitting arms to be sent to the Batista government, and of the U.S. military mission in Cuba training Batista troops to fight against the Castro rebels.

The depth of Premier Castro's grudge on these points sems bottomless at this point.

It remains to be seen whether the spate of anti-American statements he has made—about U.S. foreign policy in Cuba as reflected by several recent Ambassadors, and as to the influence of U.S. business interests in Cuba—have been meant primarily for domestic consumption and for stimulating a new Cuban nationalism and pride or whether they are to be part and parcel of the new government's policy.

Premier Castro will be accompanied on his visit by several moderates, including Finance Minister Rufó Lopez Fresquet Machado, former Cuban Ambassador to the United States and an official of the International Monetary Fund.

There are some persons here who wonder whether Premier Castro will be able to handle himself well enough, in dealing with some of the hostile questions which some newspaper editors are apt to hurl at him.

The Castro government policy on military executions is not at all well understood in the United States, and Premier Castro has criticized wire services and newspapers, generally, in the United States, for their inadequate coverage, as Premier Castro terms it, of the background of tortures and atrocities perpetrated during the Batista regime.

RED INFLUENCE QUERIED

Cubans today no longer attempt to compare the military trials here with the Nuremburg trials in Germany after World War II. Rather, they make reference to the post-World War II "cellar" killings in France of those who had collaborated with Nazis.

Thousands of killings went uncondemned by world opinion at that time, Cubans aver, and for that reason the more than 500 military executions so far performed here should not be condemned, according to the Cuban line of reasoning.

Premier Castro also will no doubt be asked about his views on whether Communists are obtaining too strong an influence in his own thinking and in the Cuban independence movement. There are certainly indications that Communists are trying to move in, in considerable numbers. But there are moderates in the Castro government who are able to hold their position and point of view.

No such influence has been established at this writing, according to well-informed sources here, though there is a possibility, it is believed, of such a strong Communist influence developing that military security in the Caribbean could be endangered.

It is believed here also that even though Premier Castro is not yet accustomed to the U.S. press conference technique, where loaded questions are often asked, he has had enough experience with it in the past few months—and smarts from some of the liberties which he feels U.S. newsmen took with some of his statements—to handle himself ably with the most critical elements of the U.S. press. It will not be his first visit to the United States.

INVITATIONS MOUNT

Since his casual acceptance some weeks ago of the invitation of the American Society of Newspaper Editors to speak before their annual meeting in Washington April 17, invitations have snowballed into Havana.

They have come from university groups—not the university administrations themselves—at Harvard, Yale, Princeton, College of the City of New York, Columbia University.

Premier Castro is expected to lunch with Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter on April 16, even though this is an unofficial visit.

He is scheduled to appear before the National Press Club in Washington April 20, the United Nations Correspondents Association in New York April 22, the Overseas Press Club in New York April 23. At this writing, his itinerary from April 23 to 28, when he is expected to be in Montreal, has not yet been announced.

LIBERALS DISMAYED—CASTRO-FIGUERES RIFT GROWS

(By Bertram B. Johansson)

HAVANA.—To the dismay of Caribbean liberals, the rift is widening between two noted Caribbean revolutionaries, former President Figueres of Costa Rica and Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba.

Ever since Senor Figueres visited Cuba some weeks ago and precipitated the issue of whether Cuba's allegiance lay with the East or West in the cold war—Dr. Castro said Cuba's position should be one of neutrality—the fissure between the two men has grown deeper.

In his last barrage of criticism, Dr. Castro called Senor Figueres, with whom he has had much in common in the past, "a bad friend, a bad democrat, and a bad revolutionary," for making statements "which only serve to provoke attacks on the Cuban people."

Even before the Figueres visit, the possibility of ideological separation of these two men became evident. Senor Figueres was among the first Latin Americans to comment negatively on the Cuban military executions and to express surprise about them. He said, at that time, he would not visit Cuba because of the spate of military executions.

Then, several weeks later, after the enormity of the Batista atrocities had been made clear to him, Senor Figueres consented to visit Cuba, as he did on the weekend of March 22.

It was during that visit, while Senor Figueres was addressing a large trade union gathering, that he made the statement that Latin America's place should be with the West in the cold war.

David Salvador, head of the Confederation of Cuban Trade Unions, snatched the microphone and asserted to the union members that "Cuba cannot be with the United States" which, he held, was oppressing Cuba.

It was at this same gathering that Dr. Castro indicated he felt Cuba's position should be "neutralist" in the cold war, a position quite out of line with the rest of Latin America, and in line with the Soviet Union's effort in Latin America to "neutralize" the area.

Dr. Castro added he was surprised Senor Figueres should be trapped by the "propaganda of lies which distort Cuba's policy in the United States and other countries."

SHARP FIGUERES RETORT

Senor Figueres on his return to Costa Rica was smarting from this Cuban treatment. No tyro at the Latin American brand of politics, he is reported to have made references to Communist influences in Cuba and said that Dr. Castro apparently took pills to keep him awake.

These jibes hit Dr. Castro in such a sensitive spot that he countered with the condemnations that Senor Figueres was a "bad friend, bad Democrat, and bad revolutionary."

Senor Figueres was referred to also by the Cuban Premier as "a person who maintained created interests in his country."

This phrase has been amplified here by 26th of July movement adherents to the extent of condemning Senor Figueres for not having overturned and changed the base of the Costa Rican economy in his 2 years in office. The implication left is that the Cuban revolutionary movement intends to make changes far more radical than those developed in Costa Rica under Senor Figueres.

As an ardent revolutionary who ousted several political factions and powerful family groups from Costa Rica, Senor Figueres became noted for the maturity of his approach to foreign firms doing business in Costa Rica.

One of his first and major acts after he took office in November 1953, was to renegotiate contracts with United Fruit Co. Under these contracts UFCO was required to boost its tax contribution to the Costa Rican Government.

The agreements were hailed by the company as a pattern for negotiations in other countries, even though some of the tax provisions were drastic. Senor Figueres said that the historic agreement placed Costa Rica among the pioneers of Latin American economic development.

The fact that Dr. Castro and 26th of July movement suporters are criticizing "Pepe" Figueres for this type of negotiations is not going unnoticed here in Havana by the business community.

Aside from the sharpness of this carbine war of words between the two Caribbean revolutionaries, the incident has served to bring several other issues into the open.

OUTSPOKEN CRITIC

One is Dr. Castro's increasing sensitivity to criticism and his tendency to hit back immediately, sometimes wildly, with statements he may regret later, though he reserves the right to be extremely critical of others.

His critical anti-American statements, which have surprised some Cubans who feel he does not need to resort to anti-Americanism to keep his hold on the Cuban public, were noticeably toned down as his trip to the United States approached.

The other issue brought to the surface by the "Pepe" Figueres remarks is that of the influence of Communists in the present government.

There are a number of men and women around Dr. Castro who are charged from time to time with being Communists or definitely left of center.

The issue is not whether these and other men are or are not Communists now, but what influence they are having currently on the Premier who insists he is not worried about Communists in the government and would rather have them above ground where he can see them.

There are moderate men and influences in the Castro government, some of them well educated in economics. One of these is Rufo Lopez Fresquet, Treasury Minister, who was asked recently by a reporter whether he felt the United States would allow Cuba to develop economically. A frequent Communist insinuation is that the United States desires to stifle economic development in Cuba.

Senor Lopez Fresquet answered:

"There's no international obligation which would be an obstacle to Cuba's development. There is no force capable of opposing the moral force of a revolutionary government which represents the yearning of a people.

"Besides," he added, "right now there's no American imperialism as back in 1920. If, in 1934, Batista had not given the Americans the protective tariffs of 1927, there's no question but that Cuba would be better developed. But Batista had no moral force and he gave in because he was more interested in his personal gains. However, when we negotiate with democratic regimes we usually manage to make gains for Cuba."

Senor Lopez Fresquet is one of the group of moderates in the 26th movement who accompanied Dr. Castro on his visit to the United States, to be present in case there are loan conversations.

UNITED STATES AND FIDEL COME TO GRIPS—QUESTIONS FOR CASTRO

(By Joseph U. Hinshaw)

Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro goes before the U.S. newspaper editors today to answer charges that Communists have infiltrated his government.

The bearded 32-year-old Castro also is expected to spell out in his lunch speech to the American Society of Newspaper Editors why he believes the U.S. press has not given a true picture of his revolutionary regime.

Dr. Castro probably will be asked during a question and answer session after his speech to justify his mass executions of followers of former dictator Fulgencio Batista. Dr. Castro's forces toppled Batista's government on New Year's Day.

A SPEAKER

The Prime Minister, here for an 11-day good will visit, promised to speak for 30 minutes. But he has been known to speak for 3 or 4 hours on other occasions.

As usual there was no prepared text for Dr. Castro's remarks. He will wear his famous jungle green, open-collared fatigue uniform.

Dr. Castro said in advance he woud deliver part of his speech in English and part in Spanish. He said he would try to answer questions in English but would keep an interpreter at his elbow in case he needed him.

A controversy over broadcast coverage of the appearance was settled when the society agreed to let radio and television services record Dr. Castro's speech on tape and film for later airing.

Dr. Castro came to the United States specifically to speak to the ASNE annual meeting. He has expanded his itinerary to include appearances before other groups and on two TV panel programs.

RECEPTION

The revolutionary leader's only other scheduled engagement today was a reception at the Cuban Embassy for Cubans living in this area. The affair was expected to be jammed with well-wishers.

Sr. Castro gave an indication of what he will say in his ASNE speech while chatting with newsmen after having lunch with Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter yesterday.

Without directly criticizing the American press, he complained that people in this country have not been informed "of the complete truth of what is going on in Cuba."

He said, "I hope I will now be able to reach the U.S. people and explain what we stand for." He said public opinion here would back his regime overwhelmingly if he could talk on television every week.

As for the executions, Dr. Castro said, "Almost all of the war criminals have been punished." He said, "it is hard for us to apply this justice but we are saving many future lives by punishing the guilty."

During a stroll later through Meridian Hill Park, one block from his embassy, Dr. Castro told a group of students, "in Cuba there is (cq) not communists, not capitalists but Cubanists."

The Prime Minister shook hands, signed autographs and posed for photographs during his walk through the park and nearby streets. A crowd of 300 persons swarmed around him. At one point he chucked a baby under the chin.

SLEEPY FIDEL MISSES SOME REBELS

(By Gene Methvin)

The good neighbor policy, which some diplomats have complained is languishing, got a boost yesterday from a couple of Fidel Castro's burly barbudos and a bunch of high school girls.

It seems a few Castro followers wandered into the Meridian Hill Hotel after they arrived Wednesday night and struck up an acquaintance with about 40 touring St. Louis high school seniors. Mostly girls. (The hotel is for women but the lobby isn't segregated.)

"Come to see us at the Embassy," they said when they parted. "It's just across the street. We'll introduce you to Fidel."

THE VISIT

So bright and early yesterday morning all 40 students lined up and trooped to the Embassy, at 2630 16th Street NW., dragging their teacher along.

A State Department security man—still rubbing his eyes—saw them at the door.

"Stop," he shouted. "You can't go in there."

"Why not?" said the saucy girl leading the bunch. "We were invited."

"By whom?"

"By Lieutenant Ramon, that's who."

WAITING

The State man left them cooling their heels on the sidewalk, cordoned off by uniformed men, while he scurried after instructions.

"They came to see us last night," one young lady sighed.

A policeman raised an eyebrow.

"Oh, it was very intellectual. Just talked, you know," she said.

"We're rebels, too," said a girl in a Confederate hat.

"Look, I got earrings from Cuba when I was there 2 years ago," said one girl.

The policeman leaned over for a closer look. The earrings had three Cuban coins dangling, and he shook his head gravely.

"If I were you, I wouldn't go in there with them on," he said. "They've got Batista's picture on them."

The girl snatched them off.

(A closer check revealed the coins really bore a bust of San Marti, great Cuban patriot, "like George Washington," the State man said.)

HOOTS

Finally, just as the embarrassed teacher was about to drag her charges away, a Cuban captain and lieutenant sauntered out.

"Hello, Emilio," the girls squealed, and flocked around.

Lieutenant Emilio beamed. So did the captain. They talked, exchanged autographs, and the students snapped pictures.

Fidel was still in bed, fast asleep, they explained.

But the way the youngsters grinned and tossed their heads at the burly State Department man, as their teacher herded them off, it was plain they didn't care.

CASTRO MAINTAINS A HECTIC PACE; CAPITAL IN STRUGGLE TO KEEP UP—CROWDS HAIL AND PICKET CUBAN PREMIER AND HE WORRIES HIS GUARDS IN BUSY SECOND DAY OF CAPITAL VISIT

WASHINGTON, April 17.—Police sirens pierced the spring air. Pickets paraded. High school students shouted from buses, "Hi, Fidel." And Fidel Castro waved, smiled, shook hands and talked.

This was the second day of the visit of Premier Castro, who flew here Wednesday night. It was no less hectic than yesterday. Even the Cuban revolutionary leader recognized his own genius for harassing State Department security agents.

After the luncheon of the American Society of Newspaper Editors at the Statler-Hilton Hotel, the ballroom was cleared to allow more seats to be taken in for Dr. Castro's address. The Premier was walking out when he was surrounded by reporters.

He stopped. Keith O. (Kayo) Lynch of the State Department's security unit tried to nudge him along into an anteroom.

Dr. Castro grinned and said, "I am his friend, but he never had so much trouble with a prisoner."

"Aw, you are no trouble at all," said Mr. Lynch.

Perhaps, but the story was told that Mr. Lynch had said to his boss, Elmer R. Hipsley: "Go get me a tent—I got everything else for this circus."

NINETEEN GUARDS OF HIS OWN

Dr. Castro's own bodyguard—it consists of 19 guards, most of them wearing green army fatigues and with beards and long hair like their leader—insists that he does not like sirens. Yet he has dashed all over town behind the whine of sirens.

His first trip this morning was to the Senate Office Building to talk to members of the Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs Committees. The police had a difficult time clearing a path among the secretaries and tourists who jammed the corridors.

When Dr. Castro arrived at the hotel three groups of pickets—all from New York—were walking across the street from the entrance. Each group was surrounded by policemen.

The largest group, numbering about 200, was anti-Castro and, according to members of the two other groups, also "pro-Batista and pro-Trujillo"—supporters of former President Fulgencio Batista, of Cuba, and Generalissimo Rafael L. Trujillo, of the Dominican Republic.

This group called itself the Pan American Anti-Communist Association. Its posters had gaudily painted caricatures of Dr. Castro. The words on one said:

"In his megalomania Fidel Castro has threatened to bomb Cape Canaveral (the missile-launching base in Florida)."

Another said:

"Fidel Castro is the nefarious law in Cuba. He forces trial courts to do as he says."

The two other groups together numbered only 75. One was called "the February 27" (the date that the Dominican Republic became independent in 1844) and the other the Union Patriotica Dominicana. Their signs proclaimed, "Democracy, yes; Trujillo, no," and "Batista is out, Trujillo is next."

Inside, just before George W. Healy, Jr., president of the editors' group, rose to introduce the dignitaries, a bearded Cuban security guard leaned over the table and examined the microphones.

Dr. Castro is not a man of few words. Each question today set him off on a speech of 5 to 15 minutes.

FIFTY ARRESTED IN CUBA—49 MEN AND A WOMAN SAID TO PLOT AGAINST REGIME

HAVANA, April 17.—Forty-nine men and one woman have been lodged in the jail at Cardenas on the north coast of Matanzas Province. They are accused of having conspired against the revolutionary government.

Capt. Pablo Cabrera Piloto, chief of the revolutionary police at Cardenas, said tonight that this group had been meeting in various places and plotting against the government. One place they met was at the home of a woman he could identify only by the name of Juana. She is also under arrest.

The majority of these alleged conspirators are former members of the armed forces of the Batista regime, the captain said. The others are civilians.

An attempt last night by 34 war criminals to escape from Bonito prison in Santiago de Cuba was frustrated, according to a report from there. Seven of the prisoners involved were to have been executed last night. The executions were postponed until tonight, the report said.

FERMENT IN CUBA

(By Bertram B. Johansson)

HAVANA.—In many Latin-American homes there hangs in the entrance halls welcome plaques or decorated ceramic tiles similar to the "God Bless Our Home," framed cards hanging in North American homes. Here they usually read, "Ésta es tu casa" (This is your home), expressing the warmth and hospitality as characteristic of many Latin Americans.

Today, plaques and tiles are appearing in Cuban domiciles reading:

"Ésta es tu casa, Fidel."

It is an indication of the deep and growing affection many Cubans have for Premier Castro.

Two days after the fall of the Batista dictatorship, when the Castro troops were pouring into Havana to bring the military situation under control, a Cuban said to an American here:

"Now I am proud to be a Cuban once again."

Pride in one's country is most certainly growing here. The feeling of admiration for Premier Castro is enormous and his supporters expect his current trip to the United States to win new friends for their cause.

"Gracias, Fidel! (thank you, Fidel), Gracias, Fidel!" cry the stickers emblazoned on automobile windshields, on buses, on shop doors, on cement garden walls where the whitewash is peeling, on the gray, elephant-colored trunks of palm trees, as the expressive, often extrovert Cuban conveys his thanks and relief over the Castro victory January 1.

DOLLS WEAR FATIGUES

In shop windows, dolls are dressed in the green fatigue uniform of the 26th of July Movement. There are unmistakable beards on many of these children's play toys.

Cuban mothers, instead of buying cowboy suits or spaceman uniforms for their children (the American influence has penetrated deeply on this island, which is only an hour's flight from Miami), now buy 26th of July uniforms.

Children smear charcoal beards on their faces to imitate the barbudoes (bearded ones). They "ambush" Batista troops in their frontyard guerrilla warfare.

It is obvious that the winds of freedom are blowing into every crevice of Cuban society, sometimes to excess.

Often, when Castro political rallies are being set up, student organizers in the high schools burst into the classrooms to round up participants.

Even Haitian exiles, seeking to raise an army here to proceed against the Duvalier government in nearby Haiti, feel free at times to walk into high school classrooms to recruit volunteers while teachers stand by helpless to prevent them from haranguing the class.

In one private high school system students not only ousted some of their student colleagues from classes, they went on strike until 15 teachers whom they did not like—in some cases for political reasons—were dropped.

In another instance, some labor leaders bargaining with a businessman for higher wages in their union threatened to send him to jail if he didn't give in.

"What I've been through is something terrible," the man said to me. "I frankly don't believe Fidel knows what some of the labor people are doing. These guys are outright Commies."

Of course, without an investigation it is impossible to state whether or not this man's charges of communism against his labor group were fair or not, but they do indicate growing concern of Communist influence in labor unions here.

Within recent days, workers at the Cuban Electric Co. wrote Premier Castro charging that Communists in their union were subjecting them to "persecution and threats." The statement declared the Communists were using "most detestable proceedings" in bringing fraud charges against union leader Angel Cofino, who had been detained recently but quickly released when no grounds were found to hold him.

In another instance, Premier Castro said in a speech that sugar prices to the American consumer could be lowered if Cuba were allowed to compete freely in the U.S. market.

What significance can one find in this variety of incidents in Cuba?

Mainly that now, feeling the first effects of liberty after years of dictatorship, Cubans are trying their hand at freedom, a bit awkwardly to be sure, getting the feel of the absence of repression and persecution.

After 3½ months of a new government, and with the euphoria of victory gradually wearing off, Premier Castro finds himself in the position of struggling to harness these vast energies of freedom generated by Cuba's revulsion against the old regime.

Currently the momentum of the Castro revolution has reached the point where its inertia could conceivably throw it out of control and cause it to crash and founder on some barren beach of history.

Or if the surge and moral impetus of the independence movement are skillfully guided and governed, the excesses of the previous regime may be cleansed out and reforms realized.

There is little doubt but that Communists are at work endeavoring to insinuate either their personal presence or their influence in various sectors of the government and in the newspaper profession, including the mechanical side of the publishing and printing trade.

In fact, there is strong evidence here that leftists and Communists are following with fear-breeding accuracy the pattern laid down in Marxist texts on political tactics for taking over a country by endeavoring to move in on Cuba's communication systems, Army, radio, television, newspapers, its public utilities, labor unions, and schools—the purpose being eventually to stifle the very freedoms which Cubans believed Fidel Castro had won for them.

RESCUE OF CASTRO URGED

To some observers the rapidity with which Communists are trying to move in is even more sudden than in Guatemala several years ago.

There are some notable Cuban intellectuals who see Premier Castro as so surrounded by Communists and fellow travelers as keeping him so busy with a multitude of dramatic but nonessential matters that he has been driven by sheer exhaustion, by adulation of the masses, to the point where he cannot thoughtfully deal with the real problems of Cuba.

These people want to see him rescued from such politically suicidal tendencies.

As Cubans discuss (in secret, to be sure) whether Communist influence may be deepening in the government, the Castro administration boasts what it terms as the following accomplishments:

An agrarian-reform program, not yet fully outlined, has started in a small way. Some government public lands have been distributed. Considerable fervor for land reforms has been fomented, but no details of a rounded program have been forthcoming yet.

Rent reforms have been instituted. Cuts amount to 50 percent of rents up to $100; 40 percent on $100 to $200 rents; 30 percent of those over $200. Tenants are amazed, landlords are drawing real estate off the market, the construction industry is slowing to a halt, 120,000 workers are partially or fully unemployed.

Prices on medicines have been cut 20 to 25 percent.

Government graft is wiped out, the government contends, and military criminals have been executed. The figure is up to 475 men executed. In justification of the executions, few Cubans now compare the trials to the Nuremburg trials. Rather, they point to the thousands of cellar killings after World War II in France, when Nazi collaborators were wiped out.

World opinion did not condemn these killings of collaborators with the Nazis, Cubans reason. Therefore, why should it condemn the Cuban executives, they ask.

The government is studying how much of an adjustment in telephone and electricity prices should be made. The Cuban Telephone Co. is to install 5,000 new telephones.

Government employees' minimum wages have been raised from $65 a month to $85 a month, while department heads (ministers) have had their salaries reduced from $900 a month to $500 a month. Several thousand government employees who received wages but did no work have been dropped.

A study for educational reforms has been launched.

For taking steps such as these, Cubans generally give Premier Castro unqualified support.

CASTRO DECLARES REGIME IS FREE OF RED INFLUENCE—CUBAN LEADER SAYS IN TALK IN WASHINGTON THAT HIS AIMS ARE HUMANISTIC—HE DEFENDS EXECUTIONS—PREMIER STRESSES EFFORTS TO DEVELOP INDUSTRY AND END UNEMPLOYMENT

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, April 17.—Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba denied today charges of Communist influence in his regime.

In a speech before the American Society of Newspaper Editors he said: "I have said very clearly that we are not Communists."

The 32-year-old revolutionary leader who overthrew the government of President Fulgencio Batista last January 1, declared that "our revolution is a humanistic one."

What he seeks, Dr. Castro said, is to create "a base for our people" to develop industry and to cure the unemployment problem.

"There is one right the people need—the right to live, the right to eat, the right to work," he said.

Dr. Castro was the guest at a luncheon of the editors' society in the Statler-Hilton Hotel. Between the luncheon and his speech, the ballroom was packed and the leader was heard by 1,500 persons.

SPEECH MADE IN ENGLISH

This morning Premier Castro met for an hour and a half with the members of the Senate Foreign Relations and the House Foreign Affairs Committees in the Capitol. Several other Senators and Representatives who are particularly interested in Latin American affairs also attended by invitation of the committee chairmen.

What he told the editors duplicated or closely approximated what he had said earlier to the congressional committees.

The speech to the editors and the question period afterward lasted 2 hours. It had been announced that Dr. Castro would deliver his speech in Spanish but would answer questions in English. However, he spoke in English throughout, occasionally asking an aide at his side to provide a word that he did not know or could not recall.

When he entered the ballroom, the applause was light and almost awkward. After he had finished, there was prolonged clapping.

Dr. Castro made these principal points:

His regime has executed only those guilty of war crimes. Those who were merely followers of Batista have not been harmed.

He has no intention of abrogating the agreement under which the United States maintains a naval base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba.

Cuba will maintain her membership in the mutual defense treaty under which the 21 American Republics are pledged to defend the Western Hemisphere against attack.

Cuba will provide hospitality, the opportunity to work, and help to exiles from other Latin American countries who hope to overthrow dictatorships in their own lands. However, he favors the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of other nations.

Cuba will not confiscate foreign private industry. On the contrary, she seeks more investment by foreign business to provide employment.

Cuba is not a beggar, and is not seeking money. What Cuba wants is more trade with the United States.

ATROCITIES CITED

Dr. Castro did not bring up during his speech the question of the executions. But when he was asked whether he did not think that a time had come for an amnesty, he replied with fervor.

He said that approximately 20,000 people had been tortured and assassinated under the Batista regime. "Why didn't the United States know about that?" he asked. Because, he said, "censorship had made it impossible to report what was going on."

"You have never lived under tyranny," he asserted. "It is terrible where there is no justice."

The Cuban Premier stressed the need for a free press, telling the editors:

"The first thing dictators do is to finish the free press and establish censorship. There is no doubt that the free press is the first enemy of dictatorship."

He said that the soldiers and police were being taught now that men were not to be assassinated for political reasons. This statement brought a burst of applause.

Replying to a question whether the Communists had played a decisive role in the revolution, he said that 95 percent of the people had supported the revolution, and that the support had come from the rich and the middle class, as well as the poor.

Those who know Dr. Castro well have said that he is not well versed in economics. But he spent much of his speech on Cuba's economic problems. "The country must industrialize," he said, "and also make full use of available land." He added:

"There is only one way to make wealth and that is to establish industry. And there is only one way to establish industry; that is by obtaining factories and machinery; and the only way to buy them is by having dollars. We must have a market for our goods."

LARGER SUGAR QUOTA ASKED

The problem can be greatly eased, he said, if the United States enlarges the Cuban sugar quota.

He pointed out that a higher percentage of Cuba's work force was unemployed than in the United States during the depression of the 1930's.

Although Premier Castro said he had not come to the United States for money, economists do not believe Cuba can solve her problems without external credits since, as Dr. Castro acknowledged, her reserves of gold and dollars are extremely low and the nation is running a serious deficit in its balance of payments.

The Premier was asked about a statement he was reported to have made at a labor rally in Havana, saying Cuba would remain neutral in any conflict between the West and the Soviet Union. He avoided a direct answer. He replied that Cuba was a poor country without troops or arms.

SMATHERS CRITICAL OF TALK

Senator GEORGE A. SMATHERS, Democrat, of Florida, who has specialized in Latin American problems, was disturbed at Dr. Castro's statement to the legislators that he did not expect to hold elections until the revolution was consummated and that this might be 3 or 4 years.

Senator SMATHERS was not satisfied, either, by Premier Castro's replies on Communists in his Government, and on the harboring of revolutionaries from other countries.

"It is clear," the Senator said, "that he hasn't yet learned that you cannot play ball with the Communists, for he has them peppered throughout his Government."

Later Senator SMATHERS issued a statement saying that "serious trouble was brewing in the Caribbean area," and that the source of the danger was "centered in Cuba."

In telegrams to Dr. José Mora, Secretary General of the Organization of American States, Senator SMATHERS urged the immediate creation of a voluntary police force to keep the peace in Latin America.

However, some of the other Members of Congress were favorably impressed by Dr. Castro's statements.

Senator RUSSELL LONG, Democrat, of Louisiana, said: "I feel reassured about a number of matters I've been concerned about in Cuba."

Representative JAMES G. FULTON, Republican, of Pennsylvania, commented:

"I was neutral and suspicious before, but today I was very favorably impressed. I think we should help him."

CUBAN NARCOTICS LIST MISSING

WASHINGTON, April 17.—A list of 50 narcotics peddlers sent to the Cuban Government to help stamp out the traffic with the United States was reported today to have mysteriously disappeared. Narcotics Commissioner Harry J. Anslinger said the disappearance had been reported to him by Castro Verde, Cuban representative of the International Police Organization. The list had been sent to the Havana office of Cuban President Manuel Urrutia Lleo.

CASTRO PROMISES CUBA WILL HONOR AGREEMENTS

(By Phil Casey)

Fidel Castro said last night Cuba will live up to its agreements with the West and asserted he had never made any declaration of neutrality between communism and democracy.

The 32-year-old Cuban Prime Minister, speaking on the "Meet the Press" television program, on NBC (WRC–TV), thus clarified for the first time Cuba's stand in the East-West struggle. Cuba and the United States are members of the 21-nation Western Hemisphere Defense Alliance. Member nations pledge themselves to stand together if one member nation is attacked.

The bearded revolutionary denied that his brother, Raul, or Raul's wife, is a Communist and said that if there are any Communists in his government their influence is nothing.

He promised free elections in Cuba as soon as possible, and said that, in any event, they will come within 4 years at the latest.

He denied also supporting the overthrow of dictatorships in other Latin American countries. He pointed out that Cuba's "doors are open to all political exiles."

He said that more than 1,000 people accused of war crimes by his followers "have been exonerated without proof and the trials are finishing in Cuba." Later, Castro told reporters that he would not allow Cuba to be used as a staging area for the invasion of any other American countries.

Earlier, he told a group of Philadelphia Cubans that he would fight communism in his country by building hospitals and schools and improving the lot of the people, not by using force against Communists.

Immediately after the telecast at 4001 Nebraska Avenue NW., Castro drove to the Capitol, where he went into conference with Vice President RICHARD NIXON in the Vice President's office.

After 2 hours and 20 minutes behind closed doors, NIXON emerged with Castro from his office and said to the Cuban: "We will work with you."

The young Prime Minister's long, exciting and tiring day began at 9:30 a.m., after only a few hours sleep. He had been up until after 3 a.m. riding around the city and Arlington and visiting housing developments.

After his brief sleep, he went to Mount Vernon, showing interest in practically everything, particularly Washington's 1,000-volume library.

At the Lincoln and Jefferson Memorials, where crowds of several hundred were gathered, Castro was besieged by autograph seekers. He signed their bits of paper smilingly.

Castro, who laid wreaths at the historic shrines, read both the Gettysburg Address and the Declaration of Independence at the monuments.

As he read the Declaration, Castro murmured: "It is a right of the people to uprise. * * * These words support the ideals of the Cuban revolution."

CASTRO RULES OUT ROLE AS NEUTRAL; OPPOSES THE REDS—SAYS IN TV INTERVIEW CUBA WILL HONOR AGREEMENTS—SUPPORTS THE WEST—SEES ELECTIONS BY 1963—PREMIER INSISTS HE PREFERS TO CONDUCT THEM SOONER—DENIES HE IS DICTATOR

(By Dana Adams Schmidt)

WASHINGTON, April 19.—Premier Fidel Castro of Cuba denied today that he favored neutrality and said that his country would live up to its international agreements.

The bearded soldier said that his heart lay with the democracies and that he did not agree with communism.

Dr. Castro was questioned about earlier statements that had been interpreted to mean that Cuba would be neutral in a conflict between the West and the Soviet Union. He denied this inference and implied that Cuba would support the West.

Dr. Castro denied also that either his brother, Raul, a leader in the anti-Batista revolt, or Raul's wife, Vilma, was a Communist. There have been reports to this effect.

If there happen to be any Communists in his government, he said, "their influence is nothing."

INTERVIEWED ON TV SHOW

The Cuban Premier, who led his revolutionary movement to victory against the Batista regime at the end of last year, was interviewed on the National Broadcasting Co. television program "Meet the Press."

Dr. Castro said general elections would be held in Cuba in not more than 4 years. He thought that it might take that long to solve our problems and establish conditions for free elections.

Previously he has said that elections could be held within 18 months to 2 years.

"Real democracy is not possible for hungry people," he declared. "Real democracy ought to be established over social justice and work for everybody."

Dr. Castro explained that although he favored early elections, thousands of Cubans did not want them because they remembered the politicians of the past who never did anything for the people.

He rejected dictatorship as a description of his Government and noted that it was a provisional regime.

At another point he declared: "This is a Government of public opinion."

An earlier plan to hold elections within two years had to be delayed, he explained, and "I have promised to my country that as soon as we advance we will have a free election."

First the executive branch must be restored, he said, and then the judiciary.

"The third power ought to be the Congress," he added. "But we need time."

Dr. Castro said he was against intervention by one country in the affairs of another.

"Our door is open for all the political exiles," he said in answer to a charge that revolutionaries of other Latin-American countries were plotting in Cuba to overthrow their governments.

State Department officials said they had heard rumors that Panamanian revolutionaries were gathering in Cuba for an invasion of Panama. But the officials said they had no confirmed information. Nor could they confirm that the U.S. command in the Panama Canal Zone had increased security measures.

U.S. officials said they had no doubt that opponents of the governments of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, and perhaps other regimes were present in Cuba.

Asked by what right he spoke out against the governments of other Latin-American nations, Dr. Castro replied that he did so in the same sense that others spoke about democracy, because he thought it was "not just for some countries to live under tyranny," as in the Dominican Republic.

Concerning political trials in Cuba, Dr. Castro said that more than 1,000 persons had been exonerated and that the trials were coming to an end.

Alluding to the right to freedom asserted in the Declaration of Independence, he asked: "What to do with those who abolish that right?"

Dr. Castro spoke hoarsely in English. Sometimes there were flights of eloquence, but there also were nearly incomprehensible passages. Several times he consulted an interpreter at his elbow.

While conceding the possibility of deception by Communists, he appealed to North Americans to "see what we have done" and not to believe "the first thing that can be heard."

Earlier in the day the 32-year-old bearded revolutionary leader visited Washington's home at Mount Vernon and placed wreaths at the memorials to Lincoln and Jefferson.

Still wearing the olive green fatigue uniform that has become his trademark, he drove to Mount Vernon through a light drizzle. Numerous United States and Cuban security men accompanied the motorcade. There were no pickets or signs of hostility among the Sunday tourists at the patriotic shrines.

After more than an hour's walk around Mount Vernon, Dr. Castro termed it "the most interesting place I have visited."

Comparing the American Revolution with the revolt against the regime of Gen. Fulgencio Batista, he expressed the view that such places as Mount Vernon would not have survived if the British had done the same things that Batista did in Cuba.

At the Lincoln Memorial, Dr. Castro walked up to the crowd of several hundred, shook hands and chatted. Then he went up the steps to the memorial and slowly, in a low voice, read the Gettysburg Address inscribed on one wall.

"Formidable and very interesting," he murmured.

Then, at the Jefferson Memorial, after placing a wreath of white carnations, he carefully studied the inscriptions on the walls.

Asked whether he thought Jefferson's philosophy supported overthrowing a government, he read these words: "I am not an advocate for frequent changes in laws and constitutions, but laws and constitutions must go hand in hand." He called this a "revolutionary principle" providing for "progressive change of institutions as the minds of men change."

FOREIGN PERIL IS SEEN

HAVANA, April 19.—Maj. Ernesto Guevara, a left-wing aide of Dr. Castro, is charging that foreign influences are trying to prevent the success of the Cuban revolution. He has made the accusation in speeches on two successive nights.

Though North Americans appeared to be his target, the United States was not mentioned directly in newspaper accounts of the talks.

The Argentine-born major, a field leader in the revolution, now commands La Cabaña, a Havana military fortress.

In a speech Friday night closing an industrial exposition, Major Guevara said Cuban enemies of the revolution were not dangerous because they are known. But representatives of non-Cuban capital are dangerous, he declared, and oppose Cuban industrialization and land reform.

Major Guevara professed to see parallels between Cuba and Guatemala, where the Red-influenced regime of Col. Jacobo Arbenz Guzman was overthrown by an invasion in 1954. He declared that the Arbenz government was moderate, but that a defamatory campaign was carried out, the Government was accused of being Communist and was toppled by an invasion financed from abroad.

WARY MIDDLE CLASS HUNTS CASTRO GOALS

(By Bertram B. Johansson)

HAVANA.—Cuban reaction to Premier Fidel Castro's U.S. tour ranges the gamut of attitudes from vamos a ver (wait and see) to confident hope that Cuban-United States relations are improving because of the trip. Premier Castro's anti-American statements voiced here within recent weeks are too fresh in Cuban memory to make what seems a sudden shift in emphasis completely credible in some circles.

Premier Castro begins his tour of the United States at a time when widening disenchantment with the pace and character of his revolution is appearing in many sectors of the Cuban community.

This may only be because the true nature of the revolution has not been successfully projected to all Cubans and foreign business interests. Also, no revolution can for long keep up its level of enthusiasm.

DISAFFECTION APPEARS

Nevertheless there is a decided disaffection appearing. Popularity polls which gave him as much as 95 percent support, but which Premier Castro has acknowledged had plummeted, are even at this writing registering a measurable rise as a result of his statements and his reception in Washington.

His public assurances that "we are not Communists in Cuba" have been interpreted as a warning to the 24,000 Communists believed holding party cards here and currently infiltrating the labor movement.

Premier Castro's indications that the Government would not be nationalizing foreign businesses or asking at this moment for transfer of the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo which is important to Panama Canal defenses, have calmed somewhat an anxious business community here.

INDEPENDENCE STIRS

Recent acts by the Castro government which many Cubans consider as increasingly arbitrary and imbued with a dictatorial potential, continue to disturb many intellectuals here, however.

The same Cuban spirit of independence which won out against Dictator Batista is beginning to question Premier Castro's methodology and procedure.

The absence of civil courts, the increasing number of executions ordered by the military courts—a marijuana peddler was given a capital sentence by a military, not a civil court recently—and the increasing contempt expressed by the Government of independent thinking, are producing seeds of intellectual revolt.

The island is in little danger of a government overthrow in Premier Castro's absence. His brother, Raul, who managed the Santiago contingent of the Castro forces with such ruthless efficiency, is in charge of the military forces.

Señor Martínez is the man Premier Castro sent to Santiago some weeks ago to conduct the second trial of the 43 Batista airmen who had been acquitted of charges of genocide by a lower court, but they were retried, at Premier Castro's insistence, in the higher court and punished—over the objections of the legal community here.

Drastic rent reductions of from 30 to 50 percent, which benefit many, but immediately dried up real estate investment, and the new Government regulations forcing sale of property at prices and under conditions which challenge the whole concept of ownership of private property, have thrown the professional and middle classes in Cuba into a state of consternation.

These still pro-Castro people, or rather, pro-independence people, who are feeling the disenchantment consist of intellectuals, businessmen, middle class white-collar workers, a few informed persons of wealth, who are now saying, in effect.

"We supported the 26th of July movement for the political revolution we expected would take place, but Fidel's social revolution, as it has begun to evolve, is too drastic. We cannot tolerate its present pace. Something has got to be done. Somehow he must be made to recognize this."

SHOCK TO MANY

That the Government and Premier Castro are evidently determined this is going to be a far-reaching social revolution has come as a shock to the professional and middle classes who were really the bedrock and inspiration for the revolution.

What is being termed Premier Castro's about-face on the middle classes and his catering in speeches to the "masses," and to the nation's 33 labor federations which failed to support his call for a general strike last year in April, have puzzled these intellectuals.

Furthermore, the accession of David Salvador, an avowed Communist, to provisional leadership of the powerful Cuban labor confederation has taken on the tone of betrayal to many of those in the professional and middle classes.

When José Figueres, former President of Costa Rica, was here recently addressing a trade union meeting, it was Señor Salvador who rose during the Figueres address to interrupt the latter's speech and say that Cuba's role did not lie with the United States or the West in the cold war.

This is the straight Communist line in Latin America today, where the effort is to neutralize countries in the area, one by one, and alienate their allegiance to cooperate with the United States.

CASTRO DESCRIBES LAND REFORM AS NEXT STAGE OF HIS REVOLUTION

(By Dana Adams Schmidt)

WASHINGTON, April 20.—Premier Fidel Castro, of Cuba, indicated today that the next big stage in the Cuban revolution would be agrarian reform.

He said his Government would expropriate legally uncultivated or badly cultivated land. Only by this means, he said, could Cuba hope to create an internal market and put to work its 700,000 unemployed.

The Cuban leader emphasized that he was not talking about nationalization or confiscation of land. His Minister of Finance, Rufo Lopez Fresquet, added the land taken by the Government would be paid for and would be organized into cooperatives.

Dr. Castro spoke at a National Press Club luncheon. Because U.S. security agents had received a warning that an attempt might be made to poison him, his food was separately cooked, and a waiter changed the dishes, butter, pastry, and water at his place just before he began to eat.

Policemen were stationed every 15 feet around the entrances, and many others were inside the building. Bearded Cuban security agents also stood guard.

Although informed of the precautions, the young Premier, wearing open-necked battle dress, seemed in good humor. In reply to a question about the revolutionaries' whiskers, he said:

"When we finish our job we will cut off our beards."

Dr. Castro made these points in an informal talk and in answer to questions:

Cuba has not received any offer of economic aid from the Soviet Union or any other nation—"and we have not asked for it.

"We didn't come here to get money. Many men come here to sell their souls. We want only understanding and sympathy.

"Where there are hungry people there is no real democracy.

"We are against all kinds of dictators, whether of a man, or a country, or a class, or an oligarchy, or by the military. That is why we are against communism.

"The last thing I am is a military man. I have this dress because it was my dress during 2 years, but I have no medals. I don't like military ornaments. Ours is the only country in the world without generals. It is also the only country without colonels."

VISIT TO CAPITAL ENDS

The speech ended Premier Castro's 5-day visit to Washington. He had been received by Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and Acting Secretary of State Christian A. Herter. But he did not see President Eisenhower, who was on a golfing vacation in Georgia.

Members of the Castro party said he would have liked to meet President Eisenhower, but he was satisfied. Before leaving by rail for Princeton, N.J., to continue his 2-week tour, Dr. Castro said:

"I feel very happy toward the people of Washington. All the people here were very nice with me. I am going to leave Washington really with regret because in my short days in this city I have come to know many good people."

He was asked whether he had achieved what he hoped for. "Yes," he replied, nodding vigorously. "I really believe."

Earlier Dr. Castro had placed a wreath on the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington Cemetery.

He also stopped at a school playground. The children, apparently admiring the beards and long locks of the Castro group, applauded enthusiastically.

GIVES VIEW ON ELECTIONS

Explaining his decision not to hold elections for 4 years, Dr. Castro told the luncheon that before a truly democratic vote could take place Cuba must take steps to put her unemployed to work and teach the people to read and write.

"If we had an election tomorrow we would win more easily than in 2 years," he added. "Elections now would be elections without opposition parties."

He was asked how, as a former lawyer, he justified "double jeopardy" in the case of Batista airmen who were tried a second time after having been acquitted on charges of bombing the civilian population.

With some heat he replied that if the defendants were entitled to an appeal, so were "the people."

His Minister of Finance said basis of land reform would be not size but use.

"We are not going to make the mistake the Mexicans made," Senior Lopez said, "by breaking up efficiently producing estates."

How much land owned by United States citizens would be affected could not be readily ascertained according to figures published by Cuba for 1955. United States concerns owned 39 sugar refineries with 40 percent of Cuba's sugar production.

CASTRO REACHES PRINCETON

PRINCETON, N.J., April 20.—Premier Castro came to this college town tonight to begin his crusade to reach American public opinion outside the National Capital.

He arrived without ceremony or much public attention by train from Washington at dusk.

CASTRO SAYS CUBA WILL LEGALLY EXPROPRIATE LAND

(By Phil Casey)

Fidel Castro, saying Cuba wants to be an example of "real democracy," told the National Press Club yesterday he will "expropriate legally" the land needed for agrarian reform.

This land-reform, the 32-year-old Cuban Prime Minister said, is the "base" of Cuba's economic program to improve living standards and help destitute and "starving" Cubans.

The statements came in answer to a question about American-owned sugar plantations. Castro did not make clear whether the expropriations would be confined to land now idle.

"We are going to expropriate legally lands for agrarian reform," he answered, "not nationalize them, not confiscate them."

Reasserting his belief in democracy and opposition to communism, Castro told the audience he wants Cuba to "be an example for Latin America of representative, honest government, and real democracy."

Predicting Cuba and the United States "will be wonderful friends," Castro said, in answer to a question about his feelings toward Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev: "We are against all kinds of dictatorship * * * that is why we do not agree with communism." He said he had not been offered or received any aid from Russia or any other country.

"Many men come here selling their souls," Castro said. "I really came here only seeking for understanding * * * honest sympathies."

The young revolutionary disclaimed any interest in the military. "The last thing that I am is military," he said, adding that he wore his uniforms because they are "simple," and stand for the heroism of the Cuban revolution. "Cuba is the only country in the world without generals," he said. "The only one without colonels."

From Washington, the Cuban went to Princeton University where he spoke before what was perhaps the most unusual seminar in the university's 213 years. Washington Post reporter Karl Meyer reported that Castro brought some 300 students and faculty members to their feet, cheering, as he spoke on "Revolution" before a meeting of the American civilization study program.

Before he entered Woodrow Wilson Hall, about 1500 undergraduates nearly started a riot of the kind traditional at springtime on college campuses. State police managed to restrain the friendly students from mobbing the rebel leader.

ONLY TIME WILL GIVE ANSWER—BEARDED YOUNG MAN FROM CUBA SELLS HIMSELF TO U.S.A. WITH HIS SINCERITY

(By Ben F. Meyer)

WASHINGTON.—It was not long ago that a lot of people around Washington regarded Fidel Castro as "just another of those Latin American revolutionaries." They thought he ought to go out and get himself a shave, and stop those executions in Cuba.

Today the bearded young man has a lot of new friends here, some in surprising places, who think he is sincere and is trying his best to do a good job for Cuba. They hope he'll carry out his promise of good government in the little republic long ridden by graft and dirty politics.

There are still some skeptics here, too, but they seem in the minority now. It may be because, as Castro puts it: "I did not came (sic) for money, but for friends, and to clear things about our revolution."

As he left Washington for the remainder of his 2-week tour, he could look back on a good start.

He seemed to make friends, all right. Boys and girls screamed with delight whenever they saw him.

Grownups, in high places and elsewhere, said they got a much more hopeful viewpoint of what has happened in Cuba, and higher hopes for its future under Castro.

Even at the State Department, where there was a great deal of reserve about the bearded man who came to Washington without an official invitation, one observer said: "The guy makes a good showing. He handled himself well."

Castro did nearly all of his talking here to newsmen. He addressed two gatherings of newsmen, gave innumerable interviews between speeches, and made one appearance on a television news panel show—Meet the Press.

Sometimes, he concedes, he does not say things as well as he would like. One of those times was when he said on the TV show that it might possibly be 4 years before elections could be held in Cuba.

It was the first time he had talked of elections so far in the future.

Talking with newsmen later, Castro himself introduced the topic of elections, and said he was "not happy—because I did not explain well." He bore down to explain that "I know it is hard to believe, but the people of Cuba do not want elections now." Cuban newsmen nodded their heads in vigorous support.

Fidel Castro appears to have established among a lot of people here the confidence that he is trying to do a good job.

But the confidence is not unconditional.

As one editor put it: "O.K. Let's say we believe he's sincere. Now it's up to him, as his program moves along, to see if he carries out what he say he believes in."

[From the Northern Virginia Sun, Apr. 24, 1959]

INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: CUBA VERSUS UNITED STATES—DR. CASTRO VIEWS THE LAW

Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro, on his good-will visit to the United States, is making an impression of sincerity and earnestness on those who see and hear him.

In his appearance at the National Press Club on Monday, he was charming in his speech to the newsmen, and forthright in his answers to their questions.

The two most difficult questions concerned the timing of the next Cuban elections and the war crime trials that have brought his regime so much criticism.

Asked about an earlier statement that his government planned to wait 4 years before holding popular elections, Dr. Castro assured his audience that his regime had no incentive to postpone elections, since there is an inevitable tendency for any regime's power to erode with time. Quick elections, he said, would result in an overwhelming Castro victory, whereas later elections might not.

Moreover, he said, after years of dictatorship under Batista, there is presently no party or other political organization in Cuba to furnish the basis for a fair test of public opinion. Elections, he said, should await the development of political parties and an attack on the problem of mass illiteracy.

This is sensible, provided the time until elections is put to good use in encouraging political organization—even by the opposition—and reducing illiteracy. The quickest test of his sincerity in making Cuba democratic, however, will be whether he encourages and allows a free press, free speech, and an independent judiciary.

The question about the war crime trials concerned a Batista supporter accused of bombing civilians acquitted by one court but later convicted by a higher court.

Under the American system of law, the Federal Government and most States are prohibited from appealing to a higher court the acquittal of an accused person, on the grounds that to take such an acquittal to a higher court constitutes "double jeopardy."

Dr. Castro's concept of the law, as evidenced in his answer, is different from the American concept. Since the accused, if convicted, has the right to appeal his conviction to a higher court, why shouldn't the government (i.e., the people) have the same right of appeal in case he is acquitted? Why should this be a one-sided right, Dr. Castro asks?

Actually, this view is not wholly opposed to the American philosophy, since those States which do not have "double jeopardy" clauses in their constitutions may appeal an acquittal without running afoul of the "due process" provisions of the U.S. Constitution.

Still, the prevailing concept is to regard an acquittal as final, which is in keeping with the Anglo-Saxon philosophy that it is far better to let a thousand guilty men go free than to convict one innocent man.

CASTRO MADE A HIT WITH U.S. EDITORS

(By Robert C. Notson, managing editor, the Oregonian)

(Mr. Notson has just returned from sessions of the American Society of Newspaper Editors in Washington, D.C., at which he was elected a director of the society, the first Pacific coast representative in many years. His impressions of Fidel Castro follow.)

Fidel Castro has done an outstanding job of selling himself to the American people on his current visit to the United States. This was a general opinion voiced among members of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, who heard him speak Friday in Washington, D.C., and who watched him perform elsewhere over the weekend. Appearance of the Cuban Premier had been attacked by some of the editors. Others had expressed misgivings over the invitation, which had bypassed the State Department. Despite all controversy, there was great curiosity as to Castro, as a person, and what he would do and say. A throng greeted him in the presidential ballroom of the Statler Hotel.

When he entered with his whiskered entourage, applause was sparse. A few editors struggled to their feet, a gesture common in case of a distinguished guest. Then a few more got up, followed by more. Most of the crowd stood, but it was a ragged demonstration.

At the end of 2½ hours of very earnest speaking by way of questions and answers, the crowd rose spontaneously and gave Castro a real hand. Editors who had been cool to him admitted that they were convinced of his essential sincerity and good intent.

Castro labored to get over his ideas in English, and did a pretty fair job of it, with only occasional aid from his interpreter, as he searched for the right expressions. It was difficult to cast this soft-spoken, but intense, young man in the role either of a vengeful conqueror or potential dictator.

The editors applauded roundly his statement that he was not a Communist and that Communists, if any, played no significant role in his Government. They also gave approval when he made it clear that he would favor the United States in any clash with Iron Curtain countries. He said that his "neutrality statement" had been widely misunderstood. He meant, he said, only that Cuba had no present ability to assist in any military enterprise.

He made it clear that he would honor all international commitments, including those for U.S. bases in Cuba. Without American bases, Castro said, Cuba would have no defense against external aggression.

The premier strongly justified his executions of war criminals. He protested the statement that has recurred in the American press that he was "executing followers of Batista." Executing mere followers would be a crime in itself, he said. While proceedings had been summary in some cases, in every one of them there was a well-documented dossier of proof, supported by testimony, he maintained.

Castro charged that 20,000 persons had been tortured, and put to death under Batista, and that the public treasury had been stripped of $200 million.

He made two telling points with the editors:

The revolutionary army had been singular for its discipline, and there had been no substantial instance of mistreating prisoners or abusing civilians.

This was the only revolution in history where there had been an orderly take over of power without rioting, looting and lynchings.

The reason, he said was that he had promised the people expeditious justice for war criminals and, lacking this, the people would have taken matters into their own hands. Military courts handled the cases, because all other courts had been corrupted by Batista.

He promised reconstituted courts in a few weeks and free elections in 2 to 3 years. An election now would simply result in overwhelming victory for his 26th of July movement, as there is no opposition worthy of the name, Castro observed.

He told of 20 percent unemployment and serious economic dislocations and declared that the first job of his administration would be to get business and farms functioning. Castro noted that he had been prodded by the press of this country as to when he would restore all freedoms. He said most of them had been restored, and all would be but the right to eat comes first.

Despite demonstrations, picketing and challenges, as the large delegation disported itself around Washington, no untoward incident was reported. The bearded retinue behaved in exemplary fashion. Castro brought many of his intimates who had been long with him in the mountains. He said he couldn't pick and choose.

THE CARNATION AS THE NATIONAL FLOWER EMBLEM

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I received this morning the following letter from the Crystal Greenhouses, of Tewksbury, Mass. Tewksbury is a part of Greater Lowell, where I live:

CRYSTAL GREENHOUSES,
Tewksbury, Mass., April 28, 1959.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
New House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE ROGERS: It is with great pleasure and equal pride that we send you this gift of carnations.

We hope that next week when the vote on resolution No. 56 comes up that you will consider carnations worthy to be voted the national flower emblem of the United States.

Our reason for wishing this done is perhaps a bit selfish; however, we feel the carnation to be a flower of distinctive beauty and most adaptable to all occasions.

Sincerely yours,

RUTH CAMUSO,
Secretary.

Those who enjoyed some of the carnations that were distributed today realize their beauty. These carnations have the longest stems I have ever seen in a carnation.

In my district, especially in Woburn, Mass., there are growers who produce equally beautiful carnations in many colors. In Woburn they know how to grow the orchid carnation, which is very beautiful and is used by one of the great silver companies in the United States in its advertising. I hope that sometime the House will have some of those carnations from Woburn.

I will appreciate any consideration that the Members of Congress can give toward naming the carnation our national flower.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, very gladly.

Mr. PATMAN. Is the carnation a national flower of any other country?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not think it is. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think it is distinctively a flower of the United States. I believe that Ohio has it as a State flower, but I do not think any other country has the carnation as its flower. You all know of the fragrance of the carnation and its clean, fresh fragrance, and when the carnation dies it does not leave an oppressive odor as some other flowers do.

The Belmont gardenias were first grown in my district, and they are wonderfully beautiful. They are gorgeous. Nick Longworth said it was the most beautiful flower in the world. Very beautiful and rare flowers are grown in my fifth congressional district.

THE HONORABLE LISTER HILL

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand the program of the testimonial luncheon today honoring the Honorable LISTER HILL from Alabama at the Mayflower Hotel in connection with the Health 1959 Award U.S.A., which was presented by the Washington Board of Trade and the Medical Society of the District of Columbia. I was privileged to be a guest.

This very distinguished gentleman was a Member of the House for several years. He was always very kind and very helpful as well as able. I remember his tremendous and helpful work for the veterans, and now that he is in the Senate, he never forgets them. In spite of all his work, he devotes much time to a general health program, and he has never forgotten, as have some others, improving the lot of the veterans, general care for the veterans, to see that they have enough money for research and hospital money and every kind of service for them. He does everything possible to be helpful to our veterans who some people seem to have forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this program be placed in the RECORD as part of my remarks as an expression of appreciation to the Washington Board of Trade and the Medical Society of the District of Columbia for its splendid recognition of a great Senator and a man dedicated to the health of the Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The program is as follows:

TESTIMONIAL LUNCHEON HONORING THE HONORABLE LISTER HILL, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM ALABAMA, MAYFLOWER HOTEL, APRIL 29, 1959—HEALTH 1959 AWARD, U.S.A.—WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE AND THE MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

AN EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION FROM VICTOR SCHINNERER, PRESIDENT, WASHINGTON BOARD OF TRADE

On these pages, you see a galaxy of distinguished names. They symbolize the high esteem in which our guest of honor is rightly held. But in their own right, they signify the wealth of talent and leadership which makes Washington, D.C.—our Nation's Capital—a great center of health.

The Washington Board of Trade is proud to be of service in focusing the spotlight of honor on an outstanding public servant—Senator LISTER HILL. In so doing, the board joins with him and his associates and friends in looking forward to new horizons of American health.

The great American system of private medicine is well represented today by our cosponsoring organization, the Medical Society of the District of Columbia. No great nation enjoys higher medical standards than we do, thanks to dedicated physicians of the type at this luncheon. The annual "Health—U.S.A." Award is, therefore, a salute both to the past and to the future.

For helping to make this association possible, the board expresses its gratitude to many civic-minded citizens and organizations—locally, to the Health and Welfare Council and the Pharmaceutical Association; nationally, to the American Medical Association, the American Pharmaceutical Association, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, the National Health Education Committee, and others.

Special credit is due to the board's own public health committee—to Chairman Richard T. Sullivan, M.D., and Vice Chairman Julius N. Cahn. Dr. Sullivan, active on many medical fronts for our community, has served in the past as delegate of the Medical Society to the Federation of Citizens Associations. Julius N. Cahn is eminently qualified to serve as this year's general chairman, in view of his very successful leadership of last year's similar occasion, his many responsible posts with the U.S. Senate and as chairman of various civic bodies.

Award chairman for "Health—U.S.A." is another highly regarded citizen, Ralph E. Becker, newly elected to the board of directors of the Washington Board of Trade and prominent in support of many notable civic projects identified with American health.

PROGRAM

Introduction: Richard T. Sullivan, M.D., chairman, public health committee Washington Board of Trade.

Invocation: The Very Reverend Monsignor Russell A. Phelan, Church of the Annunciation.

Welcome: Victor O. Schinnerer, president, Washington Board of Trade.

The U.S. Senate: Forum for Greatness: Julius N. Cahn, general chairman.

Greetings from the Congress: The Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON, U.S. Senator, majority leader, U.S. Senate.

Salute from private health organizations: Ralph E. Becker, award chairman.

Statement from the executive branch: The Honorable Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary, Health, Education, and Welfare.

Tribute from the Scientific Community: Selman A. Waksman, professor emeritus, Rutgers University.

Message from Alabama: John E. Bryan, general manager, Birmingham Chamber of Commerce.

Presentation: Dr. Howard A. Rusk, director, New York University-Bellevue Medical Center, Institute of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation.

Response: The Honorable LISTER HILL, U.S. Senator, chairman, Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

"GOLDEN AGE OF MEDICINE"—EXCERPTS OF ADDRESS DELIVERED JUNE 12, 1958, BY THE HONORABLE LISTER HILL ON THE OCCASION OF RECEIVING HONORARY DOCTOR OF SCIENCE DEGREE, HAHNEMANN MEDICAL COLLEGE OF PHILADLELPHIA

"We stand at the threshold of a momentous era—a Golden Age of Medicine.

* * * * *

"May I predict that within a few short years the world will see a momentous breakthrough of medical knowledge that will enable us to overcome many of the dread diseases that have plagued and baffled man through the ages. There is reason for confidence that this breakthrough will yield many answers in the battle against heart disease, cancer, mental illness, and other crippling and degenerative diseases.

"The breakthrough of knowledge will not come from any one discovery. It will be the accumulation of many discoveries.

* * * * *

"Medical research, tremendously expanded in the past 15 years, is making possible this dramatic new thrust in medical progress.

* * * * *

"Today we see a new unity of medical research and medical practice. New research findings, new drugs, and new techniques are communicated immediately to the practicing physician, and the local doctor finds new opportunity for greater service and accomplishment in his chosen profession, for greater satisfaction and rewards in serving his fellow man.

* * * * *

"But all the wondrous new drugs and chemicals, the ever more delicate and subtle devices, the greater knowledge of nutrition and preventive medicine, all we know of human life and its mysterious workings—these are only the sinews and the tools of medicine.

"The doctor is the mind, the spirit, the genius of medicine. The doctor is ever the central figure in the drama of medical care. All else is to assist him to do his best, to help him achieve the best possible results.

"We must realize that if the doctor is to do his best, he must remain free and uncontrolled. Only as the doctor finds the inspiration and enjoys the individual action that freedom gives—to explore, to inquire, to discover, to serve in his own way—only then can he give his best, only then can we continue the marvelous progress of American medicine.

"For even in the coming Golden Age of Medicine, medical practice will not lose its central, vital fact—the human relationship between the doctor and his patient. Indeed, there will be greater need than ever before for this reassuring personal contact in our troubled world, where the individual is beset on one side with massive world problems, and on the other is subjected to deep personal tensions.

* * * * *

"I say to you, go forward, doctors, into the ever-widening, the endless frontiers of medical discovery and medical knowledge, to serve as our fathers served: healing the sick and making whole the maimed, safeguarding the mothers in childbirth and the infant so newly come to this world, bringing life and health and happiness to our fellow man, following with humility and faith in the footsteps of Him who nearly two thousand years ago was called the Great Physician."

HEALTH—U.S.A. COMMITTEE

General Chairman: Julius N. Cahn.

Chairman of the Public Health Committee: Richard T. Sullivan, M.D.

Award Chairman: Ralph E. Becker.

Government Relations Chairman: Edward C. Sweeney.

Liaisons: American Medical Association: Cecil Dickson; Medical Society of the District of Columbia: Theodore Wiprud and Lawrence Zupan; Health and Welfare Council, Isadore Seeman; Printing, Joseph E. Jones; Reception, Mrs. Julius N. Cahn, Mrs. Ralph E. Becker, and Mrs. Edward C. Sweeney.

IMPORT RESTRICTIONS ON CRUDE AND RESIDUAL OIL

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is already apparent that the President's recent decision placing import restrictions on crude oil and residual fuel oil may have profound inflationary effects on our economy.

A few weeks ago I rose here on the floor to point out the dire results which the Presidential proclamation might have on the economy of New England. I pointed out that a national economic policy which continually inflates the cost of the raw materials we need, while it gives no support to the price of finished products we produce ourselves, can only bring disaster to the people of New England.

It is becoming increasingly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the President's ruling will have the most serious repercussions not only in New England, but in the Nation as a whole.

Because of this situation I have written to Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON, urging that the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth, of which he is chairman, consider as a first order of business the inflationary effects of restrictions on oil imports.

This afternoon I wish to review recent developments in the oil industry and point out the dangers for every American consumer.

On March 10 the President announced his decision placing strict import quotas on crude oil, residual fuel oil and finished petroleum products. Imports of crude oil were cut back about 200,000 barrels a day. Residual fuel oil imports were rolled back to 1957 levels, resulting in a heavy cutback. Imports of finished petroleum products were sharply curtailed.

The reason for this decision, we were told, was to strengthen the national security—because with imports curtailed, it was thought that the domestic industry would be stimulated to produce more and carry on more exploration work, so that in the event of a national emergency we would have ample domestic fuel supplies.

I have already addressed the House regarding the speciousness of that reasoning. Of course, the cutback in oil imports really had nothing to do with national security—it was, and is, a power move of certain economic interests to forward their lot at the expense of the entire Nation.

We may not yet realize it fully, but we are now literally at the mercy of the domestic oil producers. For years they have told us that they wished to raise prices—but obviously they hesitated in taking any such step, in view of the competition of oil from abroad. But now this restraint is gone—and without fear of foreign competition, the domestic oil producers may now raise their prices at will.

Naturally there are many other complex factors regulating oil prices. The balance between supply and demand in the oil industry is very precarious. But I think one cardinal fact is clear. By next winter, when we need vastly increased amounts of oil for home and industrial heating, the prices of oil will begin to rise far more than is seasonally normal.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with numerous oilmen regarding the possible results of the Presidential proclamation. All agree that prices will go up. After my conversations with these authorities, I have come to the conclusion that prices of crude oil may rise as much as 50 cents a barrel by next winter, as a direct result of the Presidential proclamation.

I have been shocked to read estimates that residual fuel oil price increases alone may cost my area over $100 million a year.

It is now common knowledge that oil prices will go up. The only question is when and by how much.

Naturally the principal reason for rising prices will be restricted supply. But the Presidential proclamation will have inflationary effects for other reasons as well.

Let us examine recent developments in regard to crude oil. The new regulations divide crude oil import quotas among American refineries principally on the basis of refinery capacity. What has been the result? As the Wall Street Journal pointed out on April 6:

Inland refiners who have not previously imported oil, because they operate too far from the coast, have been given import quotas and are selling such oil, without ever seeing it, at a profit to importers whose quotas have been cut and who can use the oil. And, of course, the consumer pays.

Mr. Speaker, reducing supply is inflationary enough, but when you add an extra seller through whom oil must go before it gets to you, you are increasing the inflationary danger still more.

I wish to quote from a recent letter to its shareholders, dated March 30, 1959, sent out by American Petrofina, Inc., an impoverished oil firm which realized a net profit of $1,542,504 in 1957. Harry A. Jackson, the president of this firm, informed the shareholders, and I quote:

The mandatory import program recently approved by President Eisenhower * * * extends long-awaited benefits to American Petrofina, Inc.

I would like to ask whether the intent of the administration's order is to "extend long awaited benefits" to American Petrofina or any other oil firm?

Let me continue to quote from this letter:

Under license just received from the Department of the Interior—

Jackson wrote—

the company is authorized to import 4,050 barrels a day of foreign crude oil during the initial quota period. The effect to the company of this allocation is of real significance and * * * should result in a substantial improvement in earnings.

Let me pause at this point to say that if I were a stockholder of American Petrofina, Inc., I would be delighted to hear this news. But as a consumer, and as a representative of a part of the Nation which is not studded with oil wells, I object strenuously. It is not the proper role of our Government to subsidize any industry in this way.

Mr. Jackson concludes by saying:

The prospects of your company for the remainder of the year are brightened by the Government's action, and I thought the information would be interesting and welcome to you.

For the Nation as a whole, Mr. Speaker, this news is not welcome in the least. It bears out what I have charged before here on the floor of the House—that the President's ruling will cost the people of New England, and of the Nation as a whole, millions and millions of dollars each year.

And who stands to benefit from this situation? Will the move help the consumer in New England, or the Midwest, or Far West—the average American family or business, trying to make ends meet? Or is the move simply a bonanza for the already wealthy and powerful oil interests of the Southwest? I believe the answer is all too clear.

Mr. Speaker, while the problem of crude oil imports affects the greater part of the Nation, we should also take particular note of the residual fuel oil problem. Here the inflationary dangers are just as great, and even more alarming for New England and certain other parts of the Nation which face a disastrous rise in already-inflated production costs. At this point I wish to include the text of a special bulletin sent to members of the Empire State Petroleum Association, Inc., by the organization's secretary, Harry B. Hilts, on April 3 of this year. This report shows that the President's ruling in regard to residual fuel oil is having disturbing effects on the oil industry, and may result in dire hardships by next winter:

1. Sixty-five percent of the residual demand takes place in the fall and winter heating seasons, while only 35 percent of the demand is consumed in the off months. Therefore, unless the overage above demand in the off months is made available for use in the heavy demand period we see nothing but chaos and maldistribution facing heavy oil users. The overage in summer supply cannot be held over because:

2. There is not enough residual storage available on the east coast to store the overage that will be available during the low-demand period. Nor, under the threat of continued restriction, is there any likelihood that additional storage will be built. This factor alone certainly is not in the interest of the consumer and, more particularly is not in the interest of the national security which seems to be the great concern in Washington.

3. This situation is further aggravated when the following factors are applied to the restriction of residual:

(a) Nineteen hundred and fifty-seven was a warmer winter than 1958. Since quotas are based upon 1957 imports this is in itself bound to bring about a shortage in overall supply to meet the greater demand created in 1958 and 1959.

(b) During 1957 there was abatement in the need for imports due to the industrial recession.

(c) We know of instances of new import contracts made in 1958 which did not exist in 1957 and for which no quota has been granted to provide for this additional supply.

4. Nineteen hundred and fifty-seven was a bad year for imports due to industry acquiescing to the Government's request to divert Caribbean-made residual from east coast ports to oversea countries during the Suez crisis. While some of this diverted supply was made up by gulf coast refiners, much of this product will not now be available due to the conversion of residual to coke.

5. Even if domestic refiners were inclined to make up the shortage, economics would be against them due to the unavailability of supply of heavy crude except in California. Even in the California area the industry is taking a long and hard look at its own statistical position which has resulted in price increases for this product.

We know it is not pleasant for anyone in the east coast marketing segment to review the above factors, but they are there. They exist in fact and not in fiction and unless something is done immediately to correct this situation, the responsibility will be clearly defined. Since the inclusion of residual fuel oil imports in the restrictions seems to be the result of a purely arbitrary political decision, the time seems to have arrived when it is appropriate for east coast congressional representatives to demand public proof of the harm to national security upon which this decision was made.

Mr. Speaker, this country grew and flourished because we had a free enterprise economy which stimulated economic progress and expansion. Only in dire national emergencies have we resorted to price controls.

But the Executive order restricting oil imports raises a serious question. If such a great industry is to receive special benefits and privileges—at the expense of all American consumers, and important areas of our Nation—then may we not be forsaking our free enterprise tradition?

Are we going to control and regulate our entire economy eventually, so that every American industry may have the same special protection now granted our oil-producing friends? I do not think this is the American way, or what any of us really want.

That is why I have called on Vice President NIXON's group to consider the oil import question on a top-priority basis. I am confident that if this group makes a careful study of the serious implications of the recent Executive order, it will recommend the early revocation of that order.

We will never enjoy price stability in America when one great industry enjoys the unfair and inflationary advantages now enjoyed by our oil producers.

I wish to include at this point the text of the letter I have sent to Vice President NIXON:

APRIL 25, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
Vice President,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I wish to urge that the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth, of which you are Chairman, consider as a first order of business the profound inflationary effects which may result from the recent Presidential proclamation placing import quotas on crude oil, residual oil and finished petroleum products.

As you know, imports of crude oil were cut back about 200,000 barrels a day, and residual fuel oil imports were restricted to 1957 levels. The reduced crude oil import allocations are already causing widespread confusion in the oil industry, and creating unnatural patterns of distribution which will eventually lead to increased prices for the consumer.

It will not be until next winter that the serious inflationary effects of restricted imports of residual oil will become clear. But the fact that production of residual fuel oil has become increasingly less profitable for American producers, at competitive prices, means that the consumer will eventually be asked to pay far more for residual fuel oil.

When supply is limited, and sources of competition are effectively removed, prices naturally go up. This is simply economics. I wish to suggest that the time to prevent strong inflationary pressures on our economy from oil prices is now, when there is still time to modify or rescind the recent Presidential proclamation before its most serious effects are felt.

It seems to me that the Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth could perform no greater service for the country than undertaking a careful study of the oil price problem at the present time, and I hope that serious consideration will be given to such a study.

With my very best wishes, I am,

Respectfully yours,

SILVIO O. CONTE,
Member of Congress.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

RECIPROCAL TRADE

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, the practice of reciprocal trade has many points in its favor as American exporters claim.

When it becomes all-inclusive, it has a backlash that threatens the very existence of some American industries that provide for our domestic needs.

When the United States lacks and needs such materials and products as coffee or economy-sized motor cars, it trades with these supplier nations in exchange for goods that we produce, and they require.

But when reciprocal trade is strained to the point where we permit low-wage foreign products to enter the United States when we have no need for them, and these goods undersell the American producers who provide for our home market we weaken the affected industries, and throw many of our own people out of work.

This is a form of economic suicide. Why our responsible officials not only permit it to happen, but encourage it, is beyond the understanding of the average American who rightly prides himself on his common sense.

The seriousness of this problem was highlighted last week, when the Governors of Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, made a special trip to Washington and asked the President for his help in overcoming the threat of low-wage imports. Foreign competition has the domestic textile industry on the ropes.

According to the New York Herald Tribune:

> The President said he was more inclined to set up a broader committee covering all distressed industries, but would consider a special one for the textile industry.

I submit that we have had a saturation of "committees looking into the matter," and special studies, that have gone around in circles. Their reports are immediately shelved. There is no remedial action.

Textiles have been the chief victim of this national indifference to their predicament, but other industries find themselves engaged in this losing battle. General Electric is one of our most successful industries, and one of our largest employers. This company, while providing for many civilian needs, is also one of the strong elements in the industrial base that is essential to our national defense. The quality of its products is unexcelled.

General Electric put in a bid for the construction of two generators required by a Texas rural electric cooperative. The Brown-Boveri Co. of Switzerland also put in a bid, and was awarded the contract. This foreign competitor is in a favored position to gain the contract for a third generator, and to build generators for a large western city. The loss of the Texas contract alone will eliminate 150 jobs for 1 year at the General Electric turbine and gear facility in Lynn, Mass.

There is bitter irony in the fact that an American industry is being undermined because an agency of the Federal Government does not have the authority under existing law to insist that the recipients of its loans shall "Buy American." In this instance, the Texas cooperative received an $11,480,000 loan from the Rural Electrification Administration. A portion of this money enabled the cooperative to buy steam turbines from a Swiss manufacturer, to the detriment of General Electric and its employees.

In the broad picture, covering textiles and many other enterprises, there is provision under existing law for the Tariff Commission and the administration to raise import duties for the protection of our imperiled industries.

As the administration side-steps this clear remedy, and diverts attention from the immediate problem by the delaying tactic of yet another committee to get lost in its studies, the Congress has no alternative but to pass a buy American bill in order to relieve the distress.

JAPAN

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, April 28, 1959, marks the seventh anniversary of the signing of the peace treaties between the United States and Japan. Over 14 years have elapsed since the end of World War II. During which time friendships and confidence and the recognition of the mutual interdependence have developed between the United States and Japan never before envisioned.

The continuing progress in industry and full realization of democratic institutions in Japan have skyrocketed that country well above the traditional poverty line of Asia. Though observers tend to ignore the progress being made there in favor of more dramatic confrontation of China's 5-year plans and those of India, the achievements of Japan with its range of choices within a basically liberal order have great significance to this country for its progress may determine the prospects for freedom in other Asian countries and the ultimate U.S. relations with these countries.

Japan's economy like our own derives its industrial upsurge primarily from a free enterprise capitalism. Their system operates with a few centralized decisions and the country is bursting with entrepreneurial vitality. Few corporations or enterprises are under state operation. In fact, Japan presently has a smaller public sector than it has ever had in modern times. The Japanese, remembering wartime bureaucracy with distaste, I am informed, do not press for nationalization anywhere. Within the last 20 years a reverse trend from nationalization has been the case, for the Japanese Government has turned over most of its properties to the rising business class, with the consequent result that agriculture and commerce are both now primarily in private hands.

For our purposes here an observation of William W. Lockwood in Foreign Affairs last fall is encouraging:

> Today the most striking thing about this island nation, relative to the rest of Asia and relative to the Japan of a generation ago is the advance in mass well being, the rising social mobility, the more equalitarian, the more open political and social structure.

There is a general lessening of gross inequalities in wealth and income reported Lockwood further stated and the farming class with rice prices guaranteed by the government lives nearly on the level with city people for the first time in history. Social security programs, he reported, cover over 12 million workers. While Japan offers a "pilot" project of productive economic capacity and can serve as the needed example to other countries of the non-Communist world seeking to stabilize their economies and raise the economic and social standards of their people, we in the United States must continue to cooperate with the Japanese that a working complement of the two economies can be realized mutually rewarding to both the United States and Japan in the struggle against the Communist economic drive into Asia. There is demand for more markets to compensate for those lost to Communist China and the Soviet bloc and there is need for income that imports of foods and other materials to sustain the swelling population may be secured. What happens in Japan is extremely important to us here in the United States for our future place in the sun is inextricably tied to Japan's place in that sun.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. RODINO (at the request of Mr. GALLAGHER), for the balance of the week, on account of death in family.

Mr. LOSER, for Thursday and Friday, April 30 and May 1, on account of official business at Nashville, Tenn.

Mr. BUSH (at the request of Mr. FENTON) for the balance of the week, on account of illness.

Mr. WEAVER (at the request of Mr. HALLECK) for 1 week, through Tuesday, May 5, on account of official business.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. POWELL (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK), for 1 hour, today.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Extra Long Staple Cotton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BASIL L. WHITENER
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, on April 28, 1959, I appeared before the U.S. Tariff Commission in connection with the investigation now being conducted by that agency in regard to the importation of extra long staple cotton.

Several of the New England States, as well as the southern textile manufacturing States, are vitally interested in this matter. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include my statement before the Tariff Commission in the RECORD:

STATEMENT OF HON. BASIL L. WHITENER BEFORE THE U.S. TARIFF COMMISSION ON APRIL 28, 1959, REGARDING EXTRA LONG STAPLE COTTON QUOTA

Mr. Chairman and members of the Commission, my name is BASIL L. WHITENER, Member of Congress from the 11th Congressional District of North Carolina. I am appearing before you to voice my strong opposition to any action that might be taken to reduce our present import quota on extra long staple cotton.

I have the honor and privilege to represent in the Congress a district that contains more operating textile plants than any other district in the United States. Thousands of my constituents earn their living in these mills. In addition, my constituents have millions of dollars invested in textile plants and machinery

The manufacture of textiles is vital to the economy and well-being of my district and to the State of North Carolina. If the cotton mills in North Carolina were to cease operation today there would be widespread suffering and economic distress throughout the State. It would result in economic disaster for our people.

Over 227,000 North Carolinians are employed in textile mills. This represents more than half of all persons enployed in manufacturing in North Carolina.

It is generally recognized by those who are familiar with the day-to-day problems of textile manufacturing that the industry is fighting for survival, not only in North Carolina but in other parts of the South and New England. The industry is suffering from inroads being made by foreign textile imports and an unrealistic international trade policy on the part of the Federal Government.

Aside from tariffs and other foreign trade complications, the industry is confronted with numerous other handicaps which affect business substantially but over which it has little or no control. As an example, I might point out that so long as foreign mills can buy American cotton cheaper than American mills and have their machinery and plants financed, in large part, with American dollars, our domestic textile industry will remain in a depressed condition.

I have pointed these factors out in order that we might have a background against which to view the problem before us this morning.

The Presidential proclamation of July 7, 1958, established an import quota on cotton beginning August 1, 1959. From all that I have been able to learn the quota, as originally set up, was generally approved by all of those in the cotton textile trade.

Operating conditions within the textile industry make it almost mandatory that contracts for cotton purchases be made months, and in some cases even a year, in advance of the date the cotton is to be used. In an industry that uses millions of bales of cotton and whose contracts for the sale of finished products must be made well in advance of the manufacturing date, it is apparent that considerable time must be allowed between the purchase and delivery dates of raw cotton.

The information I have indicates that the textile mills in my district, and I am sure the same situation prevails in other parts of the country where mills are located, acted under the Presidential proclamation of July 7, 1958, and purchased considerable amounts of foreign extra long staple cotton. A large part of this cotton was purchased during October, November, and December of last year and during January of this year.

In anticipation of the delivery of the cotton, mills have entered into contracts for the future sale of textile products. It will be apparent, therefore, to everyone that any quota reduction at the present time will bring about a serious condition for the mills and result in economic hardship for all concerned.

One of the most prominent textile manufacturers in my district informed me recently that he has purchased 1,500 bales of foreign extra long staple cotton against which he already has sold goods. It was his opinion, and I certainly share it, that if the quota already approved by the administration can be repudiated in part it will be, in effect, a repudiation of people like himself holding contracts.

A number of other textile manufacturers advised me to the same effect. In nearly every instance they already have sold textile products against the foreign cotton bought under present quota conditions. There is a feeling that if the quota is reduced it will mean a loss of confidence in Presidential proclamations on the part of the public in general and the business world in particular.

The textile industry, caught as it is between the squeeze of dwindling profits and soaring manufacturing costs, should be permitted to purchase cotton in foreign markets under reasonable and realistic quotas. At least, the industry should not be subjected to the uncertainty involved in arbitrary quota reductions.

We hear so much in Congress these days from responsible Government sources how vital it is to the economy of the United States that we engage in foreign trade, especially with the underdeveloped and highly sensitive nations of north Africa and South America. I cannot understand how it would be in the best interests of the United States to antagonize Peru, the Sudan, and Egypt by further reducing the importation of cotton from these countries.

These nations desperately need American dollars to bolster their economies. We should be anxious to supply these dollars through the accepted avenues of commerce rather than through some of our more unrealistic programs of foreign aid.

The matter before this Commission has far-reaching implications to the people of North Carolina and the textile industry in general. It is my hope that the Tariff Commission will take into consideration and give very careful study to all the statements that will be presented by officials of the textile industry and the cotton trade.

A number of the people who will present these statements are from my congressional district. They are responsible and successful manufacturers and cottonmen and have many years of experience in the textile industry. They are familiar with the conditions confronting their industry and are dedicated American citizens.

I know the information they will give to this Commission will represent their very best judgment of the matter under consideration, and their recommendations deserve the most careful study, as I believe they are the best qualified people in the country with respect to textile problems.

In conclusion I would like to impress upon the Commission the great importance of the matter before us to the economy of my district and North Carolina. It is my hope that the Commission will make no recommendations to the President calling for a reduction in the present import quota of extra long staple cotton.

Testimony of Hon. Chester Bowles, Member of Congress, Before Subcommittee on Public Works of the House Appropriations Committee, April 28, 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHESTER BOWLES
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my testimony given yesterday before the Subcommittee on Public Works of the House Appropriations Committee concerning several projects of vital significance to my district. My testimony follows:

TESTIMONY OF HON. CHESTER BOWLES, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS OF THE HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE, APRIL 28, 1959

First of all, I would like to thank the committee for this opportunity to appear in connection with several navigation and flood-control projects of special importance to eastern Connecticut.

There are three navigation study projects which have been authorized by Congress and are now awaiting appropriations in order for surveys to begin. I would like to call these to the committee's attention at this time.

1. The first navigation study, at an estimated cost of $10,000, involves the Poquonnock River at Groton. The problem here is one of shoaling. Over a period of years the mouth of the river has filled in to such an extent that it is difficult to enter the river even with a small boat. As a result, the recreational development of the shoreline in the area has been curtailed, and commercial use of the river has been prevented. The opening of the river mouth, in addition to providing a new area of recreational navigation, would also supplement the attraction of a projected State park to be located in this area.

2. The second navigation study, at an estimated cost of $9,500, involves the Thames River between Norwich and New London. This study would determine the feasibility of providing greater depths in the harbor for commercial navigation. In 1957 commercial river traffic amounted to nearly 1,000,000 tons, 96% of which was in coal, petroleum and allied products. If greater depth were provided in the harbor and channel, larger and more efficient fuel transport could be utilized.

3. The third navigation study, at an estimated cost of $7,500, involves the Connecticut River mouth at Essex. The problem here is again one of shoaling. Since the original establishment of the ship channel in the Connecticut River in the early 1930's, constant shoaling of the western shore near my home town of Essex has taken place. The problem now is of immediate concern to the people of Essex, since action on requests to the State for construction of new docks and wharves is being held up pending agreement on a specific plan to correct the deteriorating navigational conditions. In time, the shoaling condition at Essex will affect all river commerce on the Connecticut River. The study of the situation at Essex, if approved and funded, will permit the Corps of Engineers to indicate the basic needs of future navigation in this area.

Mr. Chairman, I urge this committee to include funds for these three study projects as an investment in the commercial and recreational navigation in Eastern Connecticut. According to the Corps of Engineers estimates, the total cost of the three projects is a modest $27,000. These studies are worth it, many times over, in terms of their probable impact on the continued economic growth of this area.

Let us move on, Mr. Chairman, to my second subject—flood control. No one who witnessed the terrible devastation in Connecticut wrought by the tragic floods of August and October 1955, will deny that our Connecticut citizens are entitled to swift completion of the necessary safeguards against any possible repetition of these disasters. Quite frankly, Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that action would have been taken in sufficient time by the Corps of Engineers so that the matter of actual appropriations for flood control dams at Baltic and at West Thompson would be squarely before this committee at this time. Unfortunately, this is not the case. I would like to go on record once more, this time before this committee, on the urgent necessity for these two critically needed flood-control projects. Understandably, I think, the people whose homes and businesses were swept away in 1955 cannot understand the long delay in providing adequate protection against a recurrence of this catastrophe. They feel, and I agree, that 3½ years is long enough to wait.

My distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. PHILBIN, who spoke to you yesterday on the need for the Westville Dam, has my wholehearted support for that project, as well. Here is another example of discouraging delays in a badly needed project.

The Westville Dam, a key link in an integrated system of flood control for the Quinebaug and French River Valleys in Connecticut and Massachusetts, was originally planned in 1945—14 years ago. Now funds for its construction are denied by the administration on the basis that it is new construction.

Mr. Chairman, to deny funds for the contruction of flood control dams at Baltic, West Thompson and Westville is to deny the citizens of eastern Connecticut and Massachusetts adequate flood protection from the only source capable of providing it—the Federal Government. The economy of our region has never fully recovered from the disastrous floods of 1955, with the $581 million in property damage. The loss of 107 lives is irreplaceable. Another such calamity would be catastrophic. I urge the committee to pursue, with every appropriate means at its disposal, the reasons for the redtape, the delays and the administrative technicalities holding up an integrated flood control system for this area. The people of eastern Connecticut and their neighbors clearly need and deserve prompt, constructive action on these projects.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the last matter I would like to call to the committee's attention is one of hurricane protection.

On April 2, 1959, the Corps of Engineers published an interim report of a hurricane survey of the Pawcatuck River area. This report, now being studied by the appropriate State agencies and the Department of the Interior prior to submission to the Congress, recommends improvements for the prevention of hurricane damages in the Pawcatuck area.

Since 1770, 58 hurricanes have struck this area, 30 of them causing tidal flooding. Studies of the Corps of Engineers indicate that if a repetition of the maximum hurricane tide of 1938 were to occur under present conditions, the resulting damage to the area would amount to $2.6 million. While this project is not now before this committee, there is hope that the final report will be transmitted to the Congress before the end of the session.

The estimated cost to the Government of this project is $409,000. I would like the committee to know of my firm belief in the necessity for this project. I have asked the appropriate State and Federal agencies for speedy action in transmitting this project to the Congress for action, and I would appreciate an opportunity to appear in support of the project when hearings are held on the appropriation for it.

One Hundred and Thirty-seventh Anniversary of the Birth of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED SCHWENGEL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, the 27th, at 12 it was my pleasure and honor to attend the memorial observance commemorating the 137th anniversary of the birth of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant at the Grant Memorial, First Street and the Mall, Washington, D.C.

This program was sponsored by the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, the Lincoln Group of the District of Columbia, and friends. It was our honor to have on the platform the grandson of Gen. U. S. Grant, Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant III, and Madam Julia Cantacuzene, the granddaughter of Gen. U. S. Grant; and in addition, the granddaughter of Madame Julia Cantacuzene who is a visitor from England and a guest in the homes of Madam Cantacuzene and Gen. U. S. Grant III. Also present were Mrs. Eloise Whitmer, president, the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, and Mrs. Anna Hausman, national registrar of the Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, and chairman of the program.

In addition there were leaders and representatives of several patriotic and veterans' groups present. The committee arranged to have the U.S. Army Band, under the direction of Major Curry, present and they presented an excellent program of appropriate music.

The master of ceremonies of the occasion was Col. Randle Bond Truett, Chief, National Memorials and Historic Sites, National Capital Park Service. He presented the Dr. C. Percy Powell, Research Director, the Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission, who gave a very appropriate invocation. The pledge of allegiance was led by Mrs. Martha Purchase, Dept. Pat. Inst., Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Maj. Gen. U. S. Grant III spoke briefly and made some very suitable observations about the occasion. Then, speaking as president of the Lincoln group, he extended greetings and best wishes of that organization. A very appropriate and erudite address was given by Comdr. John E. Allen, Assistant Director of the Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission. His subject was "The Determination and Will Power of Ulysses Simpson Grant."

Among things he stated so well he pointed out that Ulysses Simpson Grant's great opportunity came after the outbreak of the Civil War. On June 17, 1861, the War Department in Washington appointed him colonel of the 21st Illinois. His advancement to higher rank was natural in view of his military ability. His efforts, which were marked by dogged determination and strong willpower, had become evident and recognized by the summer of 1863 when Vicksburg was captured. His utilization of techniques of joint operations was successfully demonstrated. Naval forces, when required, were integrated with the usual assault forces, and certain of General Grant's plans of overall operations have become recognized as classic examples of joint planning. His will to win, by concentrating on dividing and destroying opposing forces, became a hallmark of his genius. He may be said, also, to have been a pioneer in the successful development of overall strategy in extensive military campaigns.

General Grant was accused of being taciturn or not given to extended conversations. It is noted, however, that President Lincoln had insisted that he was looking for winning generals; that in his view too much talk and too little action had occurred in certain instances. Of General Grant, Lincoln said, "I can't spare him, he fights." Throughout a series of victories which were to occur in the eastern theater, Grant's plan and strategy—in which he was supported by President Lincoln—was often to attack, when others might not have done so. Fortunate it is that he was doggedly determined to obtain victory in the cause of preservation of the American Union.

It is worthy of emphasis that General Grant as 18th President of the United States was twice chosen to lead the Nation in the highest office in the land. It was said of him during his Presidency that he unreasonably favored his friends. The facts do show that he was intensely loyal to his friends, to those who had worked with him and supported him over the years. In July 1849 Abraham Lincoln wrote that—

The better part of one's life consists of his friendships.

Are we to deny that General Grant was faithful to his friends? I would not deny that, but I believe that you may agree with Lincoln's estimate of the value of one's friendships.

As President, Ulysses S. Grant's tenure extended from March 4, 1869, to March 4, 1877. One of his notable achievements was in the field of foreign affairs; it was in 1871 that he settled the controversy with Great Britain by the Treaty of London. He was ably assisted in that endeavor by his Secretary of State, Hon. Hamilton Fish, of New York. In June 1885 he moved to Mount McGregor, near Saratoga, N.Y. After completing the writing of his memoirs—they are recognized as a historical classic—he died July 23. He was with highest honors buried in the Grant Mausoleum, built by public donations, located on Riverside Drive in New York City.

What were the attributes that enabled this good and great man to achieve tremendous goals? It is my conviction that his dogged determination and strong willpower enabled him to achieve the very highest of aspirations.

Mr. Speaker, I recall how great was what President Lincoln once said of Grant:

When Grant once gets possession of a place he holds on to it as if he had inherited it.

Then in a telegram to General Grant, Lincoln said:

I have seen your dispatch expressing your unwillingness to break your hold where you are. Neither am I willing. Hold on with a bulldog grip and chew and choke as much as possible.

Mr. Speaker, this indicates President Lincoln's attitude about Grant. History, of course, records that he was very satisfied with Grant. He had finally found a leader who would fight and had the determination and earnest desire to win and whenever possible he has indicated in the quote above, he encouraged his dogged determination and desire to win. It could well be said just as these were excellent characteristics in that hour of crisis, they are still good for Americans today and let us learn from this example, let us hold on to those great ideals we are pleased to call American and let us do our part individually and collectively to share these ideals with other freedom-loving people and encourage them in their fight to obtain the goals of liberty, freedom, and equality that our forefathers knew so well.

Thank you for your kind and thoughtful attention.

Promoting Industrial Uses of Corn Products

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES B. HOEVEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues all know, corn is grown in every State in the Union. Approximately 85 million acres or a fifth of the cropland is devoted to the production of corn. The value of the crop is almost $5 billion per year. Corn is grown on about 4 million farms or about two-thirds of all farms in the United States.

The income from corn exceeds that of the combined value of the next two most valuable crops which are cotton and wheat. More farmers raise corn than any other crop. Corn directly and indirectly constitutes a larger part of the diet of American people than any other single agricultural crop. This includes corn consumed directly, as milled-corn products, and indirectly in the form of meat, milk, and eggs. Corn is vital to the basic economy of the United States. Whatever influences corn affects all Americans.

I wish to devote my remarks to the cornstarch research of the Department of Agriculture. This research is being carried out by the Agricultural Research Service at the Northern Utilization Research and Development Division laboratories at Peoria, Ill.

From firsthand knowledge, I can tell you that northern laboratory scientists have been working for some years on several derivatives of cornstarch with important potential industrial uses. They are enthusiastic about their work—for the simple reason they considered it to be promising research important to agriculture.

The continuing research on cornstarch came in for special attention and intensification beginning July 1, 1957. In the following year scientific teams of 30 to 35 members were assigned to this research, requiring an expenditure of about $700,000. In addition, four research contracts, totaling $180,000, were let to bring in the work of industrial scientists.

The Department has advanced this research on cornstarch by a reassignment of regular funds, and with increased allotments for such research provided by the Congress in 1958 and 1959.

They have made startling progress. They have come up with at least two cornstarch derivatives that offer considerable promise for expanding the use of corn in papermaking, and in many industrial areas.

Let me tell you about these two particular products of corn. One of them is called dialdehyde starch. The other is high-amylose starch.

Dialdehyde starch from corn not only may find a substantial market in paper manufacture, but also as a tanning agent, and in the manufacture of plastics. High-amylose starch offers several industrial prospects: As an important component of transparent packaging films, water soluble films, edible films; as a permanent finish on fabrics, and as a constituent of plastics, lacquers—and of paper.

Dialdehyde starch will be available on a semicommercial scale from one industrial company this month. Another company is not far behind in its plans for this same starch.

The first commercial scale farm production of high-amylose corn occurred last year. It has been an essential part of this research program to develop corn hybrids that contain a high percentage of amylose. Two wet corn milling companies harvested 7,000 bushels of corn containing 55 percent amylose starch. From this they have produced 200,000 pounds of high-amylose starch for industrial evaluation.

This should be good news to every one. It is just one more case that supports the Department's broad research approach to agricultural problems.

All of our citizens benefit from these kinds of results. This is the kind of research that is going to help us whip our farm surpluses.

American Bar Association Proposal To Improve Agency Proceedings

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OREN HARRIS OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill based upon recommendations of the American Bar Association which have for their purpose to establish standards of conduct for agency hearings proceedings of record. This proposal was submited to me by the Honorable Donald C. Beelar, chairman of the special committee on Federal Administrative Practice Act of the American Bar Association.

Earlier during this session I introduced a bill, H.R. 4800, which was prepared to carry out the recommendations contained in the final report of the Legislative Oversight Subcommitee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce submitted to the Congress on January 3, 1959. The proposal recommended by the American Bar Association deals with some but not all of the problems with which H.R. 4800 is intended to deal, and the recommendations of the American Bar Association differ in some respect from the recommendations made by the Legislative Oversight Subcommittee as incorporated in H.R. 4800.

I have introduced the proposal of the American Bar Association in order to afford members of Congress and the American public generally, an opportunity to study the proposals of the American Bar Association and to compare them with the proposals contained in H.R. 4800.

It is my hope that by introducing this bill witnesses interested in this subject will take occasion to study and compare the two bills so that when hearings are held by this committee on both bills they will be in a better position to testify with regard to the recommendations contained in these bills.

Tribute to Rear Admiral Mumma

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CRAIG HOSMER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, Adm. A. G. Mumma's 4-year tour as Chief of the Bureau of Ships has been marked by spectacular technological advances in the design and construction of new surface combatant ships and submarines, by the development of improved electronics detection and communications equipment and by the application of effective methods of reducing costs. Four Forrestal-type attack aircraft carriers have joined the fleet and the nuclear-powered attack carrier Enterprise is taking shape on the building ways. A new fleet of atomic-powered missile-armed ships has come closer to reality. Numerous guided missile frigates and destroyers have been placed under construction. The first of these have already been launched.

The Bureau of Ships, under the guidance of Admiral Mumma, quickly designed a new type of nuclear-powered submarine to carry and launch the fleet ballistic missile, Polaris. Six Polaris submarines are now under construction and three of them are expected to be launched later this year. During the past year a project which Admiral Mumma helped to initiate and foster from the very beginning, the marriage of nuclear power with the revolutionary whale-shaped hull form of the experimental submarine Albacore, came into being with phenomenally successful results. The latest Navy submarine to be commissioned, Skipjack, is faster and more maneuverable than any other submarine ever built.

With the retirement of Admiral Mumma tomorrow, the Navy will lose an extremely capable and devoted officer. Admiral Mumma has frequently testified before Congress concerning the affairs of the Bureau of Ships. I am sure that his many friends in Congress will miss him and will wish him the best of success in his chosen field of endeavor.

Deferred Maintenance and Repair in Veterans' Administration Hospitals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERWIN MITCHELL OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I would like to insert in the RECORD the following report made by the Subcommittee on Hospitals to the full committee. The report cites the need for additional funds for the protection of the Government's investment of some $2.8 billion in Veterans' Administration hospital facilities and also for the comfort and welfare of our hospitalized veterans:

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON HOSPITALS, COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

Re deferred maintenance and repair in Veterans' Administration hospitals.

Report by the Honorable JAMES A. HALEY, acting chairman of the Subcommittee on Hospitals, on hearing held April 21, 1959.

The hearing was devoted exclusively to the consideration of deferred maintenance in Veterans' Administration hospitals. In the absence of the Honorable ELIZABETH KEE, chairman of the Subcommittee on Hospitals, Mr. HALEY presided as chairman. Witnesses for the Veterans' Administration were Dr. H. B. Cupp, Deputy Director for Operations; Mr. J. B. Baker, Controller, Department of Medicine and Surgery; Mr. Glen R. Stevens, Director of Engineering.

The Veterans' Administration witnesses testified that the budget for fiscal year 1960 includes $38 million for current and deferred maintenance and repair, $3 million of this is to be earmarked for deferred maintenance items accumulating from previous years, and the remaining $35 million is for current maintenance and repair of the stations during fiscal year 1960.

Summary of deferred maintenance and repair in VA hospitals

VA consolidated list of deferred maintenance and repair compiled for fiscal year 1959 budget	$15,000,000
List reduced by VA Central Office by reclassification and elimination of items to	11,500,000
Included in fiscal year 1959 budget for deferred maintenance and repair items	3,100,000
Carryover of deferred maintenance items to fiscal year 1960	8,400,000
Included in fiscal year 1960 budget for deferred maintenance and repair items	3,100,000
Deferred maintenance and repair items to be carried over to fiscal year 1961 from fiscal year 1959	5,300,000
Deferred maintenance and repair items accumulated each year over and above appropriations for current and deferred maintenance and repair	$3–4 million
Predicted deferred maintenance and repair items at end of fiscal year 1960, if appropriation for fiscal year 1960 for deferred maintenance and repair fund is not increased	$8–9 million

It was the conclusion of the Subcommittee that the Veterans' Administration budget does not contain sufficient funds to take care of the $8 million of deferred maintenance obligation which will exist on July 1, 1959. Continuing delay in making the necessary repairs to the deferred items will result in increased costs. Unless the 1960 budget is substantially increased for deferred maintenance items, the investment of the taxpayers of $2.8 billion in Veterans' Administration hospital facilities will be further depreciated.

The subcommittee voted to make this report to the full committee with the recommendation that the chairman of the full committee present this matter to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Independent Offices of the House Appropriations Committee, recommending that an additional sum be included in the Veterans Administration appropriation for fiscal year 1960 to clean up the backlog of deferred maintenance. In the event this recommendation is not favorably received by the Independent Offices Appropriations Subcommittee, it is recommended that the chairman offer an amendment to the appropriation bill on the floor to increase the Veterans' Administration appropriation for deferred maintenance and repair items.

Monorail Transportation for Seattle's Century 21 Exposition

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DON MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, the Seattle Transit Co. announced today that it has signed a contract with the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. to build a $5 million monorail system to serve the Century 21 Exposition in 1961. This is an historic step forward in the field of mass transportation. We are hopeful that this pilot model will prove to be the key to solving the growing problem of commuting to large metropolitan areas for work or shopping.

The first operational monorail line ever installed within a city to help solve mass transportation problems, the Seattle system will whisk exposition visitors from the downtown area to the exposition site a mile away in slightly more than 1 minute. Its radically designed aircars will carry 96 passengers at a time over the top of congested surface traffic.

An estimated 18 million persons are expected to visit the exposition during its 18-month run starting May 10, 1961. This revolutionary new transportation system will help handle this crowd. But of longer lasting importance and of interest to my colleagues is the fact that this system may be the answer to the Nation's commuting problems. I am sure my colleagues from metropolitan centers can visualize how similar systems could be used in their own areas to carry passengers from airports to business districts or from residential areas to shopping centers.

I hope that many of my colleagues will have an opportunity to visit Seattle during the Century 21 Exposition to see this monorail in operation as well as the many scientific and cultural exhibits which are being planned.

Frederick, Md., and Fort Detrick an Example of Exceptional Civil-Military Cohesiveness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN R. FOLEY
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, during my recent visit to the historic and progressive city of Frederick, Md., I was extremely and pleasantly impressed with the outstanding relationship that exists between the community and the U.S. Army Chemical Corps Biological Warfare Laboratories, Fort Detrick.

Normally, I would have noticed that there might be some sort of a friendly relationship between the citizens and the civilian and military personnel of this important defense installation; however, as I talked to many of the folks in town, I became immediately aware that Fort Detrick and the Federal employees, including the military, are vitally interested and participate in all facets of community life. This to me is important. It was wonderful news, news that caused me to inquire about how such relationships came about. Usually, we hear only unfavorable news.

The answer was given to me very simply. I was told by Fort Detrick people that "we live right and tell others about it." However, it goes deeper than that—and when I learned that the Fort Detrick community relations program prefaced a Department of the Army and U.S. Civil Service pamphlet for use by all Federal agencies, I thought it might be well for the executives in our Government organizations located here in Washington to visit Fort Detrick and see how the commanding officer, Col. Donald G. Grothaus, and his assistant for information and public affairs, Mr. Joseph Schwimer, plan and execute this outstanding program. I congratulate them on their achievements.

On the other side of the fence, I found that the Frederick Chamber of Commerce and the elected and appointed officials of the county and city, work hand in hand with Fort Detrick people—who by the way, do not single themselves out as "Detrick people." They are known as Frederick people. And the two-way communications system operates in top flight fashion—that can only mean one thing—that our Federal employees in the Frederick area have assumed their civic responsibilities. Mr. Joseph F. Rhoderick, executive manager of the chamber of commerce, outlined to me just how the people at Fort Detrick help out in the community. Not only are they generous contributors and workers for all charity and civic drives or campaigns, but Mr. Rhoderick pointed out that many of the scientific and professional employees from the laboratories pitch in to assist in the scientific and technical courses presented in the county high schools. The commanding officer encourages this and only recently, two scientists substituted for science teachers who were attending a teachers' convention—at no expense to the county. The substitute teachers were given administrative leave.

Mr. Rhoderick strongly emphasized the valuable assistance he receives from the commanding officer and his assistant for public affairs in the preparation of material for use in the community, that is, information material for local consumption. Every quarter, Fort Detrick tells the people, the taxpayers, how much this installation spends within the community for local purchases and services. It amounts to more than a million dollars a year, or about 6 percent of the total operating budget of the post. This is most laudible and I again congratulate the commanding officer for his foresight and resourcefulness.

I was highly pleased when I was shown the Meritorious Civil Service Award which the Frederick Chamber of Commerce was given by the U.S. Civil Service Commission in January, for outstanding cooperation with Federal employees. This award as made as the Commission was concluding its Diamond Jubilee observance, and unless my information is incorrect, the Frederick Chamber of Commerce became the first such organization to be so recognized. I congratulate Mr. Rhoderick and the chamber of commerce for developing this warmth of climate.

It is my pleasure to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two congratulatory letters, one sent to the Frederick Chamber of Commerce by the Secretary of the Army, the Honorable Wilber M. Brucker, and the other to the Chief Chemical Officer, Department of the Army, by Maj. Gen. H. P. Storke, Chief of Public Information, Department of the Army. In each instance, the diamond anniversary award by the U.S. Civil Service Commission to the Frederick Chamber of Commerce, was cited as another example of the continuing excellent relationship existing between the chamber and the people of Fort Detrick—in fact, this was the basis of the award. I know the letters are self-explanatory and submit them herewith:

FEBRUARY 11, 1959.

Mr. JAMES H. GROVE, Jr.,
President, the Frederick Chamber of Commerce, Winchester Hall, Frederick, Md.

DEAR MR. GROVE: It is gratifying to have the word that the Frederick Chamber of Commerce has been awarded the U.S. Civil Service Commission's Diamond Anniversary Meritorious Award. I hasten to express to you and your entire membership my personal congratulations, and those of the members of the U.S. Army.

I am especially proud that the fine relationship between the citizens of Frederick and the Army people at Fort Detrick—as exemplified in the Detrick Appreciation Week of October 1956 and the Diamond Jubilee length of service ceremony of August 1958—afforded the warmth of climate prerequisite to the Civil Service Commission's bestowal of the honor.

At the same time, we particularly appreciate the modesty and thoughtfulness of Mr. Lemuel D. Keller, your retiring president, and Mr. Joseph F. Rhoderick, your executive manager, in graciously deferring to Fort Detrick civilians and military as indispensable partners without whom this distinction could not have been achieved.

I well remember my luncheon with Mr. Keller and Mr. Rhoderick and the members of your official family at the Pentagon in March 1957, and was delighted to confer on the Frederick community the Army's certificate of appreciation. Thus, I am additionally indebted to these spokesmen for their complimentary recollections of this event during the course of your recent anniversary dinner.

Sincerely,

WILBER M. BRUCKER,
Secretary of the Army.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF PUBLIC INFORMATION,
Washington, D.C., February 5, 1959.

Memorandum for the Chief Chemical Officer.
Subject: Diamond Anniversary Award, Frederick, Md.

1. On January 29, the U.S. Civil Service Commission conferred its Diamond Anniversary Meritorious Award on the chamber of commerce of Frederick, Md. Attended by a large assembly of notables and guests and widely publicized through press and radio media, the ceremony focused much attention on a deserving community and its business and official leadership.

2. I am very impressed by the fact that the Civil Service Commission cited the excellent relationship between the chamber and the people of Fort Detrick as a basis for the award. Further, I am told the recipients repeatedly acknowledged the civilian and military of Detrick as their coworkers and partners in achieving the distinction. Whatever the criteria, great credit was reflected on the Army for its official participation in chamber of commerce sponsored Fort Detrick Appreciation Week of October 1956, and the joint Frederick-Detrick-Civil Service Commission Diamond Jubilee ceremonies of August 1958.

3. I am mindful, in this connection, of those on the military side of the fence in Frederick whose efforts have brought about such a warmth of climate and mutual understanding, notably Col. Donald G. Grothaus, the Fort Detrick commander, and his special assistant for public affairs, Mr. Joseph Schwimer. These men are obviously working as a team in rounding out a splendid community-relations balance sheet and recent events in Frederick bespeak their many accomplishments.

4. The Secretary of the Army is expressing his congratulations on the meritorious award in a letter to officials of the Frederick Chamber of Commerce. May I, in turn, express our own compliments to Colonel Grothaus, Mr. Schwimer, and all of the personnel at Fort Detrick. They are doing a fine job in many different ways and they deserve the Army's sincere appreciation.

H. P. STORKE,
Major General, GS, Chief of Public Information.

St. Elizabeths Hospital

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill drafted by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare "to amend the laws relating to St. Elizabeths Hospital so as to fix the salaries of the superintendent, assistant superintendent, and first assistant physician of the hospital, and for other purposes."

This bill is similar to H.R. 9416, which was submitted to the 85th Congress in August 1957 in order to meet a long-standing problem concerning the furnishing of quarters, subsistence, and other items of maintenance to the three top officials of St. Elizabeths, and to provide them with salaries which more realistically reflect their professional status and their responsibilities.

In his letter of transmittal accompanying the bill, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare Arthur S. Flemming, describes the need for this legislation as urgent. As he points out:

> In the interval between submittal of this legislation to the 85th Congress and the present date, the incumbent of the position of Assistant Superintendent has retired and accepted a more lucrative position outside the Government. In addition, the incumbent of the first assistant physician's position has died and only recently been replaced by a promotion from within St. Elizabeths Hospital of a physician who is nearing retirement. This bill is an essential step in placing the Department in a position where it can hope to recruit qualified persons for these very important posts.

Oil Imports and Gravy Trains

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HARRIS B. McDOWELL, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, at the time of the Executive order which restricted the importation oil by the mandatory import program, I issued a press release voicing my concern for the effect of the program upon the eastern seaboard consumers. Soon after the printing of this release, I was pleased to receive from Mr. Harry B. Hilts, secretary of the Empire State Petroleum Association, a letter with some pertinent data which vindicates my position. Mr. Hilts' letter contained an enclosure—a copy of a statement to its shareholders by American Petrofina, Inc., a Belgian controlled corporation which started operation in the U.S. market in October of 1956.

Because I feel, as does Mr. Hilts, that "the eastern seaboard consumers will be required to foot the bill involved in this gravy-train operation," I feel it necessary to bring to the attention of my colleagues, a description of my position, and the information conveyed to me supporting my stand. Consequently, I under unanimous consent, introduce the following material as an extension of remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

First. My press release of March 26, 1959.

Second. Mr. Hilts' letter of April 13, 1959, describing the position of the Empire State Petroleum Association which Mr. Hilts represents.

Third. A statement of March 30, 1959, issued to its stockholders by American Petrofina, Inc.

Fourth. My reply of April 17, 1959, to Mr. Hilts.

Fifth. Mr. Hilts latest communication of April 20, 1959.

McDOWELL ATTACKS PRESIDENT'S DECISION TO CUT OIL IMPORTS

Congressman HARRIS B. McDOWELL, JR. Democrat, of Delaware, in a strong indictment of President Eisenhower's move to protect large American oil corporations, made the following statement:

"We have been hearing a lot of talk lately about inflation from the administration. Prevention of inflation seems to have been the main thing on Mr. Eisenhower's mind as we have seen from his policy of a balanced budget and tight money. He has insinuated that the Democratic Congress is composed of nothing but spendthrifts and budget busters who are bent on destroying the economy by producing inflationary conditions.

"And yet, this same President has seen fit to cut the amount of oil which this country can import. This will definitely cause more inflation than any move the Congress could make if it were bent upon producing inflation, and of course, the Congress is not." McDOWELL went on, saying:

"While the President's order cuts crude oil imports about 25 percent, it slashes the import of gasoline and other refined oil products more drastically. To the ordinary consumer, this means the price of gasoline will go up since with less gasoline on the market, more money is required to buy it. It means the consumer's heating bill will become larger if he heats his home with oil or any oil product.

"To the businessman, this decision means a rise in the cost of manufacturing since he must pay a greater price for oil which he consumes in large quantities. By increasing the cost of doing business, this will increase the cost of buying every article that American business manufactures. Then too, when products of American industry must be sold at a higher price, our domestic manufacturers will be at a disadvantage on the world market since they cannot sell their products as cheaply as other nations with whom they are competing.

"We can easily see that the President's decision is totally inconsistent with his previous demand to eliminate inflationary tendencies from the economy. It is also inconsistent with the President's expressed desire to aid foreign countries and increase our prestige in the international arena. As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, I am deeply concerned with the effect the oil import cut will have upon our relations with friendly producer nations. Our good trade relations with Canada essentially will be destroyed, and the damage this decision will do to our already strained relationships with South America and the Middle East will be irreparable. The economic stability of these countries, whose friendship we need so badly, depends to a great extent upon the money they receive from selling oil to the United States. The President's action can do nothing but cause a loss of friendship, and a weakening of these countries' economy, making them even more susceptible to Communist influence and infiltration. This we absolutely cannot afford.

"The President has attempted to give reasons for the decision. He stated that we must cut oil imports and develop America's ability to produce oil so that in the event of a major war, the United States would not have to depend upon foreign markets. This argument is so ill advised that it becomes ridiculous."

Congressman McDOWELL pointed to its weaknesses by stating:

"First of all by cutting off oil imports we may be increasing the American oil industry's capacity to produce more oil by increasing its employees and the size of its production plants, but along with this we are depleting the available supply of domestic oil. Secondly, the United States has sufficient oil-producing capacity right now to fight a big war. Our worry is not whether we have enough oil for war * * * we have that. The real problem is whether or not we have an adequate amount of defense to prevent a major war from starting. Thirdly, in case of a limited war, the United States would not be severed from all foreign oil sources. Oil from Canada is is piped into this country, and consequently would be free from enemy action on the high seas. Fourthly, it is true that some of our foreign sources of oil would be cut off in time of war, but, with this in mind, should we not allow at least part of America's oil to lie underground and should we not take advantage of the opportunity, which may not always be with us, to bring in oil from the Middle East and South America?"

Congressman McDOWELL went on to say: "The President's decision is harmful to every State in this Union which depends upon oil imports. This means that his decision is harmful to all but a handful of western oil-producing States. It is a devastating blow to every consumer in this country, especially those east of the Mississippi River, for both business and consumers in this area depend heavily upon imported oil.

"The only people to benefit from the President's decision are those running our large oil companies and, I might add, it is not only the Democrats who are saying that the President is looking out for the oil interests which are financially well off to start with. Senator GEORGE AIKEN, Republican, of Vermont, delivered a scorching criticism of the President's plan."

McDOWELL said, in conclusion: "Although politics is not the reason for criticism of the decision, politics can be the only reason for the President's order. It looks as if there is collusion between certain people in both political parties to protect the oil producers in exchange for their political support. I, for one, however, will voice my disgust when I see politics played to this extent. This decision, by annihilating a major source of oil, the lifeblood of our Nation, can do nothing but cause unjustified hardship to the consumer, weaken our defenses, and decrease our stature in the field of international relations."

EMPIRE STATE PETROLEUM
ASSOCIATION, INC.,
New York, N.Y., April 13, 1959.

The Honorable HARRIS B. McDOWELL, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. McDOWELL: We are enclosing herewith a copy of a letter sent recently to its shareholders by American Petrofina, Inc., a Belgian-controlled concern which began operating in the U.S. market on October 1, 1956.

We call your attention to the following quotation which we have underlined in the attached letter—

"* * * upon the basis of negotiations just concluded, should result in a substantial improvement in earnings."

Since the refineries owned by this company are located at inland sites, far removed from ports of entry used by oversea tankers, they cannot readily use imported oil in their operations. Thus, we assume that the substantial improvement referred to above will result from the sale of American Petrofina's oil imports under the quota system to refiners whose locations permit them to process imported oil.

So that you may more fully understand the gravy-train aspect of the situation referred to above, we estimate the windfall profit to this company as follows: Based on the going market price for foreign oil brought in under the quota system, when transferred from the quota holder to another refiner in need of the oil, we assume the additional sums accruing to American Petrofina, Inc., will total between $1 and $1.5 million this year.

We have, of course, no bone to pick with American Petrofina per se. We submit their letter only as a typical illustration of how former nonimporting refiners stand to benefit from current import restrictions.

This type of transaction is legal under the quota restrictions, but is assuming all the aspects of a "black market" operation. To substantiate this, the McGraw-Hill Publishing Co.'s daily Oilgram on March 20 pointed out that this traffic will add approximately $30 million to the coffers of formerly nonimporting refiners this year, thereby creating an inflationary impact on consumer oil prices.

We call your attention to the fact that eastern seaboard consumers will be required to foot most of the bill involved in this gravy-train operation.

Sincerely,

HARRY B. HILTS,
Secretary.

AMERICAN PETROFINA, INC.,
New York, N.Y., March 30, 1959.

To the Shareholders:

The mandatory import program recently approved by President Eisenhower, and to which reference was made in the company's 1958 annual report, extends long-awaited benefits to American Petrofino, Inc.

Under the license just received from the Department of the Interior, dated March 11, 1959, the company is authorized to import 4,050 barrels of foreign crude oil per day during the initial quota period. The effect to the company of this allocation is of real significance and, upon the basis of negotiations just concluded, should result in a substantial improvement in earnings.

During 1958, refinery realizations on manufactured products were severely depressed as a result of the availability of low-cost foreign crudes and products to various authorized companies operating under the voluntary import program, as well as to others who elected to ignore the requirements of that plan.

The controls established under the mandatory program should now prevent many of the costly abuses of the past and contribute thereby to an improvement in market conditions.

The prospects for your company for the remainder of the year are brightened by the Government's action, and I thought the information would be interesting and welcome to you.

HARRY A. JACKSON, President.

APRIL 17, 1959.

Mr. HARRY B. HILTS
Secretary, Empire State
Petroleum Association, Inc.
New York, N.Y.

DEAR MR. HILTS: I appreciate your letter and enclosure of April 13 for it gives factual information backing my objections to the mandatory import program. Any further information of this nature, dealing particularly with the effects of this program on the eastern seaboard consumer would be most helpful to me.

It is my feeling that your letter is the type which would be extremely effective as an extension of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I would like to introduce it with its enclosure as such. I will, however, be guided by your feelings on this proposal and I would appreciate your expressing them to me as quickly as possible.

I truly hope that I may be of assistance to you in finding a remedy to this situation.

Sincerely,

HARRIS B. MCDOWELL, Jr.,
Member of Congress.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCDOWELL: Thank you for your letter of April 17 in which you acknowledge my letter to you of April 13 and its enclosure concerning our objection to the mandatory restrictions on petroleum imports.

I note your suggestion concerning the extension of this letter and its enclosure to your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and would be very happy to have you use my letter and its enclosure in this way.

Sincerely,

HARRY B. HILTS, Secretary.

Statement by Hon. Cornelius E. Gallagher, of New Jersey, in the House of Representatives, Wednesday, April, 29, 1959

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I would like to insert in the RECORD the testimony which I gave today before the House Judiciary Committee on my bill H.R. 4193, which would authorize compacts between States, such as New York and New Jersey, to grant uniform tax treatment of out-of-State residents employed in a State:

STATEMENT BY HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER, OF NEW JERSEY, BEFORE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, APRIL 29, 1959

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the district which I am privileged to represent lies just across the Hudson River from New York City. Every working day thousands of the residents of this district and many more thousands in the northern New Jersey area cross under the river into Manhattan where they are employed. A lesser number of New York residents commute from their homes in New York to jobs in New Jersey.

The income of the New Jersey residents employed in New York is taxed by that State, and taxed, it might be noted, at rates somewhat higher than are imposed on the citizens of New York. The income of the New York residents which is derived from their employment in New Jersey is not taxed. And therein lies an inequity which works an increasing economic hardship on the New Jersey residents involved.

It is important to note that this situation exists not only in the northern New Jersey and Metropolitan New York area, but in many other areas of New Jersey and in other States, where there is interstate movement of workers.

It is true that a New Jersey resident working in New York benefits from certain community services, such as police and fire protection, in the area of his employment. It may be argued that he should, in all fairness, be taxed, just as the State's own citizens are taxed, for these services. There is grave doubt, however, of the fairness of taxation of the income of an out-of-State employee at the same, or higher rates at which the citizen of the State concerned is taxed. The latter receives the full benefit of all services of his State and community on a 24-hour, 365-days-a-year basis.

The out-of-State employees, on the other hand, receive limited services, certainly nothing so extensive as the schooling of his children, for which he must pay heavily in his own State, and receives these services for only the length of a normal working day—8 hours.

I am aware that this committee is giving most serious attention to the broad aspects of the levy by one State on income earned therein by the resident of another State, and has before it for consideration several proposals. I am, certainly, in agreement with the objectives of the various proposals, for the inequity of such practice is recognized even by those States which derive benefit from it. The Governor of New York, for example, has noted that the taxation of nonresident employees is a matter to which the legislature of that State should give attention.

It is only realistic, and I am sure you will agree, that relief can hardly be expected from the governing body of a State hard-pressed for public funds, and such is the case in most States. If there is to be relief in the foreseeable future, it will come as the result of action by the Congress.

H.R. 4193, which I have introduced and which is cosponsored by other New Jersey Members of the Congress, is designed to grant the consent of the Congress to any two or more States to enter into compacts to grant uniform tax treatment of nonresidents through agreements not to discriminate between residents and nonresidents in the levy and collection of taxes. Such compacts would be subject to ratification by the States involved and approval by the Congress.

The objective of my bill is an immediate solution to the problem in a manner less difficult than seeking a constitutional amendment such as is sought in other proposals. I am confident that the passage of H.R. 4193 will spark action between New York and New Jersey leading to a compact, and that such compact would give relief to the nonresident employees of business firms in that State. This would apply not only to New Jersey residents but to those of other States. I am hopeful that such a compact might be an example for other States concerned with the problem of unfair taxation of nonresident employees.

The complex of the commerce of this Nation is such that there is bound to be an increase in instances where the residents of one State are, of necessity, employed in an adjoining State. Interstate boundaries were never intended to be barriers to employment. Should they become barriers, certainly the development of the Nation's commerce would be impeded.

The bill for which I speak today is merely an authorization for two or more States to act in this matter, to reach agreements which would resolve a tax situation which is generally agreed to be grossly unfair. I urge the favorable consideration of the committee. Thank you.

Transfer Freedmen's Hospital to Howard University

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a bill to transfer Freedmen's Hospital to Howard University, with provision for construction of a new teaching hospital. I hope that Congress will give swift approval to this legislation, which will make possible the construction of urgently needed new facilities for Howard University's medical teaching program and for proper care of the patients at Freedmen's Hospital.

Action on this bill would not only help alleviate the national shortage of medical and allied personnel, it would end the anomaly of the Federal Government's operating a community hospital. It would make the hospital an integral part of the university, with the advantages of unified responsibility and control. Under private control and with new facilities, it could become progressively more self-supporting, without impairment of its teaching function.

This proposal has been drafted by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is similar to the bill which the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the other House reported favorably last year, but which was not acted upon in the final rush of adjournment. It includes provisions to assure continuation of equal pay and benefits to the employees who will be transferred, and gives them all the security it can without continuing them as Federal employees. I understand in addition that Howard University has recently expressed its willingness to accept and operate Freedmen's Hospital in accordance with the provisions of the bill, and has spelled out the undertakings it is prepared to incorporate in the terms of the agreement.

Statement by Hon. Isidore Dollinger, of New York, on H.R. 2526

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I am including in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my statement to the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with my bill, H.R. 2526:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee on the Judiciary, on January 15, 1959, I introduced H.R. 2526, a bill to prohibit certain acts involving the importation, transportation, possession, or use of explosives with intent to destroy or damage any communal building, residence, or place of business.

The outbreak of anti-Semitic violence last fall shocked every right-thinking American. The bombings and attempted dynamitings of Hebrew congregations, temples, and centers, which occurred in Atlanta, Peoria, Miami, Nashville, Jacksonville, Charlotte, Gastonia, and Birmingham, as well as threats to numerous synagogs throughout the country were indisputable evidence of a new wave of terror and hatred directed against Jews; we have proof of a substantial increase in anti-Semitic defamation by publications promoting religious hatred. Anti-Semitic defamation and violence against Jews and Jewish property constitute a serious problem; it must have our intelligent and effective attention, and a solution must be found.

The lawlessness rampant in communities where the acts of violence took place is a symptom of the general breakdown of respect for law in those areas; lawlessness is the inevitable consequence of disrespect for law. Therefore, any approach to the problem which does not reach the root of the evil—disrespect for law—will prove of no avail. Also, remedies must be sought within the framework of constitutional limitations.

I would also point out that the number of houses-of-worship bombings in the South is a relatively small one as compared to the scores of bombings of residences and business places owned by Negroes. Therefore, any legislation which seeks to impose Federal penalties upon vandals and unlawful users of dynamite must, if it is to have any significance, include in its compass those who use dynamite against private dwellings and places of business. My bill would represent an effective, if modest, step in meeting the problem and would give some protection to all those who are victims or intended victims of bombings.

When leaders of State governments express their defiance of the U.S. Constitution, they set an example for the entire community and then members of the community feel free to show their disrespect in any way they choose. Dynamiting is one result; lynching another. The Nation was shocked and outraged by the abduction of Mack Charles Parker who was tortured and lynched. This horrible act proves that respect for law is more important than ever; it also proves that the Federal Government must act without delay to prevent such unspeakable barbarism. Local leaders cannot be trusted to protect the rights of all those within State boundaries; the American people through Congress demand that all persons in our country be assured of their rights granted by the Constitution.

My bill being considered today covers only one factor and would help eliminate only one evil. I trust your committee will take favorable action on it or similar legislation, and that you will also proceed with dispatch to vote out other bills which concern civil liberties and protection of those now discriminated against, terrorized, and deprived of their rights.

Democratic Victory in 1960

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES M. QUIGLEY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 29, 1959

Mr. QUIGLEY. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday evening the Young Men's Democratic Society of York County, Pa., held its 67th annual Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner at the Valencia Ballroom in the city of York. The speaker on this occasion was our distinguished colleague from the Fourth District of Alabama, Hon. KENNETH A. ROBERTS. It is a pleasure for me to bring to your attention the speech which Mr. Roberts delivered to his York audience:

It is a great pleasure for me to be here tonight, as I always get a high sense of pleasure in gathering with Democrats anywhere.

I feel at home with Democrats wherever I am, even though I may be in Yankee territory. I'm glad that I am here on friendly terms, because I understand that when I crossed over into York County today I also crossed over what some southerners have called the Smith & Wesson line. I think you call it the Mason-Dixon line.

It is a privilege to be in the 19th Pennsylvania District, which is served so ably by my good friend and your distinguished Congressman, the Honorable JAMES M. QUIGLEY. I could not have said that if I had come before you last year, and I know you share the pride I have in being able to salute your Democratic Congressman tonight.

There may be another reason why I feel at home here tonight. In Washington, you know things can get pretty hot sometimes. I think it should be a source of pride to you to know that when things get heated in the Capitol Building, York air conditioning is helping cool things off.

We are here tonight in a common bond, the Democratic Party.

Through a century and a half of American history, there has been a Democratic Party. And all that time our party has had one guiding principle: the ideal of government for the common man.

Ours is the oldest political party in the world. The exact date of the party's founding is not clear. But it is certain that it gained lifebreath in the fight of Thomas Jefferson for the Bill of Rights. The battle then was what it has always been for the Democratic Party: to preserve individual liberty. In that great fight which put the Democratic Party into the forefront, Thomas Jefferson declared: "A bill of rights is what the people are entitled to against every government on earth, and what no just government should refuse."

Jefferson's party first sought office opposing the aristocratic Federalists of Alexander Hamilton. Jefferson fought the party which believed that the Government could not last unless the wealthy people of the country were given preferential treatment.

Government for the benefit of the privileged few, the autocrats of privilege, has ever been the spirit of the Republican Party.

When the Eisenhower Republican administration came into power in 1953, there was great rejoicing by the men of big business, big finance, and big law. One of General Eisenhower's first actions was to take care of his rich friends. And, right off, he named to his Cabinet nine millionaires and a plumber. The plumber, needless to say, is no longer with him. Under Eisenhower, the Republican Party has run true to form. It has followed the party spirit enunciated by Alexander Hamilton. Hamilton's scheme was to create a permanent class to run the Government of those who held the wealth and capital of the country. It was built for the autocrats of privilege and there was no humanity in it.

Our great Speaker of the House, SAM RAYBURN, has often said that the Democratic Party is the party with humanity in it. Ours is the party with a heart. It was our party that created the ideal of humane government.

You know, the Democratic Party's early role in protecting the immigrant settlers almost has been forgotten. Back in the 1850's, some 600,000 European immigrants were entering this country each year. The Know-Nothing Party came into being for the sole purpose of ending this immigration. Members of the bigoted Know-Nothing movement burned churches and beat up immigrants on the streets. They ran almost unchecked until the Democratic National Convention of 1856 took a strong stand which broke the back of the Know-Nothings. The Democratic belief was put forth in a resolution which showed the common people of Europe that America welcomed them to a new life. Our western lands, then being settled, would have been of little use without people to fill them. The Democratic ideal of humane government quickened the movement that built the West.

Thomas Jefferson believed in the fullest possible life for all the people. He believed in the inherent worth of the common man. He was certain that, given the facts, the people would use the right of self-government properly.

Down through 150 years, this has been the line of the Democratic Party. Of course, we have had our ups and our downs. But there have always been men, men of good faith, young men, men ready to fight for good government.

What men we have had.

Thomas Jefferson at 33 drafting the Declaration of Independence.

James Madison at 26 the father of our Constitution.

James Monroe, who formed the basis of American foreign policy which would stand for more than a century.

Andrew Jackson, who after leading the American forces brilliantly in the Battle of New Orleans, went on to become a great President.

One of the finest assertions of basic Democratic principles on record is one delivered by Andrew Jackson while he was President. I would like to quote the words which express clearly our party's beliefs: "Every man is equally entitled to protection by law; but, when the laws undertake to add to those natural and just advantages artificial distinctions, to grant titles, gratuities and exclusive privileges, to make the rich richer and the powerful more potent, the humble members of society—the farmers, mechanics and laborers—who have neither the time nor the means to secure like favors to themselves, have a right to complain of the injustice of their government."

And from here in Pennsylvania there came a man. His name was James Buchanan. As Secretary of State, he wrote the peace treaty with Mexico. As President, he lowered the tariff, and his words on government economy still live in the Democratic 86th Congress. He said, "We ought never to forget that true public economy consists not in withholding the means necessary to accomplish important national objects, but in taking care that the money appropriated for these purposes shall be faithfully and frugally expended."

The Republican Party leadership today delights in calling the Democrats the big spenders. The Republican solution is to ignore crying domestic needs and hang onto a paper budget. They could take a great lesson from James Buchanan of Pennsylvania.

You know, that balanced budget that President Eisenhower has tossed to us in the Congress is one of the big hoaxes of the century. When you try to test the budget by comparing expenditure with revenue, it does not balance. It anticipates revenue which will not be forthcoming. When you try to test the budget by measuring it against the needs of the country, against the suffering of the unemployed, against the demands for better schools, hospitals, and housing, it is far from being a balanced budget.

It is a deficit budget. Deficit in reality and humane ideals.

The Democratic Party is and always has been the party of financial responsibility. The Democratic Party believes, as Grover Cleveland so succinctly put it, "A public office is a public trust."

In the last 4 years of Democratic Congresses, for instance, we have cut $8 billion out of the Republican President's budget. We have done it wisely, responsibly, and we have carried American progress ahead with it.

The Democratic Party has always provided leadership when the country has needed it. In time of crisis, the people historically have turned to the Democratic Party.

During World War I, America looked to Woodrow Wilson. He carried us through, and did not stop there. He devoted his life to a search for peace. Peace among men and among nations.

Woodrow Wilson was a living example of the precept of the Democratic Party which he himself enunciated with these words: "The Democratic Party, and only the Democratic Party, has carried out the policies which the progressive people of this country have desired. * * * I thank God that those who believe in America, who try to serve her people, are likely to be also what America herself from the first hoped and meant to be—the servant of mankind."

In 1929, the people of America had had Republican leadership, or lack of it, for 8 years. They were on the verge of a terrible economic crisis. And it came down like a burst bubble. The great depression. The stock market was at the bottom. There were breadlines in the streets. Thirteen million people were out of work. The Republican President gave them empty words. He said he was opposed to squandering ourselves into prosperity. He said the worst was over, and recovery was assured.

Well, you know the story. In time of crisis, the people turned to the Democratic Party for salvation. They found it in a man named Franklin Delano Roosevelt. F.D.R. told the people there was nothing to fear but fear itself. The people trusted him and he led them through.

The people grew strong under the Democrats during the next two decades. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman guided America through a great global conflict and made us sound and prosperous.

In 1952, the Hoover years were dimmed in American memories. America thought it wanted a change. I do not have to tell you here tonight that America got a change.

We have had many changes while President Eisenhower was sometimes at the Augusta, Ga., Country Club, sometimes at Camp David, sometimes at the Burning Tree golf course, and sometimes on a fancy farm over in Adams County, Pa.

Our allies have been antagonized, our alliances weakened, our strength weakened, our world prestige undermined.

On the home front, the Republican administration gave America more changes. It gave us the worst recession since World War II, with 5 million unemployed workers, the highest prices and taxes in history, a soaring cost of living.

The great change of 1952 brought to America a rededication to the precepts of Alexander Hamilton, where the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. We have felt the pinch of the high interest rates for the benefit of the bankers and the money lenders. We have seen small business squeezed out, while Republican shoulders shrugged at the big steel and auto manufacturers, food producers and chainstores putting through price increases far out of proportion to labor wage increases. Tax cuts have been reserved for corporations and rich taxpayers.

The workers, consumers, small businessmen, and farmers were neglected while the administration shadow-boxed with inflation.

You are located here in the heart of a great agricultural region. Did you know that the Republicans have driven 4 million people off the farms in 5 years?

Under the great change of 1952, there has come about a heartless and callous slashing of programs vital to the health of the people. There have been giveaways, exploitation of natural resources, minerals, water, power, forestry, and land.

The Republican administration let the Russians get the jump on us in the space race. Down in Alabama, at Redstone Arsenal, we have the world's ablest space scientists. These scientists had a rocket ready to go long before the Russian sputnik zoomed into outer space. America could have beaten sputnik and strengthened its leadership and prestige if President Eisenhower and Charlie Wilson could have made up their minds and given Redstone Arsenal the go-ahead.

Last November, the people of America realized as never before what the great change of 1952 had brought them.

They saw that once again America is facing a time of crisis. Only this time, it is not one crisis, but multiple crises. There is the farm crisis. The arms research and development crisis. The business crisis. The unemployment crisis.

In November, the people once again showed they were ready to let the Democratic Party take over. They showed it in the only way they could. Had it been a presidential election, we would have a Democrat sitting in the White House right now.

But the people will have to wait until 1960 for that.

Last fall, they could only elect Democrats to governorships, to mayorships, to Congress. And they did it overwhelmingly. In all parts of this great land, Democrats were returned to office or sent there for the first time.

Right here in Pennsylvania, in the 19th Congressional District, after he had been on the sidelines for 2 years, you sent a Democrat back to Washington and I congratulate you for it.

Well, what did that great victory in 1958 for the Democratic Party mean? One thing it most certainly meant was that the people do not want more of what they have been getting. Tired of the weak Republican administration, they are concerned over the unanswered needs on the homefront and abroad.

In short, the people are tired of the great change. They want the Democratic Party, the responsible party, the humane party, to make their laws and to give them leadership.

We Democrats feel very strongly the burden of responsibility that has been placed upon us. In the 86th Congress, where the Democratic majority is larger than at any time in the last 20 years, we know that ours is a solemn obligation to continue to fulfill the expectations of the people who have put us there.

In the 86th Congress, we are going to continue in the spirit of the 85th Congress, which the people so loudly have endorsed.

The job has already started. The Hawaiian and Alaskan statehood bills already have passed, and we have extended unemployment benefits. We are on the verge of passing a new airport aid bill, to help us meet the growing demands of safety and necessity in the jet age. We will soon pass an omnibus housing bill, to provide homes for the homeless.

We will enact health legislation and safety legislation. We will enact labor reform legislation, and we will see that adequate funds are provided for home development and defense.

The list will be long when we are through. It will be done for the ideal of government for the common man, just as it was in the days of Thomas Jefferson. It will be done at times against heavy opposition from the Republican administration.

The voters of America will be watching the 86th Congress. They want to know that their 1958 endorsement of the Democratic Party was justified. I want to tell you that they will not be disappointed. They will be sure in 1960 that the Democratic Party is the party of responsibility.

They will be able to vote in good conscience for the Democratic presidential nominee, confident that their ballot will mean a return to responsible leadership.

America today as never before has need of the Democratic Party. She has need of its spirit of dedication and devotion. She has the need of each of you here tonight, your courage, and devotion, your determination, and vision, your faith in the future.
